As some of my colleagues have done, I want to flag up genuine concern about the cost of the commission. When the Institute for Public Policy Research presented its original scoping proposals for a single commission, some of the equality bodies were worried that there might be an increase in cost. They believed that they would have to do the whole job for less. It has normally been the case that, when Ministers put several institutions into a single regulatory body—one of my hon. Friends referred to the Financial Services Authority—they claim that it will save money but it does not. In the case that we are considering, Ministers are coming out openly and saying that the commission will cost another 40 per cent. Goodness knows what the cost will ultimately be. Some of the debate compounded that with Christmas-tree politics, which adds on further nice things to do. That must be resisted; cost must be carefully probed and controlled.

Let me revert for the last time to political correctness. I emphasise that the commission has an important role in ensuring that that is resisted. There must be no argument for saying that the commission is playing into that. It should also positively dissuade others from doing that. I know from my work in health and safety that it is often not a commission that plays into political correctness.

Judy Mallaber: Will the hon. Gentleman make a commitment on behalf of the Conservatives that, every time they come up with an example of alleged political correctness, they check their facts to ensure that it is not merely one of the many myths that are put about and that make all-too-lovely newspaper headlines?

Mr. Boswell: The hon. Lady will understand that I can be responsible for what I say, but I am not sure that I can be responsible for what my colleagues say.

Mr. Swayne: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Boswell: No, I will not. I cannot be responsible for my hon. Friends, let alone for Labour Members, but we will all do our best. Let us be straight about this; let us find out what is involved and let us understand that if the commission encourages or condones such attitudes, it will devalue its own work. That is not something that I want it to do.

I believe that the great majority of people in this country want to see fairness of treatment and respect for the rights of others as well as of themselves. I also believe that the moral centre of this country is somewhere above the lowest level of the comment in the tabloid newspapers, which consistently underestimate people's decency. They are wrong to do that.

It has been observed that there is unfinished business in other parts of the Bill. There is much more work to be done on producing a single concept, as a result of the gradual, incremental way in which the law on disability and other discrimination has come together. That is why I welcome the review, and the Minister's readiness to open it to outside engagement. There will undoubtedly be a need for a new, single equality Act, but it is better to take a little more time to get that right. I emphasise to the Minister the importance not only of legal form but of equality of redress, so that all the different parts of the Bill work to ensure that people who have a problem can get it raised. The commission will have a role to play in that regard. The relationship with human rights was mentioned in relation to publicly financed private institutions and service providers such as care homes. Many other detailed points were raised, but I do not have time to rehearse them now.

As for the effects of the Bill, the worst possible scenario would be for the Government to believe that the establishment of the commission were an end in itself—I am not saying that they do—or some kind of sophisticated displacement activity, rather than the means to address real inequality of opportunity in society. I very much welcome the review under Trevor Phillips. Members on both sides of the House have rightly referred to the continuing gender pay gap, and to the engagement of disabled people and ethnic minorities in employment. These issues will not go away, and we should talk about them. We should not blame the equality bodies because perfection has not been achieved; but continue to work towards reducing the gaps.

France was mentioned earlier, and all these issues should be viewed without complacency or schadenfreude by Labour Members. A good Parliament should be alert to changing social conditions and try to steer them in the right direction. That is why it is important that the commission should have a role involving monitoring and speaking out. It is, incidentally, possible to cut the costs of monitoring by outsourcing some of those tasks to academia, for example. They do not all have to be done in-house. When Trevor Phillips gets up and expresses his extremely important and challenging views on ethnic inclusion in the United Kingdom, it is right that such people, who take the lead on these issues, should be able to speak out and open up the debate, even if we do not agree with their every last word. That forms part of the national debate. It is not necessarily an expensive activity and I hope that the commission will be able to play a part in it.

Today's debate has shown that we all have a duty to have regard to the condition of the people, and a special duty towards those who are less well placed to voice their concerns. Frankly, most of us will get our own way, one way or another, but there are plenty of people who will not. In our own interests as much as those of anyone else, we need to open our society to the potential of all our citizens, and to remove any roadblocks to their progress and welfare, both as individuals and as groups of individuals. The Bill and the commission will stand or fall on whether they really help to achieve those shared objectives. I support the Bill because I expect and hope that it will help—not on its own, but over time and with the good will of the people—to achieve some of those goals for us.

9.44 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mrs. Anne McGuire): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), who on these issues always makes a thoughtful contribution to the House. I also thank the many hon. Members who have contributed to today's debate, including my hon. Friends the Members for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber), for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan), for Erewash (Liz Blackman)—these quaint English names are sometimes beyond my good Scot's tongue—for Brighton, Kemptown (Dr. Turner) and for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird). I also congratulate the many new Members who have contributed to today's debate, including my hon. Friends the Members for Worsley (Barbara Keeley), for Tooting (Mr. Khan), for Hove (Ms Barlow) and for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier), and those on the Opposition Benches.

I also thank the official Opposition for their support for the Bill, the Liberal Democrats, the Democratic Unionists—who I think support the Bill—and Plaid Cymru, who I trust speak for all the nationalists in the House. We are in the gratifying situation that on this day in 2005 we have almost unanimous agreement on some of the major equality issues. That is to be applauded, because some of us remember the time before the Race Relations Act 1976, the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 and the equal opportunities legislation, when there was not always consensus in the House on how to tackle discrimination.

[Mrs. Anne McGuire]

This is an ambitious Bill, as many contributors to the debate today have said, and we have had a wide-ranging and supportive debate that appropriately reflects the Bill's objectives and underlines how it will affect the lives of so many diverse individuals and groups represented in our communities. Some of the examples that have been raised today are indicative of that. I am grateful for the points that have been made and I shall come to them in a moment.

The Bill is the latest step in the development of our equality and human rights framework. It builds on sound legislative changes that have already been made to challenge race discrimination in public bodies, to better protect people at work from discrimination and to strengthen the rights of disabled people when accessing services and the public sector. It builds on the excellent work done by the three existing equality commissions and the many other organisations working to make Britain a better place for all. As the Minister with responsibility for disabled people, I applaud and recognise the fact that the Disability Rights Commission is five years old this year. Ten or 15 years ago, disabled people throughout the United Kingdom never thought it possible that we would have such a commission to champion their cause and to challenge on their behalf.

The law has moved on, with regulations tackling workplace discrimination on grounds of religion and belief, and sexual orientation. There will soon be similar regulations to tackle age discrimination. But there are no institutions in place to enforce those regulations. There is no institution providing advice or promoting human rights. So the time is right for a single commission for equality and human rights, ensuring greater impact, greater relevance, greater ease of access and greater coherence.

The Bill also extends the legislation against discrimination on the grounds of a person's religion or belief. For the first time, it provides protection and reassurance for many in the provision of goods, facilities and services and other important areas.

Part 2 corrects an anomaly in the law. Through developments under the Race Relations Act, Jews and Sikhs are already protected against discrimination in the provision of goods, facilities and services, the management and disposal of premises and the provision of education—protection that is not available to any other faith or belief. The Bill deals with that anomaly.

It is generally accepted, that the Bill has been improved by the addition of part 3, which contains the power to make regulations prohibiting discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation. It is an example of the Government's response to support in Parliament and elsewhere. We are honouring our long-standing commitment to gender equality by introducing the most significant measure in 30 years in the form of a new public duty.

The Bill is not intended to do everything, but it forms part of our overall strategy for action on equality. I think it was my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey who said, using a telling phrase, that this was the starter before the main course. Work is continuing on the other two prongs. The equality review is considering the underlying causes of continuing inequalities, while the discrimination law review is considering the development of a more consistent and coherent legal framework throughout discrimination law. I ask Members who may be disappointed by some of the perceived gaps in the Bill to bear in mind the importance of getting changes right before including them in legislation.

Opposition Members in particular mentioned cost. The £70 million budget planned for the commission represents a 43 per cent. increase on the existing commissions' budgets, but it also reflects an objective assessment of what the CEHR will need, based on work to identify its activities and services and the resources required to support them. Others raised the issue of regional presences. One reason for our wish to fund the commission properly is the need to ensure that there is a strong regional presence. Combining the various bodies will produce efficiency savings, but they will be ploughed into front-line services. There will not be an open-ended cheque book which no one will ever scrutinise. The budget is specifically for the work that the House will ask the commission to do, and, as I have said, any savings will be ploughed back into the front line.

Mrs. Laing: Will the Minister undertake to report to the House each year on how much the CEHR has cost and why the cost has risen or, indeed, fallen? Keeping costs down will be very important.

Mrs. McGuire: As the hon. Lady well knows, Ministers come to the House each year to explain their budget commitments and how the budgets are spent. I assume that this will be part of our normal accountability to Parliament.

The business community was mentioned by both the hon. Lady and the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller). Representatives of the CBI and the Small Business Council participated in the CEHR taskforce, helped to draw up the White Paper and advised on consultation responses, and are represented on the CEHR steering group, which is advising on the establishment of the new commission. In fact, business wants a single equalities body: it wants all advice and guidance on all areas of discrimination and human rights law to be in one place. I hope that that gives some comfort to those who fear that businesses feel that they are being over-regulated. They are actually being very supported.

The hon. Members for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) and for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow), my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar and, again, the hon. Member for Basingstoke mentioned age discrimination. It is clearly wrong at both ends of the spectrum—and the House should recognise that it happens to younger as well as older people. Developing ways to tackle age discrimination in an effective, properly targeted manner is, however, complicated and that is why we have asked the discrimination law review team to examine ways in which we can solve some of the major issues. It is fair to say that Age Concern, Help the Aged and other organisations representing older people support that approach, rather than putting measures into the Bill and perhaps not getting it right at this time.

I wanted to deal with the issue of children. Of course children are people and they will be covered by the CEHR. As the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) highlighted, there will be memorandums of understanding with the commissioners in both Wales and Scotland. It is important that we recognise the nuances of devolution in relation to that element.

Hywel Williams: Will the Minister ensure that there is full discussion with the Welsh Assembly on the appointment of members to sit on the Welsh committee?

Mrs. McGuire: I can assure the House that there are already discussions taking place with both the Welsh Assembly Government and the Scottish Executive on those issues.

On regional arrangements, I hope that I have already dealt with that under the issue of cost. It was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North and by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar. We have listened intently to all the representations from across the country as to where the commission's headquarters should be sited. We have noted them all and the location study will report in due course.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar made an important point when she asked why we had not gone down a fourth way and provided a legislative solution to the problem of the meaning of "public authority" in the Human Rights Act 1998. We must be sure that any legislative alteration to the meaning of public authority in the Act will not have an adverse impact on other discrimination legislation, such as that on the public duty to promote equality. It is for that reason that we have asked the discrimination law review team specifically to consider that issue. We expect to issue a consultation paper calling for arguments and evidence on that subject early next year.

I will deal quickly with some of the more specific issues that were raised. I give my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash the assurances that she was seeking in terms of the disability strand. I also pick up on some, not all, of the contribution of the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne). There is a cut-off date of 18 May to allow boy scouts and girl guides to continue to make the promise. We did not want to create a loophole where future groups could get around discrimination laws by requiring potential members to make a statement such as, "I believe in all faiths but Islam" or "I believe in all faiths except Christianity." It is to deal with a potential loophole.

I hope now to give the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) some pre-Christmas cheer and to send him away with a smile and spring in his step, which I reckon is a pretty formidable task. The Home Office is not withdrawing funding from the carol service that he mentioned. In fact, it has agreed to pay up to £2,000 towards the cost of the memorial service for four consecutive years.

This is an important Bill that has gained widespread support in this House. It is a good Bill and I hope that the House will endorse it.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read a Second time.

EQUALITY BILL [LORDS] (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No.83A (6)(Programme motions).

That the following provisions shall apply to the Equality Bill [Lords]:

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

2. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on Thursday 8th December.

3. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

Consideration and Third Reading

4. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on the day on which proceedings on consideration are commenced.

6. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Other proceedings

7. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments or on any further message from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

The House divided: Ayes 292, Noes 42.

Division No. 103] [9.59 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Allen, Mr. Graham
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Armstrong, rh Hilary
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Austin, John
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Baird, Vera
Balls, Ed
Banks, Gordon
Barlow, Ms Celia
Barron, rh Mr. Kevin
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Begg, Miss Anne
Benton, Mr. Joe
Bercow, John
Berry, Roger
Betts, Mr. Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Breed, Mr. Colin
Brennan, Kevin
Brooke, Annette
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Mr. Des
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnham, Andy
Burstow, Mr. Paul
Butler, Ms Dawn
Byrne, Mr. Liam
Cairns, David
Campbell, Mr. Ronnie
Caton, Mr. Martin
Cawsey, Mr. Ian
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Chaytor, Mr. David
Clark, Ms Katy
Clark, Paul
Clarke, rh Mr. Charles
Clarke, rh Mr. Tom
Clelland, Mr. David
Coaker, Mr. Vernon
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Cooper, Rosie
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cousins, Jim
Crausby, Mr. David
Creagh, Mary
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
David, Mr. Wayne
Davidson, Mr. Ian
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Denham, rh Mr. John
Devine, Mr. Jim
Dhanda, Mr. Parmjit
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.

Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Eagle, Angela
Eagle, Maria
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Ennis, Jeff
Etherington, Bill
Farrelly, Paul
Field, rh Mr. Frank
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Follett, Barbara
Foster, Mr. Don
Foster, Mr. Michael (Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye)
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
George, Andrew
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Gidley, Sandra
Gilroy, Linda
Goggins, Paul
Goldsworthy, Julia
Goodman, Helen
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Grogan, Mr. John
Gwynne, Andrew
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hall, Patrick
Hamilton, Mr. Fabian
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harris, Mr. Tom
Harvey, Nick
Havard, Mr. Dai
Healey, John
Heath, Mr. David
Henderson, Mr. Doug
Hendrick, Mr. Mark
Heppell, Mr. John
Hesford, Stephen
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hodgson, Mrs. Sharon
Hoey, Kate
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Horwood, Martin
Howarth, David
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Hughes, rh Beverley
Hughes, Simon
Humble, Mrs. Joan
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Mr. Eric
Ingram, rh Mr. Adam
Irranca-Davies, Huw
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Jenkins, Mr. Brian
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Helen
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Khabra, Mr. Piara S.
Khan, Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Kilfoyle, Mr. Peter
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Laws, Mr. David
Laxton, Mr. Bob
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Love, Mr. Andrew
MacDougall, Mr. John
Mackinlay, Andrew
MacShane, rh Mr. Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marris, Rob
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall, Mr. David
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCafferty, Chris
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
McFadden, Mr. Pat
McFall, rh Mr. John
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McKenna, Rosemary
Meale, Mr. Alan
Michael, rh Alun
Miliband, rh Mr. David
Miliband, Edward
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Mr. Austin
Moffat, Anne
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Moore, Mr. Michael
Morden, Jessica
Morgan, Julie
Morley, Mr. Elliot
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Munn, Meg
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, Mr. Jim
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Olner, Mr. Bill
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Palmer, Dr. Nick
Pound, Stephen
Prescott, rh Mr. John
Price, Adam
Primarolo, rh Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Purnell, James
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Roy, Mr. Frank
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Bob
Russell, Christine
Ryan, Joan
Salter, Martin
Sarwar, Mr. Mohammad
Seabeck, Alison
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheridan, Jim
Short, rh Clare
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, Ms Angela C. (Sheffield, Hillsborough)
Smith, rh Jacqui
Snelgrove, Anne
Soulsby, Sir Peter
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Straw, rh Mr. Jack
Stringer, Graham
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Tami, Mark
Taylor, Ms Dari
Taylor, David
Teather, Sarah
Thornberry, Emily
Timms, Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mr. Mark
Touhig, Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Turner, Mr. Neil
Twigg, Derek
Ussher, Kitty
Vaz, Keith
Vis, Dr. Rudi
Waltho, Lynda
Ward, Claire
Wareing, Mr. Robert N.
Watson, Mr. Tom
Watts, Mr. Dave
Webb, Steve
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Williams, Mrs. Betty
Williams, Hywel
Williams, Mark
Williams, Mr. Roger
Williams, Stephen
Willis, Mr. Phil
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Ayes:
Gillian Merron and
Mr. Alan Campbell

NOES

Boswell, Mr. Tim
Brazier, Mr. Julian
Brokenshire, James
Burrowes, Mr. David
Campbell, Mr. Gregory
Clifton-Brown, Mr. Geoffrey
Davies, David T.C. (Monmouth)
Dorries, Mrs. Nadine
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Ellwood, Mr. Tobias
Evans, Mr. Nigel
Evennett, Mr. David
Goodwill, Mr. Robert
Grieve, Mr. Dominic
Hammond, Stephen
Harper, Mr. Mark
Hendry, Charles
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Hurd, Mr. Nick
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Lewis, Dr. Julian
McCrea, Dr. William
McIntosh, Miss Anne
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Moss, Mr. Malcolm
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
O'Brien, Mr. Stephen
Pritchard, Mark
Robertson, Hugh
Robertson, Mr. Laurence
Robinson, Mrs. Iris
Robinson, Mr. Peter
Selous, Andrew
Spink, Bob
Stanley, rh Sir John
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Viggers, Peter
Wallace, Mr. Ben
Watkinson, Angela
Whittingdale, Mr. John

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Eric Forth and
Mr. Andrew Turner

Question accordingly agreed to.

EQUALITY BILL [LORDS] [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a)(Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with bills).

That for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Equality Bill [Lords] it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(1) expenditure incurred under the Act by the Secretary of State, and

(2) any increase attributable to the Act in sums payable out of money so provided under another enactment.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

Question agreed to.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation).

MAGISTRATES' COURTS

That the draft Family Procedure (Modification of Enactments) Order 2005, which was laid before this House on 12th October, be approved.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation).

FAMILY PROCEEDINGS

That the draft Access to Justice Act 1999 (Destination of Appeals) (Family Proceedings) Order 2005, which was laid before this House on 12th October, be approved.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation).

ACCESS TO JUSTICE

That the Revised Funding Code prepared by the Legal Services Commission, a copy of which was laid before this House on 19th October, be approved.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation).

NORTHERN IRELAND

That the draft Employment (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Northern Ireland) Order 2005, which was laid before this House on 24th October, be approved.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation).

EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES

That the draft European Communities (Definition of Treaties) (WIPO Copyright Treaty and WIPO Performances and Phonograms Treaty) Order 2005, which was laid before this House on 13th October, be approved.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation).

FOOD

That the draft Healthy Start Scheme and Welfare Food (Amendment) Regulations 2005, which were laid before this House on 3rd November, be approved.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation).

CRIMINAL LAW

That the draft Criminal Justice Act 2003 (Commencement No. 12 and Transitory Provisions) Order 2005, which was laid before this House on 27th October, be approved.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

Mr. Speaker: I think the Ayes have it.

Hon. Members: No.

Division deferred till Wednesday 23 November, pursuant to Standing Order No. 41A (Deferred divisions).

COMMITTEES

ENVIRONMENTAL AUDIT

Ordered,

That David Lepper be discharged from the Environmental Audit Committee and Mrs Linda Riordan be added.—[Rosemary McKenna, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

WELSH AFFAIRS

Ordered,

That Mrs Betty Williams be discharged from the Welsh Affairs Committee and Jessica Morden be added.—[Rosemary McKenna, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

Transport (South-West)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

10.15 pm

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): My constituency is strategically located at the centre of the far south-west on the border of Devon and Cornwall. Plymouth is the south-west region's second city, with a population of 240,000 people. In my previous debate on urban renaissance in Plymouth, I spoke of our plans to accommodate—indeed, to welcome—substantial population growth over the next 20 years, taking us to 300,000 or even 350,000 people. Such growth, matched by increased economic activity and housing provision, will allow Plymouth to achieve a level of performance and quality of life appropriate to its size. It will also play a key part in addressing local and regional disparities in our economy and standing of living. Disparities between the east and west ends of our region are the greatest of any region in England. Plymouth recognises the need for a rapid improvement in transport performance in this context.

The city council has submitted a bid for intervention funding from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to meet support from a partner authority for further acceleration of its performance improvement. Evidence of Plymouth's commitment to transport issues and its ability to deliver when investment is available includes the A386 major transport scheme, an impressive performance on road safety—Plymouth has already reached the national 2010 targets for accident reduction and recently published a child road safety audit to indicate how further improvements can be made—and the Morice Town home zone, which is in the constituency my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Alison Seabeck) and is a national example for reducing crime, road accidents and through traffic.

Given good project management and the success of the partnering contract with the main contractor, the city council is meeting its targets for the delivery of the A386 major scheme within budget and on time. The council has recommended to the Department for Transport additional complementary elements to the major scheme to deliver stretched outcomes without increasing the funding contribution from the DFT of £11.25 million. Although the city council understands that the Department for Transport is not currently in a position to confirm whether savings from the capital programme can be released to fund additional elements, it hopes that the DFT will be able to make a positive response to its recommendation at the earliest opportunity.

Plymouth's second local transport plan focused on increasing bus patronage, which has been declining faster than national levels in recent years. A number of projects that are nearing completion should assist in building bus patronage. The investment to achieve that has been welcome, and I hope the Minister will agree that good use is being made of it. Nevertheless, I point out that Plymouth received lower transport allocations than other cities of similar size under the first local transport plan, when our aspirations were perhaps a little lower than they are now. Although our performance two years ago was poor, the council has now placed transport high on the city's agenda, and the annual performance score has risen from a low of 42 per cent. to 64 per cent. now.

Plymouth has not submitted a bid for this round of the transport innovation funding, as its strategy needs to be developed further in that respect, particularly to explore opportunities to work jointly with its neighbours in the sub-region, but the Government can expect a major scheme bid to be identified in the second LTP submission next March and further funding bids through both the transport innovation fund and other domestic and European funding streams, supported by increasing private sector involvement. It is vital that central Government are prepared to increase their investment in transport infrastructure for Plymouth to enable sustainable economic and housing growth in the far south-west and to send a clear message of confidence to the market.

I now to turn to the importance of transport links and connectivity to the rest of the UK. Research commissioned by SWERDA—the South West of England Regional Development Agency—from the university of the West of England and Bath university has shown that increased journey times and journey costs, coupled with the isolation from complementary businesses, causes productivity to reduce by as much as 4 per cent. per hour, compared with businesses located in the south-east, owing to added journey times from London. A normal road journey from Plymouth to London takes four hours 15 minutes, and the journey from further down in Cornwall in Penzance takes a good two hours more.

Following announcements made in 2001 on the combined ODPM and Department of Trade and Industry approach to regional policy, a consultation was launched at the time of the 2004 pre-Budget report called "Devolving Decision Making." It gave a commitment to a public service agreement target to > "make sustainable improvements in the economic performance of all English Regions and over the long term to reduce the persistent gap in growth rates between the regions, defining measures to improve performance and reporting progress against these measures by 2006".

The consultation on funding allocations comprises transport, housing and economic development funding streams, and the Government are requesting advice by the end of July 2006.

I know that the regional assembly and the regional development agency are working on the regional spatial and economic strategies. They must achieve a challenging balancing act if they are to ensure that their priorities for investment tackle congestion on road and rail and resolve bottlenecks so that our economy performs in a way that reduces the economic disparities that I have mentioned.

I do not intend to try to put before the Minister the content of the advice on transport that is emerging from the process. My goal tonight is to give him and his colleagues a picture of the critical importance of recognising the needs of Plymouth, Devon and Cornwall and the scale of the challenge facing businesses, planners and public services. I also want to explain why such issues have been—and remain—at the top of the agenda for business organisations such as the Devon and Cornwall business council and the Plymouth chamber of commerce for as long as I can remember. I shall consider each of the important land-based transport modes, some current challenges and the light that they cast on the importance of the decisions that lie ahead.

On roads, the Minister will know of the disappointment about the decision to prioritise investment on dualling the A303-A358 instead of the A303 west of Ilminster through to Exeter. Ensuring that there is resilience and reliability by developing two fully strategic arteries to address the challenges for the west of Devon, Plymouth and Cornwall could be properly achieved only by dualling the A303 to Exeter. I suspect that the Secretary of State was unwilling to back the overwhelming wishes of the Devon and Cornwall business community because only a slender majority of the assembly was in favour. There was a strategic failure to recognise the importance of reliable road travel when addressing regional disparities. I am sorry to criticise a body that I believe strives on most occasions to fulfil a strategic role well through what is an important and increasingly indispensable job. The decision enhances the position of Taunton and the surrounding areas, which already have comparatively good connectivity by rail and road outside the region, but does little to address the productivity deficit to which I referred earlier.

The past six to nine months have demonstrated clearly why the decision was bad. Roadworks on the M5, the A38 and the A303 at Marsh have caused delays and increased journey times, which has caused considerable frustration and concern to people and businesses in Devon and Cornwall. The quality of stakeholder consultation has been poor. The time scale of the four-mile works on the A38 around Buckfastleigh, for which no night-time work is planned, means that there will be a 26-week period during which the carriageway will be restricted, which has caused particular concern. I know that DCBC and Plymouth chamber of commerce have made robust representations about that. I hope that the Minister will consider whether night-time work could be allowed after the completion of a bridge section—that section is adjacent to a settlement, so we all understand that it deserves consideration—and especially before the 2006 tourist season begins. I would welcome him taking an interest in ensuring that future consultation is of a better quality, especially in the light of what I am about to say about our rail services in the near term.

Road investment to remove bottlenecks is important and welcome, but there is worry that the overall pot of money proposed for the south-west will not be enough, especially if the enhancement of the A303 by tunnelling at Stonehenge, which will be an expensive project, must be paid for from that pot. I repeat a plea that I made earlier this year: we must ensure that that investment is taken from national resources because the work will enhance a site of national, and indeed international, importance. As I have said, the consultation on funding allocations is requested by the end of January 2006. If we cannot have a true second arterial route opened up to the west of Devon and Cornwall, issues relating to our rail and air services will become even more critical.

Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that, as part of Transport for London's look at the corridor plan for South West Trains, the Mayor of London is considering demand patterns to the south-west? Does she agree that it is vital that the Mayor fully understands the importance of maintaining regular and fast links to the south-west, that the Crossrail project could, particularly during its construction phase, have serious implications for the south-west that need to be fully considered and understood, and that the Mayor really must ensure that his plans are not too London-centric?

Linda Gilroy: I certainly welcome my hon. Friend's move to ensure that the Mayor is fully aware of that. The Minister knows well our concerns about rail; many Members have made robust representations. Viewing our transport issues across the piece is essential against the background of what I have just been saying about roads. He has certainly heard our concerns about how Crossrail could disrupt our hard-won three-hour journey to Plymouth, which would of course also impact on services beyond. Positive consideration of the regional assembly's petition for a full impact assessment is vital. I also believe that there is to be disruption to the Waterloo to Exeter service. Will the Minister ensure that any journey delays arising from that do not clash with the period of work on Crossrail?

The importance that Plymouth attaches to the three-hour journey—remembering the productivity issues that I mentioned earlier—must be recognised. The document for the renewal of the Greater Western rail franchise ought to specify more than one three-hour journey per day to and from London Paddington and the preservation of our sleeper service to Plymouth and Cornwall.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): The hon. Lady is right about the case that she makes about rail services to the far south-west and Cornwall. The shortest train journey time to Penzance is five hours, and more often longer, so does she agree that, given the threat to the sleeper service and the fact that both the east and west main lines provide far faster services to the north of England and Scotland, the Minister has only one choice: either to give Cornwall and the south-west a high-speed rail link or to keep the sleeper service? He cannot deny us both.

Linda Gilroy: We certainly need to preserve the sleeper service and to see development, growth and a positive step change in public transport delivery to match the rising demand and expectations not only of the residents of Plymouth but of the region's residents and visitors. The fact that Plymouth's population is set to grow from its present 240,000 perhaps to as much as 350,000 has not been properly considered.

Will the Minister look at the specification of the new Greater Western franchise to ensure that it takes account of the growth anticipated by the regional economic strategy and "The Way Ahead"? As they are currently outside the remit of the regional funding allocation's transport budget, can he help us ensure that investment in rail services supports the region's aspirations for spatial and economic growth? What consideration has his Department given to the need to maintain the integrity of existing strategic rail routes into and out of the region with regard to the future of the Dawlish sea wall and the impact of climate change? I hope that he acknowledges that we need some strategic oversight of the proposed road and rail works to ensure that we do not see deterioration in what is becoming viewed as "transport exclusion" in our part of the world.

[Linda Gilroy]

Finally, will the Minister consider our air services against that same background? Services from Plymouth airport are doing well with new operators Air Southwest and Air Wales. Demand has increased substantially, and in the past 12 months the number of passengers using the airport has increased by 68 per cent. to 132,000. There are now 11 scheduled flights a day to London Gatwick, Bristol, Manchester, Newcastle, Dublin, Cork, Cardiff, Leeds, Liverpool, Aberdeen and Jersey. That contrasts with the situation just a little more than a year ago, when there was a service only to Gatwick. That is a significant improvement.

Plymouth city council is committed to retaining an airport in the city. A study will soon report on the facility that would bring most benefit to the city in terms of the ambitions and aspirations that I mentioned earlier. The viability of Plymouth airport has always depended on running joint services to Newquay St. Mawgan airport. In the light of last week's decision by the Ministry of Defence on St. Mawgan, will the Minister take a close interest in ensuring that public support and help to keep important air services flying to Cornwall complements this growth in Plymouth's air services, rather undermines it, as it has the potential to do? What is happening with the Department of Trade and Industry's consideration of whether regional development agencies can invest in route development funding, as requested by the north-east and north-west RDAs? Can the Minister understand the importance of having a framework that allows us to secure our air services, given the challenges faced by, and the fragilities of, our road and rail services, to which I have referred?

The Minister knows that I am normally a "glass half full", rather than a "glass half empty", person. Our part of the region is capable of achieving and welcoming sustainable growth in a way that some other parts of the country perhaps are not. I hope that he can do something to reassure my constituents—especially those in the business community, who are keen to help Plymouth and the south-west to reach their full potential—about the Government's commitment to assisting with the challenges that I have described. In particular, I hope that he will look at the role that the revolving investment fund proposed in "The Way Ahead" might play in helping to achieve our ambitious agenda for improving the transport infrastructure of, and services to, Plymouth, Devon and Cornwall.

10.31 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) on securing this important Adjournment debate on the transport needs and priorities in the far south-west. I listened very carefully to what she said.

This Government are committed to sustained long-term investment to improve local transport as a key element of their 10-year plan for transport. We announced in December 2000 that £8.4 billion would be available to implement local transport plans across England over the following five years. We also indicated that the four transport authorities in the far south-west would receive more than £88.8 million for integrated transport and maintenance measures in their first LTPs. In addition to this figure, we provided more than £15 million in reward funding and supplementary bids.

In our White Paper entitled "The Future of Transport—A Network for 2030", which was published last year, we confirmed our commitment to continue this high investment in all forms of transport. The planning guidelines published for the five years of the second LTPs maintain these high levels of investment. Subject to the results of the consultation and the final assessments of the far south-west authorities' second LTPs, we plan to make available similar levels of investment— nearly £99 million over the next five years. Of course, if the LTPs are assessed as among the best in the country, that figure could increase significantly.

LTPs will address the very real needs of people in the far south-west. The focus will be on our shared priorities, which have been agreed with our partners in local government. There are four main areas for LTPs to address. First, they will tackle congestion, which costs us all in lost time and pollution. Secondly, they will aim to improve people's access to the jobs and services that they need for day-to-day living. Thirdly, they will continue the excellent work undertaken in the past five years to improve road safety. Plymouth city council, for example, has achieved a 48 per cent. reduction in serious or fatal child casualties over the life of the first LTP. Finally, LTPs will aim to improve air quality by working with other stakeholders to remove the air quality management areas that have been declared.

Transport authorities are now working up final plans to take account of lessons learned, and planning for the next five years. The Department is working closely with authorities across a range of topics, and advising, where necessary, on improving delivery against targets. Final LTPs will be presented to the Government in March next year.

LTPs have also provided a financial mechanism for delivering major schemes in the far south-west that cost more than £5 million. Of the four schemes—including Highways Agency schemes—currently under construction, the Plymouth one is a major public transport scheme. It includes a park-and-ride facility, public transport prioritisation and realignment of the A386 to allow increasing of the runway end safety area at Plymouth airport and conformity with Civil Aviation Authority regulations. Initially, this scheme had provisional approval to spend £5 million, but the Government approved a cost increase to £11.25 million, as the scheme still provided excellent value for money. I am pleased that the authority has brought the project to completion with savings on the original budget, and I congratulate it on that achievement.

In Devon, construction began on the Barnstaple bypass in February 2005. The scheme is partly funded by Devon county council but the majority of resources—nearly £38 million—come from central Government funds. Two further schemes in Cornwall have received provisional approval for more than £37 million—the A39 Camelford distributor road and the A391 St. Austell to A30 link road. Work has begun on the Highways Agency scheme to replace the single carriageway A30 trunk road between the Bodmin bypass and the Indian Queens bypass with a new dual carriageway at a cost of £93 million. It is planned to open the road in summer 2007.

Work has also commenced on the improvement at Merrymeet, which will open in April 2007. The public inquiry into the Dobwalls improvement will open in January next year. That, too, is evidence of a genuine commitment by the Government to address local congestion points in the region. Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly are designated objective 1 funding areas, and have thus benefited from significant investment in transport. Schemes such as the double tracking of the main rail line between Probus and Burngullow and improvements at Newquay airport to increase passenger handling capacity have increased opportunities in the region. Authorities in the far south-west have been successful in bidding for funds from other central funding sources. Recently, support has been announced for more than £2 million of kick-start bids in that part of the region. In the past five years, nearly £5.1 million has been awarded from the urban and rural bus challenge funds. In addition, I recently announced that £1.5 million would part-fund work to turn Exeter into one of six cycling demonstration towns.

My hon. Friend will recall the announcement on the second strategic road route to the south-west by the Secretary of State in November last year. The decision was made to improve in due course the A358 so that it would provide that route in conjunction with the A303. The route was chosen on the grounds of value for money and the lowest impact on the environment. The process has now been handed over to the region to decide how the route fits with other priorities. The world heritage site at Stonehenge, which my hon. Friend mentioned, is recognised by the Government as extremely important. However, due to a substantial increase in the cost of the proposed Stonehenge tunnel, we have deferred a decision on the inspector's report and recommendations on the draft scheme orders. Instead, a detailed review of scheme options is being carried out. There will be a full public consultation early in the new year before the steering group puts its recommendations to the Government by summer 2006. We do not know what will emerge from the review and what the scheme will cost. It is not possible to say how it will impact on the regional funding allocation for the south-west at this stage.

Linda Gilroy: My understanding is that the cost of the scheme approaches £300 million, which accounts for a significant part of the transport budget. I hope that the Minister will keep an eagle eye on that issue, and help us to ensure that if the scheme goes ahead in that form the funding comes from a national, rather than a regional, budget.

Derek Twigg: My hon. Friend makes an important point, but she will have noted what I have just said.

We have introduced regional funding allocations so that the regions have more opportunity to influence the way in which transport funds are spent in their area. The south-west has been given an indicative allocation of just over £1 billion for the period 2005–06 to 2015–16. That sum will be devoted to funding local authority schemes costing over £5 million and schemes on trunk roads and motorways on the Highways Agency's regional network. The south-west region has been asked to identify the schemes that it regards as priorities for funding over that period and to submit that advice to central Government by end of January 2006. In that context, the suggestion of a revolving infrastructure fund for the south-west region is an interesting one, as it could be a useful tool in helping to provide development in the right places so that land use and transport considerations are properly integrated in support of sustainable economic growth.

My hon. Friend referred to rail issues. My Department is currently considering bids for the Greater Western rail franchise. The refranchising operation aims to deliver improved journey times, better quality, and more coherent services between London Paddington and the west. The new franchise will require the operator to provide at least one three-hour train in each direction on weekdays—there is currently no such obligation. The existing operator provides all such services on commercial judgment.

The base case on which the winning bidder for the Greater Western franchise will be chosen includes the continuation of the sleeper service. However, bidders were asked to submit a costed option of not providing it and were encouraged to look for alternative ways of serving the overnight market between London and the south-west. The aim of the costed option is to provide evidence of the cost of delivering the service and, if possible, to provide ways of identifying options that offer better value for money.

Crossrail will increase capacity and offer a better range of transport connections to central London, the City and docklands. Construction will be managed through a series of night-time and weekend track possessions and a two-week closure of Paddington. The details will be established through the normal Network Rail timetable and works planning processes. There is not expected to be any specific impact on services to and from the south-west during normal operation to and from Paddington. The intention is that Crossrail will use the slow lines, not the fast lines. The fast lines will also benefit from the additional electrification to ease freight train access.

My hon. Friend asked what consideration the Department has given to the need to maintain the integrity of the existing strategic routes with regard to the future of the Dawlish sea wall. This is an important and very scenic connection, on which Network Rail spent £2.5 million in 2003 to strengthen the foundations of the sea walls.

The works on the A38 to which my hon. Friend referred are essential maintenance to replace a stretch of road that had begun to fail structurally. Following discussions with the local environmental health officers, it was determined that night working is not possible because the road runs near communities and would cause annoyance to residents. The machinery being used is, I understand, very noisy. I note that the work was programmed for the quieter months from September through to Easter, to be completed before the main holiday season starts.

[Derek Twigg]

I welcome the growth of Plymouth airport over the past 12 months as a result of the introduction of new services. That is in line with policies in the air transport White Paper supporting the expansion of regional airports to serve local demand. However, the future development of Plymouth City airport is a matter for the city council and for the operator. I understand that they have commissioned a study to examine the future role of the airport, including the possibility of extending the main runway in order to assure the long-term viability of the airport. The airlines currently serving Plymouth have aircraft capable of operating a viable network of routes from the existing runway.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Defence announced on 17 November that RAF St. Mawgan will not be considered further as a base for the joint combat aircraft. I am grateful to him for the clarity of the decision, which I hope will help to alleviate concerns in the far south-west about the long-term future of Newquay Cornwall airport, which utilises the runway, apron and other facilities of St. Mawgan. The decision leaves the way clear for Cornwall county council, which operates the civil airport, to propose plans for its long-term development.

My hon. Friend asked about route development funding to support the start-up of new services from airports in the south-west. The air transport White Paper advocated the use of such funds, but it is for each individual regional development agency to consider whether to establish a fund, in the light of its own financial position and priorities.

Linda Gilroy: I have not heard my hon. Friend's full answer, of course, but I meant to raise the potential role for public service obligations, such as exist up to Inverness airport. May I add to the representations that I made about preserving air services by saying that that should be kept under review? With the fragility of the service, which we outlined today, and the dependence of the two airports on each other, such an obligation could be necessary in the future.

Derek Twigg: I understand the important point that my hon. Friend makes. In her speech, she was clear about that.

The far south-west is a diverse region with a growing population, great economic potential, and prized environmental and cultural assets. To maximise the benefits from these advantages, and to enable the region to develop economically and reduce social exclusion, transport must be well planned, managed and delivered. The Government are committed to working with our regional and local partners to provide the leadership that that requires. I hope I have been able to give some reassurance to my hon. Friend about our commitments to the far south-west, but I know that she will continue to be a great advocate for the south-west and for improvements in transport in the region.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at sixteen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Tuesday 22 November 2005

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

HEALTH

The Secretary of State was asked—

NHS Dentistry

1. Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): What percentage of the residents of the South Leicestershire primary care trust area is registered with an NHS dentist. [30509]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): Registration details are not collected on the basis of residency. However, the number of patients registered with dental practices in south Leicestershire is equivalent to 51 per cent. of the local population, a 3.1 per cent. increase since October 2004. Fifteen practices are currently accepting NHS patients.

Mr. Robathan: The other 49 per cent., including my family and myself and my constituents in the Lutterworth area, would like to register with an NHS dentist but, believe me, it is impossible to find one. Can the Minister explain how it was that in September 1999 the Prime Minister said to the Labour party conference:

> "In the next two years everybody will have access to an NHS dentist"?

Was the Prime Minister mistaken then, or was he not entirely correct when he told the Labour party conference that?

Ms Winterton: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we are reforming the system whereby NHS dentistry is delivered. With regard to the first part of his question, there is a dental access centre in his area. There are 15 practices currently registering NHS patients in his area, so I suggest he contacts the PCT to see whether he can be registered.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The position in south Leicestershire has a knock-on effect on the nearby PCT of Charnwood and North-West Leicestershire, in which my constituency is located. There are therefore shortages there, apart from the western end of the constituency. The soon-to-be amalgamated PCT has done a reasonable job introducing the new contracts. Can the Minister confirm that as recently as 1992, less than 10 per cent. of UK dentist income came from private practice, whereas now it is more than half? When will the new measures start to redress that balance, so that we can get even coverage throughout our county?

Ms Winterton: As the hon. Gentleman rightly said—[HON. MEMBERS: "Friend!"] the difficulty is not necessarily that there is a shortage—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let me say to those on the Opposition Front Bench and others, but mainly those on the Front Bench, that if they want to get to the Government Dispatch Box, they should not shout at a Minister. That is the last way that they will manage to get there.

Ms Winterton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The changes that we will bring in next year will address some of the problems related to the fact that NHS dentists have increasingly been undertaking private work. The offer that we are making to dentists is a fair one. Allowing them more time to do preventive work, and other measures, such as increasing the number of dentists in training and bringing in international recruits, will help to ease the current problem. We know that it is by no means solved, but we are taking firm measures to deal with the crisis that we inherited from the Conservatives.

2. Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): If she will make a statement on her plans to reform NHS dentistry. [30510]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): From April 2006, commissioning of NHS dentistry will be the responsibility of primary care trusts. A new dental contract will be introduced alongside a much simpler system of patient charges. The reforms will improve access, encourage more preventive dentistry and provide a stable income for dentists.

Mr. Jackson: I have corresponded with the Minister and received a delightful letter back from her. Will she come to my constituency, visit the PCT and acknowledge the crisis in NHS dentistry in Peterborough? In the meantime, will she ask her civil servants to undertake an urgent review of the deregistration of NHS dental patients across the country and the massive impact that that is having, particularly on preventive dentistry?

Ms Winterton: I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's correspondence and the situation in his constituency, where I understand that a dentist has threatened to leave the NHS, which would deregister about 30,000 patients. However, I also know that the PCT has been in discussions with other local dentists and is confident that if that dentist deregisters, it can offer those patients places with NHS dentists. I am aware of the problem, and the PCT is dealing with it. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will join me in encouraging the dentist to stay with the NHS and in thanking the PCT, which is working extremely hard to ensure that NHS dentistry is improved in the area and that those 30,000 people are found places, if it is necessary to do so.

Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend has visited my constituency to meet Mr. Tariq Drabu, who has a dental practice in Middleton. Since her visit, he has invested some £50,000 of his own money and, with the help of the PCT, increased his NHS patients by 1,000, and he is also about to take on a new partner. Does she think that his commitment to the NHS sets a good example to other dentists and will she consider visiting Middleton in the new year to see the progress made?

Ms Winterton: I remember visiting my hon. Friend's constituency, where I was particularly impressed by the fact that the dentist to whom he has referred was working under a personal dental services contract. I thank the dentists who have taken that approach, because they have shown how the new contract will work. The system allows more preventive treatment and greater clinical judgment by dentists on how to look after their patients, which benefits not only dentists, but patients, too. That is how we will approach the new contract in April 2006, and my hon. Friend is right that how his PCT has worked locally is an extremely good example of how NHS dentistry can be turned round in a local area.

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): Will the Minister explain how dental registrations in Rochdale have fallen from 58 per cent. in 1997 to 38 per cent. this year? Is that progress?

Ms Winterton: Of course that is not progress, and it is not good that the number of NHS places has fallen. One reason why the decrease has occurred is that more dentists have turned to private work. We have tried to turn the situation around by working with dentists to introduce a new contract that reflects how they say that they want to work and by introducing a simpler system of patient charges to reduce bureaucracy, about which dentists have complained. We are bringing dentists back into the NHS, using international recruits and training more new dentists, which started in October. I know that the situation is far from perfect, particularly in Rochdale, where I have visited the dental access centre, and we are taking steps to turn the situation around.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend confirm that the average dentist currently gets about £80,000 from the NHS plus access to capital grants and that that payment is likely to be maintained under the new system? When dentists deregister, despite the excellent remuneration under the new system, will she encourage PCTs to commission other dental services or directly employ salaried dentists?

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend is right to point out that if a dentist makes a reasonable commitment to the NHS, they can expect to receive about £80,000 in pay plus another £60,000 in business expenses, which is not an unreasonable salary. Because the power and the money will be devolved to the local level, if an NHS dentist decides to leave the NHS despite those generous terms, the PCT will have money available locally to commission dentistry from a dentist who is interested in the NHS.

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley) (Con): As you know, Mr. Speaker, I have a slight interest in the subject, so I might be able to help. The Minister knows that dentists are trained to use new methods, materials and techniques that patients demand and which are, I think correctly, available only outside the NHS. Will she re-examine the contract to see whether it can be tweaked to encourage mixed NHS and private dentistry, which would allow dentists to stay with the NHS, at least in part?

Ms Winterton: Nothing in the new contract will prevent the continuing mix of NHS and private dentistry. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that new materials are available as well as so-called cosmetic dentistry, which is not allowed on the NHS at the moment. He and I have discussed several of those issues, and I can assure him that nothing in the new contract prevents dentists from undertaking private work if that is what patients demand.

Chris Mole (Ipswich) (Lab): The mix to which my hon. Friend refers causes confusion for some patients. What are the Government doing to clarify for patients the information about which services are charged for and which are provided on the NHS?

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend is right that there has been confusion; I am sure that other hon. Members will have had experience of that. People say to me, "I've just paid £1,500 for NHS dental treatment", and I say, "No, you haven't, because the maximum you could pay was £383." The Office of Fair Trading looked into this very thoroughly and said in its report that there is some confusion. As a result of the changes that we are making, we want dentists to make the prices for private work absolutely clear in their surgeries and to tell patients what they can expect to pay under the NHS. The simplified banding system will also make it clearer to patients what they can expect to pay on the NHS. I accept that there has been a problem, but we are taking steps to put it right.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): Is it not the case that the Minister's plans will result in more patients paying more, perverse incentives for dentists to offer cheaper treatments within each of the charging bands, and little help from units of dental activity to encourage preventive work of the sort that my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) mentioned?

Ms Winterton: No, they will not. We should be absolutely clear about what we are offering dentists under the new contract. If they give a reasonable level of commitment to the NHS, they can expect to take home about £80,000 a year. On top of that, about £60,000 is given in expenses to help run practices. That will be guaranteed for three years to encourage the same level of commitment to NHS dentistry as at present. However, in terms of units of dental activity, there will be a reduction to allow for preventive care. The hon. Gentleman is wrong to say that this militates against NHS dentistry; in fact, it is a very good offer to NHS dentists. I hope that Opposition Members would join me in encouraging dentists to stay with the NHS and not to go private.

3. Natascha Engel (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): If she will make a statement on progress towards recruiting extra dentists into the NHS. [30511]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): Some 1,453 dentists were recruited by the end of October 2005, contributing to a 1,100 net increase in the number of NHS dentists in England between September 2004 and September 2005. This recruitment drive improved access to dentistry in many parts of the country. During the past 12 months, registrations increased by 700,000.

Natascha Engel: As a result of that work, NHS patient registration in north-east Derbyshire has increased by nearly 5,000. What steps will my hon. Friend take if a critical mass of dentists opt out of the NHS contract and choose instead to provide private treatment only?

Ms Winterton: I am very pleased to hear that there has been an increase in the number of NHS patients in my hon. Friend's area. That is due in no large part to the work of local primary care trusts—

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): No small part.

Ms Winterton: Quite right. It is due in no small part to PCTs and local dentists working to rectify the situation.

As regards what will happen if dentists do choose to leave the NHS, the whole idea of commissioning at local level is that instead of the money reverting to the centre, as it used to, it remains at local level. That means that the PCT can use that money to purchase dentistry from other dentists or to recruit from other areas if necessary.

Julia Goldsworthy (Falmouth and Camborne) (LD): Does the Minister agree that headcount NHS dentist figures do not give a full picture of the extent of shortages? I recently spoke to a dentist who has only three NHS patients—his wife and two children—but still counts as an NHS headcount dentist. Does the Minister agree that, to overcome the problem, the Department must undertake to measure NHS dentists on a full-time equivalent basis?

Ms Winterton: One of the advantages of the new contract and the new system of commissioning dentistry is that the local PCT will be required to consider local health needs for dentistry and then examine the number of dentists who provide it. If necessary, in the instance that the hon. Lady has highlighted, it would be possible to ask dentists whether they would like to take on more than three patients so that the PCT got the advantage of the money being devolved locally and NHS dentists could expand their practices if others were not willing to offer NHS dentistry.

Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): Is it not the case that, if the Government are to be truly successful in recruiting more dentists, they will have to increase the number of training places available? Will my hon. Friend look closely at the proposal to build a dental school in Stoke-on-Trent as part of the new provision that is planned for the west midlands?

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend knows that we will increase the number of training places by 25 per cent. We set a target this year for 170 extra places and we have made 189 available. As she also knows, we are considering proposals for a new dental school and we will examine them in the new year. Let me remind hon. Members that we are considering a new dental school because the Conservative party closed two when it was in power.

Hospital Closures (Sudbury)

4. Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): What representations she has received about the closure of Walnuttree and St Leonard's hospitals in Sudbury. [30512]

The Secretary of State for Health (Ms Patricia Hewitt): To date, more than 5,000 letters have been received from hon. Members and members of the public on the matter as well as six related parliamentary questions. I also met the hon. Gentleman on 19 July when the issue was discussed.

Mr. Yeo: Is it Government policy to close community hospitals and force patients to travel 40 miles to overstretched general hospitals? Is it Government policy for primary care trusts to issue grossly misleading consultation papers, which omit costings of replacement services, and to withdraw existing hospital-based services before even the most rudimentary community alternatives are in place? If none of those is Government policy, why is the Secretary of State allowing the West Suffolk primary care trust to do all three in my constituency now?

Ms Hewitt: Walnuttree hospital has a building that was constructed in 1836 and has already had £300,000 invested in it to bring it up to the standard required by fire safety regulations, albeit temporarily. West Suffolk PCT is dealing with that and it does not believe that the hospital can offer the quality of care that the modern NHS should provide. As the hon. Gentleman said, it is consulting about alternative proposals that will offer modern intermediate care and ancillary care to his constituents and others in the locality. The consultation has been extended at the request of the local overview and scrutiny committee until 12 December. No final decisions have therefore been made.

Herceptin

5. Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): If she will make a statement on the availability of the breast cancer drug Herceptin to recently diagnosed women. [30513]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): As the hon. Lady knows, Herceptin is not yet licensed for women with early breast cancer but, as with other unlicensed drugs, it can be used in some cases. It is for clinicians to decide, in discussion with patients, whether Herceptin is appropriate, taking into account potential risks and medical history. I appreciate that the hon. Lady is an assiduous campaigner on behalf of one of her constituents. She may like to know that, following last Friday's decision by the 14 primary care trusts of Greater Manchester to provide funding to support the wider prescribing of Herceptin in their area, the Central Cheshire PCT, which covers her constituency and is in the Greater Manchester and Cheshire cancer network area, is meeting this afternoon to consider the matter.

Ann Winterton: Will the Minister accept that that reply is good news for my constituent, Joanne Leese? Will she also examine postcode prescribing—the postcode lottery? If the Central Cheshire PCT does not go along with the Greater Manchester group, my constituent will be further disadvantaged. It is wrong, when a clinician has said that a person should have Herceptin, that cost should prevent the prescription of that good medication for her condition.

Jane Kennedy: PCTs will need to take a range of factors into consideration when reaching these decisions, including the appropriateness of the treatment for an individual patient, and its cost-effectiveness. The drug will not be appropriate for all women. The important thing is that PCTs do not refuse to fund the drug for early breast cancer on principle, and that they take into account all the considerations relating to each case.

Mr. David Crausby (Bolton, North-East) (Lab): After months of struggle, my constituent, Alyson Cooper, has been allowed to use Herceptin by the Bolton primary care trust. But why should she have had to fight for her treatment? Was it not bad enough to have cancer in the first place, without being forced to campaign for her life? Will my hon. Friend ensure that no other woman is put through such agony?

Jane Kennedy: It is important to remember that, as with other cancer drugs, Herceptin can have side effects. For example, it can cause heart damage in some patients. That is why we need to ensure that it will be safe for routine use. That is the role of the licensing process, and the reason why that process is so important in regard to the considerations that must be taken into account. The House might like to know, however, that the National Cancer Research Institute is producing guidelines on the use of Herceptin for early breast cancer prior to licensing. I am sure that that will be of great help to primary care trusts in considering these decisions.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): I was delighted that the Northern Ireland Minister with responsibility for health has said that he will make Herceptin available for specific breast cancer sufferers in the Province. However, we have just had the disturbing disclosure that a radiographer in Northern Ireland has been suspended pending inquiries into whether the correct information was given to women after breast screening. Will the Minister tell the House what checks and balances are in place throughout the United Kingdom to prevent the unnecessary experience that 1,300 women in Northern Ireland are now facing in waiting to see whether they have been given the correct diagnosis?

Jane Kennedy: It would clearly be inappropriate for me to comment on the particular case that the hon. Lady has highlighted, but I hope that she will be reassured that the NHS, whether here or in Northern Ireland, always takes great care to ensure that the right results are returned to patients. Occasionally, however, mistakes are made and the steps that she has described need to be taken. This is an extremely important issue, and it is absolutely right that the proper procedures should be in place to ensure that the right diagnosis is communicated.

Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West) (Lab/Co-op): As my right hon. Friend has already said, some 20 per cent. of women with breast cancer have tumours that are susceptible to treatment with Herceptin, and this can be tested for with the HER2 test. Can she assure me that everything possible is being done to ensure that HER2 testing accompanies diagnosis as closely as possible?

Jane Kennedy: I hope that my hon. Friend will be reassured to hear that Professor Mike Richards has been working very closely with the directors of the cancer networks across England and Wales to ensure that HER2 testing is made available to women who are diagnosed with early-stage breast cancer.

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): Bedfordshire Heartlands primary care trust will have a £19.5 million deficit by the end of this year. The recovery plan put in place to deal with that is restricting the work of our emergency services. I do not know what kind of battle a constituent of mine would have in attempting to obtain Herceptin. Does the Minister agree that, if we cancelled the much-failed choose and book system, which cost £6.2 billion and which general practitioners are failing to use, we could use the money to provide Herceptin to everyone who needs it?

Jane Kennedy: No, I do not. The cost of Herceptin will need to be met from the existing settlement agreed for the national health service. We understand that some trusts are already under financial pressures and might have to make difficult decisions to achieve that. However, we have greatly increased the amount of money going into the health service, and those trusts with deficits now have financial recovery plans in place. It is far better to be working in an environment in which NHS resources have more than doubled in three years than to be working in the environment that the Conservative party would have created.

Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating the Northern cancer network, which has agreed to allow the drug to be prescribed for HER2-positive women in the north and north-east? As that movement is growing throughout the country, is it not about time that the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence approved use of the drug throughout the country? Will my right hon. Friend put pressure on NICE to speed up that process?

Jane Kennedy: Of course I join my hon. Friend in congratulating the North-East cancer network. The directors of the cancer networks have played a key role in ensuring that the right decisions are made, and that Herceptin is prescribed only for patients for whom it is appropriate. As I have said, the drug is believed to have serious side effects, and it is too early to judge its full effectiveness, its overall cost-effectiveness and all the risks involved. That is why licensing remains so important, along with the NICE appraisal that will be carried out.

I have announced, with NICE, the new procedure that NICE is introducing. Herceptin and four other potentially life-saving drugs will be subjected to a single appraisal, which we hope will be completed within a few weeks of the announcement of the licence. The whole process will become much swifter. Let me record my appreciation of the institute's efforts to bring about a change that will benefit many patients enormously.

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): Does the Secretary of State have the power to guarantee Herceptin to women whose clinicians believe that it is appropriate for them now? If she has that power, why has she not used it? If she does not have that power, is there not a danger—I put this gently—that false hopes will be raised among women who are in a desperate situation? They will hear an announcement that suggests that Herceptin will be available, on which the Secretary of State will then be unable to deliver.

Jane Kennedy: No. We rightly decided to give primary care trusts—the local organisations that understand local circumstances best—authority to make the necessary decision when a drug that has not been licensed is being offered to a patient, or when treatment with the drug is being discussed with a patient. We have said, however, that the decision making should not constitute a blanket policy of not prescribing, but should take place on a case-by-case basis. Decisions involving an important drug such as Herceptin must take all the circumstances into account; they must not be made simply on the basis of cost.

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): The Minister will be well aware that because of deficits, many primary care trusts are struggling to implement NICE guidance and fund the provision of Herceptin for late-stage breast cancer. Given that experts such as those working for Breakthrough Breast Cancer believe that 1,000 lives a year could be saved if Herceptin were available for early-stage breast cancer, and given the Government's recent announcement that Herceptin should not be withheld for reasons of cost alone, what additional funding will the Government provide so that PCTs can implement that direction? They need to ensure that other local services do not suffer, and also that the shameful postcode lottery that exists in relation to Herceptin and late-stage breast cancer is not replicated in the case of early-stage breast cancer.

Jane Kennedy: I do not accept that there is a serious problem with late-stage breast cancer. I will look into the matter and respond to the hon. Gentleman, but I do not recognise the circumstances that he has described.

It is important to acknowledge the huge amount of extra resources that the health service has received. It is perfectly possible for PCTs and hospitals to manage their resources properly, and the vast majority are doing so. Professor Mike Richards wrote to the NHS in mid October, advising it that it would need to make arrangements to provide Herceptin for women for whom it was appropriate. It is appropriate that the NHS organises its budgets locally, gets its priorities in place and then makes payments where appropriate for particular patients.

Cerebral Palsy

6. Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): What services are provided for children with cerebral palsy. [30514]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): Children with cerebral palsy can access the same range of NHS services as all other children. We recognise, of course, that children with cerebral palsy are likely to need access to those services more often.

Ms Keeble: I thank the Minister for that answer, but may I bring to his attention the case of the Cox family and their son, Aidan, who has cerebral palsy, and the outstanding work that they have done to raise funds for his care? What I and my constituents want to know is why there is such a gap in the provision of services for such children. Why will the NHS not take notice of parental preferences for care—in this case, for Aidan—and why will it not fund more proactive care, which this couple want for their son, to give him a real chance in life?

Mr. Byrne: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for discussing the case with me personally in the last two or three days. Children with cerebral palsy are, of course, first and foremost children, so it is for local clinicians together with the parents to take decisions about the right course of treatment. Quite complex packages will often be required and it is important for parents to make their own preferences clear to the clinicians in that process. PCTs are then free to fund whatever treatment they think is appropriate, provided that they do so on the basis of available evidence and are convinced of the effectiveness of the treatment proposed.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Is the Minister aware of the financial crisis in the Shropshire health economy—currently standing at a £35 million deficit—that will have a direct impact on children's services in my constituency and particularly at the Princess Royal hospital? Will the Minister give an undertaking today to allow an urgent cash injection to pay off that deficit—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is going far too wide.

Primary Care Trust Reconfiguration

7. Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the role of the external panel in respect of the reconfiguration of primary care trusts. [30515]

The Secretary of State for Health (Ms Patricia Hewitt): The independent external panel is advising me on proposals made by strategic health authorities for restructuring both those authorities and some primary care trusts. Where proposals meet the criteria that we set out at the end of July, they will go out to a full statutory three-month consultation. No decisions will be made on the reconfiguration of PCTs until the end of that consultation.

Charlotte Atkins: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that answer. Having met the leaders of my strategic health authority last week, it is clear that they intend to force through their unacceptable proposals for a massive Staffordshire-wide PCT and also a merged west midlands ambulance service. Will the expert external panel ensure that suitable and acceptable alternatives are put out to consultation so that my constituents can have their say on other alternatives to those proposed by the SHA?

Ms Hewitt: In response, let me stress that it is not up to the strategic health authority to force through any specific option. My hon. Friend has been assiduous in bringing this particular problem to my attention and we will shortly be writing to each strategic health authority in response to proposals and my noble Friend Lord Warner, the Minister with responsibility for delivery in the NHS, will be writing to all hon. Members to let them know our response to those SHA proposals in their particular area.

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): With the proposed reduction in primary care trusts and strategic health authorities, many senior executives will face redundancy. Who will then be accountable for the specific changes that they will have instituted?

Ms Hewitt: Where an existing PCT has come forward with proposals for a new community hospital or improved services, for example, those proposals will be taken over, as the hon. Gentleman would expect, by the successor PCT where there is a change in reconfiguration. The board of the new PCT will remain accountable for those proposals, for the sound management of the PCT budget and for the delivery of the best possible NHS services to its community.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend issue instructions to the external panel on this issue? Many of us support having a review to save management and associated costs, so that the money can be passed to the front line. But given that the average number of patients in a west midlands PCT is 230,000, we regard with great difficulty the proposed figure of 730,000 patients for a shire county area. Such a PCT will not be local, and because we will need area managers, the funding savings that we are looking for will not be made.

Ms Hewitt: I understand very well my hon. Friend's concern, and as we stressed at the end of July in "Commissioning a patient-led NHS", the issue here is to balance the need to retain a real understanding of the different needs of different local communities, while ensuring that PCTs have the strength and expertise to challenge, and to hold to account, acute hospitals. Those are exactly the kind of issues that the external panel is taking into account, but let me stress that it is an advisory panel, not a decision-making one. Ministers will decide which of the proposals brought to us by the strategic health authorities go out for consultation.

Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): I am delighted to hear that Ministers will take the final decision on such matters. When the Secretary of State takes that decision on the proposed Kent reconfiguration, will she note that the current proposals put the Ashford primary care trust into a west Kent configuration; and will she have a map with her, so that she can see that Ashford is actually in east Kent? The clue can be found in her own Department. The largest hospital in the East Kent Hospitals NHS Trust is in Ashford, so if she insists on proceeding with this unnecessary and disruptive reconfiguration, can she at least ensure that the Kent reconfiguration puts the right PCTs in the right part of the county?

Ms Hewitt: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that helpful geography lesson. I will certainly bear it in mind when we consider the proposals in respect of the Kent authority.

Health Inequalities

8. Greg Mulholland (Leeds, North-West) (LD): What recent research she has evaluated on health inequalities. [30516]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): The Department has recently released a number of research programmes on health inequalities, including "Tackling Health Inequalities: Status Report on the Programme for Action"; two reports commissioned for the UK presidency of the EU; and a further report, commissioned from the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence, on behavioural change, which is linked to the health trainer programmes currently covering disadvantaged communities. Moreover, a public health research and development consortium will address health inequalities as a key theme. All this research continues to inform how best to strengthen our ability to deliver on health inequalities.

Greg Mulholland: I thank the Minister for her response. Does she realise that according to the "Tackling Health Inequalities" report, the relative life-expectancy gap between the average local authority in England and the fifth of local authorities with the lowest life expectancy has actually widened for both males and females? For males, the gap has widened by nearly 2 per cent.; even more worryingly, for females it has widened by 5 per cent. Will she acknowledge that this shows a worrying trend of increasing health inequality, and does she agree that any further market-based reforms would make the situation worse, not better?

Caroline Flint: The short answer is no. This Government should be credited for identifying the existence of health inequalities in the first place, and we have set into play a number of activities, resourced and supported from the centre, to tackle them. The hon. Gentleman is right: the status report produced over the summer—we commissioned it so that we could actively monitor the situation—did show that the relative gap for life expectancy, and for infant mortality, had increased. However, it also demonstrated that infant mortality rates had fallen in routine and manual groups and in the total population. It further showed that life expectancy had increased for men and women in England, and in the PCTs with the worst health and deprivation indicators. We have also reduced the gap in cancer and circulatory disease mortality, and we are reducing child poverty and improving housing quality. We are moving in the right direction.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most effective ways to reduce health inequalities is to have a comprehensive ban on smoking in all enclosed public places?

Caroline Flint: I am pleased to say that our proposals will cover 99 per cent. of employees and that the prevalence of smoking among adults is lower in England than anywhere else in the UK. That is due in no small part to the measures that we have taken to tackle the diseases linked to smoking and to provide free NHS smoking-cessation services, especially in our most deprived communities.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): Would the Minister like to come to Whitchurch, where there is consternation today after the publication of a pre-consultation study suggesting the closure of the local hospital as a way to reduce health costs in Shropshire? The county's acute trusts face a deficit of £34 million, but how will health inequalities be improved by closing primary care facilities, which are cheap, and pushing patients into expensive district general hospitals?

Caroline Flint: If we are serious about addressing disease prevention and public health, we must engage in a debate that moves spending into communities, so that we can—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I say to you, Mr. Stuart, that you shout a remark across the Floor of the House every time that a Minister speaks? I know that you are a new Member, but the worst thing that you can do is defy the Chair. You are beginning to go down that road.

Caroline Flint: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

One of the best things that we can do for the future of health services is to ensure that we devote as much attention to prevention and public health as we do to treatment. The health service is there to promote health as well as to provide treatment and our consultation exercise, "Your Health, Your Care, Your Say" is helping in that respect. Hospitals are part of the process, as are the services available in the community—and especially in our most deprived communities.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that allowing smoking in pubs that do not serve food and stopping it in pubs that do will increase health inequalities in places such as Liverpool?

Caroline Flint: The issues involved in smoking and health inequalities are complex. My hon. Friend will recognise the work done by the Department to tackle smoking in the home, where 95 per cent. of deaths caused by smoking occur. For example, we have aimed campaigns at parents dealing with matters such as smoking in front of children and other family members. Our proposals on restricting smoking are in tune with public opinion. Even in the drink-only establishments, they will provide protection from smoke for bar staff and other non-smokers. As I said, they are part and parcel of a comprehensive package designed to help people to give up smoking and to provide more choice for people who want to work and socialise in a smoke-free atmosphere.

Avian Influenza

9. James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): What discussions she has had with the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on public health procedures in the event of a suspected outbreak of avian influenza. [30517]

The Secretary of State for Health (Ms Patricia Hewitt): The Department of Health is working closely with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to ensure consistent planning, briefings and preparations for a possible outbreak of avian influenza. That work is based on advice from the two Departments' joint expert advisory committees on the risks to human health and transmissibility of avian influenza from birds to people.

James Duddridge: What steps are being taken to avoid a repeat of what happened when a worker at an Essex quarantine centre, who also worked at Southend hospital, was not vaccinated for three days after DEFRA discovered that there was a problem?

Ms Hewitt: There is, of course, no vaccine against avian flu at the moment, if that is what the hon. Gentleman is referring to, although we have issued a tender for vaccines against the current strain of bird flu. However, I am assured that all necessary investigations in respect of the quarantine premises in Essex have been undertaken by the Health Protection Agency and the state veterinary service. I emphasise, to the hon. Gentleman and to the whole House, that there is no bird flu in the UK at the moment. We retain our status as a bird flu-free zone.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that companies can buy vaccine shots for their employees? In the present situation, might not an increase in that activity deflect attention away from where the vaccine should go?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend may be referring to antivirals and the availability of Tamiflu. We have ordered and are stockpiling very substantial quantities of the drug, and certain companies are also seeking to obtain Tamiflu for their staff. The Department has just placed a tender for a significant quantity of vaccine against the H5NI virus in case that might prove useful in the event of a bird flu outbreak in Britain.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): The Secretary of State will recall that on 17 October she told the House and, in particular, the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle), that orders were being placed for a strategic stockpile of face masks and gloves, which she will know would be an important aspect of the overall public health measures to combat avian flu outbreaks. Has that order been placed?

Ms Hewitt: I have checked again with the chief medical officer on the issue of masks and other protective clothing, which are of course routinely available and kept in stock for NHS staff and those supporting them. We are now working with the Health Protection Agency to discuss whether further stocks should be made available to the public and not only to NHS staff.

Mr. Lansley: So the answer to the first question was no.

The Secretary of State will recall that only 12 days ago the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint) wrote, in reply to my written question, that in the event

"of an outbreak of highly pathogenic avian influenza . . . poultry workers . . . vets, contractors and other people engaged in disease control activities, will be offered seasonal influenza vaccine . . . within 24 to 48 hours of disease confirmation."—[Official Report, 10 November 2005; Vol. 439, c. 666W.]

Given what we now know about the availability of seasonal influenza vaccine, what assurance can the Secretary of State give that the vaccine will be available should avian flu occur in this country in the coming months?

Ms Hewitt: As we do every year, the Department of Health obtained its own stockpile of winter flu vaccine for this year, and we are reserving a significant number of doses to use for poultry workers should there be an outbreak of bird flu.

Age-related Macular Degeneration

10. Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): If she will make a statement on the implementation of National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence guidance relating to photodynamic therapy for wet age-related macular degeneration. [30518]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): The National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence issued its guidance on photodynamic therapy on 24 September 2003. Implementation of the guidance was co-ordinated by local specialist commissioning groups and all primary care trusts are funding photodynamic therapy treatment for patients with both the wholly classic and predominantly classic forms of age-related macular degeneration.

Mr. Ellwood: I am grateful for that reply, but according to the Audit Commission, thousands of people have gone blind from AMD while waiting for Government action. Does the Minister agree that quick referral times are essential if photodynamic therapy is to work? Will she find out why a quarter of trusts have yet to implement the policies that she mentioned? At the moment, this issue is another example of the postcode lottery.

Jane Kennedy: I do not agree with that analysis. In the hon. Gentleman's constituency, the Dorset and Somerset strategic health authority has advised me that the photodynamic therapy services for wet age-related macular degeneration are fully compliant with NICE guidelines. I understand that the trust has a dedicated commission arrangement in place to run PDT services for all patients from Dorset. Therefore, his constituents, like other patients throughout the country, are receiving treatment in line with the NICE guidelines.

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): I congratulate Ministers on the extra money that will be put into the work of optometrists, who will get extra money to check for problems such as AMD in the elderly. Even in my constituency, outwith England, one optometrist offers X-rays to his patients. However, will that money be paid year on year? In conversations with optometrists, they say that it is great to have the money, but they are worried that it will stop at the end of the year and they will have raised people's expectations of services that will not continue.

Jane Kennedy: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. He will know that resources in the NHS are increasing year on year, up to 2008, and it is expected that planning for such services will form an important part of delivering services of that nature. Photodynamic therapy was implemented as quickly as possible across the NHS, and we had to ensure that we had the staff and equipment to deliver the service effectively and safely.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): To pick up the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood), does the Minister realise, and share our concern, that some patients will go blind in the time that it takes for them to be referred to a specialist? Will she assure the House that she will urgently ensure that the NICE guidance is fully implemented?

Jane Kennedy: The NICE technology appraisal was published in September 2003, as I said. The guidance recommended photodynamic therapy only for a particular small sub-group of patients and that a second, much larger sub-group of patients should be treated only as part of a clinical study, which is now being set up. The Department of Health organised that study with the Royal College of Ophthalmologists and Novartis, the pharmaceutical company that manufactures the drug used in the treatment. It was entirely proper that the correct services and support were in place before implementing the guidance. The treatment will have a significant impact and bring enormous benefits to patients. Obviously, we share concern if patients are perceived not to get treatments that they believe are ready for them, but it was important to make sure that we took the right steps to have the services in place to deliver the treatment properly to all the patients who need it.

Health Bill

12. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): What representations she has received in support of the provisions of the Health Bill; and if she will make a statement. [30520]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): The Health Bill contains a diverse range of provisions on which we have consulted widely and received many representations. Copies of the analyses of responses to the smoke-free and health care associated infection consultations will be published before Second Reading.

Andrew Mackinlay: I welcome that reply but, before Second Reading, will the Minister also publish the findings of the Government's Better Regulation Task Force, which has come out against the Airdrie and Shotts fudge? If the Minister read the political tea leaves, she would understand that there is a majority in the House of Commons for a total ban, comparable with the one that will be introduced by the Labour party in Scotland and by the Labour Government at Westminster in Northern Ireland. We need a free vote to test whether there is a majority in the House of Commons, and I hope that Ministers will reflect on what is prudent, just and protects and promotes the best interests of poor working-class people who suffer—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are running out of time.

Caroline Flint: We have taken on board a range of views and representations and will publish the regulatory impact assessment in the usual way. The manifesto commitment was discussed through our national policy forums and the wording in the manifesto was agreed at the Warwick national policy forum, so it has gone through our party machinery in the usual way. Although I accept the views of many Members and organisations outside this place who would like a total ban, in terms of public support and the surveys we have carried out, the Office for National Statistics survey in 2004 found that 88 per cent. of people, when asked, supported restrictions in public places but only 31 per cent. supported complete bans. In California, New York and Norway—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The rest can be written. The Minister can write a letter to the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay).

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): Given that second-hand smoke is a significant cause of increased risk of cancer and heart disease, how can any employer fulfil their obligations under health and safety legislation without implementing a full ban in their premises?

Caroline Flint: I am pleased to say that, through our proposals, 99 per cent. of employees will be fully protected, and will work in a smoke-free environment, up from 51 per cent. at present. For the remaining workers, we are looking to ensure that there is protection in bar areas, too. We want to minimise the damage from second-hand smoke, which is not just about bans but about the support we give in the NHS for people who are giving up smoking. I am not sure whether that would have been achieved through the hon. Gentleman's "Orange Book" social insurance policy.

Solvent Abuse

14. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): What progress has been made in combating solvent abuse. [30522]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): Recently, I met our stakeholder group to look at issues relating to solvent abuse. Much progress has been made and we shall try to ensure that in our Department and other Departments, especially in our strategies for working with young people, solvent abuse is high on the agenda.

Ben Chapman: My hon. Friend will be aware of the work of St. George's university of London, which found that deaths due to solvent abuse had declined by 9 per cent., but does she agree that, if they are to be reduced further, education is a vital part of the process? Will she commend the work of the charity Re-Solv in schools, and in particular the work done by pupils of Wirral grammar school for girls, who are raising awareness among their peers of the dangers of solvent abuse?

Caroline Flint: I understand that my hon. Friend recently visited the Wirral grammar school for girls, where some excellent work is being done. In addition, as part of a package, by providing the young people's substance misuse partnership grant, which was agreed between the Home Office, the Department of Health and the Department for Education and Skills, we are helping to tackle the abuse of solvents, and of other substances that, I am afraid, children do abuse, including alcohol, tobacco and illegal drugs. I strongly support the work of organisations such as Re-Solv and Solve It, whose chief executive I was pleased to meet at a recent event in my constituency, aimed at encouraging responsible retailing with regard to this product and many others.

Seasonal Influenza Vaccine Supplies

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Health (Ms Patricia Hewitt): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about seasonal flu vaccine.

Five years ago, we decided to give higher priority to protecting the health of the public from winter flu. We introduced the annual seasonal flu vaccination programme and we targeted those at increased risk from seasonal flu—people aged 65 and over, and younger people in certain clinical risk groups as identified by the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation. This is an annual programme, because each year new strains of flu can emerge and therefore the flu vaccines need to be reformulated accordingly. In this way, each year's vaccine provides the best protection against the influenza virus currently circulating.

Since the programme was introduced in the winter of 2000–01, vaccination uptake in people aged 65 and over has increased year on year. In the first year of the targeted programme, just over 65 per cent. of elderly patients were vaccinated. Last year 71.5 per cent. of those aged 65 and over received the seasonal flu vaccine—some 5.2 million people—and in addition 1.2 million younger people in the clinical risk groups were vaccinated.

The responsibility for ordering seasonal flu vaccine and administering the vaccine has always fallen on general practitioners. GPs order their own supply of vaccine, based on the number of eligible patients on the register, and make contractual arrangements with any of the six manufacturers who supply flu vaccine to the UK. In addition to the GP orders, the Department of Health purchases a stock of flu vaccine each year as part of our contingency planning measures. We hold that for emergency use, in case GPs run into difficulties with vaccine supply.

We routinely meet representatives from the UK vaccine industry group at the beginning of each year to inform the industry of how much seasonal flu vaccine will be required in the UK. This is based on the numbers of people covered by the current Department of Health policy. This year, the estimated production total from all UK vaccine manufacturers was over 14 million doses—more than ever before, and sufficient to immunise 100 per cent. of those in the targeted groups, in other words the elderly and younger people in clinical risk groups, as set out in the letter from the chief medical officer to the NHS in July.

In late October, however, we began to hear anecdotal evidence that some GPs were facing a shortage of flu vaccine. In order to assess the potential problem, officials wrote on 3 November to the flu immunisation co-ordinators of all the primary care trusts. That letter reminded them of the priority groups for flu vaccination and how additional stocks of vaccine could be ordered from the Department of Health contingency stock, should extra supplies be required by practices in their area.

The current problems may be due to a combination of factors, such as possibly the under-ordering of vaccine on the one hand, and possibly vaccination of the worried well on the other. It also seems likely that awareness of the need for flu vaccinations is higher this year, due in part to the very high level of media interest in the threat of avian flu in birds and of pandemic flu.

We do not, of course, expect seasonal flu vaccine to protect people against bird flu or pandemic flu, but I stress that seasonal flu vaccine is important for people aged 65 and over and for the clinical risk groups and that high uptake in those groups is to be welcomed. We need to ensure that GPs prioritise their remaining stocks of flu vaccine to help those who will really benefit most—in other words, people aged 65 and over and younger people in the clinical risk groups. Officials wrote to influenza immunisation co-ordinators to that effect yesterday.

The Department is also helping GPs by releasing flu vaccine from the contingency stock that we have purchased. We have taken orders against that stock, and deliveries are already being made and will continue into December. There is, of course, exceptionally high demand globally for flu vaccine, despite which the Department has been able to secure an additional 200,000 doses of flu vaccine on top of the 400,000 dose contingency reserve that we have already obtained. The additional 200,000 doses will be delivered in January. We are also discussing with manufacturers whether additional supplies can be made available, over and above those additional 200,000 doses, and if so, when those stocks would be available.

In previous years, the GP-led arrangement that I have described has, on the whole, worked well. In view of what has happened this year, however, I am reviewing the arrangements currently in place for the seasonal flu vaccination programme and will consider this matter urgently.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am sure that the House is grateful to the Secretary of State for her statement, although she must understand that we would have been more grateful if she had come to the House yesterday to make a statement on the same day as selected members of the press were being briefed on this subject. I am grateful to her not only for providing me with advance sight of her statement, but—indeed at 1.50 this afternoon—for replying by fax to the letter that I sent to her on 5 October raising concerns about the winter flu vaccination programme.

I am sure that the House will have listened to the Secretary of State's statement and found in it no acknowledgement of a simple fact: people have been going to their GP surgery to get their flu jabs and been told that supplies have run out.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Not everybody.

Mr. Lansley: Happily, not everybody, but one person missed in the at-risk group is one person too many. The hon. Gentleman and the rest of the House should know that, even where that has not yet happened, it will happen because supplies are running out, and we have not completed the period during which the highest levels of immunisation occur.

The Secretary of State did not accept responsibility. She should have done so, but she did not. The delivery of the influenza immunisation programme is the Government's responsibility. It is not good enough that she has come to the House to blame general practitioners for the failure of the programme. Not only has she failed to apologise, she has not even remotely begun to explain what has gone wrong. If the House will forgive me, let us start with the actual figures.

First, the Secretary of State underestimated the success of the flu immunisation programme. Her own Department's figures suggest that, in 2004–05, a 71.5 per cent. vaccine uptake among the over-65 population in England amounted to 5.9 million people immunised—not the 5.2 million that she set out. However, she did not refer to the overall figures on vaccine uptake. Uptake was 71.5 per cent. in England, 68.1 per cent. in Scotland and 62 per cent. in Wales. For risk groups below 65 years old, the comparable figures were 42.6 per cent. in England, 39.3 per cent. in Scotland and just 25 per cent. in Wales.

The Secretary of State did not make comparisons clearly between what has happened in previous years and what is happening this year. On 26 October last year, her noble Friend Lord Warner told another place:

> "The Government made sure that there were around 14 million doses of flu vaccine available for this year" he was speaking of last winter, not this—

> "despite the problems in the Speke factory, which are well known—compared with 12 million administered last year."
> [Official Report, House of Lords, 26 October 2004; Vol. 665, c. 1174.]

That implies that the number of doses that the Department of Health has made available this year—14 million—is the same as the number for the previous year.

The letter that the Department of Health sent to general practitioners yesterday referred on the one hand to 11 million people in the at-risk groups and on the other to the 14 million doses of seasonal flu vaccine that were available. Unfortunately, the 11 million people refers to England, but the 14 million doses refers to the United Kingdom. It would have been more accurate to talk of about 14 million people in the at-risk groups and 14 million doses of influenza vaccine.

The Secretary of State did not point out in her statement that, although the Department of Health met manufacturers early this year to agree that 13.4 million doses of vaccine would be available—it subsequently procured a contingency supply of 400,000, which I accept is routinely the same each year—it agreed at a later stage that the at-risk groups would include people with chronic liver disease, who had not previously been included. It also agreed that the recommended groups would include main carers with responsibility for the care of elderly and disabled people who would be at risk if their carers were to become ill. The Department has no figures on the likely number of such people, but it means that perhaps millions of carers might have gone to their GP surgeries this winter to try to get flu jabs and then received them appropriately, although that would not have been the case in previous years.

Those are the figures—the Secretary of State might have had the courtesy to tell us what they were—and the facts about the extension of recommended groups this year compared with previous years. The House will understand that, broadly speaking, the available vaccine supply did not increase, whereas the number of recommended groups did. The prospect of a great deal of speculation about avian flu in the autumn certainly should have led the Department to be aware at an earlier stage about the desirability of being prepared for a much greater take-up of flu vaccine among people in the recommended groups than in previous years.

Let me ask the Secretary of State several questions about what was done. When carers were added to the recommended groups for vaccination, was the number of doses of vaccine that was intended to be supplied increased from 13.4 million? When the British Medical Association told the Department of Health in October—this was not just anecdotal, as the Secretary of State said—that it had concerns about the availability of vaccine, what did the Department do?

The Secretary of State will recall that the hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) made it clear on 17 October that he, for one, had gone to his surgery and been told not only that he could not have his flu jab on the day of his visit, but that he would not receive it until the end of November, at the earliest. What did she do after 17 October, given that we have now arrived at 22 November and we have a crisis? When a manufacturing company ran out of supply in late October and told the Department about that, what did the Department do?

When did the Department find out the new figures on uptake? Responses to parliamentary questions said that the uptake figures were due in the Department on 14 November. The Department talked to the UK vaccine industry group on 16 November—six days ago—and asked for additional supplies. Health Ministers did not have the courtesy to tell the House about the lack of availability of supply, even though they had talked to the industry about it. However, they must have talked to the industry because they knew the uptake figures on 14 November. What are the figures and how do they compare with those for previous years?

What is the Government's evidence that general practitioners have been vaccinating what the Secretary of State cares to call the worried well—people outside the recommended groups? The BMA certainly has no evidence that that is the case and the Scottish Executive do not tell the public and the BMA that it is the problem in Scotland. The Secretary of State might care to explain why general practitioners should vaccinate people who are not in the recommended groups, as they have no financial incentive from the NHS to do that—they are not paid by the NHS to do it—and would be out of pocket from buying the vaccine were they to do so.

The Secretary of State has not told the House the figures. She has not explained to the House when the Government knew about the implications of changes this year in the uptake of vaccine and in the number of groups recommended. The consequence of all those changes has been our constituents visiting GP surgeries seeking flu vaccinations and being unable to get them. What estimate does she have of the number of people who will at the end of this immunisation season be un-immunised? What justification does she have for coming to the House and instead of taking what is in truth her responsibility for the flu immunisation programme seeking to blame general practitioners?

Ms Hewitt: I very much regret that the hon. Gentleman has chosen not to give any credit at all for the great success over many years of the targeted winter flu programme. Nor has he chosen to acknowledge the fact that in 1996–97, for which I happen to have the figures, vaccine production for the United Kingdom was a mere 6.1 million doses. For last winter, the figure was double that—12.3 million doses—and for the current year and the current winter season it will be nearly 14 million.

As I said to the House, the number of people in the risk groups—I mean by that the over-65s and younger people who are clinically at risk—is some 11 million. Therefore, it was the conclusion of the Department of Health that the availability of 14 million or so doses this year would be sufficient not only for 100 per cent. immunisation of the at-risk groups but for immunisation of carers, whom it has always been open to GPs to immunise.

When we discussed this issue at a recent Health questions, one of my hon. Friends said that he had been unable to get his vaccination. I went back to the Department to check and found that, as I had believed to be the case, there had been delay in production from one of the companies on which we rely for the vaccines. That problem in production was corrected some weeks ago, so the vaccine that should have been produced by that company has now been produced and, as I understand it, delivered.

The hon. Gentleman asked specifically about the uptake figures. The figures that I have, which have been made available to primary care trusts from a large number of GP practices, show that at the end of October—these are the latest figures that I have—the uptake of the flu vaccine was very similar indeed to that for last year. If one looks, for instance, at the figures for the over-65s, one sees that, by the end of October this year, 48.9 per cent. had been vaccinated. By the end of October last year, the figure for elderly people was in fact 55 per cent. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman asked for the figures; perhaps he would like to listen.

This year, for younger people in the clinical risk groups, 25 per cent. had been immunised. By the end of October last year, the figure was 28 per cent. That is why the director of immunisation for the Department says that there is no evidence to support the proposition that a much higher proportion of people in the at-risk groups have been asking for immunisation. I have spoken to the chairman of the BMA to ask whether it has any evidence of a sudden upsurge in the past few weeks in requests for immunisation. He said that he did not, in fact, believe that there had been but he is to some extent relying on anecdotal reports, as do we in relation to reports from GPs of increased demand by people whom I did indeed describe as the worried well who do not fall into the at-risk groups for whom we recommend immunisation but who none the less may wish to try to obtain the vaccine.

The most important issue at this point is ensuring that we provide supplies of vaccine to GPs who, for whatever reason, do not have enough. That is the problem. As in every previous year, GPs have placed their orders. The total number of doses available to the country is about 1 million higher than in the previous year which, in turn, was about 1 million higher than the year before and so on. A number of GPs, however, have run out of vaccine, which is why we are doing everything possible in the Department to fulfil our responsibilities and ensure that the supplies that we already have are delivered to GPs who have run out as quickly as possible and that we secure fresh supplies as quickly as possible and in turn make those available to GPs who need them so that everybody, particularly in the at-risk groups, who wants a flu vaccination this winter can have one as soon as possible.

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): I am grateful for sight of the Secretary of State's statement.

Does the Secretary of State accept that central Government have only two things to do? They must ensure that the emergency stockpile is adequate and they must monitor what is happening on the ground. Does she accept that the Government have failed on both fronts? We are told that the emergency stockpile will expire in a few days and, from what she has said, the Department does not appear to have a clue about what is going on. In her statement, she said that problems "may be due" to certain factors and used the words "possibly vaccination" and "awareness may be". Frankly, the Government do not know. Will the Secretary of State admit that she cannot say what has happened to all those vaccines? Does she know where they are and who has had them?

Has not the Department of Health been grossly complacent about the issue? I and Conservative Front Benchers wrote to the Secretary of State in the first half of October, but she told us today that the Government had to rely on anecdotal evidence in late October and more recently. Why did she not take action when hon. Members contacted her to alert her to the issue? Is the Department not guilty of gross complacency? How many pensioners have gone to GP surgeries and been turned away? Does she have any idea how many we are talking about? Given that many people face a barrier when going to have a vaccination—it is an ordeal even to think about it—how many will never come back because they have been turned away and simply do not want to face it again?

The Government need to take responsibility instead of blaming GPs for prescribing to the wrong people, because there does not appear to be any evidence that GPs have done so. Did the Secretary of State ask the BMA if its members had been prescribing to the worried well and, if so, what did it say? I do not imagine that it said that its members had been doing so. If this is how the Government cope with predictable seasonal flu, which they know about every year and for which they have plenty of time to plan, can we have any confidence that they will cope with a much bigger flu pandemic if we have one?

Ms Hewitt: When the hon. Gentleman accuses my Department of complacency and a lack of preparedness he is simply talking rubbish. At the beginning of the year, my Department did what it has done every year since we embarked on this programme—talk to the industry about the amount of flu dosage that would be available and ensure that it would be more this year than it was last year. As I said, there has been an increase every year for the past eight years in the amount of vaccine for winter flu available in our country. When we began to receive information and calls from GPs who were running low on supplies, we immediately took steps to set up a national audit, from which I have cited figures to show the position for the at-risk groups by the end of October. We also contacted the industry to secure more supplies. We were accused by the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) of not contacting the industry until the middle of November. In fact, that was the second time that we went to the industry to secure more stock for departmental supplies because of the problems that GPs had encountered.

The fact remains that for the winter flu vaccine programme—this is a different arrangement from the one that is in place for childhood immunisation—general practitioners have always been responsible for ordering and administering the flu vaccine. Given the overall amounts—some 14 million doses—that have been delivered in our country, we can be clear that GPs have ordered at least the same amounts, if not somewhat more, compared with last year.

As regards possible pandemic flu, the arrangements that we are already making for obtaining antivirals and for obtaining vaccines are based on the system that we use for childhood vaccination—in other words, a central ordering system. The only central ordering system that we have for the winter flu vaccine is the relatively small but now increasing stockpile that we use to supplement the far larger amount that GPs order, based on their own patient lists and knowledge of the number of patients who fall within the at-risk groups. As I stressed, it is important now to ensure that we continue to do as we are doing, to obtain as much additional stock as we can and supply that to the GPs as quickly as possible.

David Heyes (Ashton-under-Lyne) (Lab): In my constituency, in at least one health centre, those in priority groups—the over-65s—have been told not only that supplies are exhausted, but that it is too late in the season for new supplies to be obtained. Is it the case that a seasonal cut-off date has until now been applied to the supply of vaccine?

Ms Hewitt: No, it is not the case that there is now a cut-off date and that my hon. Friend's elderly constituents are too late for the flu vaccine. As I said, we are distributing a significant number of doses—indeed, we have orders for some 200,000 doses that we are starting to distribute. We are taking further orders, which we will fill as more vaccine becomes available. As I mentioned, we have already placed an additional order for a further 200,000 doses—that is, on top of our initial order of 400,000 doses—so an additional 200,000 doses of flu vaccine will become available in January, and will continue to be made available to GPs who need it for their elderly patients and other at-risk groups. I hope that my hon. Friend will reassure his constituents that, if they are elderly or in the at-risk groups, they should seek to get their winter flu jab, even if it is a little later than they or, indeed, we would have wished.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): Fairly recently, hon. Members on both sides of the House took part in a promotional exercise to seek to draw to our constituents' attention the availability of influenza vaccine and the necessity for the elderly, particularly, and those at risk to use it. We did so, confident of the information made available by the Department of Health that there was sufficient available. Clearly, that confidence was sadly misplaced. In the small village of Birchington in my constituency, over the past few days, more than 50 people have presented at Courts the chemist carrying prescriptions for vaccine that is not available. A ring-round suggests that no chemist in the area has any vaccine at all. It is no good saying that it will be January before the vaccine arrives. When will people get it?

Ms Hewitt: As I have just told the House, we already have orders from GPs who have run out of vaccine, and we are filling those orders. We still have several thousand doses of flu vaccine in our own stockpile. Those are being made available to GPs in the order in which GPs place their orders to us. We will continue to fill those orders and, because of the problem that has emerged, we have secured additional stocks of flu vaccine. We have done so despite the fact that the manufacturers are reporting far higher global demand than was the case last year, so we have responded promptly to the problem that has emerged.

I stress to the hon. Gentleman that the GPs in his constituency are responsible this year, as they have been for every year since winter flu began, for placing their orders. They did so. The number of doses available to our country is significantly higher than last year, and was sufficient for 100 per cent. take-up of the vaccine among the elderly and the other at-risk groups. It is something of a puzzle, it is fair to say, that at a point in the year when, by the end of October, only about half of the over-65s and only about a quarter of the under-65s at risk had been immunised, the stocks have already run out. There are clearly lessons that need to be learned for next year. This year, the priority is to get our stocks out as quickly as possible to the GPs and replenished, so that other GPs who have not yet placed their orders can get them.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): Given the cost to the economy of millions of people missing work with flu, is it not time to examine widening the at-risk category to allow anyone who wants an influenza jab to obtain one free of charge?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend has raised an important point. We constantly keep under review the groups for which we recommend a winter flu vaccine and take advice from the independent Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I declare an interest—as a result of the session in the Palace of Westminster, I am one of those who has fortunately had the winter influenza jab. I fall into the vulnerable group. Was the Secretary of State actually alleging that general practitioners have not ordered as many doses of flu vaccine as they should have done this year? If the Department of Health were to order a larger quantity of vaccine in order to hold a larger balance in case of an outbreak or pandemic, would the vaccine go off? Does the flu vaccine go off after a time, which would prevent the Department ordering a larger quantity? I agree with the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) that a far wider group should benefit from the vaccination.

Ms Hewitt: As I have said, because the flu virus takes on a different form each year, it is not possible to stockpile winter flu vaccine from one year to another. As we did with considerable success in previous years, this year we ensured that GPs placed their orders in the usual way, and we placed an order for a relatively modest, but none the less significant, stockpile of 400,000 doses in case any GPs faced difficulties. I have already referred to one manufacturer having a problem with one of its production plants, which has delayed the delivery of supplies to some GPs who rely on that particular company. Last year, there was also a problem with a production facility, but we were able to step in.

[Ms Hewitt]

We do not know exactly how many doses each GP ordered, although the overall figures suggest that GPs ordered at least as many doses as they did last year—they probably ordered more than that. Those supplies have now run out, despite the fact that at the end of October the same proportion of people in the at-risk groups had been vaccinated as last year. We are ensuring that our stockpile is distributed to GPs as quickly as possible, with the exception of a small amount that we have ring-fenced for poultry workers, and we are supplementing that stockpile with the additional 200,000 doses to which I referred earlier.

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will recall that I gave her some anecdotal evidence about the matter in this House on 17 October, and she asked her officials to make sure that there was not a problem of the kind that I described, which was the appropriate ministerial response. As she has said, however, we still do not know what has happened, which is a problem and a puzzle. People such as me were asking whether it was likely that demand for seasonal flu vaccine would increase because of the attention paid to avian flu, but did the Department factor that point into its calculations? If there is a question about the vaccinating practices of GPs, is there any check on whether they are giving the vaccine to priority groups only?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend raises important points. He refers to the problem that he had encountered, which he mentioned to me on 17 October. After that, I checked with the Department and established that there had indeed been delays because of production problems with one manufacturer. Those problems were overcome and the delayed supplies were then delivered to the GPs who had ordered them. We also put in place a national audit process so that we could track exactly what was happening. GPs regularly provide information to their primary care trusts, mostly through the computer system, on the numbers of people in the at-risk groups whom they have vaccinated. I gave those figures and proportions to the House.

If somebody who is not in an at-risk group asks for a flu vaccination because they think that it might be a good thing to have this year, perhaps because of the publicity that they have read about avian flu, that does not mean that a GP necessarily should or will give a vaccination to that person. GPs are not required to report to PCTs on vaccinations given to people who fall outside the at-risk groups, although those figures might become available later in the year when they claim reimbursement for such vaccinations. We have stressed—we did it again in the letter that went to GPs—the need to focus on the priority groups. Those people are most in need and will most benefit from the vaccine. Given the shortages that have arisen in so many GP practices, it is absolutely essential that supplies are reserved for those groups.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): Will the Minister give a categorical assurance that GPs will be directed to stay within the at-risk patients guidelines for the vaccine so that the worried well, who are allegedly being vaccinated, do not receive the vaccine until the crucial groups are catered for? Given that we face an extreme winter period, surely the vulnerable must be first in line to get this much-needed vaccine.

Ms Hewitt: I agree. The whole point about having priority groups is that they should get priority. The letter that went from the Department yesterday to the flu co-ordinators and the advice that goes through them to GPs stresses that the vaccine should now be directed towards the priority groups—the elderly, younger people at clinical risk and carers—who are at risk.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Is the Secretary of State aware that not all of us who are in the categories that qualify for the flu jab have responded? I suppose that I qualify, having had a tumour removed and a heart bypass. I have a lot to thank the national health service for, and I rise to support it again. I have heard the figures. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that in the last year of the Tory Government there were 6 million flu jabs, yet this year there have been a record 14 million flu jabs? When I have mine next week, if I go—I found out this morning that it will be available—it will be 14 million and one, at least. Can there be a more sickening sight than Tory MPs who voted against—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State will answer just one supplementary.

Ms Hewitt: I entirely agree with all the points that my hon. Friend has made. In particular, I stress that more vaccine has been made available in Britain than ever before, and that it has been received by people who are, I hope, predominantly in the priority groups for whom it is of most benefit.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): The Secretary of State says that lessons have to be learned for next year. What lessons has she learned, given that she does not seem to be taking any responsibility for the crisis that we are facing? Steve Flynn of Mellor in my constituency contacted me today. He is an asthma sufferer who was told that he could not get the flu jab this week. He said, "I'll ring back next week", and was told, "Yes, give us a try." I then phoned both my Clitheroe practices, which expect it to run out of the vaccine at the end of the week. Will the Secretary of State say how long the 400,000 doses that she has in the current contingency stock are likely to last, and will she ensure that all practices, in rural as well as urban areas, get access to it?

Ms Hewitt: Some 110,000 doses from the contingency stock that the Department holds have already been delivered; 200,000 doses have been allocated to orders and will shortly be distributed; 40,000 doses are currently available for order; and a further 50,000 will be delivered to our distributors in the week beginning 5 December. As I said earlier, 10,000 doses are being reserved for poultry workers. In other words, a total of 80,000 doses will still be available for order. We will distribute them in the order that GPs place their orders. Whether GPs are rural or urban, the doses will be distributed on the basis of first come, first served.

My colleagues in the Department and I take extremely seriously our responsibility for monitoring exactly what is happening, ensuring that we get our contingency stock to GPs, who, for whatever reason, have run out of stocks, and for supplementing our stocks and getting them to GPs who continue to need them as quickly as possible.

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will recall the letter that she wrote to all hon. Members asking them to launch a campaign in their constituencies to get elderly people to take up their flu vaccine. That happened in Scotland as well as in England. Will she therefore look seriously at getting the figures correct? There are either 11 million people in England and 14 million throughout the United Kingdom or there are simply 11 million people who need the vaccine. We need to know whether the supply of 14 million doses to which she referred is available throughout the UK and whether it is required by 14 million people.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will analyse where the vaccines went from the manufacturers' point of view. I am worried about people who pay for their vaccines and never claim anything from the NHS—she never knows whether fairly well, economically active people take the vaccines from those who require them and are at risk. I should like her to check with the manufacturers how many doses were supplied to GPs and therefore how many went to people who did not require them.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend raises important points. We need to get much more information than we currently have by the end of the winter. As I said earlier, the estimated production total from all the UK vaccine manufacturers is 14 million doses—around 1 million more than the previous year and well over double the figure some eight years ago.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): May I tell the Secretary of State that the excellent GPs in my constituency will have heard with dismay her blaming them for the incompetence of her Department? When can she guarantee that the rationing will stop—by January, February or at the end of the winter, when our people have already suffered?

Ms Hewitt: This is not a question of blaming the GPs or anybody else. Since winter flu vaccination started, it has been the responsibility of individual GPs to order what they believe they need for their practices, taking into account the Department's advice on the risk groups for whom immunisation is a priority. As I have said several times, the number of doses—14 million—available this year is significantly higher than in previous years and should have been more than adequate for not only 100 per cent. take-up in the at-risk groups, which we have never achieved, but for others, including health care workers, for whom immunisation is often desirable.

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay) (LD): The last time the Secretary of State spoke on the issue, I asked her whether there was a need for a Government information campaign to deal with public confusion about the differences between a seasonal flu jab, a pandemic and avian flu. In her reply, she said that the Government's information campaign on seasonal flu had already been completed. Who is therefore to blame for those non-vulnerable and ineligible groups seeking the flu jab—the Government for not informing the public properly, the media for confusing the message that the Government needed to convey or the public for not understanding the Government's message?

Ms Hewitt: In line with contingency plans and World Health Organisation guidance, we have published a great deal of material, all of which was well tested on the public to ensure that it is as clear as possible. We have made that available to GPs and on a variety of websites. We do our best to brief the media on the difference between bird flu, which does not exist in Britain and poses a very small risk to human health in Europe generally, a possible pandemic flu of a currently unknown strain, and winter flu, with which we have been dealing in the usual way. We have done our best to communicate that information as clearly as possible.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The Secretary of State said that last year one in four of the elderly at risk did not manage to get vaccinated. It is reasonable to infer that those people are more likely to be infirm and housebound, and therefore less able to get to their GP's surgery for their vaccination. Does the Secretary of State want GPs to carry out domiciliary visits in order to reach the elderly infirm, of whom there are increasing numbers, at home?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point. Because we give priority to the elderly and other clinically at-risk groups, and because GP practices are paid specifically for vaccinating the people in those groups, there are already quite a lot of programmes of that sort. District nurses, for instance, go to old people's residential homes, or to very frail elderly people who might well be housebound, to offer them the flu vaccine. However, there has never been a 100 per cent. uptake and GPs tend to base their orders for the vaccine on what they used the previous year, as they do not want to be left with unused stock. The GPs and the Government do everything possible to ensure that vulnerable elderly people get the protection that they need and deserve.

Points of Order

4.16 pm

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Government made major announcements today on the reorganisation of local government in Northern Ireland. They also announced the implications of that reorganisation on the education, health and social services sectors. The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has referred to the proposed changes as "major" and "substantial", yet he has chosen to make the announcements in written form, rather than by coming here to announce the proposals on the Floor of the House of Commons.

You will be aware, Mr. Speaker, of the large number of right hon. and hon. Members who take a close interest in the affairs of Northern Ireland. Given that the proposals in the written statements are so fundamental and far-reaching, would it not have been more appropriate for the Secretary of State to have made a statement here in the Chamber of the House of Commons, where all of us who take an interest in the affairs of the Province would have the opportunity to question him and to contribute to what is a very important debate?

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The announcement that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland made today details some of the most radical changes in the way in which Northern Ireland is to be administered. The statements cover not only local government but health, social services and education, and the total number of public bodies involved in those sectors is to be reduced from 67 to 20. That will have an impact on hundreds, if not thousands, of employees. Surely, rather than announcing such important changes at a press conference in Northern Ireland, the Secretary of State should have come to this Chamber to allow the Members of Parliament elected by the people of Northern Ireland and other right hon. and hon. Members to ask him questions about the changes. Mr. Speaker, will you invite the Secretary of State to come immediately to the House to make his statement here?

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is getting increasingly difficult for people in Northern Ireland to feel that they are being governed by people who understand what is happening there. Surely this matter should have been discussed by the parliamentary representatives of Northern Ireland, who do not get the chance to have such discussions now that there is no devolved Government or any other way of doing so. This is quite wrong, and I hope that you agree, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary of State should have come to this House to make these announcements.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not bordering on contempt of this House for the Secretary of State to have asked his Ministers to invite Members of the Northern Ireland Assembly to briefings on the announcements that he has made today, rather than coming to this Chamber? Instead, he slinks away to an hotel to make his statement.

Mr. Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) for giving me notice of his point of order. The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has indeed made four written statements to the House today on the structure of local government in Northern Ireland. I have no doubt that there will be an opportunity to discuss the proposals in the House. I also note that some of the proposed changes will require legislation, so there will be opportunities for the House to consider them in due course.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have been expecting delivery later this week of the National Audit Office's annual report on the 20 largest defence projects—a report that always commands widespread public interest. To my surprise, this afternoon the Press Association carries a story that the Minister responsible for defence procurement, Lord Drayson, has held a press briefing providing a partial interpretation of the forthcoming NAO report. I have checked with the Public Accounts Committee, which tells me that the report is embargoed until one minute past midnight on Friday.

I understand that the Ministry of Defence claims that the timing of today's press briefing and the NAO report is coincidental. Even if we allow for Lord Drayson's relative inexperience of the courtesies of parliamentary procedure, is it not unacceptable that a Department of State should be engaged in what clearly amounts to a naked attempt to pre-empt the report of a universally respected and impartial public agency?

The PA report states:

> "The MOD took the unusual step of releasing the figures three days before the National Audit Office publishes its annual report on major defence projects."

That report will show, apparently, that the combined cost of the 20 biggest projects is still running at about £1 billion.

As I am sure you will appreciate, Mr. Speaker, the Opposition are always handicapped by having sight of public documents of this kind only 24 hours before publication. Is it not a grave discourtesy to us and, indeed, to all Members with an interest in these matters, that the Ministry of Defence has sought to use its privileged position to taint and pre-empt public reaction to the forthcoming NAO report? If you agree with me, Mr. Speaker, can you advise me on what we might do about it?

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps I can reply to the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) first. That might help the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton).

Obviously I am not aware of the circumstances surrounding the matter raised by the hon. Member for Aldershot. This is the first time that it has come to my attention. However, I would be very angry indeed if information required for the House went first to journalists. I am not happy with that, and I condemn such an action. The best advice that I can give the hon. Gentleman is that he should allow me to investigate the matter. My officials will look into it this afternoon and will get in touch with the appropriate Minister.

Mr. Howarth: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am extremely grateful to you, as, I am sure, is the whole House. I am sorry that I could not give you notice of the matter earlier, but it came to my attention only about an hour ago. I thank you warmly for, as ever, seeking to protect the interests of Members.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. Let me say from the Back Benches that I am extremely grateful for your response to my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth). The whole matter is tremendously important to some of us whose constituencies contain defence industries. Four trade unionists from BAE Systems visited me at the House today. Please will you use your best offices—I know that you will—to ensure that statements of importance to Members are made in the House and not outside?

Mr. Speaker: I can give the hon. Gentleman that assurance. All information should come to the House; it should not go to television studios or reporters.

I am so glad that everyone is so pleased with the Speaker. I hope it that it lasts at least for the afternoon.

British Subjects (Registration)

4.24 pm

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the British Nationality Act 1981 to enable citizens of the Republic of Ireland resident in the Untied Kingdom to register as British subjects.

The Bill will offer people born in the Republic of Ireland after 1949 who have associations with the United Kingdom through residency some of the rights that are currently given to those born before 1949. It will provide political, practical and symbolic recognition of those affected and will allow them to join and to be treated in all other regards as British subjects. That end is achieved by amending the British Nationality Act 1981. There will be a requirement that anyone applying to register as a British subject under the provision swear an oath of allegiance to the Crown, as provided in schedule 5 of the 1981 Act.

It is not easy to estimate the number of people who would wish to avail themselves of that scheme, but the 2001 census for Northern Ireland provides some evidence. Its figures show that the number of people born in the Republic of Ireland, but now resident in Northern Ireland, is around 40,000, though it does not indicate how many of them were born before 1949 or give any indication of the number who might wish to avail themselves of the provision. In the Northern Ireland Westminster parliamentary constituencies, the number of people born in the Republic of Ireland ranges significantly, from less than 1,000 in one instance to more than 5,000 at the other extreme.

There is a long history to these matters, Mr. Speaker, dating way back to the Act of Union 1801 and perhaps long before it. For present purposes, Members will be content to note that I will confine myself to the last century in general and the last 50 years or so in particular. I will point out that there is already a scheme in place for those people in this position who were born before 1949.

The law as it stands makes provision for anyone born before 1949 in the Republic of Ireland with associations with the UK—as defined in the 1981 Act—to become a British subject. Indeed, we have the ludicrous position whereby those born in Northern Ireland who consider themselves Irish, though they have never lived in the Irish Republic or voted in an Irish election or paid Irish taxes, can avail themselves of an Irish passport by a straightforward process of completing an application form and enclosing the fee, yet those born a few miles across the border in the Republic since 1949, having lived in the UK for many years, having voted in UK elections and having paid UK taxes, cannot avail themselves of a British passport without going through the cumbersome procedure of applying for what is known as naturalisation.

It is impossible to understand the issue without fully appreciating the relationships between all the people who live within the British Isles. Just a few weeks ago, we remembered those who have died in various conflicts, including the first world war. At that time, many born in what is now the Republic of Ireland fought as British soldiers in the British Army. As I have already explained, the law reflects their circumstances, as they were obviously born before 1949. It is those born after that arbitrary date, some of whom were descendants of those soldiers, who are denied the same option.

[Mr. Gregory Campbell]

The last few decades have inevitably focused on events in Northern Ireland and the history of our Province. There has not been much focus on the history of the Republic of Ireland since partition. One is inevitably driven to generalities when dealing with such matters. For example, in the 1920s, the drawing of the boundary between what is now Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland was not without contention. Some areas with a significant Protestant or Unionist population were not included in Northern Ireland. The reduction in the number of Protestants living in the Republic from 1921 to today is also a matter of historical fact.

The reasons why that has been the case are a matter for another day, but quite a number of those people have moved to Northern Ireland. As I have explained, if those who moved were born before 1949, they are already catered for, but many born in the Republic of Ireland after that date will be able to benefit from the Bill. These people, aged 56 and under, are indistinguishable in every respect from other British citizens in Northern Ireland—except in their formal nationality. As a result, they travel on Irish passports and are legally regarded as citizens of the Republic of Ireland, despite many of them regarding themselves as British. To qualify for British citizenship on another basis—if such is available to them—they are required to undergo the lengthy process that I outlined earlier.

I mention only in passing the approach taken by the Republic of Ireland to those who are born in Northern Ireland. Under article 1(vi) of the British-Irish agreement—the treaty section of the Belfast agreement—anyone born in Northern Ireland has the right to identify themselves as Irish or British or both, as they so choose; it is a matter for them. They also have the right to be regarded as Irish citizens. This allows me, living in Northern Ireland, to regard myself as an Irish citizen if I so wish, yet some of my neighbours—those born, for example, in County Donegal in the 1950s and 1960s, but who have lived in the United Kingdom for almost all their lives—cannot currently become British subjects without some inconvenience and additional cost.

I do not believe it too much of an assumption to accept that the majority of those in Northern Ireland who would wish to benefit from this change in legislation are from the Unionist tradition, but it would of course be open to all to whom it applied. None the less, since I raised this issue publicly in Northern Ireland, there has been no opposition to the provisions. Indeed, it is difficult to imagine how anyone could oppose this anomaly's being resolved.

This Bill is important not just in a symbolic, but in a very practical, way. It is important to these individuals that they be recognised as subjects in the country in which they live, contribute, vote and pay taxes.

4.32 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): I am very unhappy about this proposal. It carries with it a number of very important assumptions and implications with which I am certainly not prepared to go along at this stage; it needs a lot of further debate. The first assumption is the casual one that the good folk of Ireland should continue to have special privileges in this country that others do not have. Of course, Ireland is a proud member of the European Union, as, indeed, is this country—for the time being. That suggests that for fairness and even-handedness, we should treat Ireland in exactly the same way as we treat other EU member states: no better and no worse. This constant demand for special treatment for Ireland strikes me as anomalous, to say the least. If the Irish want their country to be treated as a sovereign nation within the EU, they should surely accept the responsibilities that go with that. So there is a basic problem with this proposition that we have to face up to.

I turn to another difficulty. The hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) made some play of the fact that the naturalisation process is extremely difficult, arduous and strenuous. I do not think that that is so, but if it is, it is properly the case. Surely British citizenship is a privilege that should be somewhat arduous and difficult, rather than casual and easy, for people of any other nationality to obtain. So the idea that we make the privilege of British citizenship very simple and easy to get strikes me as odd. We should move in the other direction instead, given the problems that we face with people coming from other countries to this country. If, as the hon. Gentleman suggested, they come to live here for a long time, pay taxes and so on, there is a process open to them whereby they may apply to become British citizens, and it is a perfectly proper and correct process. I hope that that process is retained. Indeed, I could easily be persuaded that it should be made somewhat more difficult, rather than easier.

I have given two basic reasons why I think that this proposal should be resisted, certainly until we have explored its implications a lot further than we are able to today.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 23 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business), and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gregory Campbell, Kate Hoey, Michael Fabricant, Andrew Mackinlay, Lembit Opik, Rev. Ian Paisley, Mr. Peter Robinson, Mr. Nigel Dodds and Mrs. Iris Robinson.

BRITISH SUBJECTS (REGISTRATION)

Mr. Gregory Campbell accordingly presented a Bill to amend the British Nationality Act 1981 to enable citizens of the Republic of Ireland resident in the United Kingdom to register as British subjects: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on 16 June, and to be printed [Bill 91].

Opposition Day

[10TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Welfare Reform and Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): We now come to the debate on welfare reform and incapacity benefit. I must tell the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

4.36 pm

Sir Malcolm Rifkind (Kensington and Chelsea) (Con): I beg to move,

That this House is extremely concerned that the Government is failing to tackle welfare reform despite promises to do so; recognises that the pensions system is in crisis; notes that the Prime Minister believes the Child Support Agency is not suited to carry out the task that it has been given; believes that the New Deal has failed to deliver; notes that 116,000 more people are claiming incapacity benefit than in 1997 despite the Government's pledge to reduce the number; is deeply disturbed that the Incapacity Benefit Green Paper, which was due to be published in the summer and then the autumn, will not now be published until January; believes that this is due to continuing conflict between the Prime Minister and the Department for Work and Pensions on the desired content of the Paper; and calls on the Government finally to deal with the increasingly urgent need for welfare reform, for the benefit of users of the system and all taxpayers.

My first, and very pleasant, duty is to welcome the new Secretary of State to his responsibilities. I am getting rather good at this, as only six months ago I welcomed his predecessor, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett). The right hon. Gentleman is no less than the fourth person to occupy the role in just over 12 months. The Prime Minister had better get careful: to lose one Secretary of State is a misfortune, to lose two is clearly carelessness, but to lose three suggests a degree of serial incompetence in 10 Downing street. In part, that explains some of the incoherence that we are experiencing in welfare policy.

Of course, we wish the new Secretary of State well. I hope that he will not mind if I borrow a phrase from pension language and say that he will find his Department rather difficult to handle, with very few direct benefits for him. He will expect to make most of the contributions and will find that a difficult task. One of the questions on which we will judge his performance is whether he can live up to his predecessor, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside. Despite his other failings, he was a big beast and could hold out against 10 Downing street when that was appropriate. The Secretary of State does not yet have that reputation, and we wait with interest to see whether he can earn it.

Welfare reform is an appropriate subject for debate today. When they first came to office in 1997, the Government chose to adopt it as one of the major issues on which they would be judged. It was one of the great themes of that election, but the Prime Minister essentially fell at the first hurdle. The right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) was appointed as the Minister in charge of welfare and invited to think the unthinkable. However, he was out of government within a year, and never emerged again.

That was our first evidence that, on welfare reform and many other issues, the Prime Minister is very powerful when it comes to rhetoric, but very poor when it comes to delivery.

Ed Balls (Normanton) (Lab): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: I will in a moment. The Prime Minister likes to give the impression that he leads from the front but, on a great many issues, he prefers to go for public opinion when the going gets tough. In effect, he tells people, "Tell me where you wish to go, in order that I might lead you."

Ed Balls: In 1997, the Government introduced the new deal, which has reduced unemployment in my constituency by 80 per cent. and helped 550 single parents into work. Why does the right hon. and learned Gentleman want to abolish the new deal? Is that a coherent policy?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: Like the hon. Gentleman, we know that most jobs offered under the new deal are not permanent. It has not had the impact that had been hoped for, and a powerful argument for using the private and voluntary sectors to find jobs is that they tend to offer long-term or permanent employment.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ian Austin (Dudley, North) (Lab): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: I hope that the House will forgive me, but I intend to make my speech. I will accept interventions, but this debate is about the incoherence of the Government's welfare policy. That is what we shall concentrate on.

On so many issues, at the first sign of difficulty, the Prime Minister tries to distance himself from the policy of his own Government. Only last week, the Prime Minister dropped broad hints at the Dispatch Box that he was enthusiastic about the suggestion that the Child Support Agency should be abolished—he knows the low esteem in which it is held by the public. But of course, soon after the Prime Minister left the Chamber, No. 10 Downing street and the Department for Work and Pensions were asked for confirmation of the policy, and we then heard the magic word, "clarification". That made it clear that there was no intent to abolish the CSA. There was no new policy on the CSA: the Prime Minister simply wished to make a short-term impact.

The same thing happened with the deal that was done between the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the public sector trade unions. The Prime Minister let it be known how unhappy he was with the deal that had been made, as if somehow it had nothing to do with him. His attitude was, "Forgive me, I'm only the Prime Minister. I can't be expected to be held responsible for deals made by my Government." But we know that that deal has been enormously damaged by the Government's attempt to argue that the rest of the population should work longer and retire later while simultaneously sanctioning a deal for their own employees that will take 40 years to come into effect. It is a poor situation, and the Secretary of State will have to acknowledge that.

[Sir Malcolm Rifkind]

We are discussing welfare policy as a whole today, but as the motion implies I shall concentrate specifically on incapacity benefit, which is one of the areas where the Government have most fallen down on their stated ideals since they came into office.

Huw Irranca-Davies: The right hon. and learned Gentleman probably knows that areas in my constituency—Bridgend and Rhondda Cynon Taff—saw the rolling out of the pathways to work pilots. It is right to say that since the Government have been in power the number of incapacity benefit claimants has risen from 2.6 million to just over 2.7 million. However, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm that if the trend established under the Conservatives had continued, the increase would have been from 2.6 million to 4 million? This Government have tightened up the system and helped people back into work under the pathways to work pilot.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman might think that he is being logical, but he should remember that logic is the art of going wrong with confidence. He should not use that sort of nonsense argument if he wishes to impress the House.

This is a debate about incapacity benefits, which are received by many millions of our fellow citizens, the majority of whom are sick or disabled. I am proud to have been a member of a Government who introduced improvements to the financial security and wellbeing of millions of our fellow citizens who, through no fault of their own, are sick or disabled. Of course, when one introduces such improvements, there is an initial high take-up, but that should be welcomed because it improves the wellbeing of our fellow citizens. However, the Government cannot rest on that case. When they came to office in 1997, they said that the number claiming—the hon. Gentleman rightly said that it was 2.62 million—was far too high. The Prime Minister said then, and has said every year since, that 1 million of those people should be in employment and not on benefit—

Edward Miliband (Doncaster, North) (Lab): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: No, I shall not give way until I have finished my point.

The Prime Minister and his colleagues should be judged by the policy on which they came to power, which—

Huw Irranca-Davies: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: No, I wish to develop my argument and then I will take interventions.

The starting point that we have is a Labour party which said that the number of claimants was far too high at 2.62 million and that it was an overwhelming priority of a Labour Government to reduce that figure by—it hoped—1 million. What has been achieved in the past eight years?

Edward Miliband: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: No. The hon. Gentleman does not want to be reminded of the facts, but he will be reminded that far from reducing the figure by the million that the Government sought as their target, the number of people claiming incapacity benefit has gone from 2.62 million to 2.74 million—120,000 more claimants than when the Government came into office.

The situation is even more alarming than that. The biggest increase in that overall total is in the number of people who have been claiming IB for stress or depression, subjects that by their nature are far more difficult to prove or disprove and where general practitioners have the greatest difficulty in establishing the reliability of the claim. The figure was 592,000 in 1997, but it is now more than 1 million, a 39 per cent. increase. That is the mark of the Government's failure.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I appreciate the right hon. and learned Gentleman's generosity in giving way again on that point. He did not accept my figure of 4 million if the Conservative policy had continued, but will he accept that since 1997 the Government have succeeded in tightening up the gateway so that although people already on incapacity benefit will, as part of our policy, be increasingly well protected, the trend for people going on to incapacity benefit is downwards? That was certainly not happening under the Conservatives.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: Only the hon. Gentleman, or perhaps some of his colleagues, could claim that an increase of 120,000 is a downward trend—[Interruption.] He will be difficult to persuade because he uses a system of grammar that is not known to the rest of the human race. That is a matter on which we will have to agree to differ.

By the Government's own standards, they have failed over the past eight years. There has been a remarkable collapse. Each year, Ministers have to say the same thing. In 1997, they were saying that a million people needed to be found jobs and in 2004, after they had already been in office for seven years, there were still a million people who needed to be found jobs. Only last year, the Secretary of State's predecessor found yet another million people who still had to be found jobs, yet nothing has happened and that is typical of the Government's approach.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): I was interested to hear the right hon. and learned Gentleman say that he was proud to have introduced incapacity benefit. The reason for reform is that the benefit itself has put barriers in the way of disabled people who want to get back into work. How can he be proud of that?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: I did not say that there is no case for reform. Of course there is, as there would be for any other major innovation. I am saying that the Government have completely failed to meet that case; they have completely failed to deliver the policy that is required.

At the beginning of the year the Government announced a major new strategy, launched by the right hon. Gentleman who is now Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. That was two Secretaries of State ago; it is difficult to keep up, as the current Secretary of State for Work and Pensions will appreciate. On 2 February, when the Department of Work and Pensions five-year strategy was launched, the Government announced, with the hype typical of them, that they were launching the > "biggest change in incapacity benefits since they were created".

That sounds pretty impressive, as though the Government were at long last getting to grips with the problem, yet when we looked at what it meant in practice we found three things.

First, we found that all that the Government proposed to do was to publish a Green Paper—not a White Paper. One might have thought that if they had already worked out how to implement the greatest reform in incapacity benefit it would have been followed by a White Paper, which could have gone out for consultation. But no, we were promised only a Green Paper.

Secondly, the new policy would be implemented—if it ever was—not in 2005, or even 2006 or 2007, but in 2008, three years from now. Thirdly, the most extraordinary part of the announcement, which is, I think, still Government policy, is that all the marvellous new benefits would not apply to a single one of the 2.7 million existing IB claimants but only to new claimants.

In their announcement the Government said:

> "The reformed benefit will provide enhanced financial security for the most severely sick and disabled"

Very good. None the less, not one severely disabled person currently receiving the benefit will have the ghost of an opportunity to enjoy any of the new benefits. The same announcement stated that there would be > "more money than now for all those claimants who take part in work focused activity".

More money than now, but not for anybody receiving the benefit now. For some reason best known to the Government, no advantage will be obtained by the 2.7 million people currently in receipt of IB.

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: I will, although I would have been happier to give way to the Secretary of State if he wanted to correct or change that policy, but as he remains silent and is on a learning curve I will give way to the hon. Member for Linlithgow and East Falkirk (Michael Connarty) instead.

Michael Connarty: As always, the right hon. and learned Gentleman is trying to teach us all something. He tried it the last time he was here. Unfortunately, I think he has got it wrong. My understanding from people that I have talked to in the DWP is that anyone who is on incapacity benefit at the moment who believes that they can have the benefit of those extra resources will be granted them. I have asked and been told that that is the case.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: I think we are talking about different things—unless the Government have made an announcement of a change of policy to the hon. Gentleman that he has not announced to the House. That is always possible. [Interruption.] On the contrary; we have not had the Green Paper yet. That brings me to my next remarks. All we have to go on at the moment is—

Mr. Pat McFadden (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: No. Let me deal with this matter first. The hon. Gentleman will forgive me. All we have to go on as to what the Government's policy is—

Edward Miliband rose—

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: No; I am sorry. All we have to go on is what the Government said in February. In February it was indicated that the new reform proposals would not apply to existing claimants, only to new claimants after 2008. Let me just share with the House—

Edward Miliband rose—

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: I understand why hon. Gentlemen wish to deflect me, but they will not succeed. Let me share with the House what has happened since that grand statement in February, promising the greatest ever reform in incapacity benefit. We were told then that there would be a Green Paper—seemingly it had to be a Green Paper, but at least it would be published in the summer—and that remained the Government's position. Indeed, after the general election the Prime Minister repeated at his first press conference that

> "there will be a Green Paper on reform of Incapacity Benefit before the summer recess."

Well, what happened to it? It never appeared. And later, in July, we were told that the timetable had slipped, and that it would be published in the autumn. And then, when asked at oral questions on 31 October why the Green Paper was four months overdue, the Minister for the disabled, the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions—the hon. Member for Stirling (Mrs. McGuire)—said,

> "the Green Paper is not four months overdue: we made it very clear earlier this year that we would publish it in the autumn."—[Official Report, 31 October 2005; vol. 438, c. 622.]

Well, the difference between summer and autumn is not very different from four months, but we shall put that on one side.

Then we had a statement by the Prime Minister on 16 November that the Green Paper is not now going to be published until January of next year. Now, is January of next year consistent with the autumn? Is this what the Government mean by their policy on climate change? Are these things very difficult to control? When asked why the delay was taking place—

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab) rose—

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: I shall not give way for the moment.

[Sir Malcolm Rifkind]

When asked why, the Prime Minister said, "Well, you know, there has been a change of Minister at the head of the Department." This, we are told, is the official reason why the Green Paper now cannot come out until next year. Well, when the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside was appointed Secretary of State back in May, that was not given as a reason for delay; far from it. The Prime Minister confirmed that the original timetable was going to be held to.

We know exactly why the delay has taken place. If the Secretary of State will forgive me, it has nothing to do with his appointment. It has to do with the very serious differences of view, to put it mildly, between the Prime Minister and the previous Secretary of State—and perhaps the present incumbent. We just do not know yet what the present incumbent's view is. But what we do know—

Lynne Jones: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: No.

What we do know is that the Prime Minister has been putting very severe pressure on the Department for Work and Pensions—quite contrary to the Government's stated policy—to toughen up the line. We know that it is contrary to the Government's stated policy, because the Secretary of State has actually said that this is not a cuts agenda.

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. John Hutton) indicated assent.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: The right hon. Gentleman is nodding. And others have said that cutting benefit is not part of the Government's reforms. And yet we know—unless the right hon. Gentleman will tell us that this is not true—that on Monday 10 October, "Channel 4 News" reported—[Laughter.] Well, we shall hear the Government's views on this in a moment—

Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): Scraping the barrels.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: I can understand the hon. Gentleman's nervousness.

On Monday 10 October, "Channel 4 News" reported:

> "We understand the Prime Minister wrote to Mr. Blunkett over the weekend asking for cuts to the planned levels of Incapacity Benefit . . . The Prime Minister's proposals would mean"— apparently, Channel 4 had seen a copy of the letter—that

> "average Incapacity Benefit claimants would be ten pounds a week worse off than under" the Secretary of State's own

> "plans. Many could be thirty to forty pounds a week worse off."

It was said that the Prime Minister was

> "suggesting the benefits should be time limited"

and

> "people could not claim it after two years and would move on to other benefits or no benefits."

On Sunday 30 October, it was reported that, following a further memo from the Prime Minister—or it may have been the same memo—the previous Secretary of State had written to the Prime Minister saying that he could not accept the last-minute, hard-line changes to incapacity benefit that were being demanded by Downing street. Apparently, the demands in the Prime Minister's own memo to the Secretary of State included replacing part of the £76 per week given to incapacity benefit claimants with tokens that could only be spent on job training courses, and that incapacity benefit would be paid at jobseeker's allowance rates, which are, of course, far less than long-term incapacity benefit.

We will expect the new Secretary of State to indicate what truth there is in those reports. Indeed, I am happy to give way to him now. Is he willing at this very moment to come to the Dispatch Box to say that neither he nor his predecessor has received representations from the Prime Minister or from No. 10 Downing street asking for the Green Paper to be changed to become more harsh with regard to incapacity benefit? Would he care to deny that those reports are true?

Lynne Jones: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: No. Forgive me, but I am interested in the Secretary of State at the moment. I notice that he has not intervened, and we will listen very carefully to his remarks in his own speech to find out whether he deals with this matter or tries to avoid it.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): The confusion is even greater than my right hon. and learned Friend has already eloquently described, given that the then Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, who is now the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, told the House on 28 February:

> "we will not introduce time-limiting of incapacity benefit."—[Official Report, 28 February 2005; Vol. 431, c. 630.]

Would it not be helpful if the current Secretary of State now abandoned his self-denying ordinance, came to the Dispatch Box and told us whether he can repeat that commitment?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: That would be very agreeable indeed. I think that I can make a fairly clear prediction that that will not happen; but of course, the Secretary of State will have my full agreement if he wishes to clarify the point so ably made by my hon. Friend.

Lynne Jones: I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for finally giving way to me. While I would have grave concerns about some of the measures that he has articulated, although I have no knowledge of whether there is any truth in those suggestions, I was very happy with the proposals announced last February by the former Secretary of State for Work and Pensions. However, I take issue with the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the Government's proposals do not help those who are on disability benefits. Will he comment on the success of the pathways to work programme? We must expand that programme, so that more people on disability benefits can get the opportunity and support that it gives. Will the Opposition support those measures?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: If the hon. Lady welcomed the announcement made in February, she must share my disappointment that it will be three years at least before those measures come into force. Indeed, that raises another question: the date of 2008 was given in February, but we have now had a six-month delay in the publication of the Green Paper. So we must now assume that it is highly likely that it will be 2009, not 2008, before the proposals are implemented. [Interruption.] If the Secretary of State can possibly bear to listen to the debate, he might like to consider whether the date is still 2008, or whether, as a result of the six-month delay in the publication of the Green Paper, 2009 is a more credible date from the Government's point of view.

Edward Miliband: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: No. This is a short debate; I have given way a lot; and many hon. Members on both sides of the House wish to take part.

Edward Miliband: What about the pathways project?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: I was going to comment on the pathways project. The pilot schemes under that project are useful. They are a step in the right direction, but they are only scratching the surface. As the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Lynne Jones) knows, they are only pilot schemes and could take years before they make the kind of impact that the Government pledged to make back in 2007.

If the House and Labour Members wish to see more rapid progress, they should look much more carefully at the proposals that the Conservative party has made with a great deal of support from the voluntary sector and charitable organisations. They should listen to the views of the Institute for Public Policy Research, which is an organisation to which I would have thought that they would give some credibility—it is not exactly a right-wing think-tank. It said:

"the private and voluntary sectors ought to have a greater role in providing employment support initiatives".

Indeed, the proposals launched by my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), who is now shadow Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, which were part of our election manifesto, have been well received. For example, the Shaw Trust said:

"We welcome the policy statement" of the Conservative party. The director of Disability Awareness in Action said:

"The Conservatives are doing . . . good things around benefits."

The chief executive of Scope said:

"The Tories have recently shown a commitment to supporting disabled people into employment through its potentially radical work on incapacity benefits."

Our proposals, which are based on using the voluntary, charitable and private sectors, are not just theoretical ideas, because they already exist in a modest way. They have been more successful because they are more flexible and sensitive. They make less use of taxpayers' funds, and based on the statistics that already exist, the jobs that they find tend to be long-term jobs.

Ed Balls: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman really trying to tell the House that the IPPR, Scope and the other organisations to which he refers support his proposal to abolish the new deal for young people and the new deal for disabled people?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: I am talking about incapacity benefit at the moment. I will be happy to deal with those matters on another occasion—[Interruption.] No, I will not be deflected from incapacity benefit. The hon. Gentleman must acknowledge that the Government have manifestly failed to meet their own objective of getting hundreds of thousands of people who would like to work into employment. Voluntary and charitable organisations have endorsed the Conservative party's proposals and are deeply disillusioned by the Government's approach.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): The right hon. and learned Gentleman seems to suggest that the voluntary sector and the organisations to which he refers will be more successful than the public sector generally. Has he compared the outcome of the pathways to work pilot projects with that of the examples that he cited from the private and charitable sectors?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: I commented on that a few moments ago. I acknowledged that the pilot schemes were useful and that they had made interesting progress. However, I repeat that they are scratching at the surface. They are not making the kind of impact that voluntary, charitable and private sector organisations have already made over the past couple of years on getting people into long-term employment.

Edward Miliband: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: I am conscious that this a short debate, so I will not allow further interventions. I am sorry.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill) (Lab) rose—

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: Well, I will give way to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Clarke: I am sure that the right hon. and learned Gentleman appreciates that some of us have followed these matters for some time and recall when one of his predecessors as the Member for Kensington and Chelsea had responsibility for them. The right hon. and learned Gentleman mentions organisations such as Scope. Although there is of course great concern that we get matters of incapacity benefit right, does he recall that those organisations rightly led campaigns year after year to plead for the right of disabled people to get out of benefits and into work? Did he agree with those campaigns?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: I agree with that. I pay tribute to the work of the right hon. Gentleman in those campaigns and the good progress that has been made, with many people in all political parties sharing the same ideal and objective. However, today's debate is about a slightly different issue: the fact that in the past few years, the progress that was made has slowed down and, in some cases, has not been delivered.

[Sir Malcolm Rifkind]

The policy over which the Secretary of State has been asked to preside has so far failed. I accept that that is a serious charge, but there are pretty important witnesses for the prosecution. The right hon. Member for Birkenhead, a senior Labour Back Bencher and former Minister, said:

> "The Government has lost the plot on welfare reform".

If the Secretary of State wants the view of someone who has occupied his own post, I suggest that of his immediate predecessor, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside, who admitted that the system over which he presided was, to use his own delicate word, "crackers".

If those are simply the views of ex-Ministers and the Secretary of State will be influenced only by those of his current colleagues, he need look no further than the Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform, the right hon. Member for Barking—[Laughter.] I emphasise that that is a pure coincidence. She said in her own unforgettable words when referring to the welfare system no more recently than 1 November, as quoted in The Herald in Glasgow:

> "So far, we have done sweet nothing."

If that is the view of the Minister, we on the Conservative Benches can be forgiven for endorsing her objective assessment of the Government's record so far.

I conclude with a tribute to the Prime Minister, who has put his commitment to welfare reform clearly on the line. He said way back in 1996 at a Labour party conference before he became Prime Minister:

> "By the end of a five-year term of a Labour Government"— that would have been 2002, three years ago—

> "I vow"—

not I promise or I hope or I aspire—

> "that we will have reduced the proportion we spend on the welfare bills of social failure . . . This is my covenant with the British people. Judge me upon it. The buck stops with me".

On that basis, we invite the House to approve the motion and to condemn the Government's abysmal failure.

5.6 pm

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. John Hutton): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

> "welcomes the Government's consistent commitment since 1997 to pursue welfare reform to create an active, enabling welfare state where rights match responsibilities; supports the recent publication of the Principles of Welfare Reform, which builds on the foundations laid out in A New Contract for Welfare, published in 1998 and the Department for Work and Pensions' Five Year Strategy of February 2005; commends the Government's achievements in helping 2.1 million children out of absolute poverty since 1997; recognises the success of the New Deals, through which over 1.2 million people have moved into work; notes that new claims for incapacity benefit have been cut by one third since 1997; further recognises the importance of the National Pensions Debate in creating a dialogue with the public and building a consensus on pensions reform; further welcomes the progress made on tackling disability discrimination, opening doors for disabled people to remain in or return to work; in contrast, condemns the shameful record of the Opposition who spent more on administering the Child Support Agency than they paid out in maintenance and who allowed those on unemployment benefit to hit three million twice whilst also trebling the numbers on incapacity benefits between 1979 and 1997, costing the taxpayer billions and condemning millions of people to a life of benefit dependency."

I thank the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind) for his kind words of welcome; I very much appreciate them. I, too, look forward to our exchanges inside and, I suspect, outside the House. I congratulate him on his speech. It was the traditional rhetoric that we expect from him: it was high on rhetoric and depressingly low on content—in fact, there was no content or substance whatever that would allow anyone inside or outside the House to have any inkling of his solution to the catalogue of misery that he described.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): You are the Government.

Mr. Hutton: That is strangely perceptive of the hon. Gentleman. We are the Government, and we have won three successive general elections partly on the basis of our manifesto in this area, but more widely too.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman suffers from one significant problem, which was clear to all of us on the Labour Benches: not only has he no policy—let us leave that on one side; that is a big enough impediment for him—but I am afraid that no one believes a word that he has to say about welfare reform. The public are right not to do so. We remember his record and that of his right hon. and hon. Friends in government for 18 years. He said virtually nothing about that record during his speech. I intend to refresh his memory and that of all my hon. Friends.

I pay tribute to my predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), and I appreciate what the right hon. and learned Gentleman had to say about him. I hope that Members on both sides of the House will join me in recognising my right hon. Friend's passionate commitment to tackling inequality and to helping some of the most disadvantaged members of our community. I am sure that he will continue to make a major contribution to our debates on these and other issues both in the House and outside it.

There are without doubt a number of very demanding challenges that face me as a new Secretary of State, but defending this Government's record on welfare reform from criticism by Conservative Members is not one of them. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's main criticism today is that our approach to welfare reform is incoherent. I totally disagree with that analysis. Since 1997, we have taken forward a programme of radical reform of our welfare state. First and foremost, we have provided much more effective help for people looking for work through the new deal. We have taken action to ensure that work pays. The national minimum wage and tax credits have helped to make the transition from welfare to work possible for hundreds of thousands of our fellow citizens. We have made genuine inroads into the scandalous levels of poverty among pensioners and young families that we inherited when we came to office.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Is it not a fact that almost from the moment that the Government came into existence eight years ago, the winter fuel allowance was introduced? It is now £200, as my right hon. Friend knows, and £300 for the over-80s. During the 18 years of Conservative government, despite constant demands from pensioners, Labour MPs and others, no such scheme was introduced. The only scheme that was in operation was one that offered payment if the temperature was below freezing for seven consecutive days, and people on income support received £7 or £8. Is that not one of the great differences between the present Opposition and Government?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and, if he will allow me, I would like to develop that theme in a minute.

We have taken action to improve the quality and efficiency of the services that we provide in the Department for Work and Pensions by establishing, for example, Jobcentre Plus and the new Pension Service. That adds up to a record of substantial achievement, and it stands in stark and plain contrast to the period in which the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea was in office. As I said, he singularly failed to refer to that record at any point, which was probably a wise decision on his part. However, I would like to refresh his memory of one or two matters.

When the Opposition were in power their policies meant that unemployment reached 3 million and there was a 300 per cent. increase in the number of people claiming incapacity benefit. Between 1979 and 1997, the number of people on incapacity benefit trebled from 700,000 to 2.6 million—the equivalent of 2,000 extra claimants every single week. The Conservatives' dismal record of incompetence and failure wrecked families and communities the length and breadth of the country. They managed the extraordinary feat of creating 3 million unemployed not once but twice during their period of office—a unique achievement in 20th-century history—not that they cared very much about it. The right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), whose own contribution was to add 1 million to the unemployment figures as Employment Secretary was quoted as saying that "unemployment never matters". He will soon have the opportunity to reflect on the accuracy of his observation.

The Conservatives were not content with raising the number of people claiming out-of-work benefits. Child poverty doubled, leaving Britain with the worst child poverty record in Europe. What did they make of that? The hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) told the House that

> "all we hear . . . is poverty, poverty, poverty—la, la, la, always on the one note . . . It is just boring for Conservative Members."—[Official Report, 22 October 1992; Vol. 212, c. 636.]

Last month, 51 Opposition Members voted for the hon. Gentleman to be their next parliamentary leader.

By 1997, one in five families had no one in work, and one in three children were growing up in poverty. No one can claim that opportunity and security were more widely distributed during the Tory years. They were not—the reverse was true. The words of the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea this afternoon bear no resemblance whatever to the record of his party in government. Indeed, if there is any incoherence in the House today, it concerns the difference between his words and the actions of his party in government.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman has a unique record, because he was a Minister for the entire period between 1979 and 1997. He cannot claim, as many of his hon. Friends have done in the past few years, that the record of the previous Government had nothing whatever to do with him. His problem is that it has everything to do with him. It is on his record that he and his hon. Friends will always be judged, not on their words. Even if he wants to airbrush the record and forget his party's contribution, we will not do so.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: At the beginning of his remarks, the right hon. Gentleman seemed to be justifying the Government's failures on the basis that his party had been re-elected to power on three occasions. The Government in which I was proud to serve were re-elected on four occasions.

Mr. Hutton: Well, we shall wait and see how many times the present Government are re-elected. The right hon. and learned Gentleman may have the opportunity to resurrect his own leadership election campaign after the next election. He made a very good appeal for last-minute support this afternoon.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that he was deeply disturbed that the welfare reform Green Paper is to be published in January. I have difficulty reconciling the words of his motion and what he said today with the comments of the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron)—briefly the right hon. and learned Gentleman's rival and soon to be his new boss. The hon. Member for Witney said on 8 November in his speech to the Centre for Policy Studies:

> "Conservative economic empowerment"—

that is something of an oxymoron, of course—

> "is a long term agenda to lift more people more securely from dependency to self sufficiency. The details of our agenda will take years rather than months to develop."

So there we have it. We will be publishing our proposals for welfare reform within months of being returned to office, and we are accused of incoherence. The hon. Gentleman's proposals will not see the light of day for years, and we are invited to take the view that his party has a better alternative. What complete and utter rubbish.

We take a very different view of these matters. The difference between our approach and the approach of the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea could not be clearer. We believe in a modern, active, welfare state, able to help extend opportunities to people so that they can help themselves and their families, and we have put this new approach into practice in the face of opposition from both Conservative and Liberal Democrat Members in the House. His approach, by contrast, such as we are able to discern it, is all about limiting the support and help that is on offer.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for reminding the House why we should not take lessons from Opposition Members on how to tinker with welfare reform. The policy that they seemed to outline today did not deal at all with the aspirations of people who need to get off benefit but do not have the necessary support. Simply extending the hours that a person can work while on benefit would not do it. Will my right hon. Friend make a commitment to ensure that people on incapacity benefit who wish to work—there are many of them—are fully supported in that transition?

Mr. Hutton: Yes, that is precisely what we want to do. I shall shortly come to the Green Paper. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that important point.

We should remind ourselves what has happened since 1997. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said we had done nothing since 1997. He is a lawyer, and he should know the importance of studying evidence and drawing conclusions from it. Let me put my evidence to him. There are now more people in jobs than ever before—2.3 million more than in 1997. Unemployment is at its lowest level for nearly 30 years, with long-term youth unemployment 90 per cent. lower than in 1997. With almost three quarters of the working-age population in work, our employment rate is the highest of any of the G8 countries. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, not surprisingly, failed to mention any of those facts. I suspect the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) is likely to follow suit, unless he quickly amends his speech to take into account what I have just said.

By supporting people in work and providing financial security for those who cannot work, we have helped 2.1 million children and almost 2 million pensioners escape from levels of absolute poverty since 1997. That is a positive record. We have done it, first, by building on a strong and stable economy, with low inflation, low interest rates and consistent growth—which the Opposition consistently failed to manage—and secondly, by embarking upon a radical transformation of the welfare state, introducing the most comprehensive menu of support ever provided. It is a menu of support tailored to the needs of the individual, focused on the right to work as the best route out of poverty, and balanced by a clear set of responsibilities on the individual seeking benefit.

The new deal has helped more than 1.2 million into work since it was started in 1998. The lone parent employment rate has increased by 11 percentage points since 1997. Independent studies have shown that half of the increase in the lone parent employment rate since 1997 can be attributed directly to the impact of the new deal. Because of the measures that we have taken, there are now nearly 1 million lone parents in work and the numbers of lone parents on income support have fallen by more than 200,000 since 1997. When the Conservative party was in power, lone parents were stigmatised rather than supported. It now says that it wants to end its war on lone parents, but it has its work cut out to convince anyone that that is so. The right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) talks instead of

"painful cuts in the new deal."

I am sure that will be a huge comfort to lone parents up and down the country.

The new deal for lone parents has helped nearly 320,000 lone parents back into work, yet Conservative Members have confirmed again today that they would scrap it, and so would the Liberal Democrats. Independent research shows that that would not even save money, as the new deal for lone parents saves the Exchequer £40 million a year through reduced benefit payments and increased tax revenues resulting from getting people off benefit and back into work.

If the charge of incoherence can be levied at anyone today, it is the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea who is most at risk. We share neither his analysis of the problem nor his proposed solutions. We believe—our welfare reforms are proving this—that Britain can best seize the opportunities and respond to the challenges of social, economic and demographic change, if we support all those who can and want to work to enable them to make their own contribution to our society.

Liz Blackman (Erewash) (Lab): The pathways to work pilot in Derbyshire is doing particularly well at supporting physically disabled people back into work, but it faces much more of a challenge in supporting those with mental disabilities and mental illnesses. Will my right hon. Friend assure me that he will give more thought to how we can correct that imbalance?

Mr. Hutton: I shall certainly do so. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the fact that that is one of the biggest challenges that we face in tackling the problems that we are discussing today. Some 40 per cent. of new incapacity benefit claimants have a mental health problem, and the matter requires a broader response than the work of the Department for Work and Pensions. We must actively involve the national health service and other partners, particularly local authorities and the voluntary sector, in the future reforms of the relevant support packages.

Edward Miliband: Will my right hon. Friend comment on whether pathways to work allows existing incapacity benefit claimants to take up the scheme? I understand that it does, but in his speech the shadow Secretary of State categorically said that it does not.

Mr. Hutton: My hon. Friend is right not to believe everything that the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea, who has a closed mind on all those issues because his agenda essentially concerns withdrawing active support from people who need it to get back into work, has to say on the matter.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind indicated dissent.

Mr. Hutton: The right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke for 35 minutes, but he was unable to provide a single policy option or indicate his strategy on providing more support for people who want to work and who feel that they can work. My hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) is right to say that the pathways to work pilots have made a significant difference to employment rates and the sustainable employment rate, which is the most important thing.

Ed Balls: To be fair to the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind), it is not right to say that he made no policy proposals at all, because he confirmed his support for the abolition of the new deal, which is a policy proposal. I think that my right hon. Friend should correct the record.

Mr. Hutton: I stand corrected, but in my book the abolition of the new deal is not a serious policy proposal; it is a giant step backwards that flies in the face of all the evidence on what works. If the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea wants to convince anyone of his sincerity about his policies on welfare reform, he should start by studying, rather than ignoring, the evidence on what works.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): As the Secretary of State is fresh into his job, I appreciate that he may not have had the benefit of studying the evidence on pathways to work, which we all hope produces the results that he anticipates. However, the evidence is not clear cut, because only three out of the seven pilot areas have been going for more than 12 months, so to argue that those schemes have already produced sustainable jobs is a little premature.

Mr. Hutton: It is a nice experience to be patronised by the hon. Gentleman. I am sure he will have other opportunities to do so in future. I point out to him that there is a growing body of evidence about the effectiveness of the pathways to work pilot. He says that the he wants them to work. He needs to have a conversation with the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea, who has already decided that they are failing and wants to cut their budget.

Huw Irranca-Davies: Will my right hon. Friend accept my invitation to visit the pathways to work project in my area in the near future? To confirm what was previously said, not only is the scheme reaching out to its target audience, but 1,000 individuals on long-term incapacity benefit have self-referred themselves on to it and are getting into work.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that the difference between the two Front Benches is typified by the fact that the constituency of the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind) is 214th in the incapacity benefit league table, whereas my constituency is 14th? There are more lessons to be learned from my constituency than from Kensington and Chelsea.

Mr. Hutton: Yes, indeed. I look forward to accepting my hon. Friend's invitation. I hope that he is aware that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform is due to visit his constituency—tomorrow, I believe, but either way she is on her way to South Wales. That is my first decision.

When we came into office in 1997—[Interruption.] Conservative Members are huffing and puffing because they do not like to hear what we have been doing. This debate was apparently motivated by a concern that the Government have been doing nothing on welfare reform. I am simply trying to set the record straight.

When we came into office in 1997, there was something that we wanted to put right. I am sorry to say that, having had 18 years to try to get it right, the Conservatives spectacularly failed to do so, despite 14 attempts to produce legislation. Only the most blatant forms of direct discrimination against disabled people had been outlawed. Sadly, there was still no protection for disabled employees in small firms or for disabled pupils and students. The Disability Discrimination Act 1995 lounged—that is the only description for it—on the statute book. It fell significantly short of its potential and provided no champion to help people to enforce their rights or to give employers advice and guidance on how to meet their legal obligations.

In March this year—again, before the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea returned to this House, so he might not be aware of it—the Disability Discrimination Act 2005 completed the most far-reaching programme of disability rights legislation that any European country has put in place. It fulfilled our manifesto commitment to deliver enforceable and comprehensive civil rights for disabled people, and represented a major landmark on the road to a world in which disabled people can be empowered to live independently and be respected as equal members of society.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned the new deal. Our new deal for disabled people has seen nearly 75,000 job entries since its launch in 2001, with 200,000 disabled people helped into work through our total package of new deal programmes. We are seeing very encouraging early results from our pathways to work pilots, which bring together Jobcentre Plus, the health service, GPs and employers to improve the package of support that we offer to people on incapacity benefit.

In the first year of the pilots, the number of recorded job entries for people with a health condition or disability had almost doubled compared with the same period in the previous year. I hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will think that that is a step in the right direction. Their continued success has driven a significant increase in the proportion of people leaving incapacity benefit in the first six months of their claim, compared with non-pilot areas. We are now achieving progress in helping people off incapacity benefit, with new cases now down by a third since 1997 and the first falls in the total count, which is down by 41,000 in the year to May 2005.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: Does the Secretary of State realise that the answer to the question I am about to ask is awaited as eagerly by his hon. Friends as it is by mine. Will he use this opportunity to confirm that the Prime Minister, or the Prime Minister's office, has made representations to the Department of Work and Pensions, to his predecessor, or possibly to himself, that would have the effect of toughening up entitlement to incapacity benefit?

Mr. Hutton: I am not going to talk about correspondence between the Prime Minister and me, just as—let us be clear—he would not have done when he was standing at this Dispatch Box. He can forget about that.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hutton: No, I am going to make this point, because the right hon. and learned Gentleman has asked me about it. I have made it repeatedly clear that the reforms that we are making are based on our manifesto and the five-year-plan strategy that my predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West and Hessle (Alan Johnson), produced in February. It is clear to anyone that that agenda is not about cuts. I have made that explicitly clear and I do so again today.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: Will the Secretary of State therefore state unequivocally that the Green Paper—I appreciate that we do not yet have it and that it is now not due till January—will contain no proposals that have the consequence of reducing entitlement to incapacity benefit compared with current rates?

Mr. Hutton: I have made it clear that the programme is not a cuts programme. It is not about cutting benefits.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: Answer!

Mr. Hutton: I am explicitly answering the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The territory that the Green Paper will occupy is that which we mapped out in the manifesto and our five-year plan.

We are now experiencing progress in helping people off incapacity benefit, with new cases down by a third since 1997 and, as I said, the first falls in the total count—down by 41,000. However, we have to accept the need to modernise the way in which we deliver our services. That is why we have sought improvements in the service that Jobcentre Plus provides.

Jobcentre Plus helps almost 3,000 people into jobs every working day. It does that against a background of a major efficiency exercise. It has reduced its staff from around 86,000 in March 2002 to 74,000 in March 2005 and is on course to reduce the total number of staff employed to 65,650 by March 2008.

Ninety-seven per cent. of our customers are now being paid their entitlement by direct debit. That move to direct payment will save the taxpayer more than £1 billion over the next five years. Centralised pensions centres provide a new telephone-based service, which is designed around the needs of today's 11 million pensioners. One year ahead of schedule, the Pension Service has already achieved the target of 2.1 million pensioners in receipt of the guarantee element of pension credit by 2006. Taken with our other measures to help pensioners, including winter fuel payments, free TV licences for the over-75s and the pension credit—all of which Opposition Members opposed—the average pensioner household is now £1,400 a year better off compared with the 1997 system, with the poorest third on average £1,900 better off.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman made several references to the lack of progress on welfare reform. The evidence contradicts his assertions. We stated in our manifesto that we would move further on the welfare reform agenda because we know that the challenges that confront our country and our people will accelerate. We are preparing the ground for that now.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): Will the Secretary of State confirm that there will be a statement on the reform or abolition of the Child Support Agency this year?

Mr. Hutton: We will make a statement about our reforms for the Child Support Agency. My right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside said that he intended to introduce the proposals before the end of the year and I shall try to stick to that. We must discuss the appropriate format for the statement—whether we make it here or, as was planned, in the Select Committee. However, there will be a proper opportunity for hon. Members to examine the proposals and pass judgment on them.

We strongly believe that people have the right to work and the right to the support that will enable them to do so. However, alongside those rights go responsibilities—the responsibility, when possible, to take up the support, actively to seek work and for each person to make their contribution to the well-being of our society.

Stewart Hosie: The Secretary of State has been generous in giving way. On rights and responsibilities, the pathways to work pilots have been labour intensive. Others will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe that the Renfrewshire project had 40 additional advisers plus 40 additional rehabilitation staff to help with health issues. Will the Secretary of State guarantee that, in expecting people to take responsibility, the Government will continue to contribute the correct amount of resources, and all the additional advisers and rehabilitation staff who are required so that the pilots are not perceived to be a cost-cutting exercise, but continue to be a genuine method of getting people who can work back into work?

Mr. Hutton: I do not think that anyone could fairly or accurately describe the pathways to work projects as cost-cutting exercises. That is, quite frankly, ridiculous.

Stewart Hosie: That was not my question.

Mr. Hutton: The hon. Gentleman says that that was not his question, but he certainly implied that the pathways to work projects were cost-cutting exercises. He used those words quite deliberately. We shall ensure that the active support that we provide for claimants in receipt of incapacity benefit is fit for purpose and does the job that we want it to do, which is to get people back into work, when they are able to work, as quickly as possible. Of course we will provide the appropriate level of resourcing to ensure that we can deliver such an effective policy.

I was talking about rights and responsibilities. We want to continue to pursue this agenda because we want to continue to work towards our aspiration of an 80 per cent. employment rate, which will help another 1 million people to escape from the trap of incapacity benefit. That is why I wholeheartedly endorse the principles of welfare reform that my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside published last month, and why

I am committed to taking forward this reform agenda, and to building a modern, active and inclusive welfare state that balances rights with responsibilities, that matches the respect of society for the individual with respect for society by the individual, and that, above all, helps people to move away from dependency and to make their own way in the world.

In our modern world, people can do 10 jobs in a lifetime instead of one, and they might even pursue several careers. A renewed welfare state must provide the support that enables people to make the transition from one job to another, by assisting them through rapid change and insecurity, helping them to balance the multiple pressures of work and family life, and enabling them to re-establish their independence and to benefit from the opportunities that change creates.

In our Green Paper, which the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea mentioned, we shall go further to tackle exclusion from economic activity and independence across the working-age population. We shall establish the necessary steps that we all need to take—as individuals, in Government and in the wider communities—to engage people with social and economic activity. We shall outline further measures to simplify and streamline the benefit system. We shall also develop the right support systems through which we can raise employment, skills and productivity and improve social inclusion and cohesion, at a time when the integration of communities worldwide has never been more important. As has now been made clear, we shall set out our detailed proposals in January.

Kali Mountford: My right hon. Friend mentioned dependency. I am particularly concerned about people who are in the early stages of claiming incapacity benefit. Will he take a particularly close look at how we can raise people's aspirations when they have just been told that they cannot carry on with their former employment, and ensure that, in the long term, they are properly supported in finding a different career, so that they do not feel that their life has ended at that point?

Mr. Hutton: Of course we shall do that. There are a couple of important issues that need to be tackled head on in this reform programme. One is that we need to restore the confidence of people with a disability or an illness coming into the benefit system that they will be able to work again soon. About 90 per cent. of people who receive incapacity benefit expect to be able to get back into work soon. Sadly, however, the present system does not ensure that that happens, and we need to tackle that problem head on. That will be at the core of the proposals in the Green Paper.

Michael Connarty: One cost-cutting exercise that has been admitted to by the Department under my right hon. Friend's predecessor—and his predecessor before him—was the closure of many jobcentres. I was promised a Jobcentre Plus in the mining village of Bo'ness, but what I got was a closure, and people were transferred on to the books of a jobcentre 10 miles away. Can I have a guarantee that people who seek to come off benefits and get back into work, or to change jobs, will not be forced to travel 10 miles without being given adequate financial support to cover their costs?

Mr. Hutton: I shall have to look into the particular circumstances that my hon. Friend has drawn to my attention. Let me put it clearly on record, however, that the modernisation and reform of Jobcentre Plus is not a cost-cutting exercise. The reforms have been backed by more than £2 billion of new investment in systems, technology, buildings and premises to improve the delivery and modernisation of that service. One of the challenges that the Green Paper will need to address—I hope that this will give my hon. Friend some reassurance—is the need to ensure that our employment advisers are out there in the community as well. We know that that can be effective and work well. Perhaps we need to look into that in my hon. Friend's constituency. I am sure that the Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform will deal with this issue when she winds up the debate.

Mr. Tom Clarke: My right hon. Friend is being very generous in giving way so often. Many of us feel that he should not be rushed into setting a timetable in regard to incapacity benefit. The important thing is to get this right, because we are dealing with individuals, their families and their lives. Some of my hon. Friends have referred to the practical issues. Does my right hon. Friend agree that when medical professionals meet people, it is important for them to show both competence and sensitivity, which, sadly, has not always been the case hitherto?

Mr. Hutton: I am sure that we will wish to make certain that it is the case. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for offering me the extra time that I clearly need to ensure that we get all this right.

The House will be glad to know that I shall skip the rest of my speech, because I think that most of the ground has been covered. I shall confine myself to saying that I am proud that this Labour Government have helped to transform the lives of millions of people through a programme that promotes opportunities for the many, not the few. With opportunity comes responsibility, which is why our programme of welfare reform will build on both. I look forward to proceeding with the next chapter of our reforms in the new year.

Having heard what was said by the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea at the beginning of his speech, I have no doubt that the record of this Labour Government will be strongly supported by all my right hon. and hon. Friends tonight.

5.41 pm

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): I congratulate the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind) on securing the debate. Unless my memory fails me, this is our first opportunity to debate welfare issues in the Chamber since the general election, apart from Work and Pensions questions on a couple of occasions.

I must confess that when the right hon. and learned Gentleman and I accepted our portfolios after the election, we feared that, given a hyperactive Secretary of State with a record in his previous Departments of frequently announcing initiatives in all sorts of policy areas, we would rapidly be faced with a series of proposals and statements from the then Secretary of State on such issues as Child Support Agency reform, housing benefit reform and incapacity benefit reform, and would be rushed into taking positions on all of them. Every Monday since I took on my portfolio in May, I have come to work expecting an announcement from this Secretary of State or his predecessor. We are still waiting for an announcement, but it seems possible that the only welfare reform issue on which we shall hear any detailed news about the development of Government policy before the end of the year will be the one that the Government have contracted to an outside agency, the Turner commission.

[Mr. David Laws]

The Secretary of State was kind enough to touch on CSA reform earlier. He implied that it was the one issue on which we might expect to hear an announcement before the end of the year. Will he clarify his response to my question? He appeared to be saying that it was possible that a major announcement on reform or abolition of the CSA would emerge in the form of a statement by him or one of his Ministers—I am not sure which—to the Work and Pensions Committee. A few weeks ago, it was expected that the former Secretary of State would make such a statement to the Committee tomorrow, when I believe that it will take evidence from the present Secretary of State.

I hope that the Secretary of State is not saying that he will make a major statement to the Select Committee rather than in the House, where members of all parties would have an opportunity to question him. As a member of the Government and as a constituency MP, he must realise that this is a matter of great concern to Members in all parts of the House. Notwithstanding the excellent job that will doubtless be done by our colleagues on the Committee, it would be very unsatisfactory if such a major statement were not made in the House. I ask the Secretary of State to reflect on that, and to clarify the position before the end of the debate.

May I congratulate the new Secretary of State on taking over his responsibilities? He has an incredibly important job to do, and I suspect that the job of Secretary of State for Work and Pensions is not looked on with a great deal of envy. It is a heavyweight portfolio, not one for which policy can be made up on the hoof, and it requires constant liaison with the Treasury to establish funding issues. It is not an easy portfolio, but is one of the most important in the Government, not only because it has a larger budget than any other Department, but because it impacts on all our constituents in many different ways. I want to touch on some of those different ways today.

It is fair to say, Mr. Deputy Speaker, at the outset of what is a pretty short debate that there are clearly some respects in which the Government are justified in boasting about their performance, and certainly their commitment, since 1997 in comparison with what went before. Funding has been targeted at areas that have not brought a particularly large political return for the Government, which is an indication of their seriousness in dealing with issues that were not high on the political agenda before 1997.

I also hope, however, that the Secretary of State will acknowledge that, in a range of areas, there are very serious concerns about the operation of Government policy and its future development. I wish to speak briefly today on four issues about which major concerns have been expressed about Government policy—concerns that will be shared on the Government as well as the Opposition Benches. The first relates to an aspect of the welfare system that we have not discussed today—the tax credit system, which is not directly the Secretary of State's departmental responsibility, but will be a matter of concern to him. The second is the Child Support Agency, which appears in both the Conservative and Government motions, but we have not had much opportunity to debate it so far today. I also want to speak briefly about pensions reform and, finally, incapacity benefit reform.

Let me tell the Secretary of State that, on those issues, although we will endeavour to do our best to make life as difficult as possible for this Department in the years ahead when we believe that policy is wrong, we are more than willing to work constructively to find solutions, particularly in matters for which cross-party agreement is necessary in order to secure stability and certainty for the future. The issue of pensions policy is particularly relevant there.

I hope that the Secretary State will take a keen interest in the tax credits system, even though it is not directly his responsibility. Since 1997, an increasing degree of influence or even control over the Department for Work and Pensions has come from the Treasury. If I may say so, the Treasury A-team has turned up today in the shape of the hon. Member for Normanton (Ed Balls), who is no longer in his place, and the hon. Members for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) and for Dudley, North (Mr. Austin). I hope that that shows the degree of interrelationship between the two Departments and it may also suggest that the Treasury is continuing to do what it has done since 1997—keep a close eye and a short leash on Secretaries of State for Work and Pensions.

I hope that the Secretary of State will, in looking at the development of the benefits system, reflect on whether it has really been sensible to transfer responsibility for so much of the means-tested benefit budget away from his Department to the Treasury? In particular, has it been right to put the administration of means-tested benefits for children and for people in work outside the Department for Work and Pensions, which is well used to dealing with that low-income client group, and making it a Treasury responsibility? Frankly, what I have heard in my constituency from people who work in the Secretary of State's Jobcentre Plus offices, is that that has been immensely unhelpful to the joined-up nature of the benefits system. It has not been helpful for tax credits and other benefits to be sitting in two different Departments. It has not been helpful for claimants' understanding of their entitlements and it has not been helpful for people trying to get back into employment. It has not helped the understanding of the interaction of different benefits.

We have also seen the disastrous consequences of the lack of understanding in the Inland Revenue of the difficulties faced by many people on low incomes. The system has not only generated massive overpayments of £2.2 billion in the first year, but has driven hundreds of thousands of people into debt and poverty as a consequence of the way in which tax credits were withdrawn. Labour Members, who are committed to dealing with poverty, should be willing to listen and to address these criticisms. They will be aware from their own constituency work of that system's impact on many people on low incomes. I hope that the Secretary of State can liaise with the Treasury on whether these tax credits are sitting in the right place, and use his special position to continue to lobby the Treasury to make the changes necessary to protect the interests of those on very low incomes. That includes not automatically withdrawing tax credits before such people have had a chance to establish whether the overpayments were due to official error—the ombudsman herself has been very critical of that—and considering whether this volatile system is the right way to help such people, or whether we should go back to fixed awards, which would create greater stability. So far, however, the Treasury has shown no willingness to do that.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): I must say that I agree with every word that the hon. Gentleman has said. Does he share my concern at the fact that, in some cases, Government agencies are refusing to take complaints from very poorly paid people who actually want to give the money back to the agency? They do not want it sitting in their bank account, given the obvious temptation, but they are encountering a great deal of intransigence on the part of the authorities, who seem not to want to reclaim that money immediately.

Mr. Laws: I am afraid that I recognise precisely the issue that the hon. Gentleman raises. In recent months, a number of people have pointed out to me at my constituency advice centre that, on suspecting that they had received an overpayment of tax credits, they had contacted the Inland Revenue, said that they wanted to repay the money and were told that there was no problem. However, they were contacted six or nine months down the line and told that there had indeed been an overpayment. Of course, by that stage the Inland Revenue is already recovering the money automatically. When the recovery takes place in-year, there is no protection of people's income in the way that the money is withdrawn. That is causing a lot of problems for people on low incomes.

Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): Given the hon. Gentleman's dissatisfaction with tax credits, will he be advising those of his colleagues who avail themselves of the tax credit system to stop taking advantage of it, just as he advised them to stop taking advantage of the pension system—a policy announced today?

Mr. Laws: Given that hundreds of thousands of people are being driven into real poverty by the failure of, and maladministration of, the tax credit system, it is very sad that the hon. Gentleman seeks to make a rather cheap party political point about what is a very small number of claims. This issue affects his constituents, as well as mine. Hundreds of thousands of incredibly vulnerable people are making claims, and he would not be taking this matter so lightly if he had sat in the same advice centre that I did a couple of weeks ago. I heard a string of people on very low incomes—£10,000 to £11,000—explain that they face frightening repayments of £5,000 or £6,000, often as a consequence of errors caused by people other than themselves.

The second issue, which has not been discussed much today—it certainly was not discussed much by the Secretary of State, or by the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea, perhaps because of his party's connection with this debacle—is the problem with the Child Support Agency. Since its introduction in 1993, its operation has been a disaster. Given that we have known that it was failing for a long time, and given that the Prime Minister acknowledged that it was a mess back in 1998, it is surely astonishing that nothing has been done to make the system work more effectively. As a result, billions of pounds in maintenance due to some of the poorest families in the country has not been paid, and an unbelievable backlog of a third of a million cases are sitting in the CSA. Indeed, 80,000 of them have been sitting there for more than two and a half years without being processed. That demonstrates not only that the CSA has been a failure since it was established, but that it continues to be so. It is managing to collect only £1.85 for every pound spent on administering the system. In countries such as Australia, the collection rate is approximately £8 for every pound spent.

We Liberal Democrats were interested to hear the Prime Minister say last week that the CSA is not fit for purpose. We thought that out of that might come the serious prospect of radical reform, be it reform of the existing arrangements, or the transferring of the CSA's responsibilities to the Inland Revenue—several Members from all parts of the House have suggested that—to enable the information that we currently collect on people's incomes to be used more effectively, and to enable a much greater deduction from the earnings of those who are determined to evade their responsibilities.

Journalists and others such as the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) left the House in a state of excitement that day, thinking that the Prime Minister had announced a policy on the CSA. However, when journalists phoned the Department for Work and Pensions and the No. 10 press office to check, they established that there was no such policy. It seems as if the Prime Minister was making up policy on the hoof in this area, as he seems to have done since 1998. That is why it is particularly important that there be an early opportunity for the Secretary of State to introduce proposals that tackle these problems, which have existed for many years, in a fundamental way, rather than simply seeking to gloss over them.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): As a new Member of Parliament, I have been shocked to discover the distress that the CSA has caused families. I understand where the hon. Gentleman is coming from, but can he outline where improvements could be made, or is it too late? Does the CSA need to be scrapped?

Mr. Laws: I see the same desperation among constituents that the hon. Gentleman sees. I am particularly concerned about the fact that many of our constituents seem to have given up all hope that the CSA will ever work. I have noticed in the past year or so that, while tax credits have taken off as an issue raised at constituency advice centres, the number of CSA cases raised seems to be going down. However, that reduction does not mean that such problems do not exist; rather, I suspect that many people have been bashing their heads against a brick wall for so long that they have given up.

[Mr. Laws]

The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) asked what the solution to this problem is, and it is clear that it consists of a number of elements. First, the CSA's computer system is not working properly. Given the amount of detail with which it has to deal, if it is not effective, major problems will arise. Secondly, there are simple administrative failings. That is staggering, given how long the CSA has been around and the number of attempts that must surely have been made to reform the system. I was astonished to be told a few weeks ago by an expert on the CSA that there is currently no obligation on non-resident parents to notify the CSA of a change of job or of address. That is one of the most obvious, common-sense, miniscule proposals that could possibly be made. However, it has since been confirmed by a DWP Minister that there is no such obligation.

Mr. Jeremy Hunt (South-West Surrey) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one big problem with the CSA is its complex relationship with the benefits system? People who go on to benefit have their CSA case de-prioritised; if they then come off benefit, it is re-prioritised. That complex web makes it very difficult for people to know where they stand with the CSA.

Mr. Laws: The hon. Gentleman is right. In fairness to the CSA, the hard core of cases that it is trying to deal with involve some of the most difficult families in the country in terms not only of their willingness or otherwise to make the assessed maintenance payments, but of the number of changes in their circumstances. That argues for introducing a simple system and—to us—for folding the CSA into the Inland Revenue, so that it can use the large amount of information that the Revenue already holds on people's incomes. It probably also argues for greater use of deduction at source from the earnings of those who are unwilling to pay, which is the Australian approach. The Australian deduction-of-earnings-at-source rate is about twice the UK's. As a constituency MP, I am often amazed by the reticence of the CSA to put deduction-of-earnings orders in place, despite the fact that people are often not willing to meet their maintenance liabilities.

Miss Begg: I am somewhat confused about Liberal Democrat policy in respect of the CSA. The party used to favour returning that agency's responsibilities to the courts, but the hon. Gentleman seems to be proposing that they should be handed over to the Inland Revenue, even though he has spent a large chunk of his speech criticising that agency for its failure to deliver on tax credits. Alternatively, is he just going to tinker at the edges of the problem? After what he has said, I am totally confused about where his party stands.

Mr. Laws: The hon. Lady should pay more attention to Liberal Democrat policy statements. Perhaps she would like a standing invitation to the conferences that my party holds around the country, as that would enable her to track the development of our policy on these matters. However, I can assure her that my party's policy is to fold the CSA into the Inland Revenue. That is because the Inland Revenue already collects a lot of information about the incomes of people who evade their responsibilities, and because it would be easier to deduct the money owed at source.

Miss Begg: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Laws: No. I am going to press on and deal with a couple of other issues, as time is short. I hope that reform of the CSA will be an early priority for the Secretary of State, and that he will undertake to make a statement about it to the House of Commons rather than simply to the Select Committee.

The two other issues that I want to mention are reform of the pension system, and reform of incapacity benefit. I do not expect much information on pensions from the Secretary of State as he is entitled to say that he is waiting for the report of Lord Turner's commission. The leaks to various media sources about the contents of that report seem relatively authoritative, but we will see whether they turn out to be as accurate as most people assume. When he responds to the announcement next week of the commission's final conclusion, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not try to give answers to all the points that are raised. We do not expect that of him, but we do expect him to give a signal on two issues.

First, I hope that the Secretary of State will give us an indication as to whether he accepts what seems to be the consensus outside Parliament, and among the three commissioners—that the increasing reliance on a complex, means-tested pension system is unsustainable over the long term. I hope that he will make it clear that, even if means testing has been necessary as a way of targeting money on poor pensioners in the short term, he will move away from it in favour of a simpler state pension system that will incentivise private saving over the long term.

The Secretary of State will also have to address the question of fairness in the public and private sectors. If the leaks about Lord Turner's report are accurate, it is likely that he will suggest an increase in the state pension age to 67 or 69. It would therefore appear very odd for the Government to sign off on a deal with public sector workers that would allow them—even those who have not even joined the public sector yet—to continue to retire at the age of 60 for a number of years after the introduction of Lord Turner's proposal to set the state pension age at 67. I hope that the Secretary of State will acknowledge that it may be necessary to return to the issue of public sector pensions reform. The office of the Prime Minister seemed to do as much in comments made to The Times in recent days. The matter needs to be looked at more in a more fundamental way. It is possible that a second independent report will need to be commissioned—not necessarily to be compiled by Lord Turner—on the future sustainability of the pension system.

Mr. Hutton: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, and I know that other hon. Members want to speak, but I am very struck by his request that we revisit the deal on public sector pensions. The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) condemned the Government for proposing that new entrants—let alone existing scheme members—should have their pension age increased to 65. What is his view on that response? His position seems totally inconsistent with it.

Mr. Laws: The Secretary of State will know that the view among Liberal Democrat Front-Bench Members has been perfectly consistent, and that we have criticised the deals struck by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. If he wants to enlighten us in this debate, will the right hon. Gentleman say whether he thinks that the deal that the Government have struck with some major public sector unions has been helpful to him, and to Lord Turner's commission, in moving the debate forward on this key issue?

We await the Secretary of State's comments on 30 November. We will find out then whether his views are in line with those of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, or whether they are more in line with those of the Prime Minister. The latter seems to be very unhappy with the deal that has been struck.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman share my concern that the complexity of applying for tax credits and benefits, and of making claims to the CSA—all of which requires long forms to be filled in—deters the least well off and most vulnerable people in society, who often suffer from dyslexia and similar learning difficulties?

Mr. Laws: I agree precisely on that point. One of the challenges for the Government, and for all political parties, is to simplify the tax and benefits system. A couple of weeks ago, a person came to one of my advice centres from whom a total of between £4,000 and £5,000 in tax credits was being reclaimed. He had learning difficulties, and had been put in a work placement. He had no understanding of how the tax credits system worked, and was therefore facing a very unfair recovery process. Moreover, Government policy is very ambiguous about whether he would be required to repay that money.

Finally, I turn to the question of incapacity benefit reform. We welcome the Government's intention to look at the matter seriously. Over the past 20 years, there has been a turnaround in the number of people on unemployment benefit and incapacity benefit. In the early 1980s, between 2 million and 3 million people claimed unemployment benefit, and very many fewer claimed incapacity benefit. The change since then has been enormous, and the number of people on incapacity benefit is now between 2.6 million and 2.7 million.

Clearly, that is extremely wasteful for the economy, but it is often very undesirable for the people involved as well. As the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea noted, the Government have said for eight years that a million people on incapacity benefit want to get back into employment. The fact that that figure of a million people has been used year after year underlines the lack of an effective policy so far to change the system.

We believe that the Pathways process helps people to get back into employment. I have visited the Pathways centre in my Yeovil constituency and it seems to be working well so far, although relevant statistics are fairly modest, as the system has been in operation for only a limited period. However, we hope that the Secretary of State will be willing to fund the Pathways process across the country, and that he will not come under pressure to deliver savings in a way that could damage incapacity benefit reform. Such savings might be achieved by time limiting payments or by turning a portion of the payments into vouchers, but they would hit a very vulnerable group of people.

Although some people on incapacity benefit would like to work, are capable of doing so and would be helped by the Pathways process, I hope that the Secretary of State has got the message that some very vulnerable people—whose conditions are often difficult to detect—are very worried about the proposals that the Government might bring forward. They are keen to get an assurance that their position and vulnerability will not be threatened by a precipitate attempt to secure savings to fund the Pathways process.

By the time that we next have the opportunity to debate welfare reform, I hope that the Government will have given us policies of more substance than has been the case over the past six months.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. It is appropriate for me to remind the House now that Mr. Speaker has imposed a 10-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches. If hon. Members can make do with less than that, they will earn the gratitude of their colleagues.

6.9 pm

Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to take part in this short debate. I found the contribution from the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind) intriguing. It was almost as though he had never been away.

Debates such as this are an opportunity to probe the Opposition. As Opposition Members have spent the past two months touring the country and the television studios with the tale of two Davids, this could be a useful debate. I recently had a glimpse of one David, the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), giving a speech in Birmingham, in which he attacked the Labour party's approach to welfare. He told us that his vision for the future promises a huge expansion of the voluntary sector. I do not know whether that was a code for cuts, but I was a bit disturbed when he went on to say what he thinks the sick, the unemployed and the disabled need. Apparently, they do not need the new deal, access to work or pathway-to-work pilots. No, according to him they need the confidence—note the confidence, not the money—to buy a new suit. Well, maybe old Etonians whose confidence has taken a bit of a knock need a quick shopping spree and all is okay, but that is not my experience of how we need to deal with some of the hard problems we face today. To parody that speech a little, I could point out that the hon. Gentleman also commented on Labour's DNA in our approach to welfare. It is my view that it is the Tories' DNA that characterises their approach to welfare. They simply despise the welfare state, as we have heard again today.

We know what kind of Britain the Tories want. In the past, their Britain was a place where mass unemployment was a price worth paying. They trumpeted it. They declared war on every British shipyard worker, steel worker and miner. They thought that the humbling of a once proud working class was a sign of political strength. Ask my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) what crushing mining communities means. It means a generation reared on heroin. It means taking once stable communities and smashing them into the ground. It means tearing apart the very bonds of family and community that give society its cohesion. So when I hear Opposition Members accuse us of incoherence or incompetence, I wonder whether they have changed at all.

[Steve McCabe]

I know that the highest concentrations of people on incapacity benefit are densely clustered in areas of disadvantage in once proud industrial and manufacturing towns, and I know that the record rises in claims in those areas occurred during the period when the Opposition were in power, because of their cynical manipulation of the unemployment figures. The party that today thinks that it can point accusing fingers at us would like the public to forget the fact that the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) was once responsible for managing unemployment. Those were the days when GPs signed off healthy men on long-term sickness because their jobs were gone and no one on the other side of the House had any intention of doing anything else for them.

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is going back down memory lane, but I have an example of my own. In my constituency, the only people who can see an NHS dentist are those who can afford to pay for one, which means that the people who need treatment most cannot get it. It was not like that in our day.

Steve McCabe: Well, I am not surprised that the hon. Lady does not like to be reminded of the track record with which the Tories have to live. I dare say that she was not in her place for Health questions this afternoon, because if she had been she might not have asked that question.

I contrast the Tories' record with what we have seen with Labour in power, including record levels of employment; the creation of more than 1 million new jobs; a minimum wage, which the Opposition fought tooth and nail to try to prevent; the new deal, which offers hope where none existed; and the education maintenance allowance for youngsters with talent whose only impediment is that their families are not wealthy. Contrast the pension credit, the minimum income guarantee, free eye tests, free television licences and the winter fuel allowance with the recommendation to wear a woolly hat and gloves. That was no doubt exactly the sort of cost-efficient, confidence- boosting measure of which the hon. Member for Witney would approve.

Of course, people are anxious about proposals to reform incapacity benefit. We are talking about people who have suffered illnesses, disability or anxiety attacks and who fear for their long-term security. Our job is to demonstrate that Labour's approach to this is as caring, as determined and as fair as our approach to all the other social justice issues that we have sought to tackle.

I think that we have a good track record. Only yesterday, the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mrs. McGuire), announced a further £2.6 million for 13 choice and control pilot schemes across the country, which are designed to give older and disabled people more power over the services they use and control over their social care budgets. It is the same approach of putting the individual first that we need to demonstrate with incapacity benefit. We need to make it clear at the outset that disability does not mean "cannot work". I recall a young man at a place where I worked some years ago. He had a severe sight problem, but with the benefit of an enlarged screen he had no difficulty working with computers. He had been out of work for many years—in fact, I think that it was his first job. He loved it. He loved being useful. That is the spirit that we should seek to engender.

We need to consider why some people are unable to enter the employment market. I understand that the current incapacity benefit claim form has only one page related to mental health. There are many stress conditions that mean people find particular work environments difficult. I have a friend who had a serious breakdown some years ago and has not worked for a long time. Recently, he started part-time on one of the pathway projects. He told me that he was enjoying it immensely and his confidence was returning. He was grateful for the support that he had received; he was working in an environment where he felt safe and could make a contribution. He is better off under the financial arrangements that we have put in place, and he has an incentive to do well. We need to provide more such help. We need a strong link between the Department of Health and the Department for Work and Pensions to help people get back to work. The choice and control pilots pool the resources and efforts of those two Departments and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, and the same approach is needed to welfare reform.

Perhaps the greatest fear among people who have lost employment because of illness or disability and found themselves on benefits is that if they return to work and it goes wrong they will end up poorer. If they take a risk, it may threaten their security. We must counter that feeling, and I think that we can. We need a sliding scale of benefit, with protections built into the system that guarantee that we will look after such people.

Mr. McFadden: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the benefits of the pathways-to-work programme is that the personal adviser not only advises the incapacity benefit claimant in the run up to finding work, but stays with them as they take up work to provide help and support after they have come off benefit?

Steve McCabe: I agree absolutely. That is the difference between caring about people and trying to help them get into work and looking for a way to cut budgets.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Steve McCabe: No; I should move on for the sake of others who wish to speak.

I want to mention the 16-hour rule. During the MG-Rover crisis, we realised that it could be an impediment to people getting into training or work. I hope that we can learn from that experience when we develop our new rules on incapacity benefit.

What is wrong with aiming for 80 per cent. employment? Unless one is the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe, I can see no problem with that. It is not only good for the economy, but for the dignity of our people. Employment at 80 per cent. is a desirable target. Contrast that to the figure of one in five families where no one was in work—the legacy of the Conservatives.

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Steve McCabe: No; I am about to finish—[Hon. Members: "Hooray."] As Members are enjoying my speech so much, I will not finish quite so quickly.

Let us do the decent thing. Let us do what only Labour can do and get on with reforming the system, giving people the chances they deserve. Let us ignore the humbug that we have had to listen to today.

6.20 pm

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): Just over 7.8 million of our fellow citizens are outside the labour market when they could be in it, according to the Office for National Statistics. That demonstrates that welfare under Labour is not working as well as it could.

Eight years of Labour have given us chaos, complacency and false starts. Since 1997, the Department for Work and Pensions has had six Secretaries of State and we have had 28 White or Green papers. Nowhere is the Government's shambolic performance on welfare better demonstrated than in incapacity benefits. There are now 2.74 million people of working age on those benefits, 116,000 more than when Labour came to power.

The Government messed up reform long before their current attempts. They reduced the value of incapacity benefit to new claimants by clumsy means-testing changes in 2001, which merely deterred existing claimants from returning to work because they feared that if they ever had to go back on to benefit they would have to do so at a much lower rate. Another change that year tightened up the IB eligibility criteria by demanding a much tougher national insurance contribution record. What was the result? A perverse effect. Certainly, people came off pure IB, but they then claimed income support with a disability premium, shoving up those numbers.

Kali Mountford: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ruffley: Time is fearfully short, so I hope that the hon. Lady will forgive me for not giving way.

There was a zero-sum game. The law of unintended consequences—classic new Labour reform.

Since that reform, the proportion of IB claimants who had been receiving incapacity benefit for more than five years rose from 47 to 51 per cent.—Members should remember that the duration of the claim is at least as important as the number of claimants. The proportion of new IB claimants coming from the unemployment register is up from 46 per cent. in 1997–98 to a staggering 60 per cent. in 2003–04. That is despite the Prime Minister rightly saying in 1999 that IB had to be reformed because it was merely > "an alternative to long-term unemployment or early retirement".

The problem is that he has done nothing about it.

Earlier, it was said that the Conservative party had no positive proposals. Let me set Labour Members straight about that. The modern Conservative party certainly has more thinking to do on welfare reform, and the new leader in December will start that work. It will take time, but we already have positive proposals on the table, specifically those we talked about last May. There should be more payment by results, with contractors paid a fixed amount per claimant on completion of various milestones for putting claimants back into employment. We need more rehabilitation, possibly with spend-to-save measures; for example, an additional fee paid to contractors to cover the cost of expensive medical and vocational rehabilitation, such as higher level physiotherapy. We also need a greatly enhanced role for the voluntary and charitable sector as, by and large, it is more effective—certainly more so than some of the state functions that I have seen in my constituency.

Miss Begg: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ruffley: No. I am sure that the hon. Lady will understand that other colleagues want to speak.

This autumn, as the Prime Minister looks fretfully at his legacy, he seems to be thinking quite radically about incapacity benefit—at least, if his leaked October memo to the then Work and Pensions Secretary is anything to go by. I shall quote—from a transcript that appeared in a national newspaper—the words of the Prime Minister to the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), who was then Secretary of State for Work and Pensions. The Prime Minister said:

> "We should publish information on the number of sick notes signed by GPs, and audit the top ten per cent ... Employers should have a right of appeal when an employee is signed off sick ... We could propose taking sick note certification away from GPs and create a new specialist service ... Incapacity benefit should be paid at £56 per week, the same rate as the jobseeker's allowance"— which would of course be a cut. The memo continues:

> "Claimants have to attend compulsory monthly work-focused interviews ... Those not engaging in activity lose the entire premium."

Best, and most controversially of all, the Prime Minister said in his memo:

> "Given the cost of employment programmes, it seems that the only funding option might be to widen the scope of means-testing the system ... Alternatively, part of the benefit top-up could be paid as a voucher"— for "rehabilitation and training programmes".

I quoted at length for a simple reason—those proposals are anathema to the majority of Labour Members. We know that they object to that radical thinking, and those proposals are certainly radical. Some of them may be worth mature and serious debate and discussion, and some of them may be to the liking of the Conservative Opposition. As my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) said, if the Prime Minister comes up with good ideas, we will back him. The question is: will his own side back him?

[Mr. Ruffley]

As I have indicated, there is much opposition to the Prime Minister's radical thinking on welfare. We may have to support his ideas; who knows? However, we know that the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) resigned his position rather than implement radical reform as dictated by No 10. We also know that when the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was Secretary of State for Work and Pensions he fought a pitched battle—he won that one—to rule out the time-limiting of incapacity benefit from the strategic five-year review that he published.

We have already heard from our Front Bench about the delays in the Green Paper. First, the Prime Minister said that it would be published before the summer recess. Then, the Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform, who is in the Chamber, said that it would be published later in 2005. Finally, last week, the Prime Minister said that it would be published some time in January. We might think that we needed no more evidence, but there is more to come. We know that the Secretary of State for International Development did not want to take the job of Secretary of State for Work and Pensions because he knew that he was on to a loser. He would have had to defend and argue for radical reform that his own side could not stomach. Perhaps most depressing of all for the Prime Minister—it really shows that he is beleaguered—is that he cannot even install his No. 10 hawk on welfare policy, Mr. Gareth Davies—the gentleman who wrote the memo to which I referred—as a director in the DWP serving the Secretary of State, due to opposition from the civil service. As was widely reported in the Financial Times and elsewhere, Sir Richard Mottram, the permanent secretary, blocked the appointment of Mr. Davies. One of the newspapers reported:

> "Sir Richard put his foot down . . . In the old days Blair would have won the battle with no difficulty but this is just a sign of how weak he has become."

The Prime Minister once said that in the area of welfare reform he would think the unthinkable. With the amount of opposition on his side, is not it a case of him trying to do the undoable?

6.29 pm

Natascha Engel (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me in this very important debate. I did not think I was going to be called in the end, but I am very grateful to you.

John Bercow: Such modesty.

Natascha Engel: I was a bit surprised.

I also thank the Opposition for tabling this motion on welfare reform, and on incapacity benefit in particular, because it gives Labour Members a great opportunity to showcase the many developments that we have seen since 1997. [Interruption.] Oh yes.

The reason why the Government have placed such a consistently strong emphasis on welfare reform is that the inherited system of benefits led to the most appalling social exclusion. Welfare is, by definition, for the poorest and the most vulnerable, but welfare should also be about well-being, and for most people, work is still the best route to both. Work is how we build our self-esteem, learn more skills and self-reliance and develop our social life. It is something that every Member of the House takes for granted.

Labour's welfare reform agenda is about helping those who want to find work find a good job, but it is also about giving extra support to those who cannot work. We have had a consistent, targeted and tested welfare agenda since 1997, with a range of successful new deal programmes. A welfare system cannot be tinkered with, but nor can it sustain massive overnight change, which I think that the Opposition have asked for. But I think everybody agrees that our welfare system must change.

A person who has been claiming incapacity benefit for over two years is more likely to die or retire than to work again, ever. That is so wrong, and that is why we must reform our incapacity benefit system. Not just as a Government but as a society, we should be ensuring that everyone has the opportunities that we have.

The vast majority of people claiming incapacity benefit would like to return to work, but the current system is stacked against them. Once on incapacity benefit, there is no expectation that an individual will look for work, even if it would help to improve their condition. The system that we have inherited means that 2.8 million people have effectively been consigned to a life of poverty and lack of opportunity. That is not just a criminal waste of talent; it is a crime against equal opportunities. Unfortunately, we still live in a society that does not give everyone the same chances—a society that still discriminates against sick and disabled people. It is no surprise that having a serious health condition is a barrier to work, so it is no surprise that benefit claimants have real problems getting a job.

Our ongoing welfare reforms, of which the reform of incapacity benefit is a vital part, have been targeted and tested in those parts of the country where benefits claims are the highest. Derbyshire was one of the three initial pathways to work pilots, and covers the constituency that I represent. The pilot was introduced in 2003, through Jobcentre Plus, and I shall go into a bit of detail about this because I have heard a lot today that has demonstrated that the Opposition are not too clear in their minds about the details of pathways to work.

Pathways to work is aimed at cutting the number of people moving on to incapacity benefit in the first place, as well as moving people who are already on benefit into work. I apologise in advance for all the jargon that I shall use now, but it is part of pathways to work. Through work-focused interviews, using specially trained personal advisers and a varied choices package, a claimant can access professional and tailored information, advice, guidance and support. The choices package is really important, because it recognises that claimants have a range of different barriers to work. People are being helped to manage their conditions by working with primary care trusts and GPs, and they are given suitable training to ensure that they are ready for jobs. This condition management programme is arguably the most imaginative and successful part of pathways to work. It recognises that an individual's condition is what initially brought them on to incapacity benefit, but it also recognises that work is sometimes the best way of dealing with a deteriorating illness.

Fundamentally, the pathways to work programme is such a success because it focuses on what people are able to achieve rather than writing them off as incapacitated. There are hundreds of stories to illustrate that. When people who have been off work because of sickness for many years arrive reluctantly for their first work-focused interviews, they are nervous and lacking in self-confidence, but they are being given the chance to rebuild their self-esteem through condition management and work, and they have the feeling that their life is being given back to them.

To get even more parochial, at the start of the pathways to work pilot in Derbyshire, the Staveley neighbourhood management project commissioned the Derbyshire unemployed workers centre to carry out a study of barriers to employment. Staveley had a long history of coal mining and heavy manufacturing, which used to make up the majority of the work. The pit closures and the loss of manufacturing continue to have a devastating impact on employment in the area. Many of those people in Staveley who are now long-term incapacity benefit claimants would have been usefully employed in light duties when we still had a mining industry in North-East Derbyshire. There is no mystery behind the high number of people claiming incapacity benefit, as there is no mystery behind the high crime levels and poor health.

The unemployed workers centre's study is a very small study of about 10,000 people, but interestingly, it reflects absolutely what is happening nationally. The vast majority of people want to go back to work and the vast majority of them have welcomed the pathways to work pilot. Most people who had claimed incapacity benefit before the start of the pathways to work pilot had received no help from employment services. Now those same people welcomed work-focused interviews with Jobcentre Plus and looked forward to a return to work.

Every month, Jobcentre Plus personal advisers in Derbyshire interview about 700 incapacity benefit claimants. These figures are small but they are really significant. Of those 700 people, 150 find work every month. This is not scratching the surface; this is real success, and the feedback is positive not just from those who are being helped off benefits and into work—advisers and employers are massively enthusiastic about being involved in these pilots.

One of the really exciting developments in Derbyshire is the pathways agreement with Tesco, which is offering tasters and in-work support to benefits claimants. If we can roll out to the rest of the country not just the pathways to work models but the enthusiasm that comes with them, we shall be taking a huge step towards greater social inclusion and greater equality. This is the right direction for welfare reform. It is not a punitive agenda designed to force people into work; it is a positive agenda, which helps people to stay in work and allows them to develop themselves and improve their economic circumstances.

To conclude, I want to point out again that our welfare reforms have been ongoing, they have been targeted and they have been coherent since 1997. We have tried wherever possible to break down barriers to work. We have recognised that health does not have to be a barrier to working. Over 3 million people with long-term illness or disability are at the moment in work. Work and well-being are two sides of the same coin. Our welfare system must be flexible to suit changing needs, but it must provide opportunities for people to work and greater support for those who cannot work. Our Labour Government's answer is to make policy to suit individual need. Pathways to work, which has been rolled out to a third of the country, has demonstrated that a personal advice strategy to help people into work has meant that twice as many people leave benefits and find jobs as before. Most important, they are staying in those jobs.

The Opposition day motion calls upon the Government to deal with the increasingly urgent need for welfare reform. We are reforming welfare, and we have been doing so since 1997. I hope that after this debate the Opposition will support us both in our progress and our successes to date.

6.38 pm

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): We called this debate in our own time with the aim of giving the Government an opportunity of clarifying and explaining their own policy, and we did so in a genuine spirit of inquiry on behalf of many millions of claimants, who want to know what the Government mean by reform. The hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Natascha Engel) said that the Government are in a continuous reform programme. All I can say is that we have not noticed that. The windy rhetoric that accompanied the first election victory of the Labour Government has simply not been carried into practice.

Again, in this short debate many questions have been raised and almost no answers have been provided, so I do hope that when the Minister gets to her feet to wind up the debate she will start to give us some hard answers to some of the hard questions that we have asked—not least by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley), who in an excellent short speech asked, in effect, which side is the Department on: the Prime Minister's, or Back Benchers'—or perhaps its own side? That triangulation is going on between different bits of the Government and the Labour party, and it is profoundly damaging to any real or genuine reform.

For instance, we have not got to the bottom of the incredible shrinking Green Paper on welfare reform, which the Prime Minister promised immediately after the election. In fact, I think that it was the first promise that he made in May this year. He said that the Green Paper would be produced by the new Secretary of State by July this year. I join other hon. Members in welcoming the new Secretary of State to his position, but I hope that, despite the fantastic turnover of Secretaries of State in the Department for Work and Pensions, he will survive long enough to see the publication of his own Green Paper.

The victims of the continuing confusion and delay are not just successive Secretaries of State and Ministers, but more importantly, the benefit claimants themselves who are trying to grapple with a system of increasing complexity that is not only beyond their own comprehension, but very often a bafflement to those whose job it is to administer the system. The National Audit Office made some observations on that only earlier this month. It pointed out that the very complexity of the system is itself an inducement to fraud, because those who are administering the system are trying to process vast quantities of information, often of a very personal kind, and—in the language of the NAO report—that

[Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory]

> "may persuade some people that fraud is a risk worth taking."

We need a massive simplification programme as part of the reform, but we know that benefit claimants are not part of the debate at all. The real dynamic is between No. 10—the Prime Minister and the policy unit—on one side and the Department on the other. The Prime Minister generally cries, "Forward." The Department cries, "Back."

Edward Miliband: May I take the right hon. Gentleman to a point of substance in the debate: the nature of the pathways to work programme? Earlier, the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind) said that the programme did not apply to existing claimants. In fact—I have checked this—11,000 existing claimants have volunteered for the programme, and from February 2005, the programme has been applied to more existing claimants. Will the right hon. Gentleman correct the record on that point?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No. The hon. Gentleman is making a mistake. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind) was referring to the Green Paper programme, which will not apply—at least initially—to existing claimants, but only to new ones. Of course the pathways to work programme, to which he was not referring, applies to new claimants. That is a simple category mistake, and I ask the hon. Gentleman to refer to the Official Report.

Edward Miliband: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No: I will not give way again. I have answered the hon. Gentleman's point.

What we had in February this year was a five-year plan. Despite its rather Stalinist title, it gave us some indication of how the Government wish to split incapacity benefit in two: one benefit more appropriate for those who will never work, and other benefit to become a pathway back into the world of work. We did not agree with all the substance in the February paper, but it was at least reasonably specific and somewhat detailed. So imagine our surprise when, on 7 October this year, we went back to what are called the "Principles of Welfare Reform".

Remarkably, in eight months, the Government have gone from fairly specific proposals to very general principles. The world was rather surprised that the new policy on welfare reform was summed up in various phrases. That document says:

> "We will create a new relationship between the individual, the family and the wider community."

It continues:

> "The Government will tackle dysfunctional behaviour head-on, and use the wider strength of neighbourliness and community to provide support through a range of interventions."

What support? What interventions? We have got beyond principles; we want to know what the Government are going to do. Of course the reason why the Government are now taking refuge in vacuous and general phrases is that No. 10 has vetoed the specific proposals that the Government announced back in February.

Another factor in all this, of course, is the purported discontent among Labour Back Benchers, but what we need from the Government now are some answers. We want to know how the Government want to put those principles into action. Will they still pursue the split in incapacity benefit in the way that they set out back in February? We also want to know what has happened to the promised review of housing benefit. That has not been mentioned in the debate, but in the Queen's Speech, Her Majesty read out the following sentence:

> "My Government will introduce legislation to reform support for housing costs."

Will the Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform tell us when she responds to the debate how that is progressing? Her Majesty may not want to know the answer, but the House does.

Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I hope that the hon. Lady will forgive me; I must reply to some of the points made.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) referred to pensions. We did not hear a word on pensions from the Secretary of State, although pensions form part of both the motion and the Government's amendment. Of course the truth about pensions is that the halving of the savings ratio under the Government has dealt a body blow to the entire concept of private sector provision. The reason for that goes back, again, eight years to 1997, when in almost the Government's first fiscal action, they removed dividend tax credits from private pension funds. The Government's siphoning of money from the private sector pensions into the Treasury has gone on year after year. If the Prime Minister wants to pick a fight with a Department, I suggest that he should do so not with the Department for Work and Pensions, but with the Treasury and the Chancellor, because that is where the damage to pensions has been done.

In 1997, our pensions system was an acknowledged international success. We had more private sector pensions under management than the rest of Europe put together. That fact has been alluded to many times by the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and other hon. Members of all parties. That policy is now in ruins. Instead, the Chancellor's contribution to welfare reform—and his main legacy from the Treasury—will be a vast extension of means testing. Again, that has been alluded to in the debate. Almost half of all pensioners are now subject to means testing and the proportion is increasing. So the Treasury is responsible for not only the policy, but the shambolic administration of child and pension credits, as we know from our surgeries and advice centres, and the developing, unresolved mess that that is producing.

In the debate, we have seen again the wide and growing gap between Labour's words and deeds. Despite repeated promises of reform, the welfare system is complex, badly targeted and sets up perverse incentives. It is prone to error, fraud and abuse. It lets down the taxpayer and those whom it is supposed to help. We should be having an open debate on how to change the system, instead of which it is a subject of repeated wrangles and leaked memos between No. 10 and the Department. It is time that the House expressed its displeasure and dismay about this continuing state of affairs, and I urge all my hon. Friends to vote for the motion.

6.49 pm

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Margaret Hodge): I urge right hon. and hon. Members to reject the Opposition motion and support the amendment.

We have had a short debate, but there have been several thoughtful, valuable and eloquent contributions, especially from Labour Members. It is bizarre that Her Majesty's loyal Opposition called a debate on this matter. Opposition days give Opposition parties the opportunity to lay out their alternative stall on what they would do if they were in government, but the official Opposition utterly failed to do that. Let me cite just one phrase from the speech made by the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind). He said at some point during his very long contribution that logic is the art of going wrong with confidence. That meaningless and illogical phrase attempts to mask the fact that the official Opposition have no ideas, no policies and no understanding of the issue.

I am happy to welcome the Conservative party's belated conversion to the importance of welfare reform, but most people will share Labour Members' cynicism and think that its newly born interest has more to with short-term opportunism than long-term opportunity. Today's somewhat pathetic attack on our record was a cover for a policy vacuum, rather a recipe for serious welfare reform.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: If the right hon. Lady is upset by the attack on her record, will she explain what she meant when she was quoted in The Herald in Glasgow as saying that the Government have done "sweet nothing" on the subject of welfare reform?

Margaret Hodge: I am always delighted to put the record straight, so I am pleased that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has given me the opportunity to do so. I make many speeches about the matter and always say that during the Conservatives' 18 years in government, they allowed increasing numbers of people—up to 2.7 million—to languish on incapacity benefit, without giving those people any help or support to return them to work.

The Conservatives are informed by their lasting values, which lead them to want to slash benefits across the piece so that they can cut taxes. The Labour Government, however, are informed by the lasting values that we have consistently articulated of opportunity for all those who can, combined with security and support for all those who need it.

Mary Creagh: Does my right hon. Friend agree that Conservative proposals to use the private and charitable sectors to deal with the most difficult cases involving incapacity benefit would lead to cherry-picking, if output-related funding were used? Does she agree that the proposals represent an attempt by the Conservative party to divide people into the deserving and undeserving poor?

Margaret Hodge: We certainly would not endorse any policy that cherry-picked people off incapacity benefit. However, the voluntary sector, especially, can play a legitimate and strong role in supporting people on incapacity benefit back into work.

Mr. Dunne: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Margaret Hodge: Not now; I have only a few minutes left.

I welcome the opportunity that the official Opposition have given us to remind all hon. Members and, most importantly, the public about the Conservative party's abysmal record on welfare and to draw attention to the Government's successes. I shall respond briefly to several of the contributions that were made.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) added little to the debate. He was good on analysis, but, as usual, short on solutions that add up, especially given his party's most recent commitment not to increase taxation. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Steve McCabe) made a feisty speech and reminded us that the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) was the Minister for unemployment. My hon. Friend highlighted the importance of understanding the nervousness that individuals face on the journey of incapacity benefit reform.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) got a lot wrong. I think that he would not take interventions because he did not want to be corrected, so I would like to correct one point for the record. People who move from benefits into work have the entitlement to come back on to that benefit level. Indeed, we are extending the time for that to two years from April 2006 so that we can deal with the insecurity that some people feel.

John Bercow: Will the Minister take an intervention in the interests of correction?

Margaret Hodge: One quick one.

John Bercow: It is always a pleasure to listen to the Minister—I say that in all seriousness—but we are entitled to be clear about the historical record. Is she saying that she was misquoted by The Herald in Glasgow in so far as she was alleged to have said or is she simply saying that she is now embarrassed and has changed her mind? Which is it—I think we ought to be told?

> "we have done sweet nothing",

Margaret Hodge: I am in some difficulty because I have not actually seen the quotation. However, I have dealt with the issue already.

[Margaret Hodge]

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Derbyshire (Natascha Engel) on her passionate and strong speech. She pointed out the importance of work to individuals and the way in which work and well-being are two sides of the same coin. She showed a proper understanding of the issues and the way in which we can bring down the number of people on incapacity benefit.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) about simplification of the benefit system. We are attempting to do that day in, day out, whereas when his party was in government it failed even to think about the measurement of fraud. The Conservatives never measured fraud, let alone took action to reduce it, whereas we have done that successfully.

Let me put on record the fact that the right hon. Gentleman and his party are wrong to suggest that existing benefit claimants cannot take advantage of the opportunities in the pathways to work pilots—they can, they do, and they are returning to work. It is absolute nonsense to suggest that we are not talking to interested groups about welfare reform. The Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mrs. McGuire), and I have done that. Indeed, our new Secretary of State has already visited several groups that would be affected by the proposals that we shall put before the House and the country when we publish our Green Paper.

The debate has given us the facts with which to judge which political party is fit to tackle welfare reform. The simple fact is that we are completely divided—[Laughter.] No, we are completely divided across political parties on the reasons behind the programme of welfare reform and the purpose of it—[Interruption.] Perhaps Conservative Members should listen to this.

Labour Members are committed to our agenda because we see it as a means through which we can unlock opportunity for all so that all can find jobs and individuals can support themselves and their families, realise their potential, enjoy the sense of purpose and self-worth that comes with work and develop a network of friends and companions. We are committed to our agenda because we recognise it as a means of eradicating poverty from British communities and British society. We are committed to our agenda because we understand that by realising individual potential, we can build a stronger economy in the more competitive global environment in which we have to live.

For the Conservative party, the agenda is benefit cuts to finance tax cuts. It is about fostering individual greed at the expense of wider interests and needs. Compassionate conservatism is about dismantling the active welfare state and destroying the support and opportunities that we in government have created. The Conservatives' policies in government created dependency, chaos, incoherence and despair.

The words of the Opposition motion give us a clear indication of their incoherence and direction of travel, whereas the Government's record on welfare reform is one of which we are immensely proud. The challenges that we face in the immediate and long term are complex and important, but the platform that we have built is strong, the values that inform our approach are right, and the task of translating those values into programmes is one we welcome and on which we shall deliver. The truth is that the Conservative party has not just lost the argument, it has lost the plot.

Question put, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

The House divided: Ayes 232, Noes 309.

Division No. 104] [7 pm

AYES

Afriyie, Adam
Ainsworth, Mr. Peter
Alexander, Danny
Amess, Mr. David
Arbuthnot, rh Mr. James
Atkinson, Mr. Peter
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Baker, Norman
Baldry, Tony
Barker, Gregory
Baron, Mr. John
Barrett, John
Beith, rh Mr. Alan
Bercow, John
Beresford, Sir Paul
Binley, Mr. Brian
Blunt, Mr. Crispin
Bone, Mr. Peter
Boswell, Mr. Tim
Bottomley, Peter
Brady, Mr. Graham
Brazier, Mr. Julian
Breed, Mr. Colin
Brokenshire, James
Brooke, Annette
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Browning, Angela
Bruce, Malcolm
Burns, Mr. Simon
Burrowes, Mr. David
Burstow, Mr. Paul
Burt, Alistair
Burt, Lorely
Cable, Dr. Vincent
Campbell, Mr. Gregory
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Chope, Mr. Christopher
Clappison, Mr. James
Clark, Greg
Clarke, rh Mr. Kenneth
Clifton-Brown, Mr. Geoffrey
Conway, Derek
Cox, Mr. Geoffrey
Crabb, Mr. Stephen
Curry, rh Mr. David
Davey, Mr. Edward
Davies, David T.C. (Monmouth)
Davies, Philip
Djanogly, Mr. Jonathan
Dodds, Mr. Nigel
Dorrell, rh Mr. Stephen
Dorries, Mrs. Nadine
Duddridge, James
Duncan Smith, rh Mr. Iain
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Ellwood, Mr. Tobias
Evans, Mr. Nigel
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Mr. Michael
Farron, Tim
Featherstone, Lynne
Field, Mr. Mark
Forth, rh Mr. Eric
Foster, Mr. Don
Fox, Dr. Liam
Francois, Mr. Mark
Fraser, Mr. Christopher
Gale, Mr. Roger
Garnier, Mr. Edward
Gauke, Mr. David
George, Andrew
Gidley, Sandra
Gillan, Mrs. Cheryl
Goldsworthy, Julia
Goodman, Mr. Paul
Goodwill, Mr. Robert
Gove, Michael
Gray, Mr. James
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian
Greening, Justine
Grieve, Mr. Dominic
Gummer, rh Mr. John
Hague, rh Mr. William
Hammond, Mr. Philip
Hammond, Stephen
Hands, Mr. Greg
Harper, Mr. Mark
Harris, Dr. Evan
Harvey, Nick
Hayes, Mr. John
Heald, Mr. Oliver
Heath, Mr. David
Heathcoat-Amory, rh Mr. David
Hemming, John
Hendry, Charles
Herbert, Nick
Hoban, Mr. Mark
Hogg, rh Mr. Douglas
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Holloway, Mr. Adam
Holmes, Paul
Horam, Mr. John
Horwood, Martin
Howard, rh Mr. Michael
Howarth, David
Howarth, Mr. Gerald
Hughes, Simon
Huhne, Chris
Hunt, Mr. Jeremy
Hunter, Mark
Hurd, Mr. Nick
Jack, rh Mr. Michael
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Johnson, Mr. Boris
Jones, Mr. David
Kawczynski, Daniel
Keetch, Mr. Paul
Key, Robert
Kirkbride, Miss Julie

Kramer, Susan
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Lait, Mrs. Jacqui
Lamb, Norman
Lansley, Mr. Andrew
Laws, Mr. David
Leech, Mr. John
Leigh, Mr. Edward
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Lewis, Dr. Julian
Liddell-Grainger, Mr. Ian
Lidington, Mr. David
Lilley, rh Mr. Peter
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Mackay, rh Mr. Andrew
Maclean, rh David
Main, Anne
Malins, Mr. Humfrey
Maples, Mr. John
Mates, rh Mr. Michael
Maude, rh Mr. Francis
May, rh Mrs. Theresa
McCrea, Dr. William
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
Mercer, Patrick
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Milton, Anne
Moore, Mr. Michael
Moss, Mr. Malcolm
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Newmark, Mr. Brooks
Oaten, Mr. Mark
Osborne, Mr. George
Ottaway, Richard
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Penning, Mike
Penrose, John
Pickles, Mr. Eric
Prisk, Mr. Mark
Pritchard, Mark
Pugh, Dr. John
Randall, Mr. John
Redwood, rh Mr. John
Reid, Mr. Alan
Rifkind, rh Sir Malcolm
Robathan, Mr. Andrew
Robertson, Hugh
Robertson, Mr. Laurence
Robinson, Mrs. Iris
Robinson, Mr. Peter
Rogerson, Mr. Dan
Rowen, Paul
Ruffley, Mr. David
Russell, Bob
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Scott, Mr. Lee
Selous, Andrew
Shapps, Grant
Shepherd, Mr. Richard
Simmonds, Mark
Simpson, David
Simpson, Mr. Keith
Smith, Sir Robert
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spink, Bob
Spring, Mr. Richard
Stanley, rh Sir John
Steen, Mr. Anthony
Streeter, Mr. Gary
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Swinson, Jo
Syms, Mr. Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Matthew
Thurso, John
Tredinnick, David
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Viggers, Peter
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Walker, Mr. Charles
Wallace, Mr. Ben
Walter, Mr. Robert
Waterson, Mr. Nigel
Watkinson, Angela
Webb, Steve
Whittingdale, Mr. John
Widdecombe, rh Miss Ann
Wiggin, Bill
Willetts, Mr. David
Williams, Mark
Williams, Mr. Roger
Williams, Stephen
Willis, Mr. Phil
Willott, Jenny
Wilshire, Mr. David
Wilson, Mr. Rob
Winterton, Ann
Winterton, Sir Nicholas
Wright, Jeremy
Yeo, Mr. Tim
Young, rh Sir George

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. David Evennett and
Mr. Henry Bellingham

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Allen, Mr. Graham
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Austin, John
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Baird, Vera
Balls, Ed
Banks, Gordon
Barlow, Ms Celia
Barron, rh Mr. Kevin
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Begg, Miss Anne
Benton, Mr. Joe
Berry, Roger
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Blunkett, rh Mr. David
Borrow, Mr. David S.
Brennan, Kevin
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Mr. Des
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnham, Andy
Byers, rh Mr. Stephen
Byrne, Mr. Liam
Caborn, rh Mr. Richard
Cairns, David
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Campbell, Mr. Ronnie
Caton, Mr. Martin
Cawsey, Mr. Ian
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Chaytor, Mr. David
Clapham, Mr. Michael
Clark, Ms Katy
Clarke, rh Mr. Tom
Clelland, Mr. David
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coaker, Mr. Vernon
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank
Cooper, Rosie
Cooper, Yvette
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cousins, Jim
Crausby, Mr. David
Creagh, Mary
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs. Claire
David, Mr. Wayne
Davidson, Mr. Ian
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Denham, rh Mr. John
Devine, Mr. Jim
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, rh Frank
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drew, Mr. David
Dunwoody, Mrs. Gwyneth
Eagle, Angela
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Ennis, Jeff
Etherington, Bill
Farrelly, Paul
Field, rh Mr. Frank
Fisher, Mark
Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Follett, Barbara
Foster, Mr. Michael (Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye)
Gapes, Mike
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Gilroy, Linda
Godsiff, Mr. Roger
Goggins, Paul
Goodman, Helen
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Grogan, Mr. John
Gwynne, Andrew
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hall, Patrick
Hamilton, Mr. David
Hamilton, Mr. Fabian
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harris, Mr. Tom
Havard, Mr. Dai
Healey, John
Henderson, Mr. Doug
Hendrick, Mr. Mark
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Heppell, Mr. John
Hesford, Stephen
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hodgson, Mrs. Sharon
Hoey, Kate
Hood, Mr. Jimmy
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Hosie, Stewart
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hughes, rh Beverley
Humble, Mrs. Joan
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Mr. Eric
Ingram, rh Mr. Adam
Irranca-Davies, Huw
Jackson, Glenda
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Jenkins, Mr. Brian
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Lynne
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Kelly, rh Ruth
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Kennedy, rh Jane
Khabra, Mr. Piara S.
Khan, Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Kilfoyle, Mr. Peter
Knight, Jim
Kumar, Dr. Ashok
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lammy, Mr. David
Laxton, Mr. Bob
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
MacDougall, Mr. John
MacShane, rh Mr. Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahmood, Mr. Khalid
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marris, Rob
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall-Andrews, Mr. Robert
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCafferty, Chris
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McDonagh, Siobhain

McDonnell, Dr. Alasdair
McDonnell, John
McFadden, Mr. Pat
McFall, rh Mr. John
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McKenna, Rosemary
McNulty, Mr. Tony
Meacher, rh Mr. Michael
Meale, Mr. Alan
Merron, Gillian
Miliband, Edward
Mitchell, Mr. Austin
Moffat, Anne
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Moran, Margaret
Morden, Jessica
Morgan, Julie
Morley, Mr. Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, Mr. George
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Munn, Meg
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Olner, Mr. Bill
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Palmer, Dr. Nick
Pearson, Ian
Pope, Mr. Greg
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Price, Adam
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Purnell, James
Rammell, Bill
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Reid, rh John
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robertson, Angus
Robertson, John
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Rooney, Mr. Terry
Roy, Mr. Frank
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Christine
Salmond, Mr. Alex
Salter, Martin
Seabeck, Alison
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Sheridan, Jim
Short, rh Clare
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Simpson, Alan
Singh, Mr. Marsha
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, Ms Angela C. (Sheffield, Hillsborough)
Smith, rh Jacqui
Smith, John
Snelgrove, Anne
Soulsby, Sir Peter
Southworth, Helen
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Stringer, Graham
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Tami, Mark
Taylor, Ms Dari
Taylor, David
Taylor, Dr. Richard
Thornberry, Emily
Timms, Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mr. Mark
Touhig, Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Turner, Mr. Neil
Twigg, Derek
Ussher, Kitty
Vaz, Keith
Vis, Dr. Rudi
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Ward, Claire
Wareing, Mr. Robert N.
Watson, Mr. Tom
Watts, Mr. Dave
Weir, Mr. Mike
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, rh Mr. Alan
Williams, Mrs. Betty
Williams, Hywel
Winnick, Mr. David
Winterton, Ms Rosie
Wishart, Pete
Wood, Mike
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Noes:
Joan Ryan and
Mr. Parmjit Dhanda

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the Government's consistent commitment since 1997 to pursue welfare reform to create an active, enabling welfare state where rights match responsibilities; supports the recent publication of the Principles of Welfare Reform, which builds on the foundations laid out in A New Contract for Welfare, published in 1998 and the Department for Work and Pensions' Five Year Strategy of February 2005; commends the Government's achievements in helping 2.1 million children out of absolute poverty since 1997; recognises the success of the New Deals, through which over 1.2 million people have moved into work; notes that new claims for incapacity benefit have been cut by one third since 1997; further recognises the importance of the National Pensions Debate in creating a dialogue with the public and building a consensus on pensions reform; further welcomes the progress made on tackling disability discrimination, opening doors for disabled people to remain in or return to work; in contrast, condemns the shameful record of the Opposition who spent more on administering the Child Support Agency than they paid out in maintenance and who allowed those on unemployment benefit to hit three million twice whilst also trebling the numbers on incapacity benefits between 1979 and 1997, costing the taxpayer billions and condemning millions of people to a life of benefit dependency.

Climate Change

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): We now come to the debate on climate change. I have to announce to the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

7.14 pm

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset) (Con): I beg to move,

That this House endorses the principle of a cross-party consensus on carbon reduction.

The motion was tabled by my hon. Friends and myself, as well as by Liberal Democrat Members.

When we last held a debate on climate change in the House, Government Members reasonably requested us to put before the House a more emollient motion if we sought consensus on the way forward on climate change and carbon reduction and to remove from that motion any vestige of criticism of the activities of Her Majesty's Government. We could not have obliged more than we have done this evening. Liberal Democrat Members and I have concocted a motion that does not offer any criticism whatsoever of the Government but seeks consensus on the need for consensus. As someone inclined to emollition I cannot imagine a more emollient solution.

Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): Can the right hon. Gentleman clear something up for me? I find a great deal to recommend in the motion, but will the hon. Gentleman oblige me to vote on it?

Mr. Letwin: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making an intervention—uniquely, in my experience—that enables me to progress my speech. I hope that the motion will not be forced to a vote. That lies not in his hands but in the hands of the Government Front Bench team and the Whips. If they choose, as I hope they will, not to force the matter to a vote we should be delighted. We shall have to wait and see how Ministers respond.

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it would have been helpful if the Government had added their amendment to the motion rather than seek to delete it?

Mr. Letwin: That would have been a possibility, but in the spirit of seeking consensus and avoiding criticism I shall assume that the Government would have done so if the hon. Gentleman had recommended it in advance.

The broad framework around which the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) and I seek consensus is well known to Members who attended our previous debate. I do not want to dwell on it in detail, as it would bore the House, so I shall remind hon. Members who attended that debate and inform hon. Members who did not that we do not imagine for a moment that consensus would consist of point-by-point agreement on every possible policy relating to climate change, which is manifestly impossible. Nor do we imagine that it will go beyond, at least at first, the establishment of common ground on principles on which the Minister for Climate Change and the Environment and I broadly agree. The nation should have a settled framework of year-by-year targets and requirements for carbon reduction, and that framework should include the appointment of a well-articulated independent body capable of informing Parliament on a regular basis of whether, as we look forward many years, the Government's policies are calculated to achieve those targets to a 90 per cent. or a 10 per cent. degree of probability, or whatever is the judgment of that independent body.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): If such a framework were set up, should not the Government be prepared to accept that it could be used to investigate the view that they are talking to their advisers on the basis that they will not meet their Kyoto promises, which is very damaging?

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): No, we are not doing so.

Mr. Gummer: Advisers certainly say that that is the case. Should not the Government refuse demands from the European Union that we should break our word on our emissions limit? Should they not also accept that we ought to ban hydrofluorocarbons instead of being the dirty man of Europe and opposing attempts to ban them?

Mr. Letwin: My right hon. Friend has an extraordinary record as a successful Secretary of State for the Environment and is a beacon of light to the Government in that respect. However, I shall not pursue the line of inquiry that he recommends because I hope that the answers to his questions are in the affirmative, that the Government and succeeding Governments will recognise not only where they are succeeding, but where they are failing, and that that will occur not in the spirit of pointing the finger, but in the spirit of seeking, as a nation, to achieve real and sustained progress.

Mr. Morley: I was surprised at the comments from the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), who is generally well informed on these matters. I want to make it clear that there is not the slightest intention that the Government will renege on their Kyoto agreements. We are well on track to meet our Kyoto targets—one of the very few industrial countries to do so. We expect not just to meet our Kyoto commitments, but to surpass them.

Mr. Letwin: I shall not pursue that debate, although as the Minister well knows, though it is probably true that the Government will just meet their Kyoto greenhouse gas emissions targets, the reduction in carbon that both the Minister and I would like to see is not happening. It will be recognised by the Minister, because he has recognised it on previous occasions, that after a period during which the dash to gas created significant carbon dioxide reductions, more recently it is a combination of what has happened on adipic acid and the performance of farmers that has largely rescued the Kyoto targets. So there is considerable force in what my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) said, as the Minister knows.

[Mr. Letwin]

I hope that across the Chamber this evening, rather than engaging in defensive and offensive manoeuvre, we can get to the point where we understand that as a nation we face a very serious problem, and that we can agree on a framework for tackling it.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): My right hon. Friend is in danger of being far too kind to the Government this evening. Did he not see the report by The Economist? In their election manifesto in 1997 the Government promised to reduce emissions by 20 per cent. In their 2001 general election manifesto they promised to reduce emissions by 20 per cent. Nothing has happened. It is only now that they are proposing to set up a review next year to work out how they meet their Kyoto targets. I caution and counsel my right hon. Friend not to be too kind to them.

Mr. Letwin: I understand the temptation on the part of my hon. Friend and others to point out uncomfortable facts, but in the end, those are not uncomfortable facts for the Government. They will probably sail on without anybody in this country, alas, caring as much as they ought about those things. It will be other issues that bring about the downfall of the Government, in all probability. We in the Chamber all know that. Alas, the danger that arises in relation to the points that my hon. Friend makes is a danger for the country. That is why it is so critical that we translate good will into action.

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): In the interests of consensus, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that targets should be set. One of the targets that the Government have set is 10 per cent. renewables by 2010. To achieve that, there will be a massive roll-out of offshore wind farms, the first of which will be off my constituency—200 turbines. Do the right hon. Gentleman and his party support such proposals?

Mr. Letwin: We will in all probability need to see a considerable extension of renewables in this country, if we are to get anywhere near meeting the targets that we seek. I accept that there will frequently be constraints against which those bump up and tensions that they create, and as a nation we will have to accept some things that we do not find comfortable. I do not know the particularities of the case that the hon. Gentleman cites. I would be happy to come and look at it for myself.

We must understand that it is not for us in the House or for Governments to make decisions about particular technologies, to pick winners or to advance the causes of this or that. It is for us—this is the onus of what the hon. Member for Lewes and I are trying to do in the process in which we have engaged—to attempt to bring it to the attention of the political establishment of this country that we need a settled framework which is translated through market incentives into the production of appropriate solutions, which will be wide ranging in nature. So politicians determine direction, and the market responds with solutions. That does not mean that it will be easy or that there will not be tensions or conflicts. It means that instead of debating particularities in the House, we can debate the general thrust and create a set of arrangements that deliver against targets.

Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Letwin: No. I shall make progress, if the hon. Gentleman will forgive me. I shall happily give way to him later.

My purpose in launching the debate is to engage in an inquiry. I want to try to understand what I genuinely do not fully understand—whether there is the basis for cross-party consensus. That depends on the answer to the question: what is it that the Prime Minister and other Ministers have been saying over the past few months, and what is the position that they take? I say that in a spirit of genuine inquiry, as I think will become evident in the remainder of my remarks.

There are three questions that need to be examined. The first is the relationship between carbon reduction and economic growth; the second is the relationship between targets and technology; and the third is the relationship between UK actions and global actions. Everybody in the Chamber today—looking around me, I see many who have concentrated on these matters for many years—will recognise that around those three sets of issues revolves much of the answer to how we approach climate change.

It is in relation to the three issues that the recent statements by the Prime Minister and other Ministers cause the inquiring mind to ask where exactly the Government are headed. Are they headed in a direction that can create the basis for the cross-party consensus that we seek?

I shall start with a pessimistic interpretation of those remarks and move on to an optimistic interpretation. I hope that that will set the scene for the Minister to cast light on where we are as a country and as a group of people engaged in a seminal political discussion. The pessimistic interpretation has been offered by some of the lobby groups and it is this: that the meaning behind, and perhaps to some extent in, the Prime Minister's recent statements is that the Kyoto process is dead, that domestic targets will largely be abandoned hereafter, that it is impossible to combine economic growth and serious and binding international and national targets, and that we should therefore do what we can to promote technological solutions that help to alleviate the amount of carbon being produced, engage in activities such as emissions trading, express aspirations and hope for the best. I think that I have given a more or less accurate summary of what the pessimists assert is the meaning of the Government's actions.

I am loth to come to the conclusion that those are the meanings behind what has been said, and much that has been said does not [illegible] that interpretation. There is a basis for hoping that that is not what the Government mean. Yes, I have read various articles and it is difficult to know which means what. I shall now put the optimistic interpretation, and if the Minister in his response can give us a clear idea where the Government stand, that will be an enormous step forward.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): My right hon. Friend mentions that the Kyoto process is dead and looks to technology to provide a solution. Does he agree that one of the reasons why Kyoto is dead is because of the United States, yet it is the United States that probably has the most to offer in providing technological expertise and investment, which will help us in the long term to achieve the sort of consensus that he seeks?

Mr. Letwin: My hon. Friend has mistaken my meaning. I am not saying that the Kyoto process is dead; I do not believe that the Kyoto process is dead; and I am not even sure whether the Prime Minister thinks that the Kyoto process is dead. I was trying to say that on a pessimistic interpretation of what the Prime Minister said, one might have thought—some of the green lobby have concluded that this is what he thinks—that the Kyoto process is dead.

Bringing the United States, China and India into the process is critical, and technology is an enormously important component in doing so, and it is also true that the United States is a significant contributor to bringing technology into the process. This is my question: does the Prime Minister believe that Kyoto and binding targets are dead, because they are not consistent with economic growth and hence cannot bring in China and India—and, while we are at it, Brazil and Russia? The pessimistic interpretation is that is what he believes.

Turning to the optimistic interpretation, I hope that the Prime Minister and the Government recognise that a combination of growth, energy security and carbon reduction is needed—I am fairly confident that the Government believe that; I certainly believe that; and I expect that the hon. Member for Lewes believes that. We have got over the idea that there is a choice—in my view, it is a false choice—and I think that the Government have, too, between growth and energy security on the one side and carbon reduction on the other.

If it is true that the Government have got over that false dichotomy, this is the next question: do they also agree that we must recognise that neither the UK alone nor even the EU can make a significant difference to the amount of carbon in the atmosphere and hence to prospects for climate change? I am fairly certain that the Government accept that proposition because it is, after all, a matter of fact. Returning to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway), I think and hope that the Prime Minister's remarks should be interpreted as meaning that the way to bring China, India and the US to the table is to identify technologies that will enable those countries to combine economic progress and growth with the reduction of carbon.

John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): The right hon. Gentleman has been speaking for eight minutes, and I cannot see the consensus. [HON. MEMBERS: "Eighteen minutes."] That long, eh? If he wants to create a consensus, he should put forward some ideas that we can discuss. So far, he has put forward no ideas. Is he relying on his new hon. Friend, the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker), to do that for him?

Mr. Letwin: If the hon. Gentleman does not understand that when it comes to building a consensus, it matters how the various parties view the fundamental questions that we are dealing with, then he is not as acute as I had hoped. It is important to understand where the Government are coming from and whether it is the same place as Opposition Members are coming from, because if we are coming from the same place, there is a real chance of obtaining agreement, and if there are fundamentally divergent views, there is not a real chance of obtaining agreement. The proposition is perfectly clear.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): Will my right hon. Friend advise me on an area in which growth is evident and in which a response to climate change issues would mean a great deal? Given the new building and development that is taking place around the country, does he believe that a certain percentage of new building in this country should include sustainable energy facilities, such as solar panels and domestic wind turbines? If we were to reduce domestic energy usage across the country, it would make a profound difference to how people see energy and carbon reduction.

Mr. Letwin: As my hon. Friend has implied, there is no doubt that if we are to achieve anything like the 60 per cent. reduction in carbon emissions by 2050, which we need to achieve to play our part in getting to the international target of 550 parts per million, we must take considerable further steps on building regulations, energy efficiency in the home and micro-generation, because the Government's own figures, perfectly sensibly, rely heavily on energy efficiency as the major component—it constitutes almost half of the total—of how they hope to achieve those targets. We are nowhere near those targets yet, because building regulations have not been sufficiently organised.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Letwin: I shall start on the right and move across, because of my ideological disposition.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): Does the right hon. Gentleman believe that the pessimists are offering a false dichotomy between technology, new ways of working and targets? When we consider the post-Kyoto situation in 2012, does he believe that we should use both levers—technology and targets? Is that the way to find the consensus that he seeks?

Mr. Letwin: Oh yes, abundantly. I am not surprised that the hon. Gentleman and I agree, because I have often heard him speak on the subject, and I more or less agree with everything that I have heard him say. As a result of his intervention, I shall advance my argument by one stage: I hope that the meaning behind the Prime Minister's remarks is that the Prime Minister recognises that we must build from the bottom up—from an understanding of the technology to an understanding of how the technology can allow countries such as China, India and the United States, consistent with their own competitive positions, to engage in economic growth while reducing carbon emissions. I hope that he hopes that it will be possible to build on top of that a second round of binding international targets, which would show that Kyoto is not dead—incidentally, such targets should be vastly more effective and ambitious than those in the first Kyoto treaty and broadly encompass the whole world of carbon producers. That is what I hope that the Prime Minister believes; that is what I think that the hon. Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) believes; and that is certainly what Opposition Members are now largely unified in believing. My argument is that if we all believe that, it is an extraordinarily strong basis for consensus.

[Mr. Letwin]

Mark Tami: Like the right hon. Gentleman, I hope that we can reach an agreement in this House that will last for many years. Although his new-found allies may speak well in this House, however, at a local level they seem to oppose every new form of energy generation, whether it is renewables or other technologies.

Mr. Letwin: I do not think that that is fair. I have spent the better part of my political life fighting off Liberal Democrats who were trying to take my seat, so I have some experience of their campaigning techniques. It is not only Liberal Democrats and the Labour party, but Conservatives—this will always be true of all parties and all politicians—who respond to a considerable degree to local circumstance and to concerns other than those about climate change. We must all understand that each and every one of the technologies that the hon. Member for Sherwood and I believe need to be brought forward have constraints, some of which are environmental constraints. There is a continuous tension between each technology and something. In some cases, the tension is between a technology and a resource; in some cases, it is between a technology and the economics of the situation; and in some cases, it is between a technology and the environmental consequences for the landscape or cityscape. We should not deride one another across the House if we exhibit some of those tensions, which are an inevitable part of democratic politics.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): Are not targets without the means to achieve them dangerous, because they provide an illusion of progress that is not followed through on the ground? We all know that with rising worldwide energy use, the only realistic way of meeting the threat of climate change is a nuclear power programme. All else is sophistry, illusion and wishful thinking. Is that not the consensus that we should be building worldwide?

Mr. Letwin: My right hon. Friend and I do not wholly agree, although I agree with a large part of his remarks. We will not make progress simply by having targets or even by translating those targets into market incentives. We will make progress only if the market incentives are then translated into action in the form of technologies that work, that combine energy security with carbon reduction, and that allow economic growth. One of those technologies may very well be nuclear. However, the existing nuclear power stations constitute a reduction of about 5 per cent. in our total carbon output. The entirety of our electricity supply industry constitutes only about 40 per cent. of our carbon production. Very much wider steps will need to be taken than merely on one particular type of plant, be it nuclear or otherwise, in this country and elsewhere. Whether we consider the power sector and carbon sequestration, disaggregated power sector, microgeneration, and energy efficiency in the home, vehicles and the substitution of traditional engines by hybrids and biofuels, or air travel and what we do to constrain the emissions from that, we are considering a vastly wider range than the "nuclear or not nuclear" debate has allowed for.

I would say to my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) that I fear that the Prime Minister's habitual brilliance in highlighting particular items in order to carry the political day has led him to overstretch the importance of nuclear power and the debate around it because he believes that that will allow us not to focus on the many other things that are, in many cases, very much more difficult to achieve. Yes, let us keep an open mind about nuclear as a part of the solution, but let us not suppose that it can ever be the full solution—or, indeed, that any amount of power plants of any kind can ever be the full solution.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Letwin: I will give way twice more and then I am going to progress to the end of my speech. I hope that no hon. Member will condemn me for speaking for a long time, as most of it has been taken in responding to interventions.

Mr. David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): The right hon. Gentleman says that there are wide-ranging solutions to the host of issues that we face. Surely one of those issues must be the fact that billions of tonnes of coal reside in this country, giving us an edge against many of our European competitors and linking the economy with how we deal with climate change. Carbon capture is an extremely important area, and we should not throw it out of the discussion.

Mr. Letwin: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman, just as I agreed with my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells that nuclear may be an important component. Carbon sequestration or capture may well play a huge part, not only in this country but in China and India, because undoubtedly coal stations will need to be built in great number. Of course, it is not yet a well-established technology, but we all have high hopes that it will become so and that it will become affordable.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): I hope to be part of this emerging consensus, but I am particularly worried about nuclear, which my party cannot support and I suspect that the Liberals cannot support it either. Can the right hon. Gentleman define what he means by technologies, because a technology such as nuclear may be as bad as a polluting one such as coal without the proper technology to clean it up?

Mr. Letwin: I do not anticipate—neither does the hon. Member for Lewes—that we will ever reach complete agreement on each item that lies under the umbrella. We are trying to reach agreement on the shape of an umbrella that will protect us from a rainstorm. We may then have different views of what to put under it, agreeing on many and disagreeing on some—for example, nuclear power. What I mean by technologies is a vast range of technologies, some of which are highly controversial and some of which are not controversial at all. Very few people believe that improving the cladding in roofs is a controversial measure. I suspect that very few people would think it wrong for someone to have a dish-sized windmill on their house, although one currently has to apply for planning permission for one of those but not for a dish, which is rather an oddity. We must ensure that the structures that we create bring forward the lowest-cost solutions that are compatible with achieving the carbon targets. Only then do we have to start arguing about the fine detail of whether there are particular technological solutions that for some reason or other some people cannot stomach.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): My right hon. Friend is rightly focusing on the range of exciting technologies that are out there, in contrast to the Prime Minister's mono-focus. Is he aware, though, of the work that is being supported by the Bush White House? We disagree with so much of its approach to climate change, but it has directed billions of federal dollars into the hydrogen economy. The brain drain that that is causing from other areas around the world into US universities is striking. Does he have any ideas on how we can encourage that sort of research to come back into the UK?

Mr. Letwin: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. In fact, the United States as a whole has been making huge advances, not only in carbon reduction but in measures to help carbon reduction hereafter. Many of those have been at state level, but some have been at federal level. What my hon. Friend says is abundantly true. Billions have been invested in forward-looking activities such as trying to promote carbon capture and, as he says, the hydrogen economy. We should be grateful to the United States for investing that money and making that effort. I agree that it would be good if we, too, were to participate in that endeavour.

Mr. Morley: It seems to have escaped the right hon. Gentleman's notice that it was announced more than 18 months ago that the UK and Japan are collaborating on clean fuel technology, which includes fuel cells, hydrogen and hybrid power. Collaborating with major G8 nations and the United States is an important way forward. He would be very wrong to think that the UK is ignoring those approaches.

Mr. Letwin: That is to be welcomed.

I return to the key question. Is the pessimistic interpretation right, or is the optimistic interpretation right? Is the Prime Minister saying that he has come to the conclusion that when the chips are down economic growth and carbon reduction cannot go together and we cannot have targets intervening between the two; or is he, as I hope, espousing the view that we need to start by advancing the technology, then persuade the rest of the world that one can combine carbon reduction and growth, bind the world into targets, and thus bind ourselves into targets over the long term and be able to translate those through market incentives into real action through technological change?

If he is saying the latter, then there is the basis for a splendid agreement between the two sides of this House—that is, the three parties and perhaps the smaller parties as well—about the framework. I hope that through the medium of this debate and others that may follow it, we can get to the point—I accept that this is difficult for any Government to do—where the Government say, "In the national interest, we are willing to lay down the normal process of claiming credit for the Government when things go right and knocking down the Opposition whenever possible", and instead try to create a series of arrangements which mean that over a 50-year period, come one Government or another, we continue with a settled set of targets, an institutional framework that brings those repeatedly to the attention of Parliament, and a political apparatus that makes it well-nigh impossible for any politician to go against that trend and very easy for any politician to go with the trend despite the democratic pressures that will be exerted at any given election.

That may be too optimistic a hope, but it is my hope this evening. If the Minister is now going to reaffirm, as I hope, that my optimistic interpretation of the Prime Minister's remarks is the right one, he will in that selfsame set of utterances be justifying the hope that we can arrive at the cross-party consensus that would give him a basis for not resisting our motion.

7.49 pm

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

> "welcomes the leadership shown by the UK Government internationally on climate change, and the important progress made at the July Summit and at the recent meeting of the Dialogue on Climate Energy, Clean Energy and Sustainable Development; further welcomes the recent announcement of the Renewable Transport Fuels Obligation and looks forward to the publication of the climate change programme review; recognises the importance of building greater understanding and support among all sectors of society for action on climate change; and further welcomes new ideas and contributions from all quarters that help to reduce carbon emissions."

I thank the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) for initiating the debate on climate change. It is an important issue and the discussion gives me an opportunity to outline the Government's policy progress and tackle some issues that have confused the debate. Some of them are based on misunderstanding, but others are based on malice. However, I shall deal with those matters later.

Climate change is the greatest environmental challenge that the world faces. I therefore welcome the fact that, at least in this country, there is a general political consensus about the need for action and the threat that climate change poses. The debate is about how far we go, what we do and the sort of mechanisms that we put in place. I explained that to a Conservative Canadian Member of Parliament. The Conservatives in Canada stated in their manifesto that if they won the election, they would withdraw from the Kyoto protocol. I explained that that was not the position in this country, where there is general political consensus. I hope that he took that message back.

[Mr. Elliot Morley]

The Prime Minister has taken a strong international lead on the matter. Even his detractors would accept that he has put climate change at the top of the political agenda, especially this year, given our G8 and EU presidencies. That is why we are also committed to implementing our ambitious domestic programme. I emphasise that 2005 has been a milestone year in relation to climate change. In February, the historic Kyoto protocol entered into force after its ratification by Russia. That ratification owed a great deal to lobbying by the Prime Minister and our actions to encourage Russia to do that.

The UK's G8 and EU presidencies have focused the international community's attention on climate change. In December, 10,000 people will meet in Montreal for the United Nations forum on climate change convention. That will be a crucial meeting, not least because we have to begin the process of looking to Kyoto's second commitment period, which is 2012.

There appeared to be confusion among some hon. Members who intervened earlier. We have a binding commitment under the Kyoto protocol to reduce greenhouse gases in the UK by 12.5 per cent. by 2012. We are on a reduction of 12.5 per cent. now. Figures are likely to go up and down because of the different sorts of pressures on emissions. However, we have no doubt that we are well on target not only to fulfil our goal by 2012, but to doing better than that.

We have another target—a voluntary, domestic, national target of reducing CO_2 by 20 per cent. by 2010 and by 60 per cent. by 2050. That is a self-imposed national target, not a legally binding agreement. It is a commitment by the Government to go beyond our obligations under the Kyoto treaty.

Colin Challen: I congratulate my hon. Friend on accepting another voluntary target. He has agreed to accept the 25-5 challenge to reduce his personal carbon emissions by 25 per cent. in five years, and no later than 2010. Several other Members who have accepted that challenge are present. I am not allowed to name them, but they are here and they are making that personal effort. Does my hon. Friend agree that the one way that we can establish a consensus is by acting on our words, not simply spouting all the time, thereby demonstrating that we mean what we say, take the matter seriously and are prepared to take action ourselves?

Mr. Morley: I accept that. Taking action on climate change is important globally, nationally, regionally and individually. All of us can do a great deal about our lifestyles. That is why I have made such a commitment. Like many hon. Members, I consider my impact on the environment and try to reduce it.

Richard Ottaway: I think that the Minister was looking at me when he made his remarks about Kyoto. I accept that he may well hit his Kyoto targets. He may or may not hit his other domestic targets and we can argue about that. However, it all pales into insignificance if countries such as India, China and the United States do not hit their targets. Cutting our emissions by 1 or 2 per cent. is nothing compared with the output of the Chinese economy, which is growing at 3 or 4 per cent. a year.

Mr. Morley: In all fairness, that argument is advanced often and there is some truth in it. When the United States alone accounts for 25 per cent. of global emissions, it is essential to engage with it and get it to take action. It is also true that while India and China do not have to have legally binding targets under the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities in the Kyoto protocol, they are enormous emitters. Their emissions have been increasing year after year. It is precisely for those reasons that the Prime Minister has been considering the way in which we can engage countries such as India, China and the United States, and especially how we can get India and China to do more when they will not accept binding targets.

Mr. Gummer: I understand the Minister's problems and he knows that I generally support what he is trying to do. However, let me bring him back to the 20 per cent. figure. The right hon. Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher) gave me some hell in the Chamber because the Labour party made that commitment in opposition. When it came to power, it reiterated it. If the Minister is now telling me that achieving the 20 per cent. is not possible—I warned him that it would be difficult—will he understand that we shall keep him to it? It may be a voluntary target, but if this country does not manage to meet it, the rest of the world will believe that we have let it down on the most important issue that confronts us. The Government will not stand up and say, "We're going to do it. This is how we're going to do it. These are the tests that we'll use. We'll have independent checks every year." That undermines our belief in the Government's integrity and intelligence on the matter.

Mr. Morley: It is true that the 20 per cent. target was a manifesto commitment—we were the only party to do that. It is a difficult target and we knew that when we made the commitment; I do not want to be dishonest about it. However, I believe that we can fulfil the target. We are attempting to do that. It is why we have the climate change review, which we will publish in due course. That will give some indication of the additional steps that we intend to take to move us towards the 20 per cent. target. Although it is true that, in common with every major industrial country, emissions have risen in the UK, if it were not for the steps that we have taken since 1997 there would be an additional 8 per cent. increase in CO_2. I freely acknowledge that we need to do more. That is the point of the review. As the amendment makes clear, we welcome contributions from other organisations and, indeed, other parties to our approach and the sort of measures that we should take.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): Let me follow the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) on Kyoto. All the efforts that we make in this country pale into insignificance when China, India and the United States create 2.7 billion tonnes of carbon emissions compared with the 483 million tonnes that all the Kyoto countries put together produce. What exactly is the Minister doing to get those countries on board? If he cannot do that, all our efforts, whether they are bicycles or wind farms, are a complete joke.

Mr. Morley: Yes, I shall be very glad to do that. In fact, I intend to cover those points in my speech, so I hope that the hon. Gentleman will listen carefully to what I have to say. I have just acknowledged that the UK accounts for 2 per cent. of global emissions. The EU, of which we are a member, accounts for about 24 per cent. However, if every country took the attitude that this problem is too difficult to tackle because the Americans are not doing anything and because China and India are producing huge emissions, we would never make any progress at all. This country is trying to take the lead in this area, and I am proud of that.

Paddy Tipping: Is not the Minister being too modest? Is it not a fact that the Prime Minister has recently had discussions with China and India, and that he has talked to the Russians about this? Is it not also the case that the next G8 summit, in St. Petersburg, is going to consider climate change? Finally, will my hon. Friend comment on the efforts that he and the Prime Minister have made to persuade the Russians to sign the Kyoto treaty? Those are strong arguments that counter the siren voices from the Conservative Benches.

Mr. Morley: As part of our commitments, the Prime Minister, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have met our Russian, Chinese and Indian counterparts. In fact, we have been advocating international action and trying to build international consensus for many years. I shall return to these points in a moment.

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Morley: I should like to make some progress.

It would be for the benefit of the House if I outlined what measures the Government have put in place to deal with climate change. First, in regard to our domestic commitments, the Government introduced the climate change levy, which will have saved 3.7 million tonnes of carbon by 2010. The climate change agreements that go with the levy have already saved 4.6 million tonnes of carbon up to 2002. This Government introduced the world's first national carbon trading scheme. We also introduced company car tax reforms in 2004 that changed the whole focus on company cars, which account for the biggest share of the new car market. Instead of giving tax discounts on the number of miles travelled, we now give them according to a car's emissions. That represents a big change and it has had a big impact on sales.

It was this Government who introduced a lower rate of vehicle excise duty for low-carbon vehicles, and who established the Carbon Trust to work with business to help it to reduce carbon emissions. We also established a target of obtaining 10 per cent. of our energy from renewable sources by 2010, and introduced the renewable energy obligation certificates. We introduced the energy efficiency commitments—we are now moving into their third phase—which involve the energy companies helping their customers to achieve energy efficiency. We have also recently announced that we are to introduce a renewable transport fuel obligation, which is designed to save more than 1 million tonnes of carbon a year. That proposal has been warmly welcomed.

We are one of the few major industrial countries that is on track to meet its Kyoto targets, and we have now achieved a 12.5 per cent. reduction in greenhouse gas emissions. We are, I understand, the first Government in the world to take a decision to offset all Government air travel from April next year. We have already offset all the air travel involved in travelling to our G8 conferences, and we have used the money from that to invest in a clean development mechanism scheme in Cape Town in South Africa. I believe that we are unique among Governments internationally in that regard.

This Government have also set up a review of the economics of climate change, which is important in regard to dealing with its impact on gross domestic product, the potential benefits, and the cost of doing nothing about climate change. We have also brought forward proposals from the Commission under our EU presidency to include aviation in the European carbon trading scheme.

Mr. Nick Hurd (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Morley: Those are just the domestic issues, and I want to go on to the international issues, but I am happy to give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hurd: One of the stated ambitions of this Government's presidency was to advance the inclusion of aviation into the next round of emissions trading. Will the Minister update the House on exactly what progress they have made, as of the end of this month?

Mr. Morley: As of the end of this month, the proposals have come forward from the Commission and they are on the agenda of the December Environment Council, at which we hope to reach agreement with the Council to take the necessary steps to include aviation in the EU scheme post-2008. That is the earliest that it could be done because of the procedures that have to be followed in the European Parliament.

Mr. Weir: The Minister missed out the Energy Act 2004 from his long list. It introduced measures relating to renewable energy and to the capping charges for renewable transmission from Scotland. That has largely been undermined by the transmission charging regime recommended by Ofgem. I know that the Minister's colleague in the Department of Trade and Industry, the Minister for Energy, the hon. Member for Croydon, North (Malcolm Wicks), has announced a change for the island areas, but no change has been made in the highland areas of Scotland. Will the Minister tell us whether such a change is under consideration?

Mr. Morley: The hon. Gentleman should be aware that measures have been put in place to support hydro energy in the Scottish highlands. That would also have the effect of reducing transmission costs because of a small increase across the whole of the national grid, which would benefit the people in remote Scottish areas. I am sure that he will appreciate the Government's taking those measures.

[Mr. Morley]

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): In the Minister's long list of the Government's efforts—[HON MEMBERS: "And achievements."] Well, some achievements. The point that the Minister made was that the Government had succeeded in mitigating what would otherwise have been a bigger problem. However, in the spirit of co-operation that we are trying to achieve this evening, I should like to say that I believe that the Government are trying hard on this issue. The fact that they are not succeeding as fast or as much as we would like is due to the fact that this is a really difficult problem to solve, domestically and internationally. The Minister has accepted the need for international co-operation, through which all of us on the planet can make progress. It is sad, however, that he saw fit to table his amendment to the Opposition's motion, and I would like him to explain why he felt that that was necessary. Does he not think that it sends out the wrong message to people who are seriously looking for political consensus and leadership on this crucial issue?

Mr. Morley: As always, the hon. Gentleman makes a reasonable point, and I intend to address it. I understand the argument for consensus. However, just as he wished to ask a number of questions about the Prime Minister's view, I need to ask a number of questions about where the Opposition stand on certain issues. If we are to explore these issues, we must also explore the disagreements. I would ask him to read the amendment carefully—he will see that it is written in a way that leaves open the option of working together and of treating the proposals on this serious international problem in serious and mature manner.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): I accept that the Government are earnestly and genuinely trying to make achievements on climate change. May I ask the Minister, however, what the special relationship between our Prime Minister and President Bush has achieved in regard to making significant changes in the American stance on climate change?

Mr. Morley: I believe that there have been changes in the American stance—an example is the outcome of the Gleneagles agreement. A bottom-up approach is being taken in parts of the United States, involving certain states, cities and even major American companies such as General Electric and DuPont, arguing for a framework of emissions reduction. That there are changes taking place was also reflected in a recent vote in the Senate. To be honest, I would not have expected to see such a vote even two years ago. Some of the changes have been as a result of our engagement—although not only that of the UK—with the Americans at all levels, not just with the federal Government, but with individual states. I recently attended a conference promoted by the Climate Group, which is a voluntary group consisting of American and Australian states, British companies and a range of international companies, all of which want to go further and faster than their Governments are doing. We have encouraged and supported them because we want to work at all levels.

Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Morley: I should like to make some progress.

At this point, it is worth saying a few words about what we have done in relation to our international engagement. Just as we are proud of the progress that we have made domestically, we are proud of what we have done in terms of global leadership. Making climate change one of the two key themes for the G8 focused attention on it, and the Gleneagles summit agreed on a package of measures to combat the problem, together with a new dialogue between G8 countries and emerging economies such as China and India and a statement on the importance of climate change.

The first meeting on the dialogue was held in London on 1 November. Significantly, it was attended not just by the G8 countries, but by the five big emerging economies: India, China, Brazil, Mexico and South Africa. That is an example of the use of our facilities and influence to build an international consensus and to establish how we can work together to deal with some of the requirements of countries such as China and India.

The round table for G8 Energy and Environment Ministers was the first of its kind and was very successful. We hosted a major international science conference at the Hadley centre in February, which informed some of the sceptics—who, I am glad to say, are becoming fewer and fewer—about the science of climate change. Under our EU presidency, we held an informal Agriculture and Environment Ministers' council on climate change. Such a council had never been convened before. Under our presidency, an EU-China summit was held that led to an agreement with China on the pioneering and developing of clean coal technology. Of course, the Chinese will use their coal because they have huge coal reserves. Then there was the EU-India agreement. We talked to India about renewables and about the possibility of co-operating with India on, in particular, the clean development mechanism. There was also an EU-Russia agreement, which was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping). It was agreed that Russia should become the next president of the G8 and that energy efficiency would become one of its key themes. We have been involved in important international work.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I understand that earth observation and environmental monitoring were important subjects at the G8 summit and that the UK emphasised their importance. A decision on the global monitoring for environment and security satellite is due in December, and DEFRA is the lead Department when it comes to that important decision at the ministerial meeting on the European Space Agency. Rumour has it that the UK will put in a paltry £2 million, although we really need to put in £11 million if we are to hold our own in the international community. If the rumour is correct, will the Minister immediately go back to the Department and think about investing the £11 million that British industry and the sector really need?

Mr. Morley: We certainly need to invest in monitoring technologies. We were involved recently in support for the satellite that was designed to monitor the decline of ice sheets in the Arctic. Unfortunately, that satellite came to a premature end, but I will look into the hon. Lady's serious point and write to her.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): As a member of the Science and Technology Committee, I welcome much of what the Minister has said, especially about carbon sequestration and international co-operation. I am a bit puzzled, however. Our motion states:

> "That this House endorses the principle of a cross-party consensus on carbon reduction."

I cannot see the Minister's problem with it. Perhaps he will explain.

Mr. Morley: I will, if I am given the chance.

Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): We have been talking about consensus in the House and in the UK, and about the Government's work in terms of leadership to secure international consensus. In the light of all the good work that the Government have done and the leadership shown by the Department and the Prime Minister, will my hon. Friend give us an idea of the international agreement that he hopes will emerge when the Kyoto agreement needs to be replaced? When we speak of international consensus, the question of the successor to Kyoto must be the most pressing issue.

Mr. Morley: We certainly want an effective second phase following Kyoto. I think that it should include targets, but I also think that we should take a sensitive approach to its application, especially in regard to countries that are not obliged to adopt targets. We should consider how we can persuade those countries to become involved in the reduction of emissions.

Patrick Hall: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Morley: I will, but after that I shall make some progress because I know that others wish to speak.

Patrick Hall: Does my hon. Friend agree that no country will take these issues seriously unless the whole world is convinced that it is possible to combine economic growth with tackling climate change? Although we must not be complacent, it should be borne in mind that during the period in which we reduced carbon dioxide emissions by 12.5 per cent., the UK economy grew by well over 30 per cent. That suggests that it is possible to combine two processes, so we are well placed to urge others to take such issues seriously and drive the political will.

Mr. Morley: It is true that ours has been one of the strongest rates of economic growth in Europe, and I think that we can demonstrate that we have reduced emissions during that period of economic growth. I do not accept the argument that reductions in emissions and economic growth cannot be achieved at the same time. Of course there are implications to be addressed, and some have asked why we should act when our emissions are so much smaller than those of other countries, but action on climate change promotes energy efficiency, new technology, productivity and a whole new sector of energy industries. We should not be afraid to say as much, and as a country we are not.

John Barrett: Do not figures released last week by the World Health Organisation provide one of the strongest reasons for action? According to those figures, 150,000 fatalities and 5 million diseases a year are directly linked to the increasing temperature on the planet.

Mr. Morley: I entirely agree. Global warming has a number of severe implications, and the spread of disease is one of them. Others are desertification, water problems, difficulties with crops, rising sea levels and storm intensity. The more scientific papers I read and the more I learn about such issues, the more concerned I am about climate change and the more convinced I am of the need to take action.

As I have said, I welcome consensus on what is an important global issue. Understandably, we have our political disagreements, but there is an enormous amount of consensus and co-operation between all parties in Committees, including Select Committees. We should not be ashamed of that, or worry about it—it is right and proper. However, let me say this to the right hon. Member for West Dorset—and I intend to answer his questions. He talks of year-on-year reductions, but where are his policies? How will he achieve those reductions? What taxes will he raise? What measures will he introduce? I welcome his thoughts and his suggestions, but this is the second debate that we have had on this subject, and so far we have heard nothing about what he and his party intend to do. Consensus requires a measure of agreement on the politics involved.

We have some disagreements with the right hon. Gentleman on climate change. He knows what they are, but I shall remind him of them nevertheless. We strongly disagree with the Conservative party's opposition to wind energy because wind is an important aspect of renewables. Other renewables are coming on-stream and we are encouraging that, but about 70 per cent. of renewable energy will come from wind. The right hon. Gentleman's party is opposing the development of wind farms wherever they are proposed, and it must be said that the Liberal Democrats are not much better in that regard. If that continues, we shall never make any progress.

Mr. Letwin: The Minister must know that we are not opposed to wind energy. As a matter of fact and as I said earlier, we are not opposed to any particular form of energy. Each form of energy poses constraints and problems, and it has to be looked at case by case. Of course we are in favour of allowing local communities a degree of discretion to decide where these things are suitable and where they are not, but that is not the same as being opposed to wind energy. The Minister's own Government support a system of planning precisely because they accept that there are such constraints. I do not believe that there is much between us on wind energy and certainly not enough to justify not having a consensus on the overall framework.

Mr. Morley: The problem is that there may not be much between myself and the right hon. Gentleman, but in a debate on wind energy that was initiated by the official Opposition, some Conservative Front-Bench Members frankly painted a picture of wind energy as generally akin to supping with the devil or having the anti-Christ on our fields. I am not quite clear whether that is the right hon. Gentleman's or his party's position, but it certainly needs to be clarified. The right hon. Gentleman also supports the scrapping of the climate change levy, but it has made an enormous contribution to reducing energy consumption in this country and we do not see how scrapping that levy makes a contribution to fighting climate change. Finally, although I do not levy the charge against the right hon. Gentleman, who I have not heard commenting on the matter, every time that there is a dispute about fuel prices and we have demonstrators on the streets, official Conservative spokespeople jump on the bandwagon and demand that the Government cave in immediately to the demonstrators by cutting fuel duty and fuel taxes. Again, that is not an area of consensus between us.

[Mr. Morley]

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: The point about the fuel protest illustrates precisely why we need cross-party collaboration on these issues—in order to prevent that sort of opportunism, which any Opposition party will be tempted to engage in when life gets tough. There will have to be tough decisions. However, the Minister has illustrated exactly why he should support my right hon. Friend's motion this evening.

Mr. Morley: I have no doubt about the sincerity of the hon. Gentleman's views on these issues, but the problem is that I have no idea where the official Opposition stand on the issue of fuel duty—and I would like to know.

Speculating about the Prime Minister's comments provides another problem. The right hon. Member for West Dorset claims to be seeking a consensus, but he did not properly read what the Prime Minister has written, spelling out where he stands on all these issues. The Prime Minister's views were more than clarified in the recent article in The Independent, which I highly recommend to all Members who want to know where the Prime Minister stands on targets and binding commitments. It is all spelled out in great detail. The right hon. Gentleman read that article, but was still keen to quote not what the Prime Minister said, but what people who claimed to be saying what the Prime Minister said—because it suited their particular agenda. We have to do better than that. Rather than ignoring fact and repeating fantasies, people who want clarification are free to ask for it. That is the spirit of consensus. If people ask for clarification, the Prime Minister, my right hon. Friends and I will be only too happy to provide it.

I accept the need for a stable framework that is not affected by political changes. Our progress on carbon reduction is now independently audited by the National Audit Office, as well as the United Nations forum on climate change. We already have independent bodies that monitor what we are doing in respect of emissions and progress. Nothing is to be gained from what the right hon. Gentleman proposes, even though I am not particularly against it, because we already have it. Let me make it clear that we are always happy to give credit to people who make real contributions and real progress. It is important to realise that we as a Government cannot achieve progress in climate change alone. We need support from local authorities and civil society, and we need backing from our scientists and international support. Yes, we also need political support in respect of achieving a consensus.

As to what the right hon. Member for West Dorset said tonight, no one has said that Kyoto is dead. The Prime Minister played a key role in getting Kyoto in place and is committed to it. We have to face reality in respect of the views of India and China, which has influenced some of the Prime Minister's comments, but what he said about India and China has sometimes erroneously been applied to the UK. There are real difficulties in turning around the current trend of emissions, but I believe that it can be done. It is false to claim that it is an argument about technology versus targets; we need both. This country has demonstrated real progress in tackling climate change and we have provided a real international lead.

In conclusion, I invite the right hon. Gentleman to read the amendment that we tabled today. If he does, he will see that it embraces proposals to give the Opposition the opportunity to judge that the Government have real policies on climate change and that they are committed to them. I am afraid that the Opposition have often been opportunist in the past and it is important that they are not seen merely to be backing empty gestures. Our amendment leaves the door open. If the right hon. Gentleman is serious about a consensus, I invite him to withdraw his motion and support our amendment.

8.26 pm

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): I am certainly serious about achieving consensus, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I believe that the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) is, too.

My first question is whether the threat from climate change is serious. The answer is manifestly so—and it is judged to be so by probably every hon. Member in the House, by the Government's chief scientist and by 99.5 per cent. of scientists. The number is increasing all the time. Is climate change becoming increasingly serious? Yes, it is, and evidence from the last six months has been frightening, as the figures supplied by scientists are proving to be underestimates of the speed at which climate change is kicking in, and underestimates of its impact on developing countries and, indeed, on our own shores. The matter is becoming more rather than less serious and at a faster rate of knots than ever before.

My second question is whether sufficient progress is being made both internationally and domestically to limit greenhouse gas emissions. I fear that the answer is manifestly no. I am aware that the Government have taken steps this year to ensure that the issue is put firmly on the international agenda and I acknowledge that some progress has been made. I particularly welcome the sensible engagement with China and India and I also welcome the review on the economics of climate change, which will go a long way towards establishing the cost of doing nothing and the cost of doing something. It will enable us to present to other countries the facts of the matter as we have put them together and hopefully bring about some international consensus on what actions need to be taken. So to be honest, in most respects—bar one, which I shall mention now—I doubt whether the Government could have done much more internationally.

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): I know that we are striving for consensus this evening, but if the Liberal Democrats are so interested in reducing greenhouse gas emissions, why did Liberal Democrats in my constituency vote against the congestion charge, and why, extraordinarily, are they against creating bus lanes to support our new park and ride?

Norman Baker: I am sorry that I gave way to that intervention. I do not know the facts of the situation that the hon. Lady describes, so I will not comment on it. This is not about pretending that one party is whiter than white—or greener than green—or that every other party is faulty in all respects. That is the old politics, and the right hon. Member for West Dorset and I are trying to get away from it, rather than encourage it. I hope that the hon. Lady will take my response in the constructive spirit in which it is intended.

On international negotiations, the caveat that I want to outline for the Minister is one that I have mentioned before. The Prime Minister, with the best of intentions, is trying to bring President Bush on board, as he should; but I caution him against paying too high a price to get a piece of paper signed by the President. The concern has been expressed—the right hon. Member for West Dorset raised it earlier, as have others—that over the summer and in September, the Prime Minister showed signs of wavering in his commitment to targets. He undoubtedly did show such signs, but as the Minister rightly says, an article in The Independent has hopefully put that fear to bed. If the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has managed to bring the Prime Minister back on board, that is all to the good, but international agreement cannot be achieved at any price. If it is achieved through signing a piece of paper, that piece of paper will not be worth having.

Of course we want the US Administration on board, and the way to get them on board is to strengthen the commitment within the US to tackling climate change. We can do that by standing firm in the European Union and elsewhere; by supporting the north-eastern American states that have emissions trading schemes; by supporting Senator John McCain, who is pushing such issues within the Republican movement; and by supporting Arnold Schwarzenegger and the 130 mayors who have signed an agreement. I again caution the Minister and the Prime Minister that getting President Bush to sign a worthless piece of paper will not achieve our aims.

Have we taken sufficient action domestically? No, we have not. The Minister read out a list of the Government's actions and, in some regards, achievements. I happily confess that some achievements have been recorded, and I welcome them. I am bound to say, however, without being churlish, that most of them date from the early part of the Government's tenure, rather than the later part. Nevertheless, those achievements are significant and might not otherwise have occurred, so I welcome that so far as it goes, but the reality is that there is a lot more to do.

Carbon emissions are increasing. Indeed, in the past two or three years, they have increased by 3 per cent. compared with 1997 levels, and there is no indication that they are slowing down. In answer to my recent parliamentary question, the Minister said—extrapolating the most recent figures—that we could miss our Kyoto targets for the next four or five years. I am not saying that we are going to miss them, but that threat is there. I do not want us to miss them and nor does the Minister; that is why we are collectively trying to find a way of ensuring that they are met, and surpassed as far as possible.

Why have we not achieved our domestic goals? There are a number of reasons why, one of which is that it is sometimes difficult for the Government to take the decisions that they know are necessary, because they fear the political consequences of doing so. Fuel duty was certainly a case in point. In 2000, the pressure from fuel protesters was enormous.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: The hon. Gentleman will doubtless agree that the longer Governments go on putting off difficult decisions, the harder those decisions are when they eventually have to be taken.

Norman Baker: Indeed, and we would rather give the Government a soft landing than a hard one.

That leads me to aviation—an issue that the Government have yet to grasp because they are concerned about the political consequences of doing so. They want to enter into the European emissions trading scheme in respect of aviation; so do we, and so do the Conservatives, so there is consensus on this issue. But I do not regard that as sufficient. Further action has to be taken, as the Minister probably admits privately. The reality, however, is that he and his colleagues will be reluctant to go further in case the national papers produce headlines such as, "Government hit airline travellers", or "Blair puts £25 on your air ticket". Of course the Minister is concerned about that; he is a politician and he is worried about the consequences of such an initiative. But we are trying to give the Government a mechanism for taking decisions that they, and we, know may be necessary, but which are politically difficult for them to take.

Mr. Morley: Of course we, as politicians, have to take into account certain consequences, but it is not simply a question of that so far as aviation taxes are concerned. The question is: what is the most effective fiscal measure? Some charter airlines have imposed a £20 fuel surcharge, but it has had not the slightest effect on passenger numbers. I do not doubt that, theoretically, people could be priced out of the market, but rationing travel on the basis of who is rich enough to pay for pollution does not accord with social equity.

Norman Baker: I did not suggest that, in fact, and the Minister should listen more carefully. A number of mechanisms are possible—ending the "single till" approach to airline pricing, implementing an emissions charge, or reforming airport passenger duty. Various options are available, and they might add to the Government's armoury when it comes to tackling the effect of aviation on climate change.

Colin Challen: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that many of the taxes proposed to deal with carbon emissions would be rather regressive and hit poorer people harder than others? In that context, does he support the concept of domestic tradable quotas, the subject of my private Member's Bill last year? Under the system, which offers a way to deal with the problem in a progressive manner, people have a carbon cap and are allowed to trade their carbon allocations.

Norman Baker: That concept makes up the fifth point in my five-point speech, so I will bring it forward. I agree that tradable quotas do offer a way to move matters on. It has the attraction of being liberal—with both a small "l" and a big "L"—in that it allows people to limit carbon emissions by their personal actions. It gives them choices, and at the same time information about what those choices are.

For example, the system means that people would be given information on their airline tickets about the number of rail journeys that would be equivalent to their flight. Deductions from their carbon emissions allowances would be made to cover their airline journey, with the result that they might have to buy more allowances from someone else further down the line. Under those circumstances, people might choose to travel by rail, but they would do so having had access to the relevant information. They would have the freedom to make their own choices about how they travel.

Colin Challen: It was remiss of me not to congratulate the hon. Gentleman also on signing up to the 25-5 challenge, by which he aims to reduce his personal carbon emissions by the year 2010.

Norman Baker: I thank the hon. Gentleman. I have taken drastic action in that respect, although it is proving difficult to make further cuts. However, I shall do my best to live up to the challenge.

The empowerment of individuals generally is important. Personal carbon allowances are one option, but the personal production of energy is another. Why do we have to have an energy system based on huge units—nuclear or coal-fired power stations, or even wind farms—that are situated miles away from centres of population? Why not have decentralised energy, so that people can have a say about what they use? That was the burden of the private Member's Bill introduced last year by the hon. Member for Morley and Rothwell (Colin Challen). Such a system would allow people to sell excess energy to the grid and it would also offer security of supply, as people with wind turbines on their houses are not liable to be cut off.

Mr. Boris Johnson (Henley) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman say who would distribute the personal carbon allowances? What would be the penalties for failure to comply?

Norman Baker: The honest answer is that there is a lot more work to do on the proposal. We are moving towards taking radical measures to tackle climate change. A number of economists have suggested the carbon allowances approach: implementing the allowances could be achieved in a variety of ways, but none of them is particularly easy. My suggestion is that we could start with the transport sector, which is self-contained and could be ring-fenced. However, if the hon. Gentleman is asking whether we have solutions that we can distribute around the House, the answer is no, we have not.

Another reason why too little is being done about climate change is that it is not high enough up the political agenda. By our actions, we are trying to correct that. We could do with some help from the media—a point that I regularly make—which insist on treating climate change, if they deal with it at all, as a purely scientific matter. They give the impression that no politicians of any party, including those in the Government, have anything to say about it. I, for one, am fed up with reports on the "Today" programme or stories in the broadsheets that go into great detail about horrendous and apocalyptic things going on in the world but which contain no comment from any politician. That means that no Minister is put on the spot and asked what is being done about the subject of the story, and the opinions of Members of Parliament are not sought either. Such stories and reports exist in a vacuum, outside the political process, so it is not surprising that politicians do not make progress on environmental matters. I hope that the media will reform their approach to these things.

What should we do about policies that, collectively, are failing to deliver domestically the reaction to climate change that we need? The motion has been tabled by both Conservative and Liberal Democrat Members, and follows on from earlier debates and initiatives undertaken by myself and the right hon. Member for West Dorset. It wants to deal with the problem of climate change by putting it higher on the agenda, and telling the media that the story is political as well as simply scientific. It is designed to make it easier for the Minister and the good guys in government to argue with people who are perhaps less enlightened in other Departments, such as the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. I hope that it will also help the Government to take difficult decisions in the knowledge that they will not be exploited for narrow party reasons.

That is how the motion attempts to help the Government. I want action on climate change, and I want the problem to be tackled. That is one of the reasons why I am in politics. I am trying to make it easier for the Government to take the right decisions. That is what we are collectively trying to do.

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): Only one Opposition Member has mentioned the biggest contribution we could make on climate change—nuclear power. The Liberals have a principled opposition to nuclear power, but countries such as China and South Africa are going nuclear, even though they have massive coal stocks, because they realise that nuclear is the cleanest form of power.

Norman Baker: I do not agree that it is the cleanest source, and we could have a long debate about nuclear energy—as we doubtless will in due course. It is not for this country to dictate to others the choices they make in energy supply, but I am convinced that we can deliver security of supply and meet our energy demands through renewable sources, energy efficiency and cleaned up fossil fuel.

We will have the argument about nuclear power later, but that subject brings me to the issue of consensus. Last time we had a debate on climate change, I was asked how I could possibly want to do business with the Conservatives when their position on the climate change levy is so dreadful. Indeed, the Minister mentioned that today. Let me make it plain. I do not share all the Conservatives' views on the environment, and they do not share mine or those of my colleagues. That is not a requirement. We are not entering a coalition or seeking to agree every dot and comma for a joint Administration. We are setting off down the road and seeing how far we can get with a common policy. At some point, we will fork off and go in different directions—[Interruption.] I said, "Fork off"! However, it makes sense to go as far down the road together as we can—and I include the Government—instead of picking on differences and saying, "Well, you're in a different party so we are going to find a reason to disagree with you. We will pick some council that has done something unhelpful and make an issue of that, instead of trying to address the issues of climate change." That is not the response that members of the public want to hear. They want a proper, concerted response that proves that MPs are taking climate change seriously. That requires a different approach from us.

The Government should not be defensive on this matter. They should not feel that they always have to engage in normal, adversarial politics. They should not feel that they would be weakened by engaging with Opposition parties to find a consensus on climate change. The Minister, who cares about these matters, will find that liberating.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. There is a 10-minute limit on speeches from now on, but several hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye, many of whom are likely to be disappointed. It would be helpful if some Members could take less than their allotted span.

8.43 pm

Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): I hope to reduce my emissions this evening as much as possible. I shall start by reiterating two requests. The first is that we do not have a Division this evening. It would not serve any useful purpose and most of us agree with most of what is on the Order Paper without sending the wrong signal to people outside. The issue is the subject of intense debate and we are seriously looking for consensus. Much common ground has been covered this evening, and that is welcome.

I chair the all-party group on climate change, which has members from both sides of the House, including the smaller parties. I have referred to the 25–5 challenge, and if any Members who have not signed up would like to do so, they can see me afterwards. The challenge involves trying to reduce one's personal carbon emissions by 25 per cent. in five years—by 2010. That will send out a signal to our constituents, and other people who may be role models in society, that we are doing something and not simply making speeches and asking others to do things that we are not prepared to do. Although there has been much common ground, the all-party group is about to launch an inquiry into whether cross-party consensus is possible or desirable—a suggestion that, coincidentally, appears in the motion.

Having thought about the subject, I think that such consensus is both possible and desirable, although some people may say that it is not possible and we have heard a few of the reasons this evening.

John Barrett: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that we are well on the way to all-party consensus, as those parties that have already agreed to it represented about 65 per cent. of the electorate at the last election?

Colin Challen: That is possible. But when I wake up in the morning and listen to John Humphrys interviewing different Front-Bench spokespeople, I often want to go back to sleep again. Sometimes I would rather that the Front-Bench spokespeople agreed with each other and that John Humphrys found somebody else to intimidate.

Is cross-party consensus desirable? We should consider what that means for collective responsibility. We may not agree on nuclear power as a solution—that is quite possible, as we shall probably soon find out. However, if we appear to disagree on climate change, that sends out damaging signals. People might say that the Opposition wanted consensus because they wanted to get their hands on the decision-making process without collective responsibility.

In Denmark, after a long consensual process, all the parties, both in and outside government, signed up in July to about eight measures to reduce energy use and improve energy efficiency. I realise that the Danish electoral system is different from ours, which produces different results, but at least the Danes were able to agree positively on those measures. We should consider emulating that approach.

Another example, although not one that I particularly favour, is offered by Finland, which recently agreed to go ahead with its fifth nuclear reactor. In the 1990s, the Finnish Parliament rejected that option, but a couple of years ago a free vote was marginally in favour of the nuclear option. However, despite cross-party consensus and a free vote, the Greens left the Government.

The "stop climate chaos" initiative is building consensus between development and environmental non-governmental organisations. I hope that shortly there will be an initiative in the House so that all the party groups can work together to parallel and reflect what is happening outside in civil society. Perhaps we could develop the same sort of consensus that produced "Make Poverty History". Indeed, it is crucial that we do so. "Make Poverty History" is marginally less important as an all-embracing issue than climate change, although they have an impact on one another.

Earlier this autumn, I was looking for consensus between the party leaders. What better place to start than their conference speeches? Members may recall that this year we heard nine leadership speeches at three party conferences. If anyone wants to read the efforts of all the leadership contenders, they are available in the handy little publication that I have produced, entitled "Carbon 2 Share".

[Colin Challen]

Sadly, climate change was completely absent from the speeches of some of the leadership contenders of one party. I am pleased that one of the leading contenders for the Conservative party crown has now come out with some sensible ideas, such as independent carbon accounting and auditing—described as a model based on the Monetary Policy Committee. A question was put earlier about whether domestic tradable quotas would require penalties. An independent source of information on carbon counting and how the system works would have more credibility and engage people much more.

I hope that the inquiry of the all-party group on climate change will take place early in the new year. It will pose serious questions about how we should proceed, and about the obstacles. A few years ago, the Prime Minister and leading individuals from the other parties came together to form a cross-party consensus on the euro, and it was a fiasco. It went nowhere. That is an example of consensus going wrong. In Sweden, there was cross-party consensus on that subject, and consensus among the media, including broadcasters, and the people rejected it. In fact it was anticipated that they would reject it, despite the great sense that the establishment supported it. We must ask profound questions, such as whether people might feel that this consensus was a politicians' artifice, created to hoodwink them into actions that they did not agree with. It is possible that domestic tradable quotas could be such a thing.

I want to finish by saying that I am not getting Bill crazy, but tomorrow I shall present a Bill. It will be launched officially on Thursday in Committee Room 6 at 1 o'clock, and Aubrey Meyer, director of the Global Commons Institute, will be present. The Bill will be called the Climate Change (Contraction and Convergence) Bill, and it is the other half of the Domestic Tradable Quotas (Carbon Emissions) Bill. This is the international framework that has been proposed to frame all of our considerations, and consensus, and negotiations. It is what is called a full-term framework because it covers the entire process. It is not just about setting one target for next year and one for 10 years' time, and keeping our fingers crossed that we shall be able to deliver, perhaps as a result of a piece of technology. Instead, we shall be able to benchmark what we do against the contraction and convergence model. It will demand of us all quite an effort to achieve that kind of thing in the international negotiations that we face.

There is an analogy with early Christendom. What would have happened if the early Christians had gone to Rome and said, "We are not going to bring down the Roman empire, or even change the views of the emperor"—I think we know who the emperor is in the present-day world—"so let's just give up. Let's pack it in, because we cannot change their opinions; we shall just get tossed to the lions"? They did not stop because of that argument.

John Smith said that even if a country cannot achieve its international consensus, it should lead by example. I think that we should lead by example because if we do not, personally, nationally and internationally, nobody will believe that we mean what we say. Contraction and convergence is the only workable model. I have looked at all 40 of the models that the Minister mentioned in a recent debate—40 models that were provided by the Pew centre in its report. Some of those are simply a reading of the literature, extracted from an academic journal, and are not really models at all.

Contraction and convergence is fully worked out. It is comprehensive. It has the flexibilities—it allows for trading. It also meets the objections that the Byrd-Hagel resolution posed, back in the time when Kyoto was being negotiated, for any President—Clinton or Bush and any successor. The Byrd-Hagel resolution in the Senate said that the United States should not enter into an agreement that did not involve all countries. That was the sense of it. It was an agreement not simply for the developing world, but for all countries, including the developing ones. More recently, the McCain-Lieberman state of the Senate resolution has moved the debate on, albeit with less of a majority than the Byrd-Hagel resolution.

Contraction and convergence can meet the objections. It is a logic that we are not really seeking to avoid. "Contraction" means that we shall reduce our carbon emissions to the recommended levels: a 60 per cent. reduction on today's emissions by 2050. In fact—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. Gentleman has met his target.

8.54 pm

Mr. Boris Johnson (Henley) (Con): The Minister has been rather hard on the Opposition for failing to come up with a practical policy proposal about which the House could form a consensus tonight. He is being very unfair on my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin). None the less, I am going to provide a single policy initiative, which I am sure will meet universal approval among Labour Members and my hon. Friends. It would save money for people on low incomes, cut pointless bureaucracy, reduce the burdens on local councils and, of course, reduce carbon emissions, and in doing so, supply not just hot air but hot water and, indeed, central heating.

We all know that one of the major causes of CO_2 in the atmosphere is household emissions—far bigger than vehicle emissions—and 75 per cent. of those emissions comes from heating and boilers. We now come to a peculiarity, and I want to use the debate to draw it to the Minister's attention in the hope that he can clear it up tonight. It would be a wonderful thing if he did so. He might like to come with me to the lovely village of Sonning Common—one of the largest villages in south Oxfordshire—and if he would be so kind as to come, he would see a large estate full of semi-detached houses built in the 1960s, with an attractive array of south-facing roofs. Mrs. Ann Anley, who lives in one of those houses, has written to me to explain that she has a plan, which I am sure that the Minister and, indeed, all hon. Members would support.

For an outlay of £3,000, Mrs. Anley can add to her roof a wonderful panel by which she can heat her water. It is a photovoltaic pump. I do not know the exact technical details. The Ministers is nodding sagely; he knows of what I am about to speak. It is a wonderful thing. She assures me—I have no reason to doubt her, since I have taken the trouble to look up her plans on the internet—that she can reduce her carbon emissions by half a tonne of CO_2 a year and that she can supply up to 70 per cent. of her hot water needs in doing so. It is a good thing that the installation is subsidised by the Government—the Minister is nodding again—to the tune of £400. We all support that. The kicker is that she has to get planning permission. I refer back to the very prescient words of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset, who pointed to the absurdity of having to get planning permission to install a small windmill on a roof.

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): On Friday 11 November, time ran out for the Management of Energy in Buildings Bill precisely because of the determination of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), ably aided and abetted by the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper), who did their utmost to talk out that Bill. I should like to ask the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) if he can explain that sabotage by two Conservative Members.

Mr. Johnson: Henley.

Nia Griffith: To be fair to the hon. Gentleman, I meant the right hon. Member for West Dorset, because he was present for the debate and I assume that he will sum up. Am I right, Mr. Deputy Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Lady is seeking to catch my eye later. Perhaps she has said enough for the time being, and the hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) can respond to that.

Mr. Johnson: I am most grateful to the hon. Lady for her intervention. It is precisely to address the point that she makes that I seek to build a cross-party consensus tonight on the very issue in hand. The problem is that this good lady—indeed, anyone who wants to do so—must get planning permission.

Mr. Morley rose—

Mr. Johnson: I think that the Minister is about to intervene to say that the need for planning permission will be revoked on these questions.

Mr. Morley: The hon. Gentleman is on to a serious point. I understand that rooftop installations do not necessarily need planning permission, but there is confusion among local authorities about whether or not they do. I am glad to say that my hon. Friends in the Department of Trade and Industry have recently launched a consultation exercise on micro-generation that seeks to look at barriers to those devices. Part of that is intended to address the planning system to ensure that there are no anomalies.

Mr. Johnson: I am grateful to the Minister for that intervention because we are inching towards progress. I am tempted to say that he agrees with me, but I want to ram home the case a little further. To convince him, may I point out that the device that Mrs. Anley seeks to install is only 2 ft by 4 ft and only 8 cm thick, but to get planning permission, she must pay a non-negotiable flat fee of £135. She must then get an architectural artist to produce drawings of her house, which, as you will readily appreciate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will push her costs well over £200. Everyone in the House will agree that it is complete madness on one hand to subsidise the project to the tune of £400, and on the other hand to force the good lady to spend more than £200.

It is of no disrespect to the beautiful village of Sonning Common to say that not every house in it is an architectural gem beyond price. The estate in question, which I hope the Minister will visit with me, is not yet deemed to be a critical part of our national heritage. As my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset has already pointed out, it is absurd that we allow houses throughout the country to sprout great Murdoch excrescences that pump trash into people's homes. Indeed, one can build the most extraordinary things with no planning permission whatever—I have done so myself—in the form of tree houses, sheds and heaven knows what, yet this single beneficial improvement to the lady's house is forbidden without planning permission.

What do we do now? We do not content ourselves with the discussion process that the Minister outlined. I hope that he will tell the councils that he rightly says are in doubt what is allowed and what is not allowed. He should use all the plenipotentiary powers in his possession as Minister for whatever he is to indicate—I will read this out for the benefit of those who need to take it down—that class C under statutory instrument No. 418, the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995, does not apply to solar panels. If councils remain in doubt, I hope that the Minister will use his good offices and all his influence to ensure that they are in doubt no longer.

I have read some of the correspondence from councils, which are receiving more and more applications for solar panels because they are becoming more popular. I think that we can all agree that we should encourage them. The Minister himself said that this is not just a national or international question, but a question of our own individual actions and of taking our own initiative to reduce our carbon emissions. Addressing the matter would be a perfect way in which he could encourage and assist that. I very much hope that I have succeeded in my brief speech in forging the consensus that the Minister sought earlier on a single, practical policy. I look forward to hearing later that he is going to do a little bit more than set up a committee in the DTI to clarify matters, because this needs to be done urgently, and he is the man to do it.

9.3 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West and Royton) (Lab): It is widely accepted—the debate has confirmed it—that the Government so far have a pretty good record on climate change. We played a significant role in securing the Kyoto protocol in December 1997. We chaired the European Council in 1998 that produced agreement on the allocation of carbon reduction targets among all EU member states. We then produced a programme for countering climate change that was probably the most detailed and extensive of any country in the world. It is fair to say that we have been consistently proactive and effective in international negotiations to push the climate change agenda. We have been one of the only two or three countries in the

[Mr. Michael Meacher]

EU on track to meet our Kyoto target by 2010—so far, so good. However, there appear recently to have been disturbing shifts in policy that I fear are beginning to undermine that excellent record, which is why I have been prompted to speak in the debate.

A few months ago, British officials started lobbying in Brussels to try to persuade other EU countries that the successor regime to be implemented after Kyoto ends in 2012 should contain no targets or time scales. That is of course what President Bush wants, but it would defenestrate the entire global effort to stop and reverse global warming.

Then, a few weeks ago, the Prime Minister stated at a private conference in New York that the way to deal with climate change was not through the Kyoto mechanisms, but by more research and development in improved technology, as has been referred to. In other words, it should be business as usual, but with more scientific ingenuity to try to lessen the catastrophic consequences. I profoundly disagree with that approach.

If the world is to achieve the exceedingly exacting target of cutting greenhouse gas emissions not just by 5 per cent., as Kyoto requires, but by 60 per cent. by 2050, which scientists say is necessary to reverse global warming, a post-Kyoto international treaty that lacks targets, time scales and mechanisms is, to be honest, hardly worth the paper on which it is written. If that is the line that we are now taking as the presidency of the EU at the Montreal conference of parties, which is starting next week—I hope that I am wrong—it is a seriously retrograde step.

We will never solve the problem through business as usual plus merely improved technology. Welcome and useful though that new technology may be, we will do so only if we remove the causes of climate change: the burning of fossil fuels. To those such as the Prime Minister who seem to fear that that will inhibit economic growth—there has been a good deal of discussion about that in this debate—I say that helping developing countries to do that via the clean-development mechanism, which was specifically put into the Kyoto protocol, will not dumb down economic growth. It will increase the opening up of vast new international markets for climate change mitigation and adaptation.

That worrying shift in strategy—there have been some confusing signals, so I am not absolutely clear about the policy—is now beginning to seep into other more specific areas of policy. Over the summer, the national allocation plan targets that set out the carbon dioxide limits that are allowed for each industrial sector were increased by the Government, in one case above the levels already agreed by the EU Commission, as a result, of course, of industrial lobbying. I believe that I am right in saying that we are still intending to take the Commission to court in order to force it to accept that 3 per cent. increase. I hope that I am wrong, but if I am not, we should think about that again.

The building of 250,000 new homes—this point has been made and I very much agree with it—in the south-east of England offers a great opportunity to ratchet up the low energy-efficiency standards in housing, but as far as I can see, so far it has not been taken up.

The fastest rising cause of greenhouse gas emissions is of course transport, yet too little has been done to replace the fuel duty escalator, which was so abruptly dropped in the face of the lorry drivers' blockade of oil refineries in 2000. I know that some things have been done, but certainly not enough.

Air travel, which may soon become the single biggest generator of greenhouse gases, is—let us be honest—being strongly promoted by the DTI. In addition, the Government heavily subsidise the airline industry—all Governments have done so—so that real-terms fares are falling year on year. The Government impose no tax on aviation fuel, which is a huge discrepancy when compared with the undoubtedly high tax on petrol for cars. They are now proposing a huge expansion of airports and a 300 to 500 per cent. increase in air travel in the next 30 years. All I can say is, fine, I know people want to do that, but I should like to be told how that is compatible with achieving a 60 per cent. reduction in greenhouse gas emissions by 2050. Now we are being told that the only way in which we can reach our Kyoto targets—

Mr. Boris Johnson: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: I will, although I hope that it will be a serious intervention compared with the speech that the hon. Gentleman has just made.

Mr. Johnson: I take it that the right hon. Gentleman does not therefore agree that planning permission should be revoked in the case of solar panels. Is he saying that that is a frivolous suggestion? On the point of air travel, I have had the pleasure of meeting him several times at airports—at Cagliari most recently. Is he seriously suggesting that people should give up their pleasure of holiday travel?

Mr. Meacher: No one is saying that. No one is suggesting that people should give up their car or air travel. I am simply saying that the rate of expansion is incompatible with the requirements that scientists say we must meet if we are to achieve the targets to reduce climate change. We must find a way of reconciling what people want with what is absolutely necessary to stop climate change. I cannot give the answer today, but that is exactly what we need to examine.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): One way in which we could meet those targets is through the increased use of biofuels. Allscott, the British Sugar factory in my constituency, certainly wants to produce sugar beet for biofuels. Does the right hon. Gentleman think that we need more discussion of biofuels and greater demand for them?

Mr. Meacher: The Government are looking seriously at the question of biofuels. Fuels containing 5.75 per cent. of biofuels are helpful to the workings of engines and are good for the environment, so I welcome the proposal.

We have been told that the only way in which we can reach our Kyoto targets is through the renewal of civil nuclear power. Whatever the opinion of Sir David King, the chief scientific adviser, that is patently untrue. Our target is a reduction, as the Minister rightly said, of 12.5 per cent. by 2010. Even with recent slippages, largely because of the shift from gas back to coal, we are still on track to achieve at least a 14 per cent. reduction. However, we are not doing considerably better, as many of us would like, because of the reasons that I have spelled out and, importantly, because we have made glacial progress in promoting renewables. The Minister is nodding, and I am sure that he agrees with me.

We fall well short of the 10 per cent. target for 2010. On current trends, we will fall well short of the 10,000 MW target for combined heat and power by 2010, and we have not made any commitment to the EU goal of 20 per cent. renewables by 2020. It has even been proposed—I hope that the Minister will say that this is wrong—that the funding support for the burgeoning solar industry should be largely withdrawn. The Prime Minister appears to be gearing up to renege on the energy White Paper of February 2003, which was produced by his own Government and proposed no new nuclear build and a major switch to renewables. He is doing so despite the enormous downsides of nuclear, which is more expensive than wind power, coal and gas and which, over the past 50 years, has accumulated taxpayer liabilities of no less than £56 billion according to the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority. It generates colossal amounts of waste—10,000 tonnes at present, and 0.5 million tonnes according to the Department of Trade and Industry at the end of the century—which Governments have tried, genuinely but fruitlessly, to dispose of. Nuclear plants create a major terrorist risk. They are surrounded in every case, studies show, by cancer and leukaemia clusters. The risk, however small—I am sure that it is very small—of a catastrophic nuclear accident can never be ruled out entirely.

I am not seeking to knock nuclear, but simply wish to make the point that we do not need it. As an offshore island, we have enormous wind power capacity which we have not tapped. Experts, however, have calculated that it is sufficient to provide our entire electricity requirement four to six times over. We need to be much more determined in our pursuit of carbon reduction policies across the piece, and I shall end by suggesting a few.

We should demand—I am sure this is what we want to do—that air travel be brought within the Kyoto protocol, from which it was excluded under American pressure in 1997. We should extend UK participation in the EU emissions trading scheme. It would certainly seem, from the leak of the Government's climate change review, which I have seen, that they are minded to do that, which is good. We should tighten building standards significantly in new build in order to achieve a major boost in energy efficiency, and we should—I do not know why we have not done this—reintroduce the excellent idea of standard assessment procedure ratings for all home sales.

We should introduce innovative proposals to give people incentives for carbon reductions in transport. For example, there is the idea of a fee-bate, which entails giving people a rebate of, for example, £3,000 or £5,000 if they buy a car below, say, 1200 cc. The rebate would be paid for by a fee or charge of the same amount on the sale price if people buy a large gas guzzler. I shall stick my neck out as others have done in the debate, including my hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Rothwell (Colin Challen), who has honourably pursued the issue. To sensitise people to the way their activities may generate greenhouse gas emissions, we should consider the gradual introduction of domestic trading quotas. Of course—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman has had his time.

9.16 pm

Mr. Nick Hurd (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to follow the right hon. Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher), whose credibility and sincerity in the matter are well known.

The Government amendment asks us to congratulate them on the leadership that they have shown on climate change. It is ironic that in the same amendment they also ask us to welcome the publication of a climate change programme review, which was set up in acknowledgement of the probability of failure—specifically, the failure to hit the 2010 carbon dioxide reduction target that is at the heart of that claim to effective leadership. The logic is tortuous. The more honest truth is that the global challenge of climate change faces a vacuum of credible leadership, not least with the imminent departure of the Prime Minister, at the very point when we reach a critical crossroad in the run-up to 2012 and the expiry of the Kyoto treaty.

The issue remains riddled with uncertainties, both in terms of risk and the cost/benefits of alternative approaches to managing that risk. It is clear that we are living a dangerous experiment with current levels of carbon concentration in our atmosphere. We are at 381 parts per million and growing, according to Sir David King, at 2 parts per million per annum. We do not know what a safe level is. The working scientific assumption is 550 parts per million, which is thought to be compatible with an increase of 2° this century. Even if we could stabilise concentrations at 550 parts per million—and it remains a huge "if"—we face, in the words of Sir David King, very severe impacts around the world, leaving aside the impact on biodiversity.

The scale and pace of these impacts are uncertain, but the message from the scientific community is that the risks are rising, not falling. The political response to the challenge to date has been the pursuit of international treaties to impose a top-down interventionist centralising solution. We should be honest and recognise that that has failed. Fifteen years of political effort went into producing the Rio agreement and the Kyoto treaty. They are milestones of a sort, but on a journey that has not taken us very far in controlling emissions or incentivising the technology breakthroughs that offer our best chance. They represent a vessel holed below the waterline by the absence of the big polluters—the USA and the emerging giants.

In the absence of a lead from the superpower, Britain—Margaret Thatcher and Tony Blair—has tried to take a lead but has found the going tough. The Prime Minister acknowledges that he is rethinking his international strategy. Although he inherited a healthy platform for showing Britain as a role model for how to cut emissions without sacrificing growth, emissions have risen since 1997. It seems that everything, including climate change policy and energy policy, is up for review again, and the non-governmental organisations are lining up to express their disappointment and frustration.

[Mr. Nick Hurd]

Where do we go from here? First, we must take stock of the priorities. As has been pointed out in numerous interventions from the Opposition Benches, the most urgent priority must be to minimise the carbon intensity of industrial development in China, India and Brazil. If we do not, we will find ourselves locked quickly into an even higher level of carbon concentrations. The solution, as the Prime Minister knows, lies in technology. That technology is increasingly available, whether it be micro-generation, solar, wind or new generation nuclear power, clean coal or hybrid cars, but it is relatively expensive.

Colin Challen: The hon. Gentleman and I both serve on the Environmental Audit Committee. Sir David King told us last week that the target for reductions by 2050 is closer to 80 per cent. than 60 per cent., which shows us that the task is urgent. Does he agree that the necessary technologies must be brought on stream now and not in 10 or 15 years' time?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman has anticipated my second point, which is key: how can we accelerate the development and deployment of those technologies to make them more affordable? Why should we expect countries such as China to pay a premium for their basic infrastructure as they develop? The response of Governments must surely focus on this question: what can we do to accelerate the deployment, development and sharing of technology? That makes not only environmental sense, but commercial sense, because it is in our interests to grow those markets, which is a point that is not lost on the French. I did not hear anything in the Minister's remarks to suggest that the Government are any clearer on how to accelerate and share the technology.

As has been said, a further priority must be to establish a framework for an agreement post-2012, which is do-able and would bind the big polluters into a common objective. As most people know, the challenge lies in reconciling the objectives of countries at different stages of development, and there is no shortage of ideas on the table—for example, the ideas set out by the international climate change taskforce make good reading.

The Government are going to Montreal in two weeks' time to open negotiations, but this House knows nothing of what is in their mind. It would be so much more effective if Ministers went to that conference having established a consensus. At the moment, the situation is a complete mystery, possibly even to them.

My third point does not come up often enough in these debates. An urgent priority for Governments must be to support a sustained effort to reduce scientific uncertainty on the impacts and correlations between emissions growth and temperature increase. We desperately need the debate to be framed by more certainty, and an urgent role for Governments is to support that scientific process.

The fourth priority, which has been raised throughout the debate, is the urgent need to engage consumers and businesses, who will be agents of sustainable change. Arguably, that is the greatest political failure of the past 15 years. The key argument to win is that it is in the world interest to reduce the carbon intensity of our development. The chance of a stable climate with less pollution is not the only prize. Reduced dependence on the major producers of fossil fuels should mean greater energy security, which is a big issue for the United States and a growing issue for Britain. The law of supply and demand means that fossil fuels will become more expensive, and it is therefore in our economic interest to develop a cost-effective alternative.

Last but by no means least, the development of low-carbon technology will create a new global market that can help to drive more sustainable economic growth. The way forward surely lies in focusing minds on that win-win analysis, because the politics then becomes easy. At the famous summit in New York, which the Prime Minister attended, President Clinton discussed a clean energy future:

> "If people really thought it was the next biggest way to create a new generation of jobs in every continent in the world, nobody would be fighting about the deadlines; they would be fighting to get there ahead of the next person."

I believe that he was right.

What is Britain's role? We have an opportunity to show the world that it is possible to reduce carbon emissions without sacrificing growth, but we must put our house in order because emissions have risen since 1997, and we are undermining the argument. When one engages with non-governmental organisations or submissions to Committees, it is clear that we could do so much more. Sonning common cries out for solar panels.

Mr. Boris Johnson: I cannot think of anything more serious or more practical that this House could do tonight to alleviate the problems of climate change than to get rid of the ludicrous burden of the £135 charge, in addition to the cost of architectural drawings, that falls upon people who want to install solar panels.

Mr. Hurd: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention; I could not agree more. I hope that the Minister responds on behalf of Sonning Common.

There is much more room for the Government to send clearer market signals to consumers, businesses and investors about policy direction in terms of what kind of energy mix we want and the desire to grow markets for cleaner cars and cleaner fuels. They should set a much better example in terms of the standards that we expect from manufacturers of cars, electrical appliances and new homes. The Environmental Audit Committee produced a report that showed the Government's deficiencies in setting standards for public procurement. They are spending £500 billion of our money—a serious amount.

The Government should be doing more to develop market instruments that will get them out of the business of picking winners. In the European Union emissions trading scheme, which was very diluted and weakened in its first phase, lies the key opportunity to set a real price for carbon that will change the framework of this debate.

All this is in our national interest and in the global interest. It is do-able with political will, and it would be helped by political consensus. I am therefore very disappointed by the Minister's reaction to our motion. The major breakthrough required is the inclusion of the United States of America and the giants, and the emergence of an American President who sees it as being in the interest of the United States to lead this debate, not follow it.

9.26 pm

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): I join other Members who have expressed a preference for the House not to divide on these issues tonight. I feel that it would put us all in a strange position if we were asked to choose between voting for the anodyne or the out-to-lunch. It is difficult to choose between those who advocate some good things or other good things without specifying what they are. We have to move this debate, which is the most important of our lives, on to a whole series of practicalities about how we not only address the challenges of climate change, but learn to live differently and better as a result of meeting them.

I will resist the temptation to go into the details of my new house, which I have turned from a derelict building into a place where we will be able to live and where we will ultimately generate 50 per cent. more energy than the house consumes. I am happy to talk later to the hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) about how to do that. From my micro-experiences, I have learned a whole series of things about the macro issues that we have to address as a society.

Every stage of this issue is riddled with contradictions. For me, not the least of those is that, as a socialist, I have to acknowledge that perhaps the Prince of Wales has a greater understanding of how to meet the challenges of climate change than does this Parliament. In the next decade, we will face four interconnected crises relating to climate change—crises of food security, water management, energy security and insurability. To emphasise the scale of the latter crisis, it has been calculated that this summer's girls' night out between the hurricanes of Wilma, Rita and Katrina has resulted in higher insurable damage than America has ever known. There has been £56.8 billion-worth of insurable damage as a result of this year's catastrophes in the US.

The cost of that will be borne not only in the US but virtually everywhere. We will have our own experiences of that. When the flash floods hit Boscastle, Carlisle, the Vale of York, Oxford or the Medway towns, they are not going to make the same distinctions between rich and poor. They will sweep everything away and we will find ourselves in a society facing a different divide—that between the unemployable and the uninsurable. When that happens, the Government will be faced with very angry populations asking how we provide security in their lives. We do not have much time to change the way in which we think about meeting those challenges.

We must move on from old to new agendas. In other parts of the world, especially in other parts of Europe, there is a different agenda for markets that will provide sustainable water use and sustainable agricultural systems. However, those markets are post-globalisation in their presumptions. Their frameworks of production and distribution are regionalised. They reduce product miles, urban congestion, the distance of accountability between the producer and the consumer, and they set up fresh lines of sustainable, local accountability as well as sustainable, localised production.

The same will be true of energy. Some hon. Members have criticised the Government's chief scientist, Sir David King, for being a Government spin merchant, but it is much more appropriate to criticise him for trying to sell lousy science. I want to tackle that head on. Those who try to pretend that the only solution to a secure energy future is to go backwards with a new generation of nuclear power will be proved in the next five years to be conducting a Maginot line debate between sad old men trying to work out how to win the last war.

An American environmental entrepreneur called Amory B. Lovins has tried to set out how we construct different markets around sustainability. He began by doing that in his Rocky Mountains institute, where he reduced the energy requirements to less than the cost of one 100W light bulb. It uses existing technologies to minimise waste and to generate and recycle heat that we are already using. He points out that if one takes the energy inputs from a power station, for every 100 inputs into the energy system, the end user has access to less than 10 per cent. One can stand in front of any power station in this country and see 60 per cent. of energy inputs going up in steam into the atmosphere. That is a colossal waste. We could run the country on the energy that we throw away. That is the biggest challenge but our mentality stands in the way of change.

I found that in my house I could get into net metering. I can have a system that puts more energy back into the grid than I take out of it, but I get paid a pittance in the process. We can change that if we get out of a rigged energy market that tells the energy system, "You have a one price in and a one price out process."

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): I have concerns about my hon. Friend's suggestion that David King advocates bad science. Perhaps a more realistic proposition is that he has no confidence that the necessary investment will go into ensuring that our energy consumption is reduced by investment in energy conservation and the sort of measures that he advocates. Perhaps that is why he advocates nuclear power.

Alan Simpson: I understand that point but I will not budge from my initial contention, which is that nuclear power was never economic. We have not worked out who should pay the £56 billion to £80 billion of clean-up costs from the last generation of nuclear power before we work out who will pick up the costs of another generation of nuclear energy.

Lynne Jones: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that the Government appear prepared to advocate investment in nuclear technology but not in energy conservation. David King probably finds himself having to deal with that.

Alan Simpson: I understand that point, but let me draw the House's attention to a completely different approach. If we step outside this country, we see that 50 per cent. of Denmark's energy is generated by local energy systems; in the Netherlands, 60 per cent. is generated by decentralised energy systems. When motorways are built in the Netherlands, the hot-road sub-surface of the motorway is harnessed to provide energy and heating for houses. Every kilometre of road that is built provides the energy and heating for 100 houses. In this country, we are not even beginning to look at local energy networks, although they are infinitely more efficient than our national energy system, which leaks like a sieve.

[Alan Simpson]

We need to make that shift in thinking, to catch up with what is going on in other countries and to follow the lead being taken by some of our major cities. I have said before in the House that the Mayor of London has committed the capital city of this country, which currently consumes more energy than the whole of Portugal, to being energy self-sufficient within a decade. The international agreement that he is trying to broker with other major cities is that 20 of the world's biggest cities will all be energy self-sufficient using sustainable and renewable resources by 2020. That draws on the thinking of how to do things differently, which is already practised in other parts of the world.

We need a shift in market rules, a shift to thinking about decentralised energy and a shift in the requirements that we have for our buildings. In Berlin today, 80 per cent. of new buildings are required to generate their own energy. We make no such requirements of own built environment. Some of the architects and property developers here should be in prison for the buildings they are throwing up. Those buildings are the gas guzzlers of the built environment, yet they pass for modern buildings. They are a massive source of carbon consumption and they are profligate in the way in which they are constructed.

Mark Pritchard: We have heard about the Government taking international leadership. Do they not also need to take domestic leadership? Is not the public sector, across the parties, the worst user of energy and the poorest performer from an energy efficiency point of view?

Alan Simpson: I would be happy for the Government to set targets for their own Departments, but Members should also set targets for their own lives. We are dead good at blaming other people for failing to take a lead, but do we take that lead ourselves? Do we heck as like! We are all on the line on this. We need to create new approaches to ethical and sustainable markets in relation to the way we live, treading lightly on the environment of the future. We need to create markets in conservation rather than consumption, markets that reward what we put back rather than what we take out. If we look at what is happening in the world outside this House, we can see a new consensus forming in civil society around the principles of sustainability. The problem is that the House is not part of that consensus.

9.37 pm

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): Many interesting comments have been made during this debate, which confirm that we have all come to see climate change as a real and dangerous threat. The debate started with my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), and I take my hat off to him for his efforts to achieve consensus. I am not a particularly good consensus person, which is why a lot of my speeches are made in here. My right hon. Friend, however, could not have done more or gone further to encourage the consensus that he so rightly believes in. I pay tribute to the way in which he explained the purpose of this debate, and the fact that the Prime Minister's mixed messages mean that we need to find out from the Government where we are going to get to. I also pay tribute to the way in which he explained the difficulty involved in striking a balance between economic growth and reducing carbon emissions, and between adopting UK-centric or global policies. His efforts were humbling to me; even when he talked about Liberal Democrat campaigning techniques, he was exceptionally generous. He concluded with a particularly clear understanding of what consensus would enable, and the various layers and targets that it involved.

I felt, however, that the Minister was less than charitable—uncharacteristically for him. He listed the Government's achievements, although he seemed to recognise the growing concern about climate change throughout the House following the numerous interventions. He made six points about Conservative policy. He said that he needed to know where we stood on wind energy, scrapping the climate change levy and fuel protestors. He also mentioned the Prime Minister's comments. He ended by saying that he had left the door open.

At that point, the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) explained consensus in what I considered to be a helpful and constructive manner, until he spoke of "forking off". I forgave him for that immediately, because I realised that he was trying to say that while we would not agree on every part of the way forward, we did agree that a way forward was essential.

My hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) talked about photovoltaic roofs and planning permission. He made the immortal comment that "the Minister for whatever it is" should acknowledge the importance of the subject. I submit that there could be no finer advocate of solar panels on behalf of his constituent. My hon. Friend had a single, practical policy, he made his case vociferously and eloquently, and I am sure that his constituent will sing his praises from her rooftop in years to come.

The right hon. Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher) delivered all the parts of my speech that I have now abandoned. He made an important and, perhaps, a rather harsh attack on the Government, citing the lack of speed and progress on this vital issue. His was an interesting and valuable speech. He said that we did not seem to be doing enough of the right things, which is obviously a worry for all of us.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd) also spoke of real worries about progress on climate change. He said, perhaps a little unfairly, that Rio and Kyoto had failed, but went on to talk about why policies were up for review and about the disappointment felt by non-governmental organisations. I agreed with what he said about carbon emissions from China, India and Brazil. I also agreed when he said that the solution was technological. He put his case very eloquently, especially when describing Britain as a role model for the rest of the world, and suggesting that economic growth along with carbon reduction was the most important progress that we had achieved. He rightly pointed out that the duty of the House was constructing market frameworks rather than picking winners. He made an excellent speech.

Last time we debated this subject, the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) described himself as a heretic. Like me, he sought no vote on the motion, which I considered helpful. He also spoke of the four apocalyptic crises that would befall us, affecting food security, water security, energy security and insurability. That tied in helpfully with an e-mail that I received today from the Association of British Insurers, which stated:

> "we need to stop putting people, jobs and property in harm's way. A quarter of Environment Agency objections to development consents on flood risk ... are being ignored by planning authorities ... the houses we build now need to withstand the weather of the 2050s and later ... flood defence investment needs to defend existing property".

The ABI believes that there will be a major crisis in insurability. So the heresy of the hon. Member for Nottingham, South has become apocalyptic. I always enjoy listening to his speeches. He also made a number of constructive suggestions tc help us to catch up with the rest of the world.

I think that the scientific evidence on climate change is conclusive. In the past 30 years alone, the average temperature in August has risen by 0.3° C in a decade. The subsequent warming of our planet has caused sea levels to rise by an average of 20 cm in the last century. As we have seen repeatedly and with great loss of life this summer, extreme weather events such as the hurricanes which have tormented the Gulf of Mexico are becoming far more frequent. Our ecosystems are being transformed at an unprecedented pace, and increases in ocean acidity and temperature threaten the world's diverse sea life.

Governments across the world have recognised the problems associated with climate change, and over the past two decades concerted efforts have been made to take action. There have been high-profile discussions at Kyoto and Rio, in which many Conservative Members past and present have been involved. We in the UK, however, cannot afford to be complacent. We should not only do more to save our own environment, but take a lead on the international stage to show countries how changes can be made successfully without slowing economic growth.

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): Is my hon. Friend as convinced as I am that local authorities have a huge role to play? It is all very well looking at the international position, but local authorities and their planning decisions have, as in so much else, a huge role to play. Unfortunately, they are not yet playing it.

Bill Wiggin: I partly agree with my hon. Friend. He will know that when it comes to recycling, the top authorities are Conservative-run. Some authorities are doing their best, but my hon. Friend is right that we could all do more. He will have heard the contributions from Labour Members, particularly on what people can do as individuals. Responsibility starts at home and can be spread through local authorities all the way to the Government and then on internationally. I agree with my hon. Friend on that.

Despite progress made on reducing emissions of nitrous oxide and sulphur hexafluoride, our primary objective must be to reduce carbon dioxide emissions, which are causing the most damage to our environment and may well lead us to miss our Kyoto targets. We obviously hope that that will not happen.

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab) rose—

Bill Wiggin: If the hon. Lady will forgive me, I will not give way, as I want to allow the Minister as much time as possible to answer the points raised in the debate.

It is a shame and surprising to note that the average car emissions from new cars sold in the UK in 2004 were a worrying 31.4 g per kilometre above the EU target of 140 g per kilometre by 2008. Things are clearly not going the way we want. The failure to reach our own targets would serve as a damning indictment of our efforts to tackle climate change. It is essential that we reach and surpass those targets if we are to make a difference to our own environment and set an example to others across the world. How else can we expect other countries to heed our voice on the need to fight climate change? It should be our international duty to lead, not simply to follow.

On this side of the House, we do not doubt the honourable intentions of the Government to act against climate change, but we question the Government's ability to make much difference. Back in 2000, the Prime Minister announced that > "the greatest threat to our environment today is climate change."

In 2004, the Prime Minister remarked:

> "Our effect on the environment, and in particular on climate change, is large and growing."

However well intentioned those words, they mean nothing without action. Procrastination is the adversary of success. On climate change, it is the sworn enemy of our ability to safeguard the environment as the inheritance of future generations. My greatest concern is a doubt whether, despite all the words and promises, the Government's approach to finding real solutions will be felt in years in to come.

We have spoken before about consensus. On this side of the House, it has already been acknowledged that climate change is an issue on which we must all fight together. We want to work across party lines so that effective and agreeable solutions can be found and implemented. That is why I hope that we will not divide tonight.

9.48 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight): The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment stated in his opening speech that climate change was the greatest environmental challenge that we face. There is no longer any significant doubt about the scientific basis for action, and I was pleased to hear the hon. Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin) say the same. It has been recognised internationally, stimulating more action and discussion on the issue this year than ever before.

Impacts are felt all around us, as I can see in my role as the UK Minister responsible for biodiversity. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood

[Jim Knight]

(Mr. Hurd) for mentioning that in passing. Biodiversity is an excellent indicator of the effects of climate change. By the end of the century, climate change and its impacts may be the biggest cause of biodiversity loss and the change in ecosystems service globally. Over the past 50 years, humans have affected ecosystems more rapidly and more extensively than in any comparable period of human history—largely to meet rapidly growing demands for food, fresh water, timber, fibre and fuel. That has resulted in a substantial loss to the diversity of life on earth.

Species such as the polar bear, the mountain gorilla and the river dolphin are all under real threat due to climate change. The loss of these great animals would be a tragedy in its own right, but that loss of biodiversity would also expose the human population to greater threats of disease, and to threats to our livelihoods. I commend to the House a document analysing the effect of climate change on migratory species, published last month by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. It was much discussed at the conference of the parties to the convention on migratory species. Another such conference is taking place this weekend in Kenya.

The Prime Minister has demonstrated—

Mr. Ellwood: Will the Minister give way?

Jim Knight: I will if I am given just a little more time; bear with me.

The Prime Minister has demonstrated his commitment to tackling climate change by placing it at the top of the agenda for our G8 and EU presidencies this year. We are also committed to implementing our ambitious domestic programme. The current review of the UK climate change programme, which will be published at the turn of the year, will set out how we will achieve our targets for 2010, 2012 and 2050 across Government Departments. We have seen that the economic impact of cuts in greenhouse gas emissions need not be prohibitive, so long as Governments introduce sensible policies, combined with a wide range of low-carbon technologies.

I want to reiterate our position, as set out by the Prime Minister and my DEFRA colleagues, for the benefit of my right hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher), among others. We do not believe that the Kyoto protocol is dead, and we do believe that any future international agreement should include binding targets. The Prime Minister said in his article in Saturday's edition of The Independent that > "we need an international framework and emissions targets which take us beyond Kyoto's 2012 commitments . . . I am showing the path we need to follow if we are going to agree internationally binding targets which all can sign up to . . . Too much of the debate over climate change has become polarised between those who advocate compulsory targets and those who advocate technology. For me this is a false choice. The technology is the means by which we will achieve those targets."

His commitment is very clear.

Lynne Jones: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Jim Knight: I will take some interventions once I have made a little more progress.

The UK wants a new global framework for action that goes beyond 2012, and which should include binding targets for developed countries. We do not believe that quantified binding targets should be a condition for the involvement of developing countries. We look forward to next week's conference in Montreal, which we hope will represent the next step in an important process. In the build-up to that conference, we can be proud that under this Government, we are leading Europe on achieving our Kyoto targets, and leading the world in achieving the international consensus that we need in order to take urgent action to manage and reverse climate change.

Several hon. Members rose—

Jim Knight: I shall take interventions from the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) and my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Lynne Jones) only.

Mr. Ellwood: I am very grateful to the Minister for giving way. I grew up not with the backdrop of the second world war or the cold war, but with the huge concern of global warming and climate change. I hope that everybody in this House can look in the mirror and ask themselves with confidence what they are doing individually on this issue. Does the Minister agree, however, that the public are looking at us and asking what we are doing internationally to contain global warming and climate change?

Jim Knight: As I sketched out—I hope that the hon. Gentleman was listening—we are taking a lead through our presidencies of the G8 and the EU. I have no time to take another intervention, but I challenge him on a future occasion to name any country in the world that is doing more on this agenda than we are.

Lynne Jones: I accept what my hon. Friend is saying, but why are the Government reducing expenditure on the replacement for the clear skies programme? Less money is being spent on encouraging individuals to upgrade their domestic energy supplies to incorporate renewables. My point is that there is a feeling that the Government are moving away from encouraging renewables, and putting all their eggs in the basket of nuclear power as a way of reducing CO_2 emissions.

Jim Knight: My hon. Friend will be pleased to know that we are investing in a new Department of Trade and Industry scheme to replace the clear skies programme. [Interruption.] It is a successor scheme, as my hon. Friend the Minister for Climate Change and the Environment says from a sedentary position.

This was a good debate and the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) made points similar to those made by the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin). It makes me wonder why he has changed so rapidly from his position back in March, when he thought that the Tories were toxic when it came to climate change. He rejected their calls then for all-party consensus, but I accept that events have moved on and that the intentions behind the policy are honourable.

My hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Rothwell (Colin Challen) chairs the all-party group and is very knowledgeable on these matters. Like my hon.

Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson), he asked that there should be no Division this evening. I shall repeat that call for the Opposition to withdraw their motion, in the interests of cross-party consensus.

My hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Rothwell also mentioned the "Stop Climate Chaos" campaign, which is a very useful initiative.

Several hon. Members rose—

Jim Knight: I will not take any more interventions. The hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) made a memorable contribution. The whole nation is looking forward to his devoting all his time to politics and making similar practical policy proposals from the Opposition Front Bench. I suggest that he should also talk to his local planning authority—I do not know whether it is Conservative—about planning charges and the process through which people have to go to get planning permissions.

Mr. Boris Johnson: Will the Minister give way?

Jim Knight: I am sorry, but I am not taking any more interventions. My hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Nia Griffith) intervened on the hon. Member for Henley to remind the House that it was Conservative Members who talked out the Management of Energy in Buildings Bill when it was debated here.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West and Royton was generous in his praise of the good record of the Government, especially in the days when he was in office. He was slightly less generous about their record since, and I cannot go through all the points that he made. However, I can say that the standards covering Government-financed buildings will be raised in April, when a new code of practice will be introduced. I hope that that will satisfy some of my right hon. Friend's concerns in that respect.

The UK has made taking forward the inclusion of aviation in the EU emissions trading scheme a priority for our presidency of the EU. We therefore welcome the publication of the European Commission's communication on the matter, which sets out a clear framework that we anticipate will be taken forward next year. In addition, I was pleased that my right hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West and Royton responded to an intervention by mentioning the transport fuel obligation, which will encourage the use of biofuels.

The hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood made an interesting and thoughtful contribution, which I enjoyed without necessarily agreeing with everything that he said. He spoke of the need to reduce scientific uncertainty, and I do agree about that. That is why, in anticipation of our EU presidency, we organised in February a conference at the Hadley centre in Bracknell. The aim was to bring the science together, and we need to continue that good work.

My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South made another thoughtful contribution, in which he admitted to being a fan of the Prince of Wales' approach to climate change. That was good news for me, and I was interested to hear it. He also talked about nuclear power, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West and Royton had earlier. That difficult and controversial matter will be addressed in this Parliament, but no decisions have been made as yet.

I fear that the idea of an all-party consensus is no more than a fig leaf from the Opposition. On the face of it, the motion is tempting: there is all-party consensus that climate change is a serious global problem that we should all work together to solve. However, I fear that, beneath the all-party consensus that the right hon. Member for West Dorset proposes, the Opposition have nothing left in terms of policy.

Where is the Opposition policy around which consensus could be built? The Conservatives opposed the climate change levy, and they oppose wind-power projects at every turn. Every time there is a fuel protest, they make noises to oppose the level of fuel duty. That is why the hon. Member for Lewes called them the toxic Tories back in March.

I therefore urge the Opposition to withdraw the motion and to come back when Tory Front Bench Members are able to present a credible position across all shadow Departments. Failing that, the House should vote down the motion and in that way show its support for the Government's global leadership on this matter, for our action nationally, and for our desire to do better.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

The House divided: Ayes 233, Noes 296.

Division No. 105] [9.59 pm

AYES

Afriyie, Adam
Ainsworth, Mr. Peter
Alexander, Danny
Amess, Mr. David
Arbuthnot, rh Mr. James
Atkinson, Mr. Peter
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Baker, Norman
Baldry, Tony
Barker, Gregory
Baron, Mr. John
Barrett, John
Beith, rh Mr. Alan
Bercow, John
Beresford, Sir Paul
Binley, Mr. Brian
Blunt, Mr. Crispin
Bone, Mr. Peter
Boswell, Mr. Tim
Bottomley, Peter
Brady, Mr. Graham
Brazier, Mr. Julian
Breed, Mr. Colin
Brokenshire, James
Brooke, Annette
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Browning, Angela
Bruce, Malcolm
Burns, Mr. Simon
Burrowes, Mr. David
Burstow, Mr. Paul
Burt, Alistair
Burt, Lorely
Cable, Dr. Vincent
Campbell, Mr. Gregory
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Clappison, Mr. James
Clark, Greg
Clarke, rh Mr. Kenneth
Clegg, Mr. Nick
Clifton-Brown, Mr. Geoffrey
Conway, Derek
Cox, Mr. Geoffrey
Crabb, Mr. Stephen
Davey, Mr. Edward
Davies, David T.C. (Monmouth)
Davies, Philip
Djanogly, Mr. Jonathan
Dodds, Mr. Nigel
Dorrell, rh Mr. Stephen
Dorries, Mrs. Nadine
Duddridge, James
Duncan Smith, rh Mr. Iain
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Ellwood, Mr. Tobias
Evans, Mr. Nigel
Fabricant, Michael

Fallon, Mr. Michael
Farron, Tim
Featherstone, Lynne
Field, Mr. Mark
Foster, Mr. Don
Francois, Mr. Mark
Fraser, Mr. Christopher
Gale, Mr. Roger
Garnier, Mr. Edward
Gauke, Mr. David
George, Andrew
Gidley, Sandra
Gillan, Mrs. Cheryl
Goldsworthy, Julia
Goodman, Mr. Paul
Goodwill, Mr. Robert
Gove, Michael
Gray, Mr. James
Green, Damian
Greening, Justine
Greenway, Mr. John
Gummer, rh Mr. John
Hague, rh Mr. William
Hammond, Mr. Philip
Hands, Mr. Greg
Harper, Mr. Mark
Harris, Dr. Evan
Harvey, Nick
Hayes, Mr. John
Heald, Mr. Oliver
Heath, Mr. David
Heathcoat-Amory, rh Mr. David
Hemming, John
Herbert, Nick
Hermon, Lady
Hoban, Mr. Mark
Hogg, rh Mr. Douglas
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Holloway, Mr. Adam
Horam, Mr. John
Horwood, Martin
Hosie, Stewart
Howard, rh Mr. Michael
Howarth, David
Howarth, Mr. Gerald
Huhne, Chris
Hunt, Mr. Jeremy
Hunter, Mark
Hurd, Mr. Nick
Jack, rh Mr. Michael
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Johnson, Mr. Boris
Jones, Mr. David
Kawczynski, Daniel
Keetch, Mr. Paul
Key, Robert
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Kramer, Susan
Lait, Mrs. Jacqui
Laws, Mr. David
Leech, Mr. John
Leigh, Mr. Edward
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Lewis, Dr. Julian
Liddell-Grainger, Mr. Ian
Lidington, Mr. David
Lilley, rh Mr. Peter
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Mackay, rh Mr. Andrew
Maclean, rh David
MacNeil, Mr. Angus
Main, Anne
Malins, Mr. Humfrey

Maples, Mr. John
Maude, rh Mr. Francis
May, rh Mrs. Theresa
McCrea, Dr. William
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Milton, Anne
Mitchell, Mr. Andrew
Moore, Mr. Michael
Moss, Mr. Malcolm
Mulholland, Greg
Mundell, David
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Newmark, Mr. Brooks
Osborne, Mr. George
Ottaway, Richard
Paice, Mr. James
Paisley, rh Rev. Ian
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Penning, Mike
Penrose, John
Pickles, Mr. Eric
Price, Adam
Prisk, Mr. Mark
Pritchard, Mark
Pugh, Dr. John
Randall, Mr. John
Redwood, rh Mr. John
Reid, Mr. Alan
Rifkind, rh Sir Malcolm
Robathan, Mr. Andrew
Robertson, Angus
Robertson, Hugh
Robertson, Mr. Laurence
Robinson, Mrs. Iris
Robinson, Mr. Peter
Rogerson, Mr. Dan
Rowen, Paul
Ruffley, Mr. David
Russell, Bob
Salmond, Mr. Alex
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Scott, Mr. Lee
Selous, Andrew
Shapps, Grant
Shepherd, Mr. Richard
Simmonds, Mark
Simpson, David
Smith, Sir Robert
Spelman, Mrs. Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spink, Bob
Spring, Mr. Richard
Stanley, rh Sir John
Streeter, Mr. Gary
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Swinson, Jo
Syms, Mr. Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Matthew
Taylor, Dr. Richard
Teather, Sarah
Thurso, John
Tredinnick, David
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Viggers, Peter
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Walker, Mr. Charles
Wallace, Mr. Ben

Walter, Mr. Robert
Waterson, Mr. Nigel
Watkinson, Angela
Webb, Steve
Weir, Mr. Mike
Widdecombe, rh Miss Ann
Wiggin, Bill
Willetts, Mr. David
Williams, Hywel
Williams, Mr. Roger
Williams, Stephen
Willis, Mr. Phil

Willott, Jenny
Wilshire, Mr. David
Wilson, Mr. Rob
Wilson, Sammy
Winterton, Ann
Winterton, Sir Nicholas
Wishart, Pete
Wright, Jeremy
Young, rh Sir George

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Henry Bellingham and
Mr. David Evennett

NOES

Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Allen, Mr. Graham
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Austin, John
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Baird, Vera
Balls, Ed
Banks, Gordon
Barlow, Ms Celia
Barron, rh Mr. Kevin
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Begg, Miss Anne
Benton, Mr. Joe
Berry, Roger
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Borrow, Mr. David S.
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Browne, rh Mr. Des
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnham, Andy
Byers, rh Mr. Stephen
Byrne, Mr. Liam
Caborn, rh Mr. Richard
Cairns, David
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Caton, Mr. Martin
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Chaytor, Mr. David
Clapham, Mr. Michael
Clark, Ms Katy
Clarke, rh Mr. Tom
Clelland, Mr. David
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coaker, Mr. Vernon
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank
Cooper, Rosie
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cousins, Jim
Crausby, Mr. David
Creagh, Mary
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tor[illegible]

Curtis-Thomas, Mrs. Claire
David, Mr. Wayne
Davidson, Mr. Ian
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Denham, rh Mr. John
Devine, Mr. Jim
Dhanda, Mr. Parmjit
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, rh Frank
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drew, Mr. David
Dunwoody, Mrs. Gwyneth
Durkan, Mark
Eagle, Angela
Eagle, Maria
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Ennis, Jeff
Etherington, Bill
Farrelly, Paul
Field, rh Mr. Frank
Fisher, Mark
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Follett, Barbara
Foster, Mr. Michael (Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye)
Gapes, Mike
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Gilroy, Linda
Godsiff, Mr. Roger
Goggins, Paul
Goodman, Helen
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Grogan, Mr. John
Gwynne, Andrew
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hall, Patrick
Hamilton, Mr. David
Hamilton, Mr. Fabian
Hanson, Mr. David
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harris, Mr. Tom
Havard, Mr. Dai
Healey, John
Henderson, Mr. Doug
Hendrick, Mr. Mark
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Heppell, Mr. John
Hesford, Stephen
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg

Hodge, rh Margaret
Hodgson, Mrs. Sharon
Hoey, Kate
Hood, Mr. Jimmy
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hughes, rh Beverley
Humble, Mrs. Joan
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Mr. Eric
Ingram, rh Mr. Adam
Irranca-Davies, Huw
Jackson, Glenda
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Jenkins, Mr. Brian
Johnson, rh Alan
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Lynne
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Kennedy, rh Jane
Khabra, Mr. Piara S.
Khan, Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Kilfoyle, Mr. Peter
Knight, Jim
Kumar, Dr. Ashok
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lammy, Mr. David
Laxton, Mr. Bob
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
MacDougall, Mr. John
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahmood, Mr. Khalid
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall-Andrews, Mr. Robert
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCafferty, Chris
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, Dr. Alasdair
McDonnell, John
McFadden, Mr. Pat
McFall, rh Mr. John
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
Meacher, rh Mr. Michael
Meale, Mr. Alan
Merron, Gillian
Milburn, rh Mr. Alan
Miliband, Edward
Moffat, Anne
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Moran, Margaret
Morden, Jessica
Morgan, Julie
Morley, Mr. Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, Mr. George
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Munn, Meg
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Olner, Mr. Bill
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Palmer, Dr. Nick
Pearson, Ian
Pope, Mr. Greg
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Prescott, rh Mr. John
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Purnell, James
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Reid, rh John
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robertson, John
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Rooney, Mr. Terry
Roy, Mr. Frank
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Christine
Ryan, Joan
Salter, Martin
Seabeck, Alison
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Sheridan, Jim
Short, rh Clare
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Simpson, Alan
Singh, Mr. Marsha
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, Ms Angela C. (Sheffield, Hillsborough)
Smith, Angela E. (Basildon)
Smith, rh Jacqui
Smith, John
Snelgrove, Anne
Soulsby, Sir Peter
Southworth, Helen
Speller, rh Mr. John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Stringer, Graham
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Tami, Mark
Taylor, Ms Dari
Taylor, David
Thornberry, Emily
Timms, Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mr. Mark
Touhig, Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Turner, Mr. Neil
Twigg, Derek
Ussher, Kitty
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Ward, Claire
Wareing, Mr. Robert N.
Watson, Mr. Tom
Watts, Mr. Dave
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, rh Mr. Alan
Williams, Mrs. Betty
Winnick, Mr. David
Winterton, Ms Rosie
Wood, Mike
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Noes:
Kevin Brennan and
Mr. Ian Cawsey

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the leadership shown by the UK Government internationally on climate change, and the important progress made at the July Summit and at the recent meeting of the Dialogue on Climate Energy, Clean Energy and Sustainable Development; further welcomes the recent announcement of the Renewable Transport Fuels Obligation and looks forward to the publication of the climate change programme review; recognises the importance of building greater understanding and support among all sectors of society for action on climate change; and further welcomes new ideas and contributions from all quarters that help to reduce carbon emissions.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With the leave of the House, I shall put together motions 3 and 4.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

PENSIONS

That the draft Financial Assistance Scheme (Appeals) Regulations 2005, which were laid before this House on 26th October, be approved.

That the draft Financial Assistance Scheme (Modifications and Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations 2005, which were laid before this House on 26th October, be approved.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 119(9) (European Standing Committees),

DECLARATION ON EU DEVELOPMENT POLICY

That this House takes note of European Union Document No. 11413/05, Commission Communication: 'Draft Joint Declaration by the Council, the European Parliament and the Commission on the European Union Development Policy'; and supports the Government's view that poverty eradication must remain the overarching objective and that the document clarifies the role and added value of the European Community.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

Question agreed to.

Travellers (Middlewich)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

10.15 pm

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): The issue of Gypsies and Travellers and their need for accommodation is highly topical, and I am grateful to the House for the opportunity to raise the matter on the Floor of the House and to seek some much-needed clarification from the Government. There are two matters that concern Congleton borough council: first, demand for additional caravan sites for Gypsies in terms of their location and size; and, secondly, the stationing of caravans belonging to Gypsies and Travellers within the curtilages of the residential properties that they have purchased. At the moment, the second issue appears to be located only in one part of the borough—Middlewich.

Middlewich has approximately 30 houses owned by Gypsy families with multiple caravans compacted in their garden areas. The adopted Congleton borough local plan contains policies that relate to Gypsy caravan sites, and there are a number of criteria against which planning applications will be judged. A number of permissions have been granted for small sites, but recently there have been incidences of illegal encampments, notably at Cranage. The latter would provide enough material for another debate, but I want to focus this evening on the second issue that appears to be peculiar to Middlewich, which historically has had a number of Gypsies among its population.

An increasing number of Middlewich residents have raised concerns about various domestic operations and activities undertaken by Gypsy families more recently settled in the town. Specifically, residents query whether those families are in breach of planning legislation by hard surfacing the whole or a major part of their gardens; by installing elaborate decorative railings; by keeping and using one or more caravans in their gardens; and by installing shower and lavatory blocks and electricity points in the gardens to facilitate living in the caravans.

For the past two years, the CW10 residents action group has been trying to establish why our local authority allows mini-caravan sites in the cartilage of dwelling houses without the need for planning permission, licence conditions such as those for health and safety, or enforcement, which are the normal requirement for any land where the intensification of use has occurred—that is, where a material change of use has taken place.

The council has considered the issues and two barristers, each specialising in Gypsy-related planning law, have been consulted. Their advice is that caravans do not need planning permission if they are ancillary or incidental to the use of a dwelling house. What is incidental varies according to the particular facts of each case, and to ascertain those facts, the proper approach is to investigate and judge each case on its merits, taking into account, first, the degree to which each caravan is functionally connected with and subordinate to the use of the dwelling house. For example, to what extent do those who sleep in the caravans use facilities in the house? Do the caravans provide independent living accommodation or are their occupants dependent on facilities in the house, too?

Secondly, the relative scale of accommodation available in both the dwelling house and the caravan must be taken into account. For example, caravans providing sleeping accommodation for a small overflow of family members may well have a subordinate, functional link to the main house, but may not where the caravans provide more accommodation than the house itself. Thirdly, account must be taken of the relative size of the dwelling house, its garden and the caravan. The larger the first two and the smaller the latter, the more likely it is that a subordinate, functional link exists. Fourthly, the relationship between the occupants must be taken into account. Extended family groups are more likely to share functional links.

To help to decide whether caravans are incidental or require planning permission, enforcement officers would need to ask each family questions along the following lines. Who lives in the house? Who lives in the caravan? What is the relationship between those people? What size of rooms and what kind of facilities exist in the house and caravan, and who uses what? How are utilities such as electricity, gas, water and waste shared? Are any payments shared? Is rent paid? What are the family's intentions for the proposed use of the caravans, including time scales?

The borough council considers that hard surfacing of part or all of the garden will generally be permitted development and that the erection of decorative railings will follow normal permitted development rules that apply to all means of enclosure. Likewise, the construction of shower and lavatory blocks might require planning permission, or might be permitted development, depending on the usual spatial allowances that apply to all residential properties.

Congleton borough council's stance has been that multiple caravans sited in the gardens of houses are permitted development because they are incidental to the enjoyment of the dwelling house and occupied by extended family members.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): The situation that my hon. Friend is describing reflects exactly what is happening in part of my constituency in Rushden. Several caravans form part of something that is, in my view, a permanent structure, and local residents are incensed that planning action is not being taken.

Ann Winterton: My hon. Friend describes the reason for the debate, and I am sure that the Minister has heard his comments.

A planning application or site licence are not required for such caravans, and the number of caravans allowed in a single curtilage cannot be limited. However, the CW10 residents action group has found that siting multiple caravans in the gardens of houses is a material change of use and not permitted development. Putting a dwelling in the curtilage of another dwelling is always a material change of use and, in turn, cannot be incidental to the enjoyment of the dwelling house, so surely planning permission is required. Furthermore, the same group believes that an extended family member includes three generations of the same family—grandparents, parents and their children—but not other independent family units, such as aunts, uncles, cousins and so on.

My constituents and I would be grateful to receive clarification from the Minister on a considerable number of questions, not least whether caravans are assessed for council tax purposes as additional facilities. On enforcement, paragraph 29 of circular 01/94—Gypsy sites and planning—states:

> "Some kinds of activity will not fall within the definition of 'development' in section 55 of the 1990 Act, and will not therefore require planning permission. Any gypsy living in a dwellinghouse will not require planning permission to use a caravan within the curtilage of the dwellinghouse, provided that the purpose is incidental to the enjoyment of the dwellinghouse as such. A caravan within the curtilage of a dwellinghouse may have a number of ancillary uses for which planning permission would not be required. For example, it could be used for additional living accommodation, provided that it remained part of the same planning unit as the dwellinghouse and the unit remained in single family occupation."

Is the above definition for a single caravan, or an unlimited number of caravans, being permitted to be stationed in the garden of a house without the need for planning permission? When would that definition no longer apply so that planning permission would have to be sought by the occupants of the dwelling house? To what extent would the usage of caravans in the gardens of a property fall under the definition of being incidental to the enjoyment of the dwelling house? When would the usage of the caravans fall outside that definition? Furthermore, would the intensification of caravans in the garden of a house be classified as incidental to the enjoyment of the dwelling house?

Paragraph 29 of circular 01/94 says:

> "A caravan within the curtilage of a dwellinghouse may have a number of ancillary uses for which planning permission would not be required."

Under the above definition, what would the usage of the caravan be if classified as ancillary use? What would its usage be when it falls outside that definition? Are there any time limitations for caravans to be stationed in the gardens of a house under the definition of incidental to the enjoyment of a dwelling house? What about the impact on neighbouring properties?

If the primary use of the dwelling house remains residential and within one planning unit, would it be possible for more than one caravan to be sited without the need for planning permission? Furthermore, would caravans stationed in the garden of an unoccupied house be incidental to the enjoyment of that dwelling house? If so, are there any time limitations without the need of planning consent? When would such cases require planning consent?

Under the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995—the GDPO—when would the stationing of caravans in the curtilage of a dwelling house fall within the definition of permitted development? Would the number of caravans and extent of use have any bearing on that definition? Also, under the same GDPO, when would the stationing of caravans in the garden of a house fall within the definition of material change of use, and would the number of caravans and extent of use have any bearing on that definition?

When would provisions on the health and safety of the occupants of the caravans, the dwelling house and their neighbours come into effect if multiple caravans, cars and vans are compacted into the curtilage of a single dwelling house? Who would be ultimately responsible for ensuring that those checks are carried out?

When would the following extract from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's "Planning Guide for Householders" apply to the stationing of caravans in a single residential curtilage? The following are examples of when one would need to apply for planning permission:

> "If you want to divide off part of your house for use as a separate home (for example, a self-contained flat or bed-sit) or use a building or caravan in your garden as a separate residence for someone else";

or

> "If you want to make additions or extensions to a flat or maisonette (including those converted from houses)."

When would the following extract taken directly from a letter to the CW10 residents action group from a planning policy adviser at the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister apply in connection to multiple caravans stationed in the garden of a house? I quote:

> "Each local planning authority has to take a view on whether any particular activity amounts to 'development' within the meaning of section 55 of the main Act. There are two types of development—'operational', such as building or engineering work, and 'material change of use of land'. A boat or vehicle would be a chattel rather than a building or a structure, so could only be considered as development if it represented a material change of use of land (eg, if someone set up a commercial boat-repair business in what was supposed to be his back garden).
>
> Similarly, a caravan, as defined under section 29(1) of the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960, as modified by section 13(1)(b) of the Caravan Sites Act 1968 is not a building. However, if someone started using one as a self-contained dwelling within the curtilage of a dwellinghouse the local planning authority would require a planning application for change of use of land. Putting one dwelling into the curtilage of another is always a material change of use".

Will the Minister please specify a rule of thumb when determining who will fall under the definition of extended family used in planning guidelines? Moreover, when would that definition no longer apply in respect of a family member? Finally, when would permanent occupation of caravans require planning consent within a single residential curtilage, and when would permanent occupation not require planning consent?

Given the complexity of planning law and that to judge the facts and degree of each case would involve significant intrusion into the lives of the families concerned, it might be appropriate for the Government to be invited to consider changes to planning legislation to clarify the issues. One suggestion from Congleton borough council is that a limit be imposed on the number of caravans permitted to be kept within the residential curtilage of a property to no more than one, whether occupied temporarily, permanently or not at all. Above that limit, planning permission would be required, and it would be clear to all where the distinction lay. It would then be a matter for the local planning authority, when required to determine an application for more than one caravan, to balance the merits of each case in the light of the development plan and any other material considerations.

I would appreciate the Minister's clarification of those important issues, which are of understandable concern to the residents of Middlewich. There seems to be one rule for one group of people, but my constituents want equity among all local residents, and they want planning regulations to be unequivocal in application. I have gone into considerable detail about the matter, and I am happy for the Minister to write to me if he cannot respond to all the points that I have made in this short debate.

[Ann Winterton]

10.31 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): I congratulate the hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) on securing this debate and I hope to provide the clarification that she seeks. However, she posed some detailed questions about the legislation, which I accept were entirely appropriate, and I therefore undertake to write to her to ensure that in due course we cover all the points that she made.

We recognise the difficult problems that can arise when trying to find suitable accommodation for Gypsies and Travellers, and the hon. Lady will acknowledge that we take these issues seriously. We have been working hard and we will continue to work hard to find solutions to try to alleviate the distress to everyone concerned. The hon. Lady asked a number of detailed questions about the location of caravans in back gardens, and I shall attempt to answer them as fully as possible. However, as I said, I shall write to her in due course, because I do not think that I will cover every point that she made.

The hon. Lady asked to what extent the usage of a caravan would fall outside the definition of being "incidental to enjoyment of the dwelling house".

A caravan is not a building. Stationing one on land is not itself "operational development" that requires planning permission, although associated works such as the provision of infrastructure and hygiene facilities may well be. Under planning law, householders can park caravans in their gardens or driveways indefinitely, provided that no material change of use of land occurs. However, in certain circumstances, the placing of a caravan on land may change the principal use of that land, which would amount to development in the form of a material change of use of land. It is for that reason that the use of land for an occupied caravan generally requires planning permission.

The hon. Lady asked whether adding extra caravans would still be incidental. A householder is entitled to use caravans as extra accommodation without planning permission, provided that the occupants continue to use the house, for example, the kitchen or bathroom. If, on the other hand, a caravan is there for another purpose not incidental to the enjoyment of the main dwelling, known as the dwelling house—for example, it is inhabited quite separately from, and independently of, the dwelling house—planning permission for change of use of the land would, generally speaking, be required. As it would result in the creation of a new planning unit, such permission may well not be granted in a residential area. If a caravan was being used in connection with a commercial purpose, the local planning authority may decide that an unauthorised change of use of land had occurred, for which planning permission should be sought.

The hon. Lady also asked whether there were any time limits relating to the stationing of caravans, and whether it is possible for more than one caravan to be sited without the need for planning permission. As I stated previously, caravans can be stationed indefinitely in someone's garden or driveway, provided that no material change to the use of land occurs. There is no legally defined limit on the number of caravans that can be stationed in gardens before planning permission is required. However, if so many caravans were stationed in the garden of a house that they ceased to be incidental to the principal use of that land, the local planning authority could require a planning application, or take enforcement action against the unauthorised change of land use.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield) (Lab): Can my hon. Friend deal with a point relating to the advice that the hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) mentioned in connection with extended families and their use of caravans? As we know, many Gypsies and Travellers have a wide family base and their extended family is much wider than the norm. I hope that my hon. Friend will clarify the situation and give us the Government's view of what is and is not legal in planning terms.

Jim Fitzpatrick: I shall respond to my hon. Friend's intervention when I deal with extended families later. I hope to provide some clarification of the points raised by the hon. Member for Congleton and by my hon. Friend.

The hon. Lady invited the Government to set a limit on the number of caravans permitted to be kept within the curtilage of a property, and urged that no more than one caravan should be permitted, whether occupied temporarily, permanently or not at all. The Government's view is that the limit of one caravan would be a disproportionate burden on local authorities, which would have to deal with large numbers of planning applications, and a disproportionate burden on all those who enjoy using caravans, whether from the Gypsy and Traveller or settled communities. The current law allows flexibility for local authorities to determine the merits of any case as to whether the stationing of a caravan or caravans constitutes development requiring planning permission.

Mr. Bone: Has any research been done on how many houses have more than one caravan?

Jim Fitzpatrick: The hon. Gentleman makes a reasonable point. I will refer later to the review being undertaken. Given the strength of feeling and the problems caused by multiple parking, officials in the Department will want to consider the question as part of the review.

Ann Winterton: The issue is not just multiple parking; it is multiple living.

Jim Fitzpatrick: The hon. Lady made that very clear in her contribution. I apologise for not acknowledging that.

The hon. Lady asked whether a caravan would need planning permission if it were stationed in the curtilage of an unoccupied dwelling house. The answer would depend on the circumstances in each particular case. For example, it would not be reasonable to require planning permission if the house was unoccupied while the owners were away on holiday and had left a caravan in the back garden. However, if a caravan was being used as the sole residence of a family and was stationed in the garden of an unoccupied house that was not used at all by the family, the local authority might consider this to be a material change of use of land, as the caravan was not ancillary to the enjoyment of the main dwelling house.

The hon. Lady asks what uses might be considered ancillary. Examples could include uses such as storage, home office, additional sleeping accommodation and garden shed. In respect of the question that she asked about council tax, it is for the valuation office or the local authority to determine whether there has been a change in the value of the house resulting from additional development, which would alter its council tax banding.

The hon. Lady quotes from the "Planning Guide for Householders", an explanatory guide that gives examples showing when planning permission is needed. In answer to her question, and as that booklet states:

> "Planning permission is needed to place a caravan in your garden as a separate residence for someone else".

A separate residence is clearly not ancillary to the use of the main dwelling house.

In relation to the responsibility for health and safety issues for caravans in gardens, in the first instance it would be for the environmental health officer of the local authority to assess whether there were any health and safety issues caused by use of caravans within a tight space surrounding a dwelling house. The environmental health officer is under a duty to contact other relevant agencies, including the local fire authority, if he or she believes that they need to be aware of the concentration of caravans. Local residents who are concerned should therefore contact their environmental health officer in the first instance. Finally, the term "extended family" is not a legal one, and it must be given its ordinary, everyday meaning. The question whether a person is covered by the term is a question of fact that needs to be determined by looking at the particular circumstances of the case.

Siting caravans in back gardens seems to be one solution Gypsies and Travellers have identified in response to the lack of authorised sites. Some 25 per cent. of all Gypsy and Traveller caravans in England are on unauthorised sites. I understand that Congleton district council is actively investigating whether there has been any breach of planning control with a view to possible enforcement action. The Government take the view that local planning authorities should take appropriate enforcement action if they consider that an unacceptable breach of planning control has occurred, and they have a range of tools at their disposal.

The hon. Lady has concentrated on planning matters in relation to Gypsies and Travellers. However, she has raised the issue of instances of unauthorised encampments in her constituency in the past, and I thought it might be useful if I set out the Government's wider policy towards unauthorised encampments by Gypsies and Travellers. Our aim is to reduce the tensions between Gypsies and Travellers and the settled community, and in some cases unauthorised camping can be dealt with through negotiation. However, in other cases firm and prompt action is necessary: firm action to enforce against encampments in inappropriate places; firm action to provide the right sort of authorised sites, in appropriate locations; and where people are unwilling to respect the rights of others, firm action to enforce against antisocial behaviour and environmental damage. Where persistent and repeated offences occur, action must be relentless in upholding the law.

There are a range of powers for use by private landowners, the police and local authorities to deal with unauthorised encampments and associated problems such as antisocial behaviour. I have every sympathy with those encountering problems over enforcement action, where there has been vandalism and criminal damage. The powers are there—it is a question of using them effectively.

Unauthorised sites can cause many serious problems and distress for local communities. The key to a reduction in both unauthorised camping and the siting of caravans in locations inappropriate for planning reasons is to increase the supply of authorised sites. The Government are committed to the firm but fair use of enforcement powers against unauthorised sites and antisocial behaviour linked with increasing site provision.

Ann Winterton: It might be worth mentioning that on the illegal encampment at Cranage, I inquired about the costs of some of the statutory duties. For example, the situation cost the police in Cheshire—this figure includes the pension contribution, which one must include—£5,800. That does not include the cost of cleaning up the site, the environmental health officer and all the rest, which is a huge expense on the back of local council tax payers.

Jim Fitzpatrick: The hon. Lady has made some valid points. Options are available to local authorities to claim compensation from those who cause damage. The penalties are quite stiff, and it is a matter of using those enforcement powers to make sure that those who cause the damage and distress ultimately pay for those actions that cause such difficulty for many in the settled community.

Many local authorities have not responded sufficiently on providing sites to meet local needs in their areas in recent years. To be fair, however, some local authorities have done a great deal. Under the Housing Act 2004, local authorities will be required to carry out accommodation needs assessments for Gypsies and Travellers, as they do for the settled community, and also to draw up a Gypsy and Traveller accommodation strategy to ensure that need is met. We will issue guidance on how to carry out accommodation needs assessments in due course, but in the meantime we will seek to facilitate the sharing of good practice between local authorities and other players, and we will do all that we can to help local authorities find a way to share provision.

[Jim Fitzpatrick]

Local authorities should identify land that could be used for the provision of new public and private sites, which is why it is important to place an obligation on local authorities to identify land as part of their planning process. Under the new draft Gypsy and Traveller planning circular, there is a requirement on local planning authorities to allocate sufficient land for sites, which is effectively a "duty". As part of the new planning process, local authorities will have to identify sites suitable for Gypsies and Travellers as part of their local development framework. The regional planning body will have to assess regional need for Gypsy and Traveller sites based upon local accommodation needs assessments made by local authorities—

The motion having been made after Ten o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned accordingly at fifteen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Wednesday 23 November 2005

The House met at half-past Eleven o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Security Situation

• 1. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): If he will make a statement on the security situation in Northern Ireland. [29664]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Hain): We continue to see dramatic improvements in the security situation compared with the height of the troubles and paramilitary attacks continue to decrease. Those dramatic improvements could not have occurred without the enormous sacrifices made by the security services over 35 years. Today marks the fifth anniversary of the award of the George cross to the Royal Ulster Constabulary by Her Majesty the Queen. That award recognised many cases of exceptional valour, which we remember again today.

Mr. Bellingham: Although conventional terrorism is obviously under control, it has been replaced by a ruthless form of racketeering, which is being carried out by both loyalist and republican paramilitaries. Does the Secretary of State share my concern that parts of the Province are descending into anarchy? Surely now is not the time to disband the two Territorial battalions of the Royal Irish Regiment.

Mr. Hain: On the home battalions of the Royal Irish Regiment, discussions are currently taking place about compensation for those affected and their families, and I hope that it will be as generous as possible, because they deserve no less. On the overall situation, it is true that there is still too much criminality. Indeed, the feud between the loyalist groups in the summer was largely about gangsterism rather than the original political objectives of the Loyalist Volunteer Force and the Ulster Volunteer Force. It is also true that there is still criminality among republicans, and the Assets Recovery Agency and the Organised Crime Task Force are cracking down on it together with the police.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): A BBC television programme that was aired last night revealed that the police have warned a friend of the late Robert McCartney that there is a threat to his life from the Provisional IRA. How does that sit with ministerial statements that the Provisional IRA has turned its back on terrorism, and why will that organisation be rewarded in a debate later today?

Mr. Hain: I have received no evidence from the police or any other quarter about a threat to Robert McCartney witnesses or friends by the Provisional IRA, but I have received reports that individual republicans in that locality have made threats. Those matters are being dealt with by the police and arrests have taken place, and we will continue vigorously to crack down on such activities.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): Will the Secretary of State outline the precise level of engagement by any of the loyalist paramilitaries with either the de Chastelain commission or the Independent Monitoring Commission?

Mr. Hain: I know that the hon. Lady takes a close interest in that matter, which she has discussed with me, and I am grateful for her interest. We hope that some of the loyalist groups will start to engage with the de Chastelain commission, and it is important that they do so. I understand that some preliminary contacts have been made and it is important that they progress to allow us to reach the same end as that achieved with the Provisional IRA.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): Was the Secretary of State ever a supporter of the troops out movement? If so, has he changed his mind?

Mr. Hain: I dealt with those matters a long time ago. Following the Good Friday agreement, all the old arguments were transformed, including that one.

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): Will the Secretary of State comment on any recent incidents of loyalist violence? The Independent Monitoring Commission October report covers March to August this year, but there were loyalist riots in September over the Blackrock parade and the LVF has stated that its feud with the UVF is over. To emphasise the point raised by the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon), have any loyalist paramilitaries met the decommissioning commission? If the LVF means what it says, it should give up its weapons, too.

Mr. Hain: I think that the hon. Lady is referring to the Whiterock parade, but she has made an important point. I agree with her that it is important that the LVF, the UVF, the Ulster Defence Association and any other loyalist paramilitaries give up their weapons and engage with the de Chastelain commission, as the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) has argued.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): The Secretary of State will know that some senior members of Sinn Fein-IRA have declared openly that their intention is to establish so-called community restorative justice schemes as an alternative to policing by the Police Service of Northern Ireland. Has he seen the comments by a spokesman for the rape crisis and sexual abuse centre in Northern Ireland, who said that members of community restorative justice schemes have > "threatened women and attempted to cover up crimes committed by those with IRA, Sinn Fein or CRJ connections"?

She continued:

> "Allowing such people power is like letting the lunatics run the asylum."

Will the Secretary of State make it clear that the Government will provide sufficient assurances in their forthcoming guidelines on community restorative justice to ensure that nothing like the appalling practices reported by the rape crisis and sexual abuse centre can recur?

Mr. Hain: Yes, I am happy to provide that unequivocal assurance. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising the matter, because a great deal of mischief and misinformation has been spread about community restorative justice schemes. The guidelines for the new schemes will be published on 5 December by the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson), when he meets the Policing Board.

Let me make it emphatically clear that, whatever claims are made by Sinn Fein members or others, these schemes, which operate in republican communities among others, are currently unregulated. We intend to bring them under proper regulation if they wish to attract public funds, although no provision has been made for that. I can unequivocally state that under our guidelines nobody who has been involved in paramilitary activity or organised crime would be allowed to work on the schemes. Appointments principles would be overseen by an independent body. There is no way in which those schemes will have a policing role in determining guilt or innocence. They will have no investigative role and will have to work with all the statutory agencies, including the police service.

Mr. Lidington: I am grateful for those words, but can the Secretary of State also assure the House that he will provide an independent statutory basis for complaints against members of community restorative justice schemes? He will know that at present there is real fear on estates in Belfast, Derry and elsewhere that if these schemes are licensed by the Government, that will amount to licensed control by paramilitary mafia.

Mr. Hain: It is emphatically not the case that any community restorative justice schemes that we endorse will in any way allow for control by paramilitary mafia, militia, or whatever else the hon. Gentleman chooses to call them. I agree with him on that. He should remember that these proposals stemmed from the community justice review some years ago and were widely endorsed on a cross-party basis. We needed to establish proper guidelines and regulation of what is now a bit of a free-for-all. In doing so, there will be an opportunity to consult, as the hon. Gentleman will see when we publish the guidelines on 5 December. We will consult him and other parties, as well as others in Northern Ireland, on the exact terms of the guidelines.

Education Administration

2. Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): What steps he is taking to reduce administrative costs in education in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [29665]

3. Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): What steps he is taking to reduce administrative costs in education in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [29666]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Angela E. Smith): The Government are determined to focus resources on front-line services, not bureaucracy. Yesterday's announcement on the review of public administration included a new Education Authority replacing the functions of the five education and library boards and other support bodies. Through these fundamental changes, along with the existing measures to cut administration costs, I am determined to ensure that our children and schools see tangible benefits.

Mary Creagh: How will the organisation reforms that my hon. Friend sets out help to deal with the impact of falling pupil numbers in schools in Northern Ireland?

Angela E. Smith: My hon. Friend is right to highlight the issue of falling pupil rolls. There are about 47,000 empty desks in Northern Ireland's schools, and if no action is taken that figure could rise to 80,000 over the next 10 years. The new structures that I announced yesterday will ensure that we can be more responsive in dealing with that while placing a greater emphasis on strategic planning across Northern Ireland's schools estate. A failure to tackle the issue would put unacceptable pressure on school budgets. The measures announced yesterday will ensure that we go a long way towards tackling it.

Mr. David Anderson: The administrative changes may well result in people losing their jobs. Will my hon. Friend assure me that the work force will be taken care of, with, if possible, an agreement on no compulsory redundancies? Can the review look into the cost of duplication through segregated services? We should move much more towards an integrated education system so that we can save money and provide a better service.

Angela E. Smith: It is too early to talk about possible job losses, because current functions still need to be carried out, but I assure my hon. Friend that we will do everything possible to ensure that any redundancies are voluntary. As the Secretary of State announced yesterday, we are establishing a Public Service Commission to ensure that the work force are fully engaged and involved in the decisions.

My hon. Friend asked about duplication in the schools estate, which has been highlighted. The Good Friday agreement includes a commitment to integrated education. I have also given a commitment that parents' wishes will be adhered to.

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): The Under-Secretary made much of the reforms or changes that were announced yesterday. A cursory glance shows that, on top of the Department of Education, we will have a new Education Authority, a new Education Advisory Forum, a new director of children's services, a new Public Service Commission, a new Northern Ireland Network for Youth and new district youth networks in council areas in Northern Ireland. Is that pruning or increasing administration? What costs does she hope to save through the announcement?

Angela E. Smith: I think that the hon. Gentleman is having some sport with his question. There are currently 67 public bodies, which have been whittled down to 20. There are five education and library boards for a population of 1.7 million, but the new Education Authority, which replaces the five boards and the support bodies, will make a fundamental difference to organisation and cut bureaucracy. I give him a clear assurance that, as a result of the announcement, we are cutting the number of bodies that deal with the same issues.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Will the Under-Secretary give the comparative administrative costs of the education system of Northern Ireland and those for the rest of the United Kingdom? Will she confirm the importance of ensuring that as much money as possible goes directly to pupils on the front line?

Angela E. Smith: The purpose of the changes that we announced is to ensure that money goes directly to front-line services. I am not satisfied that the current administrative structures achieve that. It is difficult to give a comparison of costs because of the different structures in Northern Ireland and in England. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman if I can provide more detail for him. However, the purpose of the changes announced is to ensure that schools are not disadvantaged by overly bureaucratic systems that take money away from schools and put it into bureaucracy.

Kitty Ussher (Burnley) (Lab): Does the Under-Secretary agree that ending segregation in schools has an important part to play in the sustainability of the peace process? Will she undertake to discuss with colleagues in the Department for Education and Skills whether there are lessons to be learned from the operation of faith schools in divided communities in other parts of the United Kingdom?

Angela E. Smith: I assure my hon. Friend that I am in regular contact with my colleagues in the Department for Education and Skills about several issues. However, we have to bear in mind the different situation in Northern Ireland. When I talk to head teachers—indeed, the headmaster of Portora Royal school wrote to me today—I find the collaboration between schools from different sectors, which aims to ensure that pupils are brought closer together, encouraging. It is important when we consider the future in Northern Ireland that schools co-operate and collaborate to ensure that there is no sectarian divide in education.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): Although it would have been better if yesterday's announcement on the change to the Department of Education had been made in the House, we support the principle of trying to reduce administration costs. However, how much will it cost to dismantle the grammar school system? Why are the Government intent on destroying the best education system in the UK?

Angela E. Smith: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should get his facts right before speaking at the Dispatch Box. There is no dismantling of the grammar school system in Northern Ireland. However, we are getting rid of selection. He may find it acceptable that 95 per cent. of children on the Shankill never get a chance of a grammar school education—I do not. Every child should have the opportunity to reach their full potential. He should examine the proposals more closely.

Dr. Alasdair McDonnell (Belfast, South) (SDLP): I note the Under-Secretary's comments about the consequences of the review of public administration in education and health. The jury is out on that for the moment. However, is the Secretary of State fully aware of the impact of some aspects of the review of public administration on local democracy? Is he aware that all political parties, with the exception of the military wing of Sinn Fein, oppose the proposed changes to the number of councils? If the proposals go ahead as planned, a canton or two somewhere will be under the control of one political paramilitary organisation.

Angela E. Smith: We are looking to devolve power to local councils, and one important issue is the role of those councils. Under the proposals put forward by the Secretary of State yesterday, far more functions will be carried out by local government than before. It is worth noting that the voluntary and business sectors across Northern Ireland have broadly supported our proposals to devolve more power to local councils.

Inward Investment

4. Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): What steps he is taking to promote Northern Ireland as a place for foreign direct investment; and if he will discuss with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry a long-term strategic plan to encourage greater foreign direct investment. [29667]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Hain): The focus of Invest Northern Ireland's international sales and marketing effort is aggressively to promote all areas of Northern Ireland as attractive, viable locations for inward investment opportunities.

Daniel Kawczynski: I thank the Secretary of State for that answer. However, I was slightly concerned by his comments in the media, in which he seemed to suggest that Northern Ireland was too small an entity to survive by itself. Will he give us an assurance that that is not the case, and that he will do everything possible to ensure that foreign direct investment comes into Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hain: I am doing everything possible in that regard; I was doing so last week in New York, and the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela E. Smith), is going on a trade mission to China imminently. We are pressing for increased inward investment in Northern Ireland. Indeed, only yesterday in Belfast, I met the executives of Citigroup, a very exciting project that has already brought 375 jobs into Belfast. Belfast was chosen by Citigroup over other locations in Europe, including Dublin, because it is a much better place in which to invest. These are high-quality jobs, and we are continuing to bring them in. It is not a question of the Northern Ireland economy being too small, but the business community says—it agrees with me on this—that the economy needs to be much more entrepreneurial and enterprising, to build a stronger private sector right across Northern Ireland.

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): The southern Irish Government are one of the best Governments in the world at utilising Irish communities around the world to promote trade and investment in southern Ireland. What steps is my right hon. Friend's Department taking to use the Ulster communities around the world to promote trade and investment in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend has raised an important point. I was talking to exactly that community in New York and Washington last week, including senior figures in the business community who are working with the Government, and with me as Secretary of State, to find new opportunities to market Northern Ireland—now that we have a stable, prosperous Northern Ireland that is going from strength to strength—and to bring in American and other investors, who know that they will find it an excellent location in which to base themselves.

Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that the selling point for investment in Northern Ireland is not subsidy but the excellence of the location and the work force? May I press him further on co-operation with the Republic of Ireland, which has already worked very successfully in tourism? To what extent does he seek to work with the Republic of Ireland in promoting the island of Ireland as an inward investment location?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. We are anxious to take every opportunity to get more investment, including from companies based in the Republic of Ireland. We want them to come to Northern Ireland and to see that there are better opportunities there and a less overheated economy. That was one of the reasons why Citigroup decided to locate in Belfast. It could have chosen the south—indeed, it might have been drawn there in the past—but Northern Ireland, especially with its skills base, is now a very attractive place in which to invest.

Mark Durkan (Foyle) (SDLP): We have many examples of politicians being asked to resign for being economical with the truth. Does the Secretary of State recognise that he is possibly the first to be asked to resign for being truthful about the economy? Does he also recognise that, for many of us, promoting direct foreign investment in Northern Ireland would best be done in an all-Ireland context? Does he also acknowledge the lack of confidence in the performance of Invest Northern Ireland, particularly west of the Bann? In the absence of foreign direct investment, does he acknowledge the Government's duty to ensure more balanced employment in the east and west, through Government employment and public procurement?

Mr. Hain: I agree that we must focus all our efforts—as indeed we are doing, and announcements will be made in the relatively near future—on ensuring that extra jobs and investment go to the hon. Gentleman's constituency and the north-west of Northern Ireland in particular. I also agree that at a time when we face global competition from China and India, let alone more immediate competition in eastern Europe, we need to consider all investment opportunities, including co-operation across the border, to maximise opportunities for the whole island of Ireland. As the hon. Gentleman says, Northern Ireland will benefit from that.

David Simpson (Upper Bann) (DUP): I was disappointed by what the Secretary of State said about the Northern Ireland economy when he was in New York. I have been involved in the Northern Ireland business community for 25 years, and I know that it is one of the strongest communities in Northern Ireland. Will the right hon. Gentleman use his influence with Invest Northern Ireland to promote small businesses?

Mr. Hain: I do that already, as does the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela E. Smith). But let me return to what the hon. Gentleman said at the beginning. Members of the business community, both in New York—where the comments were made—and at home in Northern Ireland, prefer honesty. Honesty about the Northern Ireland economy means saying "Yes, the economy is doing better than ever before, but the private sector is too small compared with the public sector, and there is therefore a question of sustainability." The business community wants a Secretary of State and a Government who recognise that and want to expand small businesses and the private sector, as indeed we do. It will invest in Northern Ireland more readily in the knowledge that the Government have that strategy. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House must come to order.

Regeneration

5. Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): When he next intends to meet representatives of the loyalist community to discuss regeneration. [29668]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. David Hanson): As part of my engagement with the loyalist community, over the next 12 weeks I will be meeting elected political representatives, community activists, churches and faith-based organisations, residents, women, youth, Loyal Orders and business representatives from the loyalist community. I am committed to using the results of that engagement to produce real improvements on the ground.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I was pleased to hear the long list of representatives of the loyalist community whom the Minister will meet, but will he take the opportunity to discuss the continuing criminality that emanates from some groups of ex-combatants and paramilitaries? It is one of the biggest impediments to regeneration in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanson: I certainly will. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said, the Government will take strong action against paramilitaries, and will ensure that criminality and paramilitary activity cease as part of the regeneration of the Province.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Does the Minister accept—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The private conversations must cease. The noise is unfair to Members who are interested in Northern Ireland questions.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Does the Minister accept [illegible] if regeneration is to succeed, whether in loyalist areas or in other parts of Northern Ireland, there must be meaningful peace and stability? Does he accept that without a much more transparent decommissioning of arms in all parts of Northern Ireland, there will never be that peace and stability? Will he therefore make the decommissioning process more transparent?

Mr. Hanson: As the hon. Gentleman will know, the decommissioning process is ongoing. We have already received the report from the Independent Monitoring Commission following the IRA's statement in July. We are committed to ensuring that the process is transparent and open, and to building on the strong economy that Northern Ireland can have once the peace process continues. I know that the hon. Gentleman shares my wish to see an end to IRA activity, an end to criminality, and an end to paramilitary activity.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): During his discussions, will the Minister ensure that the perception that loyalists and paramilitaries are being funded is dispelled? I know from experience of the valiant efforts by church and community groups to make progress in the community. Will the Minister redouble his efforts both to deal with the funding issue and to engage with the law-abiding elements in the loyalist communities?

Mr. Hanson: The Government are particularly keen to engage with elected politicians and community groups. We recognise the need for regeneration not just in loyalist areas but in republican and nationalist areas, but we must also ensure that the Government take on board some of the challenges faced by loyalist areas. That is why a taskforce headed by the civil service is considering what we can do for loyalist and Protestant communities throughout Northern Ireland.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): As we are the elected Democratic Unionist representatives of those areas, the Government will be aware of our commitment to their social and economic betterment. Does the Minister accept that the main issues are better housing, sustainable employment and a focus on education from the earliest age right through to adulthood, all of which must be tackled as part of a strategic plan? It must, however, be properly resourced and funded. That is the challenge for the Government.

Mr. Hanson: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, and he will know that we are trying hard to consider how best to improve educational opportunity, housing and employment, particularly in loyalist areas. He will recognise the taskforce's work over the past two years, which provided the opportunity to look into those matters. I have appointed the head of the civil service to examine those issues and he will report in January or February next year. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will work with the Government to ensure that we deliver on the ground for those communities.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [30879] David Simpson (Upper Bann) (DUP): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 23 November.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): Before listing my engagements, I know that the whole House will join me in sending our condolences to the family of Police Constable Sharon Beshenivsky, who was tragically murdered on duty last Friday. Our thoughts and prayers are with her family at this time. I know that the whole House will also join me in sending condolences to the family of the British soldier killed in Iraq at the weekend. He was doing a vital and heroic job in helping that country towards democracy. Our country can be very proud of him.

This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

David Simpson: I thank the Prime Minister for listing his engagements and I concur with his sentiments and sympathy for the two serving members who lost their lives. My right hon. and hon. Friends will also concur with that. May I leave this thought with the Prime Minister? What would the British people and members of his party think of him if he offered an amnesty to the murderer of the police officer? Later on today, we will debate such matters in respect of Northern Ireland. Will the Prime Minister please comment on what I have said?

The Prime Minister: I am meeting RUC widows this afternoon, at the request of the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon). I totally understand the pain and anguish that there will be about this matter, but I also hope that the hon. Gentleman understands that already, as a result of the Good Friday agreement, people convicted of terrorist offences before 1998 have been released, so it is necessary to deal with those who have not been convicted but are nonetheless suspected of such offences before 1998. That is the reason for the measure that we are introducing. As I say, I fully understand the pain and anguish that it causes, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will also understand that it is something that has to be dealt with.

Q2. [30880] Mr. Martin Caton (Gower) (Lab): The Prime Minister quite rightly celebrates the start of talks on Turkey's accession as an achievement of the UK presidency of the European Union, but next month, the fine Turkish novelist, Orhan Pamuk, faces trial for public denigration of Turkey, simply because he talked about the killing of Armenians and Kurds in the early part of the last century. Does my right hon. Friend agree that a prerequisite for membership of the EU should be the protection of the right of free speech; and will he also join me in commending those people in Turkey such as Pamuk who are campaigning for that right?

The Prime Minister: First, may I tell my hon. Friend that during our presidency of the European Union, we raised that issue with Turkish justice and foreign Ministers? It is important, if Turkey wants to become a member of the EU, that it abide by the criteria for membership, including the criterion on freedom of expression. I hope, however, that my hon. Friend would also agree that Turkey has gone a considerable way down the path of reform over the past few years. I hope that these issues will also be dealt with as part of future reforms so that Turkey can proceed to EU membership, which I believe is in the interests of Turkey, Europe and the wider world.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): I join the Prime Minister in expressing my condolences, and those of my party, to the family of WPC Beshenivsky. Her loss is a tragic reminder of the risks run by our police officers on our behalf every single time they go on duty. I join him also in expressing condolences to the family of the service man who was lost in Iraq over the weekend. That, too, was a tragic reminder of the sacrifices made on our behalf by those who are serving with such distinction in Iraq.

Last month, the Secretary of State for Health said:

> "I am assured . . . that there are adequate supplies"

of flu vaccine

> "available to GPs to ensure that anyone who is at risk and who therefore should have the vaccination can do so."—[Official Report, 17 October 2005; Vol. 437, c. 637–8.]

What went wrong?

The Prime Minister: What has happened is that an assessment was made of the number of vaccines that would be necessary. I remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that we ensured with the manufacturers that more than 14 million doses would be available this year. At the end of October, however, it appeared that there would be a shortfall because more people were demanding the vaccine. The Department of Health then ordered a further 200,000 doses.

To be fair to the Department and the others involved in the planning, I should say that if everything had gone to plan, in the region of 2 million doses would probably not have been needed. It is correct to say that the demand for the doses has risen considerably, obviously as a result of people's concern. As I said, those responsible had built a very large contingency into their plans, but it appeared at the end of October that it was not large enough, and that is why they asked for more.

Mr. Howard: At least the Prime Minister, unlike the Secretary of State, has not blamed general practitioners. On 5 October—that is, not at the end of October—my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), the shadow Secretary of State for Health, wrote to the Secretary of State. In his letter, he expressed concerns about the availability of vaccines. He did not get a reply until yesterday afternoon, less than two hours before the Secretary of State made her statement in this House. The British Medical Association also warned the right hon. Lady that it had similar concerns. Why did she not respond to those concerns?

The Prime Minister: First, let me inform the House of what took place earlier this year in respect of the doses that were ordered. In accordance with the normal practice that has applied since 2000–01, a meeting was held with the UK vaccine industry group, at which the number of doses thought to be necessary for the year was worked out. This year, about 4 million more doses were ordered than was the case, say, five years ago. As a result, there should have been easily enough doses to cater for people over 65 and those at clinical risk. As I said a moment or two ago, the number of doses ordered meant that there should have been a probable surplus of 2 million. That is why people thought that there would be enough to cover any eventuality, including increased demand arising from the heightened concern about flu in recent weeks. It was at the end of October that it appeared that that was not the case. In early November, therefore, a further 200,000 doses were ordered. That will mean that the number of doses manufactured is somewhere in the region of 14.5 million.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister has referred to 14 million doses, but that is exactly the same as the number of doses that a Health Minister, last year, told us was being made available last year. So 14 million doses last year, 14 million this year: is it not true that the Department of Health cannot tell the difference between England and the UK? In its letter to GPs this week, it said that there were only 11 million people in the at-risk groups, and 14 million doses of vaccine. However, the first figure refers to England and the second to the UK as a whole. Is it any wonder that GPs and others are in despair at the inefficiency and incompetence of the Department of Health and the Secretary of State? If the Department can so comprehensively bungle the routine administration of the seasonal flu vaccine, what confidence can people have in its ability to cope with a pandemic of bird flu?

The Prime Minister: As I have explained to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, over the past few years we have increased enormously the number of doses available. It is correct that a 100 per cent. takeup among people aged over 65 and those at clinical risk would amount to 11 million doses. However, the biggest takeup that there has ever been amounted to only 70 per cent. So even taking into account the UK-wide factor, the planners estimated earlier in the year that there would be a surplus of 2 million doses. Last year, there were more than 1 million surplus doses that had to be destroyed. It is sometimes difficult to plan accurately. They built in a large contingency, but it appears that that has not been enough and therefore they have ordered more doses.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister has yet again compared figures for those at risk that relate to England with figures relating to doses for the UK, as the Secretary of State did yesterday.

Now let us look at another example of incompetence. Four weeks ago, the Leader of the House, when asked if the Government could guarantee energy supplies to business and domestic customers this winter, said, "Yes, they can". Does that guarantee still stand?

The Prime Minister: Of course there will be difficulties with gas prices, because of the cold winter we are likely to have. The energy suppliers have made it clear that they are doing their level best to ensure that demand is properly met. There is not, as far as we are aware, a problem for domestic users. There is a problem for high-level industry users, but the only way to deal with that is to ensure that the industry can meet as much demand as possible from abroad. On the whole, industry prices for domestic consumers in the UK are way below the European Union average. We are not the only country with the problem, but it is not a problem that lies within the remit of the Government to resolve.

Mr. Howard: Now we know that when this Government give guarantees, they last roughly four weeks. The Leader of the House also said that the Government would plan and prepare for this winter, but the Government commissioned studies on gas supplies for large manufacturers only two weeks ago. Why has it taken until November—when winter has already arrived, gas prices are almost five times higher than they were a month ago and manufacturers have been forced to switch from gas to oil to generate electricity—to find out whether business can cope this winter? Should not that have been done months ago?

The Prime Minister: I do not think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman seriously suggests that we should have a planned economy, in which the Government buy in—[Interruption.] Perhaps that is what he is suggesting. Let me just tell him the facts. UK energy prices—[Interruption.] Well, this is a rather strange situation. I do not know whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman is suggesting that the Government should buy in energy from abroad. The Government work with the industry to ensure that it can meet demand. I repeat the fact that UK prices are actually the cheapest in the European Union and UK domestic prices are 40 per cent. below the European Union median. It is true that there will be an extra £10 billion of investment in additional energy supply, but it is not something that the Government on their own can resolve.

Mr. Howard: If the Prime Minister thinks that gas prices for British industry are cheaper than gas prices for European industry, he is living in a dream world. I suggest that the Government should have done what they are now doing some months ago. The Met Office warned us months ago that we were likely to have the coldest winter for more than a decade. The CBI and others have been warning for months of possible gas shortages. Why have the Government ignored them for so long? Why, on flu vaccines and gas supplies, have the Government proved so thoroughly incompetent? Is it not clear that the Government are on the skids and that the Prime Minister has lost his grip and is incapable of dealing with the challenges that the country faces?

The Prime Minister: Even the right hon. and learned Gentleman found it a bit of a stretch to link flu jabs with gas prices. As opposed to the situation in respect of the vaccine for flu, in which we sit down with manufacturers and help to ensure that enough is ordered, the gas market and prices depend on demand and the amount of gas available for electricity users and others to buy. The idea that the Government should make up the shortfall is utterly absurd.

Mr. Howard: I am not saying that.

The Prime Minister: Well, I do not know what the right hon. and learned Gentleman is suggesting, other than points that seem absolutely absurd. We are doing our level best to make sure, for example, that we have additional infrastructure that allows us to import more energy. That we are doing, but what we cannot do—even this Government—is affect the current situation in the energy market, which is a product of all the reasons that we know about and which, I repeat, the Government alone cannot resolve.

Mr. Marsha Singh (Bradford, West) (Lab): May I join the Prime Minister in expressing my condolences on the murder of Officer Beshenivsky? I also extend my sympathy to Officer Milburn and wish her a speedy recovery. What more can be done to tackle gun crime in this country and to assist in the safety of our officers on the beat? Although Bradford is united in its horror, shock and grief, does the Prime Minister agree that this is a time for sober reflection, not a time to call for the routine arming of the police or for the restoration of the death penalty?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend says, it is important that we see, in a considered way, what more can be done. As he knows, since January 2004 anyone convicted of possession of an illegal firearm receives a mandatory five-year minimum sentence. Measures under the Violent Crime Reduction Bill will ban the sale, manufacture or import of realistic imitation firearms. The new Serious Organised Crime Agency will come into effect next April. With the agency, we are looking at the additional measures necessary to deal with organised crime. With organised crime, as we have done with antisocial behaviour in a completely different context, there will be a need for special and particular measures to deal with a very brutal new type of organised criminal gang that operates not just in this country but in other countries as well. We shall come back to the House with such proposals when we can.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Lochaber) (LD): May I associate my right hon. and hon. Friends entirely with the expression of condolences for the families who have lost their loved ones in recent days, in such tragic circumstances, in the service of the police and our armed forces?

May I return to the opening question from the hon. Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson)? As the Prime Minister has acknowledged elsewhere, those of us who disagreed with him over an aspect of the Terrorism Bill—90-days imprisonment without charge—did so as a matter of principle. Does he recognise that the Northern Ireland measures before the House this afternoon also raise matters of proper principled judicial process? Those of us who support the Good Friday agreement readily accept that the issue must be resolved, but if justice is to be seen to be done it is surely imperative that those who have committed terrorist atrocities appear in court and answer for their crimes.

The Prime Minister: I think that the right hon. Gentleman knows why we have to deal with the issue. We have to deal it with it for a very simple reason: under the provisions of the Belfast agreement—the Good Friday agreement—those convicted of offences before that agreement, in other words, before April 1998, have been released under the prisoner release scheme. We were always going to have to deal with the situation of those suspected of, or being pursued in respect of, crimes committed before April 1998, and that is what we are trying to do. The proposals were published about two and a half years ago and are a necessary part of ensuring that we follow the process through to its conclusion. I understand the anger that they provoke; it is very natural, especially from those who suffered so much from acts of IRA terrorism. However, I believe that they are a necessary part of securing the overall agreement.

Mr. Kennedy: Why will not the Prime Minister provide direct linkage in the legislation to the early release scheme, which involves a proper court process? Many who, like the Alliance party and others, have worked tirelessly for reconciliation in Northern Ireland are asking a simple question: why will not the Prime Minister put the victims of terrorism higher up the priority list?

The Prime Minister: The special judicial tribunal has the powers of a criminal court. It is true that this is a special procedure, because the circumstances are special. As for the right hon. Gentleman's remark about putting the victims of terrorism higher up the political agenda, it is precisely for that reason that, over the past eight years, I have worked to try to make sure that the Northern Ireland peace process succeeds. If it does succeed—we have come a long way in eight years—it is sometimes because we do things that are uncomfortable and difficult, but none the less necessary. It is called, I am afraid, making difficult political decisions.

Sir Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): Having just returned from the first ever Inter-Parliamentary Union delegation to the Palestinian territories, applauding my right hon. Friend's commitment to peace between Israel and Palestine, and recognising the Israeli need for security, may I ask him to make representations to the Israel Government about their building of the separation wall deep into Palestinian territory, turning old Hebron into a ghost town by building gates and turnstiles in the streets and obstructing Palestinian movements with 600 permanent checkpoints, plus flying checkpoints? Does he not agree that peace will not be possible if the Israelis persist in turning Palestine into a fragmented police state?

The Prime Minister: We have continually made representations about the wall or the fence. However, we should recognise that, in addition to trying to normalise relations between the Palestinian Authority and the Israeli Government, it is important that all forms of support for terrorism on the Palestinian side cease as well. If the terrorism stops, we have a better opportunity to make sure that relations between the two sides can be normalised.

Q3. [30881] Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): The Crown Prosecution Service in England and Wales has made welcome progress in recent years, but I hope that the Prime Minister will agree that conviction rates of fewer than two in three for sexual offences in a quarter of the country, fewer than two in three even for homicide offences in four areas, including London, and about two in three for all violent crimes leave room for improvement. Will he tell the House how he proposes to increase the success rate, so that more serious offenders are prosecuted and successfully convicted?

The Prime Minister: The main part of what the Crown Prosecution Service is doing now is working in a far more integrated way with the police to make sure that charges are properly brought and that therefore prosecutions can be successfully mounted. In respect of sexual offences, although there is an increase in the number of recorded crimes, it is important to realise that that is in part because we are asking more of the victims of sexual offences to come forward. Sometimes, however, it is difficult to secure convictions in those types of case, but we continually look at how we can improve the situation. Overall, the Crown Prosecution Service—as, indeed, the hon. Gentleman implied in the first part of his question—is working a lot more effectively than a few years ago.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West and Royton) (Lab): My right hon. Friend told the Liaison Committee yesterday that the Government have got to take on nuclear power. Why does he believe that, when we are already comfortably meeting our Kyoto climate change target and can clearly meet future, more exacting targets with a steady expansion of renewables, when nuclear is more expensive than wind power, coal and gas, when it has already generated more than 10,000 tonnes of undisposed of highly toxic nuclear waste, when it creates an obvious major terrorism—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the Prime Minister knows that the right hon. Gentleman is displeased about this matter.

The Prime Minister: Let me say to my right hon. Friend that the reason why I think that this has to go on the agenda for discussion is very simple. It is true that we will meet our Kyoto targets—the Government have played a major part in the action on climate change—but it is also true that by 2020, the amount of energy coming from nuclear power will decline from just over 20 per cent. to 4 per cent. It will be difficult to try to meet all that through renewables or additional gas. That is why we need a proper and thorough debate on the issue, and I look forward to joining that debate with my right hon. Friend.

Future Aircraft Carriers

Q4. [30882] Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): When he expects the future aircraft carriers to be brought into service with the Royal Navy.

The Prime Minister: We are committed to delivering this important capability in a time scale that meets the requirements of the Royal Navy. We will set the dates when the carriers will be brought into service when we are ready to commit to manufacture.

Dr. Lewis: If, as the Prime Minister now suggests, it is not appropriate to set target delivery or in-service dates until the order is placed, can he tell me why his own Defence Ministers on five occasions between April 2004 and June 2005 told both Houses of Parliament that the target in-service dates would be 2012 and 2015? Why are they no longer prepared to say that?

The Prime Minister: The reason for giving those dates was the way in which the existing carriers get phased out. Those are possible dates, but we cannot give a firm commitment to a date until we are ready to commit to manufacture. That simply cannot be done at the present time. As I say, it is perfectly possible that those dates will be the dates that we choose in the end, but at this time we cannot give a firm date until the commitment to manufacture is in place.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a closed question.

Engagements

Q5. [30883] Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): Last week, the local inspector threw out plans for 3,000 houses in Basingstoke because he felt that local communities could not cope with the scale of building. Is it not time for the Government to stop dumping thousands of houses on Basingstoke and the rest of the south-east and to let local councils plan the future of their towns and villages?

The Prime Minister: No, I do not agree with the hon. Lady. It is important to ensure that we build enough houses in this country so that people, especially younger people, can access affordable housing. We try to do that in a planned way, but for the Conservative party to pretend that no new houses need to be built in the south at all is absurd.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley) (Lab): Has my right hon. Friend seen the shocking survey from Amnesty International that shows that a third of those questioned think that women who flirt or are drunk are partly responsible if they are raped? Will he support Amnesty's campaign against all forms of violence against women and assert that all such violence is totally unacceptable and liable to prosecution?

The Prime Minister: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that it is totally unacceptable and should be liable to prosecution.

Q6. [30884] Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): Last night, the House debated the straightforward motion

> "That this House endorses ... a cross-party consensus on carbon reduction."

Why did the Government vote against it?

The Prime Minister: Because until we work out the means of ensuring that there is carbon reduction, it is all very well for the Conservative party to join the Liberal Democrats and insist that the Government say that we must reduce carbon by a certain amount by a certain date—actually beyond the targets that we have already set—but they also need to be prepared to say how to do that. The one time we put forward a specific measure, namely, the climate change industrial levy, the Conservative party voted against it. When it has some serious propositions to make, we will listen, but while it continues to behave as if opposition were its natural state, we will not.

Q7. [30885] Dan Norris (Wansdyke) (Lab): This Friday, as part of anti-bullying week, Lib-Dem controlled Bristol city council will call on its teachers not to punish or blame pupils who bully other pupils. What message does the Prime Minister have for those who adopt a no-blame approach, which, in my view, is dangerous and reckless, does nothing for the victims and does nothing to make bullies change their behaviour?

The Prime Minister: If what my hon. Friend says is correct about the Liberal Democrats, then it is an extraordinary thing for even them to do and I am shocked by it. [Interruption.] To describe oneself as shocked by the Liberal Democrats is perhaps an oxymoron.

I profoundly disagree with the position taken by the council. Bullying should be punished. Children who bully must be made to understand the harm that they have been doing. New sanctions are available. I am pleased that in the schools White Paper we are giving teachers an unambiguous right to discipline. It is absolutely necessary, and I pay tribute to my hon. Friend's work on that serious problem.

Gas Supplies

12.30 pm

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD) (Urgent Question): To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to comment on the gas supply and market.

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): The facts are that so far this winter there have been no gas shortages and supply and demand have remained in balance. Demand from gas is being met by deliveries from the North sea and the rest of the UK continental shelf, the interconnector, imports through the Isle of Grain and storage. We are also seeing a reduction in demand from gas-fired power stations and some large industrial users of gas in response to increased prices.

Gas storage levels remain full or nearly full. National Grid's daily report for 21 November shows short and long-range storage as being at 100 per cent. and 98 per cent. respectively. Medium range remains at 66 per cent. pending the new Humbly Grove facility, which is in the process of filling up.

We will continue to liaise closely with National Grid throughout the winter.

John Hemming: I thank the Secretary of State for that answer. Will he confirm that on Saturday 93 GWh were taken from medium storage and 393 GWh from long-term storage; on Sunday 138 GWh were taken from medium storage and 469 from long-term storage; and on Monday 231 GWh were taken from medium-term storage and 496 GWh from long-term storage, which has maxed out at that rate? At that rate of withdrawal, we could breach the safety monitors during winter. At what point will the Secretary of State be concerned if that continues?

Malcolm Wicks: I should point out that I am not the Secretary of State. [HON. MEMBERS: "Yet."] Let us wait until the end of the winter.

The serious point is that in terms of the gas market, supplies are taken from storage from time to time. They are then filled up. Let us remember that the North sea is this country's natural storage. The market is building—it is a matter for the market, not for the Government—more storage facilities, with 10 new projects under way. Reports from National Grid this morning say that what is happening to the spot gas price is irrational. It tells me that it is awash with gas at the moment.

Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): While I understand that there is an issue about gas supplies, that has a bearing on the cost of gas to intensive energy users. Will my hon. Friend ensure that as soon as the cold spell is over, the price of gas will go down to what it was before? Will he meet pottery and ceramic manufacturers, who are concerned about the effects on production capacity of the price increase to £1.60 per therm?

Malcolm Wicks: Of course I will meet my hon. Friend's colleagues from industry. Since the spring, we have met intensive users of energy and their representative bodies. Most of business buys gas in the normal way, as do domestic customers. Globally, prices for energy are rising, often linked to the price of a barrel of oil. However, our prices are often lower than the median in the rest of the European Union. That is a fact. The particular problem is with intensive users of energy, who use gas as the feedstuff for producing chemicals, for example. They—not the Government—have chosen to buy on the spot market. It is one private company signing a contract with another, and they are suffering from very high prices. We are concerned about that and we are working with them, but as was said during Prime Minister's questions, the market is a liberal, commercial, privatised market in which judgments are made by private companies. We do not need someone posing as a shadow Stalinist Minister of Power saying that the Government should take command. To put the matter in context, the companies in question, although important British industries, represent 0.2 per cent. of companies that use gas and 0.05 per cent. of all companies in the UK. I am not complacent, but we have to put the present concerns in an intelligent and factual context.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): But the Government are responsible for the framework for long-term investment in the security of energy supplies in this country. Industry will be astonished to hear the Minister say that we are "awash with gas" when it faces the prospect of interruption to its gas supplies. The failure of the security of UK gas supplies reflects the failure of eight years of Labour energy policy.

We have not sought to provoke unnecessary anxiety about gas supplies, but we have been raising the issue with the Department of Trade and Industry for many years. I wrote to the Secretary of State weeks ago to ask about contingency measures, but he never replied. The right hon. Gentleman promised a debate on security of supplies, but we have not had it. Is it not astonishing that the Government have held their first meetings with industry only in the past few weeks?

Can the Minister confirm that for many industries the price of gas for delivery is five times higher than it was a mere four weeks ago? Does not that give the lie to the Prime Minister's claim that we are still paying the lowest prices in Europe? The Energy Intensive Users Group says

> "Industry is already facing the highest electricity and gas prices in Europe this winter."

Will the Minister for Energy inform the Prime Minister, who did not seem to know that? Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that the emergency summit at No. 10 on 9 November concluded that there is a very high possibility that industry will have its supplies interrupted?

Now that the Minister has done all the contingency planning that he claims to have done, will he tell the House who decides which businesses are cut off and to whom is that person accountable? Is it possible that gas-fired powered stations, which affect electricity supplies, will be cut off, too? Can he assure the House that every business that might have its supplies interrupted because of gas shortages has been informed and that they will not receive a fax five minutes before the gas is shut off, as has happened before? Have businesses been informed of the criteria that will determine which ones are shut down first? How much warning will they receive?

Does not the present situation, together with the splits and disputes going on in Government, underline the chaos of the Government's energy policy?

Malcolm Wicks: The last question was the simplest and the answer to it is: no. One or two people might be trying to talk up a crisis in gas prices, but the energy companies, most of business, the DTI, National Grid and Ofgem are not part of that. The more loose and totally inaccurate talk we hear, the worse the position may become.

The companies that have chosen—they have chosen, not I—to have contracts under which they buy on the spot market are suffering from high prices. I have acknowledged that and we are talking with the companies concerned, which include chemicals companies and some of the steel companies. However, let us look at the prices for medium-sized businesses—the hon. Gentleman might want to know the facts as opposed to the bluster. For such businesses, the latest figures available—for the summer—show that the price of gas is 17 per cent. lower than in Germany, 4 per cent. lower than in France and 4 per cent. lower than the EU median, and the price of electricity is 49 per cent. lower than in Germany, 10 per cent. lower than in France and 20 per cent. lower than the EU median. Those are the facts.

As for the hon. Gentleman's reference to a meeting at No. 10 Downing street, to suggest that my Department reacted only in mid-November is totally nonsensical. If he cares to table a written question—no, I shall write to him anyway detailing our meetings. In summer, I met representatives of the oil and gas industry operating in the North sea and the UK continental shelf to make sure that they were doing the repairs and had the spares necessary to ensure that they were in the best possible position this winter. I met the supply companies on two occasions—my officials have done so more often—to make sure that they are in the best possible position this winter. In November, the industry suggested that there were one or two other actions that we might wish to investigate, and of course we listened to their advice. However, to suggest that we are not prepared is nonsense.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): Has the Minister seen reports in some newspapers suggesting that domestic customers could be cut off? Will he take the opportunity to deny such scaremongering and confirm that even in the most severe winter, gas supplies to domestic customers will continue?

Malcolm Wicks: I am very happy to do so, because while we need to reassure business that its prices are not higher than the European average—we need reassurance as opposed to panic—it is even more important that householders, including some of our eldest and best, the vulnerable and the frail, are reassured. If those people hear that there may be energy cuts from reports that, in fact, are inaccurate, scaremongering nonsense, they may fear the effects of the cold weather that we are now experiencing. The domestic customer is not threatened at all, and through home energy efficiency schemes, winter fuel payments, the targeted focus of pension credit and so on, the Government are doing their best to make sure that elderly people are warm this winter. That is my first priority.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): The Minister said that his first priority is the elderly, so with the increased prices for energy, how many more people will suffer fuel poverty this winter compared with last winter? Will he emphasise the important lesson that we must improve energy efficiency and the housing stock so that people can keep warm in their houses and make best use of their energy?

Next Thursday, the Minister will chair the Energy Council of Europe. How does he plan to deal with what the European Commission has identified as serious malfunctions in the European energy market? While our liberalised market is connected to a malfunctioning market there are serious concerns about the way in which the latter market will impact on our market. What progress does he plan to make next Thursday in sorting out that market? He has held meetings with representatives from industry and UK continental shelf operations, but what meetings has he had with the Environment Agency to ensure that there is minimal impact on the environment and that we maximise the economic benefits this winter? Finally, while there are arguments about our relative position in Europe, the reality is that prices are going up this winter, which is a serious concern for the economy, especially for those parts that may be shut down.

Malcolm Wicks: The hon. Gentleman raised two or three serious matters. I chair the Energy Council during our presidency, and it meets next week, on 1 December. We have made it clear from the beginning of our presidency that the issue of market liberalisation in the rest of Europe was at the top of our agenda—indeed, it is the top item on the agenda next week. The Commission has published two major reports on the issue, and it has made it quite clear that there are "serious malfunctions" in the European market. We will discuss that with Ministers, and we need to take action, because we have market liberalisation in the UK, and we need it across the European Union. That is the policy, and it should quickly become practice.

On fuel poverty, I accept that prices are rising for the domestic customer. However, they are rising across the world, so we need to see the problem in a global context. Energy demand in China, for example, is increasing by 15 per cent. a year, and the hurricanes have not helped. There are therefore serious difficulties, but we must do our utmost to protect people to whom we refer as the fuel-poor. I tend to think of them as elderly and other vulnerable people who will be cold this winter. We have taken action on several fronts, as I detailed earlier, to protect that high-priority group.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend confirm that while increased demand is forcing gas prices up, the very fact that gas prices are connected to oil prices is also forcing the price up? Will he also confirm that last winter, at peak cold periods, 48 per cent. of our electricity was generated by coal stations, which are ready and available to produce electricity in cold periods this winter?

Malcolm Wicks: It is right to be reminded that we have a mixture of energy sources in this country, including the still very significant role of coal. For that reason, when the details of the energy review are announced by the Prime Minister, possibly quite soon, it will be a review of energy as a whole, contrary to what some people are speculating, and the future of coal will be one of the focuses of that important review. I am very mindful of that point.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): There will be a degree of scepticism about the Minister's claims about relative prices in Europe and the UK, but leaving that on one side, he has rightly highlighted, in answer to the question from the Liberal Democrats, the importance of the single European market in energy. When he came before the Trade and Industry Committee a few weeks ago, the Minister said that that was the highest priority, but there is not much sign of progress yet. He speaks about forcing compliance on other countries when he chairs the meeting next week. How does he intend to do that? Does he think that there is a realistic chance of making a breakthrough in those crucial negotiations? The market is determined by Governments, and the British Government have a golden opportunity to help resolve it.

Malcolm Wicks: There has been progress. The market has been the major focus during our presidency. The Energy Council does not meet till next week. Meanwhile, with our strong approval, the Commission has published two major evidence-based hard-hitting reports. Commissioner Piebalgs, whom I met earlier this week, is as enthusiastic as I am to drive the matter forward. I believe we will see real action on it. The hon. Gentleman expressed some doubts about prices. Whenever these issues are raised, I try to produce evidence—an old-fashioned hankering after the facts. I hope that might become more fashionable on the Opposition Benches. I have given the House some evidence already. Let me also say—I am surprised that the party of the market is not parading this more than I—that between 1990 and 2004, British industry paid an estimated £7.9 billion less than German industry for gas. Those are the facts, as opposed to the nonsense and the scaremongering.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): The Minister rightly refutes the suggestion that he has been in touch with industry only over the past few weeks. I know that he has met high intensive users, including the pottery industry, throughout the year, and they have told me they are grateful that the Government are listening. None the less, there is great concern about gas prices in particular. What can my hon. Friend do to assure the industry, including ceramics, about the prices that it will have to pay not only in the months ahead, but next year and in the future?

Malcolm Wicks: We have touched on some of that in relation to the importance of market liberalisation. The dialogue with the industry which, as my hon. Friend acknowledges, and I thank him for that, has been going on for a very long time at both ministerial and official level, is part of that process. One body of evidence to bring to bear on the debate at this stage is that there is now a great deal of investment in new infrastructure. I opened the Isle of Grain terminal yesterday, and I am told that the next ship will arrive today with liquefied natural gas. The Langeled pipeline to Norway is being built. There are many, many other projects, including upgrades of the interconnector, which will mean that in terms of the infrastructure of terminals, LNG and pipelines, we will have capacity for some 26 per cent. more gas in a year or so than we currently have. So the infrastructure and the investment by the private market are there.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): The Minister will understand that we in Scotland find it extraordinary that there is a gas shortage and rocketing prices, when we produce eight times the amount that we consume—indeed, we land at St. Fergus alone six times what we consume. He mentioned infrastructure, but does he accept that much of the problem in the UK as a whole with supply and rising spot prices is due to the lack of investment in the pipeline system over many years, leading to a lack of flexibility and capacity for storage to meet periods of exceptional demand? He spoke about improvements in infrastructure, but when can we go back to manufacturers in our constituencies and tell them that there is no chance of interrupted gas supplies in the future?

Malcolm Wicks: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman acknowledges the strong partnership between Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom. I have mentioned the investment that is now taking place, which should make an impact on the price issues. I repeat that for most of the economy, certainly for the domestic customer, the spot gas prices are not the relevant feature; they are for those companies who are the intensive users, using gas as the feedstuff for chemicals and other materials, who have chosen freely, as part of the private market, to sign such contracts, which often enable them to reduce their own demand at difficult times. But I hope that, with the extra supply of gas and more generally with the announcements that we have recently made about connecting up the Scottish islands to the national grid in terms of wind power, the situation will steadily improve. I expect it to.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): The Minister may have heard on the radio this morning the director of the interconnector saying that 30 per cent. of his capacity was not being used due to structural problems in the German gas market that were inhibiting our ability to obtain supplies. What does the hard-hitting report in the Energy Council to which he has just referred say that Germany should do and when should they do it by? Will he ensure that the matter is on the Prime Minister's agenda when he meets the new German Chancellor to ensure that we have some action on this by the end of the year?

Malcolm Wicks: The Prime Minister has recently talked about energy and energy strategy as an important component of the European debate, so he needs no reminding about the importance of that. I have acknowledged and talked about what needs to be done in terms of ensuring fair competition across Europe. We believe that liberalisation—an end to monopolies—is not only good for the UK consumer, but, critically, is also important for the German consumer, business and domestic, as well as elsewhere in Europe. That is why we are driving this forward.

One has to keep reminding the House that the interconnector is a matter for private enterprise; it was built not by the state or the EU, but by entrepreneurs with their money so they make the decisions about it. Nevertheless, I am advised that on a daily basis at the moment—these are bound to be average figures that will vary from day to day—some 25 to 30 million cu m of gas are flowing through the interconnector to Great Britain.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): The Government have no excuse for complaining about the state of the European market. Three years ago at the Energy Council there was a qualified majority in favour of imposing on France and Germany a liberalised market in gas and electricity by 2005. Mr. Brian Wilson, the Minister's predecessor, chose not to press the issue and to do a deal with the French and the Germans that has led to the compromise that means that now there is not a liberalised market in Europe, which is causing us precisely the problems that we are now experiencing with the Germans being able to withhold supplies to the United Kingdom through the interconnector. Equally, the Government failed to take decisions in the Energy White Paper, and now we are to have an energy review by the Prime Minister. Will the Government understand that they must face up to their responsibilities to take decisions in a timely fashion and not go on putting off difficult decisions because of the presentational problems?

Malcolm Wicks: I do not understand the reference to presentational problems, because the issue is top of the Energy Council agenda next week. We have put it there and we have consistently—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. When the Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen have an opportunity to question a Minister, I expect them to be silent for his reply.

Malcolm Wicks: It should be gas, not gassing, I think.

We have significantly pushed the issue within the EU. I have described the two new reports as hard hitting. The hon. Gentleman may want to read them one day. They are hard hitting. We need to push the matter through during our presidency, and after that. We do believe in market liberalisation; it is good for European business and good for British business.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): In evidence before the Trade and Industry Committee, we were told that wholesale gas prices in the United Kingdom were more than 50 per cent. higher than in the EU. When will the Government fight for a level playing field in the EU on the matter, or have they given up totally on the EU?

Malcolm Wicks: We are committed to the EU. Following my appearance before the Select Committee, we sent it some statistical evidence. I repeat that, when one looks at the record over 10 or more years and the data today, our gas prices, both for domestic customers and the business community, are lower than the median. The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) shakes his head. I can present him with the evidence; I cannot make him understand it. I have acknowledged—it is an important acknowledgement—that those heavy users choosing to buy on the spot market are having to pay very high prices, and we are doing our best to look at that and improve the situation. The market is through great investment.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): The Minister said that Britain does not need a strategic gas reserve, as we have for oil, because of the reserves in the North sea. Will he describe the circumstances and the legal powers under which, in an emergency, he could require private companies to sell into the market?

Malcolm Wicks: As I have explained, the contracts that some intensive users freely sign mean that in certain circumstances they will take less gas than in normal times. Some companies make money by selling it back to the grid. That is the reality of the market in that situation. It would be in only the most extreme and unlikely circumstances, in serious emergency conditions, that the state, via the national grid, might have to intervene. I answer the question because the hon. Gentleman asked it, but no rational commentator anticipates such a situation.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): The Minister has openly acknowledged that we now import gas through the interconnector. That has profound political implications, particularly with regard to the energy mix. Does he have a long-term policy on whether there should a limit on an acceptable level of gas imports?

Malcolm Wicks: My own Member of Parliament has asked me an important question. [Interruption.] I always think that how one votes is a secret. The hon. Gentleman raises an important question about national security and the geopolitics of energy policy, and that is a matter of growing concern. In 2004 we became a net importer of gas, as the hon. Gentleman knows, and in a year or so we will become a net importer of oil. Therefore, we are moving from energy island to a heavy dependence on imports of energy, notwithstanding the issues around coal and the contribution of renewables, and so on, which I could go into if we had more time. Therefore, as the Prime Minister said at the Labour party conference in Brighton—I do not think that the hon. Gentleman was there on that occasion—we now need rigorously to consider issues relating to our depending on some unstable parts of the world, and that will be an important dimension of the new energy review.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): The Minister has accused Opposition Members of scaremongering about the prospect of cuts in the gas supply. May I direct him to the comments made by the hon. and learned Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), a former Minister with responsibility for energy, in January 2005 in Westminster Hall, when he said that gas supplies could indeed run short if there were a cold snap this winter, or next winter? Will he take time to familiarise himself with those remarks, and perhaps look into what the hon. and learned Gentleman meant by that?

[Mr. Laurence Robertson]

Malcolm Wicks: We all recognise that the balance between energy supply and demand for two or three years is difficult. That is to some extent why we are having this discussion. Why is that? I am advised that it is partly because the rundown of oil and gas from the North sea and the rest of the UK continental shelf has happened at a faster rate than was being predicted only a few years ago. It is also because—it is regrettable but it is where we are—the heavy investment by the market in infrastructure, such as pipelines, liquefied natural gas terminals and the rest, is only now coming on stream, or will be in a year or so. I rather wish that it had been there a year or so ago. Of course I do. But there is this time lag. There is a tightness in the market, but domestic consumers will not be affected and most of business will not be affected, although high prices are now a global phenomenon. However, there is the issue, and I am repeating myself now, of the heavy users, which is where the difficulty is, if people have chosen, rightly or wrongly—it is their commercial judgment—to buy on the spot market.

BILL PRESENTED

CLIMATE CHANGE (CONTRACTION AND CONVERGENCE)

Mr. Colin Challen presented a Bill to make provision for the adoption of a policy of combating climate change in accordance with the principles of contraction and convergence; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 14 July, and to be printed. [Bill 92].

Registration Service

1 pm

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): I beg to move,

> That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision about certain offices under the Registration Service Act 1953; to make provision about the holders of certain offices under that Act and the appointment of persons to such offices; and for connected purposes.

I declare an interest as the honorary patron of the Society of Registration Officers in England and Wales. I was appointed to that position shortly after my election to Parliament in May 1997 and succeeded the former Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, Joyce Quin, when she was appointed Minister of State, Home Office, in the new Government.

Registration officers are appointed, accommodated and paid by local authorities, which also provide their pensions. However, because they are statutory officers, they have no legal employer, and only the Registrar General at the Office for National Statistics in Pimlico has the power to dismiss them. A registration officer has duties and responsibilities imposed by the Marriage Act 1949, the Births and Deaths Registration Act 1953 and the Registration Service Act 1953.

Registration officers are held responsible for their own acts or omissions. As statutory officers, when they are dismissed they have no right of appeal against unfair or constructive dismissal to an employment tribunal. The Registrar General will hear an appeal, but only if new material evidence is available. My Bill will result in the post holders becoming employees of the local authority. Notwithstanding that, they would retain their statutory duties under the Registration Acts. My Bill will also result in consequential amendments to the Registration Service Act 1953.

The Bill has the full support of the Government, the Registrar General and the Front-Bench spokesmen for the two major Opposition parties, whom I thank for their support. It also has the full support of the representative organisations of the employees whom it will affect, namely their professional organisation, SORO, Unison, the employer's organisation and the Local Authority Co-ordinators of Regulatory Services.

My Bill is non-controversial. It would bring the employment of registration officers into line with all those currently employed by local authorities, and would impose no additional financial burden on local authorities. When registration officers change their status and become local authority employees, there will be no redundancies and their existing pay and conditions will be unaffected. Moreover, there will be consultation in accordance with a national joint council agreement that is being negotiated between the employer's organisation and Unison.

There are currently 1,700 registration officers, who are known as principal officers, working in accommodation provided by local authorities, and they will be affected by my Bill. In the past 10 years, 18 of them have been dismissed from their posts. Since 1997, I have tabled several written and oral questions and suggested a debate on the issue more than once at business questions, and I held an Adjournment debate in Westminster Hall in June 2003. I have lost count of the number of Ministers whom I have dealt with, in both the Treasury and the Department of Trade and Industry, in an attempt to correct the anomaly that this Bill would right.

Following my early lobbying, I learned that the White Paper "Fairness at Work" contains a proposal to allow existing employment rights to be extended to all statutory officers and that section 23 of the Employment Relations Act 1999 provides a way forward. The DTI embarked on a consultation exercise on section 23 of the 1999 Act in 2003, which is known as the employment status review, and a statement about the use of section 23 is expected towards the end of this year or the beginning of the next.

Section 23 allows the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to make an order, subject to the affirmative resolution procedure, to extend to persons who do not currently enjoy them certain employment rights, but an employment order under section 23 has not yet been made. In parallel with those DTI procedures, the Treasury planned a major reform of the civil registration service, the first since the service was established in 1837.

In September 1999, the Registrar General published a consultation paper, "Registration: Modernising a Vital Service", which resulted in the publication in January 2002 of the White Paper "Civil Registration: Vital Change". The Government announced that civil registration reform would be delivered by means of the order-making powers in the Regulatory Reform Act 2001, and another consultation document, "Civil Registration: Delivering Vital Change" was published in 2003. The document proposed that the titles of superintendent registrar, registrar of births, marriages and deaths or additional registrar of marriages should disappear, and that local authorities should become the legal employers of all those involved in the civil registration service, in which case the demarcation between registration officers at marriage ceremonies and registering births, deaths and marriage events would cease.

The first of two planned draft orders, the Regulatory Reform (Registration of Births and Deaths) (England and Wales) Order 2004, was laid before Parliament on 22 July 2004. It is the largest regulatory reform proposal ever presented to Parliament, with 68 articles and 15 schedules amending 20 Acts. The House of Commons Regulatory Reform Committee report on the first draft order was published in December 2004. It rejected using delegated legislation to reform the civil registration service or the part of it that deals with births and deaths. A second regulatory reform order was planned to reform the civil registration service relating to marriage, but it has not been laid. The House of Lords Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee also rejected the first draft order. Both Committees regarded the overall package of proposals as an inappropriate use of the powers in the 2001 Act.

On 16 November this year, the Financial Secretary launched a further consultation paper, "Registration Modernisation", which sets out how local authorities are to be given greater responsibility for the delivery of the local registration service. It also contains details of other important changes to modernise civil registration. Some of these changes will require primary legislation, and further delays are inevitable. Because of that, I beg leave of the House to introduce this Bill, which in the meantime will remove the uncertainty that has hung over the employment of registration officers for so long and which will deliver them the right of appeal to an employment tribunal should they be unfairly or constructively dismissed. Surely that is what this House wants in the 21st century? I therefore commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): I was going to start by saying that I hesitate to intervene in a matter in which the hon. Gentleman has such expertise, but as you know, Mr. Speaker, I rarely hesitate to do any such thing.

I want to say a few words because I have been contacted by a registration officer, who has expressed some concern about the process that the hon. Gentleman has described and the way in which it has been conducted. My reservations are more about process than about content, although I must say that when I see a Government paper that begins with, "The modernisation of", my blood runs cold and I have serious reservations.

I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's long-standing interest in the subject and his expertise, and I defer to them. I am glad to see that the Financial Secretary is on the Front Bench, because the Bill that the hon. Gentleman is introducing has two problems.

First, I suspect that he is trying to implement what should be Government policy by using the private Member's Bill route. I say to him in all friendliness that if he thinks that that will be a method of quickly delivering the solution that he seeks, he could not be more mistaken. Whatever date he selects for his Bill, it will already be some way down the order because most of the primary slots have already been taken. There is therefore little chance of its being debated and agreed by the House. I hope that he does not raise too many expectations about his Bill, because choosing this route is naturally hazardous.

Secondly, the Bill is at cross purposes with the very consultation process that the hon. Gentleman openly describes. As recently as 16 November, the Financial Secretary said:

> "the Government announced that they would actively consider other ways of delivering the key elements of civil registration modernisation."—[Official Report, 16 November 2005; Vol. 439, c. 51WS.]

He went on to say that the consultation paper, "Registration Modernisation", had been published on the same day. That paper gives a deadline for reply to the consultation in February.

My question is therefore this: is it reasonable to expect the House to agree to the hon. Gentleman's Bill, which deals with matters in the consultation paper, when the consultation has hardly started and before the end period for the consultation in February? That strikes me as being a somewhat bizarre way of going about things and, to put it mildly, puts carts before horses. I appeal to the House not to approve the Bill today but to wait until the consultation process has been completed. There is some unease among registration officers about the speed with which this has been done, about whether full consultation has been allowed, and about whether individual officers have been able to express their point of view fully.

[Mr. Eric Forth]

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will have a quiet word with his colleague, the Financial Secretary, so that they can sort out exactly what they are trying to do—the Government on the one hand and the hon. Gentleman on the other—and try to match more closely the consultation process with the suggested track of the Bill. If it survives today, some of us will be keeping a very close eye on it in the hope that it does not ultimately conflict with the consultation process or with the unease that is being expressed by registration officers outside the House.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 23 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business), and agreed to.

Bill ordered to brought in by Dr. Brian Iddon, Mr. David Anderson, Mary Creagh, Jim Dobbin, Kelvin Hopkins and Mr. David Kidney.

REGISTRATION SERVICE

Dr. Brian Iddon accordingly presented a Bill to make provision about certain offices under the Registration Service Act 1953; to make provision about the holders of certain offices under that Act and the appointment of persons to such offices; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 2 December, and to be printed [Bill 78].

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I tabled two questions to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland with a named date of reply of 17 November. They related to the Bill that we are about to consider. I have as yet received no reply to those questions. Can you advise hon. Members what action they should take when such replies are not received?

Mr. Speaker: I have taken some advice to help the hon. Gentleman out. He has put the matter on the record, and he should follow that up with further questions. Perhaps he should make another visit to the Table Office. That is the piece of advice that I would give him at the moment.

Mr. Forth: A nod is as good as a wink.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman is right.

Orders of the Day

Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: I inform the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition and the Liberal Democrats.

1.15 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Hain): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I am sure that the whole House will join me in expressing our sympathies and condolences to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) on the sudden and shocking death of his brother, Endel. All our concerns are with him and with the family. I know that it must be a terrible strain for him to be in the Chamber today. It is a mark of the duty that he gives to this House, and always has done, on this important issue that he is here. Will he please accept our sympathies?

Because I realise that this is a controversial Bill, not least among victims in Northern Ireland, I shall be especially generous with interventions, but if the House will allow me I would prefer to resist them until I have had a chance to set the context for six or seven minutes. I shall then be happy to take as many as possible.

Northern Ireland and Irish terrorism have, over the generations, presented unique challenges to this House, to Governments of both parties, to the forces of law and order, and to society, particularly in Northern Ireland but also in the rest of the United Kingdom. This House, and successive Governments of both parties, have been faced with difficult—often exceptional—problems to deal with. As a result, Ministers have had to adopt exceptional policies—and, in recent times, abnormal measures—to normalise Northern Ireland, so that today it enjoys more peace, stability and prosperity than ever.

I believe that the proposals in the Bill should be considered in that light. It sets out to deal with one of the most difficult and sensitive issues that the Government have faced in the long and complex process of taking Northern Ireland forward—that is, those terrorist suspects who are "on the run" outside the reach of our police or our courts.

Anyone who is, or has been, involved in trying to make political progress in Northern Ireland will know that having to take difficult decisions is no new experience. The former Prime Minister, John Major, knew that only too well when he took the decision to begin the engagement that would ultimately lead to the Good Friday agreement. That engagement with the IRA at that time was difficult—very difficult. It was unpalatable to many people, not least in this House, but it was right. And because it was right, it had the support of the then Labour Opposition. John Major and his colleagues, Lord Mayhew, Lord Brooke, and the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) paved the way for the Good Friday agreement signed under our Government in 1998. Their role was as crucial as it was courageous. It was attacked and criticised just as our Government are today, but it had the support of the then Labour Opposition.

The agreement required all sides to compromise and meant taking immensely difficult decisions, not least that on the early release of prisoners, which was completed in 2000. Victims of the troubles were, understandably, in uproar at the sight of murderers or former terrorists walking free, but it was the right thing to do to seal the agreement. However, it left unresolved an equally difficult matter: the issue of what to do about those who had committed terrorist offences before 10 April 1998 and who, had they been in prison at the material time, would have been part of that early-release scheme.

It is important that the House recalls that this has not suddenly materialised. I remind the House that it was raised with the British and Irish Governments at Weston Park in July 2001, but, rightly, was not dealt with then because not enough progress had been made on bringing an end to paramilitary activity. It was raised again in April 2003 in the talks that led to the joint declaration between the British and Irish Governments in May 2003, and a statement for the record was published at that time. It was not dealt with then—again, rightly—because not enough progress had been made on bringing an end to paramilitary activity.

It is not disputed that the IRA statement of 28 July, ending its violent campaign was of great, indeed historic, significance. That statement, with the subsequent decommissioning of the totality of its weaponry, verified by General de Chastelain's Decommissioning Commission and the two independent clergymen in September, has fundamentally changed the political landscape. So now is the appropriate time to deal with this difficult issue.

I know that many people will find the Bill very hard to bear. I understand that. If I had not known it before, I was left in no doubt when I attended with the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) the annual prison officers' memorial service at Millisle on Remembrance day and spoke to widows of prison officers murdered by the IRA.

I also spoke to a man who, as a seven-year-old, had seen his dad gunned down next to him more than 20 years ago. I could still feel the pain and misery of a family torn apart. The decent and dignified people to whom I spoke on Remembrance day, together with the thousands of victims of over three decades of conflict in Northern Ireland and beyond, have suffered grievously. That is why one of Mo Mowlam's first actions in 1997 was to ask Sir Ken Bloomfield to look at practical suggestions about how the Government could best recognise the suffering endured by the victims of violence and their families.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Is not the very least that those bruised and wounded people can expect the appearance in a court in person of the murderous thugs who perpetrated that atrocity?

Mr. Hain: I understand the powerful arguments that have been made about the matter. We are trying to strike a difficult balance—[Interruption.] The House will make its own judgment. It is difficult to strike the right balance. In the end, I decided that it was more important to get more people through the process than would otherwise be the case—

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Why?

Mr. Hain: My right hon. Friend asks why. The decision was made to get closure not least for the victims—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must let the Secretary of State speak.

Mr. Hain: The point that the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) rightly made is the first matter that we should consider. It is probably the most sensitive issue in the Bill—I understand that. There is a question of balance and of whether we can get more people accounted for, brought to justice and convicted, if the evidence justifies that. The victims then have at least the satisfaction that the people who are now on the run outside UK jurisdiction or who might be uncovered by the historic inquiries will be brought to justice.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): Does the Secretary of State accept that the figures for deaths and for victims who lived but are scarred physically and mentally do not reflect the total number of deaths resulting from the Sinn Fein-IRA campaign of genocide, especially against the Protestant community? Does he accept that many deaths resulted from fathers and mothers with broken hearts and children who committed suicide because they could not face the reality of how their loved ones met their deaths at the hands of those murderous scum?

Mr. Hain: Indeed, I do. I fully agree with the hon. Lady. She knows better than me many of the victims and many who felt that life was not worth living after their loved ones were blown up and their lives destroyed. I greatly appreciate that point. As I shall make clear later, the Bill is aimed at bringing closure and an end to the murderous IRA campaign, which the 28 July statement achieved and was confirmed by General de Chastelain's statement on 26 September. The Bill is aimed at ensuring that the armed campaign is over and that there are no future victims of the IRA.

Mrs. Robinson: I thank the Secretary of State for giving way a second time. Does he realise that the Bill will bring not closure but more anger and pain, because those people relied on the Government to allow them to see justice done to those who perpetrated the heinous crimes?

Mr. Hain: That will happen if people are convicted—[Interruption.] There may not be sufficient evidence to convict them, but if they are convicted, they will have a criminal record and have to give DNA and other intimate samples. There will at least be such accounting and closure for the victims.—[Interruption.] I understand—we are all in the same boat. [HON. MEMBERS: "We are not."] We are—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are conducting a debate and the Secretary of State has a right to put the case before the House and to be heard. If there is so much shouting, I shall suspend the sitting. That is the danger—that no one else will get an opportunity to speak.

[Mr. Speaker]

Mr. Hain: Although I fully appreciate your point, Mr. Speaker, I also recognise the strong feelings—indeed, the anger—that the hon. Lady expresses. She knows from first-hand experience, as do many of her colleagues, the suffering that has gone on. All I would say to her—I stress that I do not make the point adversarially—is that, at the moment, the people whom the Bill covers are on the run, outside UK jurisdiction. There is the prospect—no more but no less—of bringing them into UK jurisdiction and putting them through a process of justice. If the tribunal convicts them, it will mean that they have a criminal record. That should be some comfort to the victims.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): The Secretary of State talks about bringing closure. Why does he insult the victims? It is bad enough to introduce the offensive and nauseating Bill, but to say that he is doing it for them—how insulting can the Secretary of State be? Has he not heard the victims say that they do not want this obnoxious Bill? If he had any decency, he would withdraw it immediately.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman is right—[Hon. Members: "Withdraw it."] He is right that the Bill is unquestionably hated by victims. I am sure that the RUC widows whom the Prime Minister and I will meet with the hon. Member for North Down this afternoon in Downing street will express the same point of view as the member of the Police Federation.

My point is that the Bill is about the closure of a dark, awful and murderous terrorist campaign by the IRA. That ought to be of benefit to the victims in the sense that, at the moment, nothing is being done about the people whom we are considering. The on-the-runs are beyond UK jurisdiction and that is no consolation to the victims.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): The right hon. Gentleman says that he will meet some of the victims from the police this afternoon. I hope that he realises just how deep, dark and terrible the cut to the quick of their souls is. Does he appreciate that the Bill is not closure when 202 police officers were murdered and nothing has been done? They were put into what the Chief Constable described as the cold. They were cold cases. No action has been taken over the deaths of loved ones who served in the Royal Ulster Constabulary and in the Army. How does the Secretary of State believe that the Bill, which wipes the stone clear, will ever close what is in the hearts, minds and souls of those people?

Mr. Hain: Again, the right hon. Gentleman knows more individuals than me who have suffered so grievously. It is not a question of bringing closure to their anguish—that is not possible. I am not presuming to suggest that. I am arguing that this legislation is part of an international agreement with the Irish Republic announced in 2003, and part of a process of bringing to an end this awful murderous activity and terror by the IRA—I agree with the hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs Robinson), who made clear her views about the IRA.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hain: Before I take more interventions, which I will be happy to do, I want to inform the House that the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson), and I have between us met representatives of the RUC George Cross Foundation, the RUC George Cross Widows Association, the RUC George Cross Parents Association, the Police Federation and the Superintendents Association. I also met many victims at Millisle on Remembrance day, as I explained earlier. I do not deny that the victims are very angry about this legislation, but the Government sometimes have to take a view on difficult decisions in order to make progress. That is what we have done.

Mr. Frank Field: When the Secretary of State says that the Government are seeking closure, does he realise that the House and, probably, many of the victims are actually seeking justice? They are also well aware that the Government are sending out conflicting messages. If someone is a white, murderous Protestant or Catholic terrorist, they might get closure, but we have another message for black Muslim terrorists if they attack us.

Mr. Hain: I find that suggestion reprehensible. The problem that my right hon. Friend and others are refusing to face up to is that these people are not being brought to justice now—[Hon. Members: "Why not?"] In the case of the on-the-runs, they are beyond UK jurisdiction—and have been for decades, in some cases. In the case of the historic inquiries, we are trying to use the new techniques available, including DNA, to track people down. This includes some of the cases involving murdered police officers rightly mentioned by the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley). We are trying to find out who was responsible for those historic cases, some of which go back almost 40 years, then arrest them and charge them. That will be pursued.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): Does the Secretary of State not recognise why people feel so strongly about this? My predecessor in my constituency bears daily the scars of IRA activity. He and his wife, who sits in a wheelchair, had to swallow very hard—as did I, and many others who had misgivings about the Good Friday agreement—as the Government moved again and again on these issues. But we swallowed. Does he not recognise that the difference now is that he is proposing to give people who ran away from their crime, and who have never been brought to book, the opportunity to avoid that completely? That goes far beyond anything that has happened before. Does he not recognise that people think that this is a grubby and reprehensible move by the Government, and that it is going one step too far?

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman made his point very powerfully, and I understand it. I would just make this point in return. He will recall the absolute outcry when the Conservative Government started talking to the IRA. Those early negotiations began a process—which this legislation is concluding—which led to the statement by the IRA on 28 July that no one here ever thought that it would make, namely, that it was giving up its armed, vicious, murderous terrorist campaign. The Bill is part of that process—[Interruption.] Well, it is, because it is part of the process agreed with the Irish Government in 2003—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. I understand how strongly hon. Members feel about this matter, but the Minister must be allowed to respond to one intervention at a time.

Mr. Hain: The point is that the Bill is part of the process announced in 2003, and part of the process that has led to the historic experience for the people of Northern Ireland of the IRA ending their terrorist war. There will therefore be no Provisional IRA victims in the future, as there have so grievously been in the past.

Mark Durkan (Foyle) (SDLP): In his opening remarks, the Secretary of State said that the Government had not moved earlier on this legislation because the IRA had not moved sufficiently on decommissioning. Of course, the Bill will benefit not only the IRA but the loyalist paramilitaries, who have made no moves on decommissioning whatever, so where is the logic there? The Secretary of State also suggests that the Bill somehow flows from the Good Friday agreement. Let me remind him that when the agreement was signed, yes, we sold it and promoted it on the basis that there would be prison releases within two years. We were told at the time that the key date for prison releases was after the date for the completion of decommissioning, but the Government then dropped that. We also assured the victims of crimes that had not been solved that their cases would still be pursued, even if it meant that the perpetrators would serve only two years in jail. That is what the victims were told by Ministers and by the parties, and that is why the victims are being betrayed by the Government today.

Mr. Hain: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's point about loyalist paramilitaries. Whether they are on the run or uncovered by the historic investigations, they will of course find themselves the target of this legislation.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Has the Secretary of State received any indication from the IRA or its political representatives that they will return to violence if he does not take this further step beyond the agreement?

Mr. Hain: No. However, rightly or wrongly—the hon. Gentleman takes the view that it is wrong, and I respect that; indeed, that view is being expressed very vehemently today, and I understand that—Her Majesty's Government entered into two agreements that have led to this Bill being introduced. The first was an international agreement with the Irish Government, and that cannot be lightly disregarded. Any responsible Government would have felt that that was the right thing to do to get to where we are—and we have got there. Secondly, as part of the negotiations that led to that process and then to the 28 July statement by the IRA, yes, this was one of the factors in those negotiations and an agreement was made there. Yes, this is following the 28 July statement, but it was part of the process that led to this historic change by the IRA, which I know was welcomed by the hon. Gentleman and every other hon. Member.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): Why is the Secretary of State attempting to hang his argument on the fact that the Bill affects on-the-runs? The majority of people who will benefit from it ran from no one. It will affect everyone who committed a terrorist crime before 10 April 1998, not just those who are on the run. Will he please explain why there are to be two different standards: one in Dáil Éireann and one here in Westminster? In Dáil Éireann, the killers of Garda McCabe are not to be brought within the scope of this legislation. Is a garda in the Republic of Ireland more valuable than an RUC man in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hain: No, of course not. I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but the Irish Government are responsible for bringing to justice—or not, as the case may be—cases within their own jurisdiction. That case does not fall within UK jurisdiction. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the Irish Government have chosen to address this issue by pardoning people. We are not doing that. We are making sure that people are brought to justice. He is right to say that the Bill affects not only those on the run outside UK jurisdiction but, potentially, those who are the subject of the Chief Constable's historic inquiries investigation. That investigation will involve a difficult process, and if it uncovers those who have been responsible for awful atrocities such as that in Enniskillen, for example, they will be arrested, charged and brought to justice. They can choose how to proceed.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): I stood in a mortuary and looked into the face—or part of the face—of a young girl, my cousin aged 21 and engaged to be married that day. I then asked to see my other cousin, her brother, aged 16, blown up by the IRA. He was not on a table. There was not enough to put on a table. His earthly remains were lying on the floor in a sheet. I ask the Secretary of State to tell me this: am I to bury justice to appease the murderers, the IRA?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman has made a powerful point very movingly, in a way that only he could, given the experience that he has described. I appreciate the emotion with which he made his point, and it is very compelling. Let me say in all good faith, however—and I accept his right to disagree with me vehemently—that one of the reasons why we were able to achieve an end to the IRA terror campaign and the IRA's statement of 28 July was the agreement that we made with the Irish Government to produce this legislation at the appropriate time.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): This morning on Radio 4, the Secretary of State referred to what he described as political prisoners. We take great offence at that description of terrorists. If the term is to be applied to one set of terrorists, why should it not be applied to all of them?

[Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson]

Do not the IRA men who murdered Garda Jerry McCabe fall into that category? Are they different from the murderers of RUC officers in Northern Ireland? The Secretary of State spoke of an international agreement that he had reached with the Irish Republic. Why do standards differ in the two jurisdictions?

The Secretary of State said earlier that he had met representatives of the Superintendents Association. Is he aware of the association's view that the Bill is so deeply flawed that it is potentially injurious to the overall administration of the criminal justice process in Northern Ireland and to public confidence therein? If that is the view of police superintendents in Northern Ireland, how can we be expected to support the Bill in the House?

Mr. Hain: That view was indeed expressed to my hon. Friend the Under Secretary, but not, on that occasion, to me.

I was not aware that I had used the term "political prisoners" on the radio. In fact, they are paramilitary prisoners. Let me correct the record for the benefit of the House. As for the way in which the Irish Government choose to treat this matter, we are not in favour of acting in that way in the United Kingdom, within our own jurisdiction. That is why, rather than engaging in a process of pardoning, we are introducing a process whereby although people will not have to serve in prison, if convicted they will be released on licence. If they breach the terms of the licence, they can be rearrested at any time.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Will the Secretary of State reflect on the wise words of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan), who has huge experience of these matters, and will he respond to the part of the hon. Gentleman's intervention to which he failed to respond earlier? This ill-thought-out and unpleasant legislation does not flow from the Belfast agreement, which many of us supported and for which most people in Northern Ireland voted in a referendum. It flows from deals done at Weston Park in 2001, and there is therefore no reason for it to be supported. It does not have the support of the people of Northern Ireland; neither does it have the support of most of those in the House who backed the Belfast agreement.

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman is correct to the extent that the Bill did not flow from the Belfast agreement—the Good Friday agreement. He said earlier today that it was negotiated well before I started my job. [Interruption.] I am not trying to shift the responsibility; I am merely correcting the record. As the right hon. Gentleman said, the process began at Weston Park in 2001 and was concluded in the joint declaration by the two Governments in 2003.

Mr. Dodds: The Secretary of State spoke of people being released on licence. That will give little comfort to the people of Northern Ireland, who are aware of the despicable way in which he behaved over the imprisonment of one Sean Kelly for breaching his licence conditions. Sean Kelly was released within weeks because the IRA had demanded his release as part of the price for its statement. The licensing provisions therefore do not give the people of Northern Ireland any reassurance. Does the Secretary of State accept that his attempts to defend this obnoxious legislation do not inspire confidence in Members of Parliament or in people outside this place?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman mentioned Sean Kelly. That was a unique situation.

Mr. Dodds: The next one will be as well.

Mr. Hain: That case was unique in that about six weeks after I had had Sean Kelly arrested—I was widely attacked for doing that, but it was the right thing to do—it was clear that the IRA had given up its terrorist campaign, as it was due to announce the next day, and that he had signed up to that. The situation was entirely different. I had Sean Kelly arrested because I was told by the Chief Constable that he was engaging in activity that constituted a breach of his licence.

The point I am making is that, under the Bill, anyone with a conviction who is released on licence and who breaches the terms of that licence can be hauled back. That cannot happen at present because such people are outside the United Kingdom's jurisdiction.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): The Secretary of State has referred seven times to two agreements—an agreement between the Irish and British Governments and an agreement between the British Government and Sinn Fein. Was it agreed with Sinn Fein that these criminals—these murderers—would never stand in a court of law? Was it agreed that they would never have to appear before any tribunal? Was that agreed by our Prime Minister?

Mr. Hain: A whole process of negotiation led to this position, but the hon. Lady is right to say that the Bill originated in the negotiations of 2001 and 2003.

Sir Patrick Cormack: As the Secretary of State has neither logic nor justice on his side, and as he is clearly deeply uncomfortable with the case that he is having to put to the House, why can he not accept the offer made to him on behalf of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee, which suggested that the Bill be referred for pre-legislative scrutiny? It cannot by any stretch of anyone's imagination be described as emergency legislation. Why can we not have time to take evidence and decide on the best way to deal with a problem that we acknowledge exists? Why does the Secretary of State persist with this tawdry measure, which is not worthy of him?

Mr. Hain: In all fairness, the hon. Gentleman did make that point to me when I gave evidence to his Committee a few weeks ago. Let me repeat what I said then. Pre-legislative scrutiny is an admirable process, initiated by this Government and by me and supported by me, but it cannot be applied to every Bill. This Bill is being introduced at this time as part of a sequence of events negotiated by both Governments some years ago.

The hon. Gentleman disagrees with me, as do many others, but we are fulfilling—I am fulfilling—an agreement made with the Irish Government and others.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has already described the Bill as unpalatable, which I think is parliamentary language meaning that it is abhorrent to many people because of the repercussions for victims. Some Labour Members may not be in a position to understand that, but we entirely understand where the Opposition are coming from.

Given what my right hon. Friend has said about the balance to be achieved, the Bill may be unavoidable. However, to reassure people that there is at least some justice in it, will he keep an open mind on the issue of appearance in court, which was raised by the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack)? He may agree with me that people would have a greater sense of justice if they saw the individuals involved standing in the courts.

Mr. Hain: I understand my hon. Friend's point, which was also expressed powerfully by the hon. Member for South Staffordshire. The Bill has a long way to go in order to complete its passage and we shall listen carefully to the arguments, but for reasons that I have explained the Bill provides that people will not have to appear in court. It was a difficult balance to strike, but it is the balance that we struck.

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): The Secretary of State sprinkled the term "justice" throughout his speech. He is not prepared to make certain people accede to a request to appear before a court—I ignore all the other measures in the Bill that do not require the perpetrator of a crime to appear or co-operate in any way—yet he is prepared to give them a licence, which, as we have heard, he can throw out against police advice at some later date. Will he explain how that can be viewed as "justice", and, if it is justice, what comfort is there in it? The victim does not see the perpetrator and the perpetrators do not have to appear, so where is the comfort for the victim?

Mr. Hain: If individuals who appear before the special court are convicted—the hon. Gentleman will understand that that will depend on the evidence—they will have a criminal record. [Interruption.] That is the point that I am making about a system of justice.

Let me also deal with the point about comfort. As I have said, I understand the anger of victims, but there is no comfort for them at all under present circumstances in which many of the people likely to come through the process are outside UK jurisdiction and evading justice. They will continue to evade justice, as far as anyone can see, for ever. Compared with that position—[Interruption.] They are evading justice, so the Bill represents an improvement, in my view, because those involved are brought through a proper process.

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): Was the commitment for defendants not to have to appear in court given in writing to the IRA? If victims can be subpoenaed to appear in court, while the perpetrator can be sitting in a pub down the road waiting for the result, how can the court achieve a fair and just result? If the perpetrator cannot even be questioned, how can the court get to the bottom of the matter and achieve a result that is fair and just? Will the Secretary of State explain that?

Mr. Hain: Some in absentia trials do occur, but I recognise the hon. Lady's point. Defendants might well choose to appear before the special court because they do not want the sentence that would result from the conviction. I repeat the point that I made and reconfirm that no assurance was given in writing to the IRA about this specific matter—[Interruption.] Of course no such written assurance was given.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hain: I face an abundance of hon. Members wanting to intervene. I give way to the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash).

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): A number of British soldiers have faced difficulties in regard to acts that they may have committed as a matter of duty under military law. Are some of those soldiers who have been convicted to be given pardons? It is outrageous that terrorists should get away with it, while soldiers who performed their duties under military law should be treated in that way.

Mr. Hain: I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman raised the matter with me earlier. In framing the final details of the Bill, I faced a choice. The original draft did not apply to members of the security forces at all. I took the view that, leaving aside the question of whether the Bill is right or wrong in principle—clearly, the hon. Gentleman and many of his colleagues oppose it—if we were to proceed with legislation that we believed to be essential, it would be entirely wrong for members of the security forces in the course of their duty to find themselves—[Interruption.]

Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con) rose—

Mr. Hain: I would like to finish the point and give the hon. Member for Stone the courtesy of replying to his question.

Members of the security forces may have committed a criminal offence in the course of their duty: it has happened in a handful of cases and who knows what might be uncovered in the future? For them to find themselves serving a prison sentence when members of the IRA and loyalist terrorists could be walking free would, I thought, be entirely wrong. That is why I gave members of the security forces—including, in principle, serving soldiers now—the choice of availing themselves of the special procedure. If they found themselves charged—and only if they found themselves charged—with a crime uncovered as a result of historic inquiries, I felt that it would discriminate against them in comparison with the IRA or loyalist terrorists to deny them the opportunity of taking advantage of the provisions.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): The Secretary of State repeatedly used the word "closure", and subsequently made it clear that it has nothing to do with the victims, but apparently with violence. Will he explain how allowing those who are genuinely on the run abroad to come back to the UK to send a text message to the Secretary of State's wretched commissioner—that is virtually all that they have to do—will somehow make it safer for people who live perhaps in the very street to which those people return to live?

[Mr. Julian Brazier]

Mr. Hain: If they come back, they will initially apply to the commissioner. If they return to Northern Ireland or any other part of the UK after the commissioner has issued a certificate—the contents of the certificate are determined not by the on-the-run suspect, but by the Police Service of Northern Ireland—they will be arrested. It is a matter for the police—it is not a question of simply texting something and appearing the next day in the Falls road—and there is a proper judicial process to go through.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): May I offer my personal condolences to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), with whom I was at university for three years?

The Secretary of State is well aware of the scepticism among some elements of the Protestant community in Northern Ireland about the detailed implementation of aspects of the Good Friday agreement. Everyone knows that. However, the Bill goes beyond that agreement. How will confidence be improved among the Protestant community, most of whom will see this grubby little Bill for exactly what it is—a capitulation to Adams and McGuinness?

Mr. Hain: The Good Friday agreement—[Interruption.] No, the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds), for whom I have a great deal of admiration, should realise that it is not a question of not caring. I really do not accept that. It is a matter of the Government taking responsibility to bring closure not to the victims' anguish—that can never be done—but to the IRA terrorist campaign, which we have now succeeded in doing under the 28 July agreement. The Good Friday agreement started that process, but it did not conclude it. One of the reasons for introducing the Bill is as part of an agreement that did conclude that process.

Let me say, in all fairness, to right hon. and hon. Members that this legislation is—as the hon. Member for South Staffordshire, the Chairman of the Select Committee, reminded me—extremely difficult. I understand that and I appreciate the strong feelings involved, the anguish of the victims and the anger felt among elected Members of Parliament of all parties in Northern Ireland. I appreciate all that, but to reach a position in which the IRA has ended its vicious war and terrorist campaign required us to introduce, among other things, the Bill before us. That is the reason for introducing the Bill—[Interruption.] I would also suggest, however much it might be denied, that any responsible Government—including a Conservative Government—who had reached the point of persuading, forcing and cajoling the IRA to give up its terrorist campaign would have faced exactly the same circumstances that I now face.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): The Secretary of State cannot be allowed to get off with the pretence that Weston Park somehow concluded the business of the Good Friday agreement. The distinction is that the Good Friday agreement involved the agreement of all parties, whereas Weston Park involved that of only two. If the Government have made certain undertakings that are not in their power to deliver, they cannot now seek to get our imprimatur for those agreements.

Mr. Hain: For the historical record, the hon. Gentleman must know that one of the reasons the Democratic Unionist party opposed the Good Friday agreement was that it did not bring closure to the IRA's terrorist campaign. We have now done that. [Interruption.] Hon. Members can go back to the history and form their own judgments, but the agreement did not achieve that closure. The Bill is part of a commitment to make sure that we have delivered an end to that murderous and terrible campaign.

I have been taking interventions for quite a long time now. I need to make some progress, but first I shall give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey).

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): The Secretary of State continues to say that the Bill is about the IRA, not the victims. Supposedly, the IRA has said that the war is over, so why are we introducing this Bill? Is my right hon. Friend saying that if Parliament turns down the shoddy little agreement that the Government and Sinn Fein-IRA have signed up to, the IRA will say that the war is on again?

Mr. Hain: No, I am not saying that. In fact, I expressly did not do so.

Mr. Dodds: Why introduce the Bill then?

Mr. Hain: Why? It is because we made an agreement to do so. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Indeed, and the agreement was with the Irish Government.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hain: No, not for the moment, as I am trying to answer the question posed by my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall. She and other hon. Members may say that we should not have made that agreement, but without it there would have been no guarantee of an historic end to the IRA's campaign. That is the point.

Mr. Dodds: Blackmail!

Mr. Hain: It is not blackmail. To get to the end of a conflict as ancient and bitter as the one in Northern Ireland, which has caused—

Mr. Dodds: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hain: No, I have given way to the hon. Gentleman before and will do so again, but I think that I have the right at least to make my case in answer to the question.

If it had not been ended, that historic and murderous terrorist campaign would have created even more victims in the future. That is the point, and the Government have taken a tough and difficult decision.

Mr. Dodds: Shameful!

Mr. Hain: I started taking interventions some half an hour or more ago, at which time I was explaining that Mo Mowlam started the process by acknowledging that victims had suffered grievously during the Northern Ireland conflict. We all know that, in many respects, their cases had been appallingly neglected for decades, by all Governments. That is why she brought victims' issues to the heart of Government with the creation of the world's first Minister for victims. That is why the memorial fund was set up, and why we have recently provided it with a further £1.5 million. It is also why Her Majesty the Queen recognised the valour and sacrifice of the Royal Ulster Constabulary with the George Cross, and today marks the fifth anniversary of that award. Without those officers' sacrifice, the dramatic improvements in the security situation evident today could not have come about.

It is also why I have appointed Northern Ireland's first victims' commissioner, Mrs. Bertha McDougall. She is the widow of an RUC officer who, in addition to other tasks, will prepare the ground for a victims and survivors forum.

I have met many victims of the troubles since taking up this job, some with most horrific stories of loss, pain and continued suffering. Quite properly, those stories have been brought to Members' attention by members of the Democratic Unionist party in particular. I would not presume for one second to tell any victim that they must draw a line under the past. I cannot, and would not, tell anyone who has suffered such a unique and personal loss that they must close a door on their pain and move on.

There are times, however, when a Government must take a view on the best way for society as a whole to move on, so as to get closure on the past, difficult as that may be. This is one such time.

The Government are trying, in all good faith, to bring about what the agreement itself described as the

> "true memorial to the victims of violence"— that is, a peaceful and just society in Northern Ireland in the future.

I recognise entirely the difficulty of this step. If I had not done so already, that difficulty has been made very clear in the debate. However, I believe that it is necessary, as do others who have been involved in the Northern Ireland peace process.

For example, I met the former Taoiseach, John Bruton, in Washington last week. He is well known to many hon. Members, and much respected for his unswerving stand against terrorism in Ireland. He has given me permission to inform the House of what he told me. He said that he regards this Bill as a painful but necessary step towards completing the translation from the years of pain and conflict. I agree exactly with those sentiments.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Wallace: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hain: I need to make some progress, and then will give way again.

The Government believe that, if Northern Ireland is finally to move out of the conflict that has scarred the past four decades, we have to deal with this outstanding issue left unresolved by the 1998 agreement. That is what the Bill does.

Even before this Bill was introduced, there was much talk of "amnesty". This is no such thing. Under this Bill, individuals could be tried, sentenced and subject to recall to prison for their crimes if they broke the conditions imposed on them. That is not an amnesty.

The House should be under no illusion. The choice is stark: either many of these people continue to run free, never having to account for their crimes, or we put them through these special procedures to face the possibility of conviction.

Mr. Dodds: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hain: I will, in time.

The choice in many cases is between failing to bring the people involved to justice at all—effectively doing nothing about them—and these special procedures. That is the choice, and the Bill makes it clear that what is proposed is not an amnesty.

The Bill sets out a two-stage process. The first stage is an eligibility process, and the second a judicial process. Clause 1 sets out the offences to which the legislation will apply. They are offences committed before the Belfast agreement in connection with Northern Ireland, including offences committed in any part of the UK, escapes and offences committed by members of the security forces.

The Government were mindful—

Mr. Dodds: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wallace: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hain: I shall finish this point, and then take an intervention from the hon. Member for Belfast, North. The Government were mindful of the need to ensure that members of the security forces and the police who may have committed acts of unlawful violence before the Good Friday agreement are not disadvantaged. It is not a question of treating them as equivalent to terrorists, but of making sure that they suffer no discrimination. It would be totally unjust and offensive if they were to face imprisonment while former terrorists did not.

Provided that they meet the criteria set out in the Bill, members and former members of the security forces and the police will be covered by this legislation. I do not expect more than a handful, if that, of such people to be affected, and remind the House that only a handful have been affected by prosecutions in the past.

Mr. Dodds: The Secretary of State will have noted the deep anger caused by putting members of the security forces and the police on an equivalent basis with terrorists. That is absolutely outrageous. On a number of occasions, he has said that the choice is between allowing people to go free and putting them through the process that he has outlined. However, is not the reality that there is no question of putting them through any process? The matter is entirely voluntary. If people are approached by the police with evidence, they are not required to confess their crime, or to do so within any particular time limit. The provision amounts to a get-out-of-jail-free card that they can keep in their back pockets until such time as the police come looking for them. No choice is involved at all. Will the Secretary of State deal with that?

[Mr. Dodds]

Mr. Hain: It is a matter of choice, and we can explore the question of time limits in greater detail as the Bill progresses through the House.

David T.C. Davies: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hain: No, as I am answering the hon. Member for Belfast, North.

The problem of time limits was considered when we drafted the Bill. The practical difficulty is determining how long such a limit should be. What is the sensible period? We want the process to be carried forward, but at the same time we must make sure that it does not go on for ever. As the hon. Member for Belfast, North knows, the Bill gives me powers to end the process at any time.

I want to make one other point in response to the hon. Gentleman. It is a stark choice in the sense that at present the people on the run, outside UK jurisdiction, have no incentive to come back and face justice, and get a criminal record, which many of them would do.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: I thank the Secretary of State for giving way to me a third time. Does he understand that the people of Northern Ireland cannot trust the word of this Government? Our Prime Minister came to Northern Ireland in 1998 and promised that there would be no terrorists in government and no prisoners released unless and until decommissioning was resolved. In the last election, the Democratic Unionist party received more than 231,000 votes, which indicates that the Protestant community in Northern Ireland oppose the Belfast agreement. It is about time that the Government realised that they do not have the Belfast agreement to follow.

Mr. Hain: I acknowledged that the hon. Lady's party, for reasons stated at the time and repeated since, opposed the Good Friday agreement.

Mr. Donaldson: The Secretary of State referred to the ongoing historic inquiries, and I presume that he includes the Saville inquiry. He will recall that the greatest loss of life suffered in Northern Ireland was experienced by the Parachute Regiment at Narrowater Castle, near Warrenpoint. No one has ever been brought to justice for the murders of those soldiers. Indeed, the perpetrators of that atrocity can avail themselves of the facility that the Secretary of State proposes. However, the absurd position is that if members of the Parachute Regiment are charged as a result of the Saville inquiry, they can clear their names only by going through the full judicial process, because one has to plead guilty to benefit from this system. They will face the full rigour of the law if they want to clear their names, but those who murdered the paratroopers at Narrowater will walk away scot-free.

Mr. Hain: I am sorry, but that is factually incorrect. First, if the individuals responsible for Warrenpoint are identified, arrested and prosecuted as a result of the Chief Constable's historic inquiries investigation, it is only the first stage. They cannot opt to enter this process until they have been arrested and charged and, in that sense, brought to justice—[Interruption.] I have dealt with that point. It is true that they can then elect to go through this special procedure, following which they may be convicted and get a criminal record. That is one set of circumstances.

I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has sought clarification because he is not correct about the possible position for former paratroopers. I do not know whether any will be affected by the Bill. At the moment, before the Bill is enacted, if an individual were identified by the Saville inquiry, he would face a normal criminal trial, if the police arrested and prosecuted him, and a sentence would follow conviction. When the Bill is in place, the person could choose—the Government would not force him and, indeed, the Bill will not force anyone to do anything—to go through the special court process and could end up, yes, with a conviction, but able to take advantage of the licence system and walk away. In that sense, the person would be advantaged by the legislation or, at least, not disadvantaged compared with former terrorists.

Mr. Donaldson: Will the Secretary of State clarify whether the tribunal system would give the former members of the Parachute Regiment who may face charges under the Saville inquiry the opportunity to clear their names? Will they receive proper justice under this system?

Mr. Hain: Indeed it will. They could plead not guilty. As a result of the Saville inquiry, if any soldiers are charged with a serious offence—even murder—they could plead not guilty and choose to go through the special process—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hain: I am sorry, but the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) has raised an important point and I am glad that he seeks clarification of it from me. The soldiers could choose to take advantage of what for them could be a beneficial process—[Interruption.] It could be beneficial for them, because otherwise they would go through the normal court process and possibly be convicted and serve a sentence. It would be a beneficial process. They could still plead not guilty and the evidence would have to stack up before they could be convicted. It is the same Crown court-type procedure in the special courts as the alternative route.

Mark Durkan: I thank the Secretary of State for giving way, because the specific example of Bloody Sunday that he is using occurred in my constituency. Obviously, much of the Saville inquiry also took place in Derry. Will he further confirm that if paratroopers who might face charges as a result of the Saville inquiry elect to use this process, they would not have to appear in court at any stage? On the basis of the controls and limits that the Secretary of State will have power to put on the information disclosed, their names might never have to be heard by anyone and other pieces of information about their case could be suppressed. Will the Secretary of State clarify that provision?

Mr. Hain: I know the sensitivity in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and the city of Derry about this matter—[HON. MEMBERS: "Londonderry."] Well, it depends on which side of the community one sits. I call it both in order to take matters forward—[Interruption.] To clarify the point that the hon. Gentleman makes, I say to him that he is right. The paratroopers who faced that situation, if any, would be treated in exactly the same way as anybody else going through the special tribunal court process.

Dr. Julian Lewis: As I understand it, the Secretary of State is saying that if a former serving soldier were charged and chose to try and resist acknowledging guilt, and opted to go through the whole judicial process, he might clear his name, but he could be found guilty. If he were found guilty, could he then use the new procedure to walk free? If he could not, he would in a sense have been blackmailed to accept a false rap and plead guilty in advance so that he could use the new procedure.

Mr. Hain: I thought that I had explained the position very clearly, but I am happy to clarify it again for the hon. Gentleman, because it is an important matter for him and, I suspect, for the whole House. It is certainly very important to me. The paratrooper, or any other member of the armed forces, would face a choice. He could plead not guilty or guilty to the charge. Let us say that the Saville inquiry identifies an individual, who is then the subject of investigation by the police, arrested, charged and faces prosecution. He can then choose. Normally, he would go through the existing criminal justice system—the normal Crown court route. He could plead his innocence throughout, but if convicted he could, in principle, serve a very long prison sentence. I took a deliberate decision—I need not have done so—to avail a soldier in that position of the option of the special process, which could leave him with a conviction, but still pleading his innocence, and with release on licence, so that he did not have to serve the sentence.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I congratulate the Secretary of State on giving way so much. I know that the whole House appreciates it. In answer to his most recent example, the big difference, which he does not seem to have spotted, is that no soldiers asked to go to Northern Ireland. They went because their Government sent them to hold the peace. Therefore, it is reprehensible to treat them on the same basis as terrorists who ran from their crimes.

The Secretary of State touched on an important issue. After all the interventions he has taken, he seems to have slid into a position where it is almost clear that he is saying that the Bill is not part of the Good Friday agreement and never was officially. However, is it now not clear that at the time of the Good Friday agreement and afterwards, through third parties—possibly the Irish Government—the Government gave a nod and a wink to Sinn Fein-IRA that when the end point of the agreement process was reached, they would get this new system if they kept their noses clean? The Government never said that at the time of the Good Friday agreement because they knew that it would never have been accepted in Northern Ireland or backed by all parties.

Mr. Hain: It is not a question of evading issues at the time of the Good Friday agreement. This is an unresolved issue, which the right hon. Gentleman, too, would face if he were serving as a member of a Conservative Cabinet at this time, and it will always remain an unresolved issue. He is absolutely right: it was not resolved under the Good Friday agreement. I said that freely earlier on. Where the right hon. Gentleman is not right, however, is that it was not smuggled in at the last minute. It was a matter of public knowledge, published in May 2003; the House was informed about it and all the detail was there.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hain: I want to respond to the first point made by the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith).

I know that the right hon. Gentleman is opposed to the legislation, but is he advocating that it would be right for a member of the security forces perhaps to serve a long prison sentence while a former terrorist walked free? Is he saying that that is what should happen?

Mr. Duncan Smith: What I am saying to the Secretary of State is clear: the legislation is wrong for everybody. He should have looked back at what the Saville inquiry is doing and recognised that it is attacking the very people who went to Northern Ireland at the behest of the Government but are now being treated as criminals. That, as well as the legislation, is wrong.

Mr. Hain: I understand and respect the fact that the right hon. Gentleman is opposed to the legislation and that he will vote against it. Of course he will. But I find it absolutely extraordinary, particularly as he is a former Defence spokesman for the Conservative party, that he could put members of our armed forces—perhaps serving members—in a position where they were discriminated against compared with former terrorists—[Interruption.]

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hain: I have been on my feet for an hour and 10 minutes—[HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] I give way to the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green.

Mr. Duncan Smith: The Secretary of State has accused me of something that is reprehensible. As someone who actually served in Northern Ireland and is proud to have done so, I take no lessons from him and nor does my party. I am absolutely opposed to the proposed process and I do not think it right for the Secretary of State to use British soldiers as a shield in defence of what is wrong. That is what is wrong with the legislation.

[Mr. Duncan Smith]

Mr. Hain: I acknowledge the role that the right hon. Gentleman played and the House will of course want to pay tribute to that. I am not using the measure as a shield for anything. If the legislation is passed by Parliament, as I hope it will be, and as the Government believe, as part of their commitments it should be, and notwithstanding the fact that a large number of Members will vote against it, I think it would be wrong for members of the security forces, many of whom, like the right hon. Gentleman, served with great valour in the most horrific circumstances in Northern Ireland, who were ever faced with a situation in which they were a bad apple—and it has never been suggested that more than a handful might be—to have to serve a full prison sentence while former terrorists walked free.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hain: I need to make some more progress. There are strong feelings about the Bill and I have been happy to take interventions, but I need to set out the case for the measure.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hain: No, I am sorry.

Clauses 2 to 6 provide for an eligibility process, conducted by a certification commissioner. Provisions governing the commissioner are set out in schedule 1. The eligibility procedure will ensure that access to the scheme will be restricted to specific categories of suspect. They include those colloquially known as on-the-runs—OTRs. It also includes people charged with relevant offences during the lifetime of the scheme; for instance, people whose crimes are uncovered as a result of the police historic inquiries work.

The Bill sets out criteria which must be met, and must continue to be met, for the person to hold a certificate. The criteria refer to the person's connection to terrorism and criminality. The certificate will apply only to offences connected to the person by the police and the offences will be listed on the certificate. Certificates can be cancelled if their terms are broken. The certification commissioner will also have a duty to keep victims informed—this is important—as far as possible with the progress of cases. We believe that it is crucial to ensure that the needs of victims are not neglected in the scheme.

Clauses 7 to 11 set out the effects of the certificate. The certificate will grant the person exemptions from certain powers, including arrest, detention, questioning and remand. The exemptions apply only to the offences listed on the certificate, as determined by the police.

Sir Patrick Cormack: The Secretary of State is being generous in giving way, but he has heard the unanimity of view on both sides of the House, so will he give an undertaking to accept an amendment, which I will table, so that people appear in open court before a judge—not a retired one—to answer for their crimes? Will he accept such an amendment?

Mr. Hain: I acknowledge the strength of feeling in the House. That is why I have accepted interventions. I cannot anticipate what amendments will be tabled. We shall have to see them, and they will be debated in the normal way.

Any prosecution for a certified offence will take place in a special tribunal set up under the legislation. Detailed provisions are set out in schedule 2. The special tribunal will have all the powers, authorities and jurisdiction of the Crown court sitting without a jury. The defendant will not have to attend the trial, but otherwise the trial will follow traditional procedures.

In the event of a conviction, the person will receive a licence, subject to certain conditions.

Mr. Dodds: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hain: No, I need to make progress.

A person given a life sentence will not be granted a licence if he is deemed to be a danger to the public. No licence can be granted until the person has provided the necessary fingerprints and non-intimate samples. If licence conditions are broken, the licence can be suspended. The person must then begin to serve their sentence in prison. The case is then passed to the appeals commissioners, who will take the decision to confirm or revoke the licence. If the licence is revoked, the person will remain in prison to serve his or her sentence.

Clauses 12 to 17 set out the routes of appeal for decisions made in the scheme. Challenges at the certification stage will go to specially appointed appeals commissioners. The terms of those commissioners and the procedure they will follow are set out in schedules 3 and 4.

Conviction and sentence before the special tribunal may be appealed before a special appeals tribunal, also established by the legislation. The special appeals tribunal will attract to itself all the powers of the Court of Appeal, and detailed provision is set out in schedule 5.

Mr. Peter Robinson: The United Kingdom has obligations under several human rights conventions. Under the United Nations convention against torture, the Government have a responsibility to prosecute those responsible for torture. Will the Secretary of State have the Bill amended to ensure that that obligation is in it?

Mr. Hain: The issue has been raised with us and we are looking into it, but as I said, the Bill is in full compliance with human rights legislation.

Lady Hermon: I assume that the Secretary of State occasionally speaks and listens to the Home Secretary—at least I hope he does. The Home Secretary and the Lord Chancellor invariably tell the House and another place that we must make every effort to instil public confidence in the criminal justice system. Will the Secretary of State explain to the House how the dreadful procedure set out in the Bill can in any way enhance public confidence in the criminal justice system in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hain: The name of the Home Secretary appears on the Bill as one of its sponsors, along with my name.

Clause 18 establishes the special prosecutor, who will bring prosecutions in the special tribunal. The special prosecutor will also have responsibility for liaising with victims to ensure that they are properly informed of the progress of cases that reach that stage. Further details are in schedule 6.

Clauses 19 to 27 contain ancillary provisions, which include protections for information provided to the certification commissioner and the power to suspend and repeal provisions of the scheme. Of course, I would prefer it if the normal processes of the criminal law could be applied in all those cases, but those who are outside Northern Ireland will not return on that basis.

Mr. Andrew Turner: The Secretary of State will appreciate that he is proposing a new but parallel system, which he may describe as justice, for the people who apply for those certificates. I do not understand why, if the system is as good, they will not be taken before the normal courts, allowed to appeal to the normal Court of Appeal and prosecuted by the normal prosecutors. Why is that?

Mr. Hain: I can explain very simply why. I do not want this process to jam up the existing courts. [Interruption.] If I am allowed to answer the hon. Gentleman's point, I do not think that it would be right—and I do not think that the citizens of Northern Ireland think that it would be right—to obstruct the timing and momentum of the normal criminal proceedings that are going through our Crown courts, possibly including cases following the Good Friday agreement. That is why we set up the parallel procedure.

Mr. Robathan rose—

Mr. Dodds rose—

Mr. Hain: I am sorry; I need to make some progress.

Those who may be suspected in the future may well abscond if criminal proceedings were initiated against them, leaving both groups beyond the reach of the criminal process altogether and victims haunted by the fact that they will never be confronted by the justice process for their crimes. In this context, the work of the historical inquiries team—the cold case review—is important. There will be those who say that they will be denied justice if someone charged and convicted does not serve a prison sentence—I understand that—but I hope that the House takes note of the fact that there will be others who will want to find out as much as possible about what happened to their loved ones, and if the review of cases helps to bring them nearer to closure, it is worth doing.

Mr. Dodds: Can the Secretary of State confirm that, under the special procedure, the defendant does not have to turn up, that it may well be that their details will not be made known to anyone—the anonymity provisions can apply—and that they will be able to get to legal aid as well? So the defendant will not have to turn up and will be anonymous, but can he confirm whether they can get legal aid to fight those cases?

Mr. Hain: If people are eligible for legal aid, of course, they will get legal aid, but they must be eligible for it. I have already explained the processes involved in the procedure—[Interruption.] I repeat that there is no prospect at all of bringing on-the-runs to justice if we do not proceed with the process.

In an intervention in the recent debate on the renewal of aspects of the prevention of terrorism legislation, the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) said:

> "Either things are not good in Northern Ireland or else things are good in Northern Ireland"—[Official Report, 31 October 2005; Vol. 438, c. 630.]

He suggests that it is a case of paradise or perdition. I do not agree with that stark either/or analysis. Things are immensely better in Northern Ireland than they were—nobody contests that—but, of course, that is not good enough.

The reality is that we are coming to the end of a long period of transition in Northern Ireland that began with the ceasefires of the early 1990s and the negotiations conducted, including with the IRA, by the then Conservative Government. However, we will only get to that end once all the outstanding issues are resolved: the issue that we are discussing today; Sinn Fein's unequivocal endorsement and support for policing arrangements; an end to all paramilitary activity and criminality, by all paramilitary groups—the UDA, UVF, LVF and the dissident republicans included. Then stable and inclusive institutions can be restored and the promise of the agreement can be realised.

Mr. Donaldson: The Secretary of State has today placed in the Library a written statement confirming that he has changed the nature of the inquiry into the murder of Billy Wright in the Maze prison. Can he give an absolute assurance to the House that, as a result of the change in the nature of that inquiry, no information will be withheld from the inquiry by his office and that those involved will not seek to shelter behind the provision of the new legislation to prevent information and evidence from being provided to the inquiry to enable it to reach a conclusion?

Mr. Hain: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that issue and seeking clarification. He brought Billy Wright's father, David Wright, with him to see me, and I was able to hear Mr. Wright's views that he did not want the inquiry converted as Lord MacLean, the presiding judge, has requested of me. I looked into this in great detail and sought to take careful account of all the relevant factors and to arrive at a reasoned decision. David Wright has suffered grievously—he is another victim—and I was very impressed with the strength of his conviction and his demeanour at that meeting.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman and Mr. Wright will be reassured by the fact that Lord MacLean and I strongly share their wish that the full facts in relation to the murder of Billy Wright should be established. It is Lord MacLean's belief that the conversion is necessary for the inquiry to be as thorough and effective as possible. He will do all that he can to ensure that the concerns expressed by the hon. Gentleman, Mr. David Wright and the family about the conduct of the inquiry under the Inquiries Act 2005 are addressed.

I, too, am only interested in finding out the truth about what happened. I can promise the hon. Gentleman and, through him, David Wright that the Government will fully co-operate with the inquiry. We will not seek to limit its scope or to withhold material from it. I can also assure him that I have no present intention to issue a restriction notice with regard to the Billy Wright inquiry.

[Mr. Hain]

The decision to propose the Bill was not taken lightly. I therefore commend it to the House not with a spring in my step, but because I firmly believe that it is an absolutely essential part of the process of Northern Ireland not being trapped in a past of horror and violence, but looking to a future where there are no victims any more, where every child has the best start and every citizen can walk out from under the shadow of fear, intimidation and brutality.

2.37 pm

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): I beg to move, To leave out from "That" to end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill because it creates an amnesty for terrorist fugitives from justice; because it allows such fugitives to return to Northern Ireland without ever being arrested or questioned by the police about their alleged offences; because it proposes a quasi-judicial process in which those accused of perpetrating terrorist offences will never have to appear before a court or spend any time in custody; because it allows an indefinite period of time for terrorists to take advantage of this procedure; because it treats members of the Armed Forces and the police on a par with terrorists; because it fails to contain an obligation on terrorist organisations to allow the safe return to Northern Ireland of those they have exiled; and because it places the rights of those suspected of serious offences before those of the victims of terrorism in Northern Ireland and throughout the rest of the United Kingdom."

I join the Secretary of State in offering heartfelt condolences to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik). I am sure he will know that he has many friends. He is held in great affection on both sides of the House, and the thoughts and prayers of all hon. Members will be with him today.

The Secretary of State presented his case in a measured fashion. It seems to me that his case rests on two propositions. First, we have a choice between, as he put it, allowing criminals to run free, or putting them through the special procedures created by the Bill. One has only to ponder briefly and imagine any Minister of any Government of any possible political persuasion applying that argument to any other category of criminal to see just how flimsy that ground is. The second argument that the Secretary of State put forward is that the measure, however unpalatable, is needed for Northern Ireland to achieve closure and to put a dark and violent past behind it.

I am happy to pay tribute to the efforts that the right hon. Gentleman, his predecessors in office and the Prime Minister have made over the years to bring peace and normality to the suffering people of Northern Ireland, but I have to say that I do not believe that the Bill will attain the objective that he wants. The Bill is wrong. It is unjust, it undermines the rule of law and it betrays utterly the interests of the victims of terrorism. The House is being invited to offer—however much we dress it up—what amounts to an amnesty or a pardon to men and women who include those responsible for some of the worst atrocities of a 30-year campaign of terrorism in Northern Ireland and beyond.

Mr. Hain: May I take the hon. Gentleman up on that point? I welcome the basis on which he is making his speech, except for that point. A pardon or an amnesty would mean that people would just be given a bit of paper and would never have to account for their crimes or terrorist atrocities. These people could face conviction and have a criminal record, and could be hauled in if they misbehaved in the future. That cannot, by any definition, be a pardon or an amnesty.

Mr. Lidington: As I hope to explain later in my speech, one of the problems that I have with the Bill is the fact that it sets aside due process and the normal rule of law. It shuts out the courts from consideration of these cases. It will certainly make it much more difficult than it should be to hold these criminals to account in public for what they have done.

The Bill offers that amnesty to people who have never owned up for what they did, who have never had to stand in court to hear evidence against them and who, in most cases, have never served one day in prison for their crimes. It is important for every Member of the House—irrespective of how we intend to vote tonight—to reflect carefully on, and have in their minds, the sort of crimes about which we are talking. It is sometimes too easy for those of us who represent constituencies in Great Britain to think that the experience of people in Northern Ireland is different because it is no longer in the headlines and is thus in the past and forgotten. Let me give just three examples of cases, the perpetrators of which might stand to benefit from the scheme embodied in the Bill.

In 1976, in Kingsmill, County Armagh, a minibus carrying 10 textile workers home from their local factory was stopped at gunpoint. The men were ordered out and they were shot down in the road with at least four different automatic weapons.

In 1987, in Enniskillen, County Fermanagh, a bomb exploded on Remembrance Sunday. It was timed for just before 11 am. Eleven people died and 63 were injured. No warning whatever was given.

In 1992, in Teebane, County Tyrone, an IRA land mine killed eight building workers who were travelling in a minibus on their way home. It maimed six others. Just seconds before the explosion, a bus filled with schoolgirls had passed over the same spot.

The House needs to understand that the sense of horror felt in Northern Ireland was just as deep after those outrages, and the grief of widows and children was just as heartfelt, as anything that we experienced here in London in July, or that we saw, tragically, in Bradford last weekend. The Bill is not a mere tidying-up exercise, or a minor piece of unfinished business. As hon. Members' interventions have already demonstrated and as, to be fair, the Secretary of State has publicly acknowledged, it gives rise to real passion, anger and heartache.

I want to address the various arguments that have been used to justify the Bill, but first let me make it clear that I draw no comfort from the Government's assurance that the Bill could apply to soldiers and police officers as much as to terrorists. It is a form of logic that amounts to casuistry to defend a measure that has been contrived to deliver a deal between the Government and IRA-Sinn Fein on the grounds that the special arrangements will also be opened up to soldiers and police officers. Like my hon. Friends—I feel somewhat humble speaking in the presence of those who have served in the armed forces on behalf of the people of Northern Ireland to defend them against terrorism—I find it morally repugnant that we are being asked to approve a Bill that treats agents of the Crown on a par with brutal and ruthless terrorists.

Mr. Hain: I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman makes and sympathise with it in many respects. However, will he table an amendment to the Bill to remove—[Interruption.] No, I want the hon. Gentleman to answer this specific question: will he try to ensure that if members of the security forces are charged—and only if they are charged—they will not be able to avail themselves of the special court procedure? Is that his party's policy?

Mr. Lidington: I put to the Secretary of State what members of the Police Federation for Northern Ireland said to me when I met them last week; I am sure that they have said the same thing to him. They said that they believed that the Bill was unjustified in principle, and that if there were compelling evidence against an individual police officer—whether that derived from the Stevens inquiry or another source—that police officer should expect to face charges and appear in open court like anyone else. I and my predecessors with my responsibilities have argued consistently for that throughout all the debates about collusion and related inquiries.

Mr. Hain: I understand both that point and the hon. Gentleman's point of principle in objecting to the Bill. He will vote against the Bill. However, is he saying that if Parliament passes the Bill—I respect the fact that it will be vigorously opposed at every stage, including by him—he will have wanted his party to have moved an amendment to remove the option for members of the security forces to go through the procedure?

Mr. Lidington: As the Secretary of State said himself, we will deal with amendments in Committee and on Report. I agree with the view expressed to me forcefully by the Police Federation for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Robathan: As this shameful Bill is a concession to the IRA, as the Saville inquiry has been a concession to the IRA and as the start-up of investigations into past cases involving soldiers will be a concession to the IRA, does my hon. Friend think it is likely that the operations in Gibraltar and Loughgall, for example, will be investigated with the backing of the Government? That might lead to charges against, and perhaps the conviction of, serving officers, some of whom will be senior officers, as a concession to the IRA. If those people received criminal convictions, they would have to give up their jobs.

Mr. Lidington: My hon. Friend speaks with his experience of service in the Army. It is obviously for the Government—whether in the person of the Secretary of State or the Secretary of State for Defence—to explain what they plan to do about investigations into allegations against members or former members of the armed forces. I hope that the Government will bear in mind the worry expressed in July in the House of Lords by the most recently serving Chief of the Defence Staff, Lord Boyce. He described the armed forces as "under legal siege", and said that the legal challenges and investigations already under way were

"generating real risk-averseness, clouding good military judgment."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 July 2005; Vol. 673, c. 1236.]

Mr. Carmichael: Is not the answer to the logical knots in which the Secretary of State ties himself that, instead of putting soldiers into the special tribunal, we put terrorists into the courts? If there is to be a process involving guilty or not guilty pleas, evidence being heard and thereafter a conviction to be reached, that should be done in a court.

Mr. Lidington: I agree completely.

Mr. Duncan Smith: May I compliment my hon. Friend on making a cogent argument? I put it to him, and through him to the Secretary of State, that seeing how reprehensible the Bill is, the Secretary of State has sought to suck the British forces into it as a shield against criticism. On the question of an amendment, the best amendment of all is to strike the legislation down.

Mr. Lidington: That is what I hope Parliament will do.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): How much has the inquiry into Bloody Sunday cost? What will be the consequences to that inquiry if the Bill makes it into law?

Mr. Lidington: The trouble with estimating the cost of the Bloody Sunday inquiry is that the figure goes up with each written answer, one of which was received by the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell).

Mr. Dodds: It is £200 million.

Mr. Lidington: I think that that is the most recent figure. We have to ask serious questions about the value of the exercise.

Dr. Julian Lewis: Let us return to the options facing a soldier who took part in an operation such as Loughall, which, I believe, had ministerial prior approval, and who finds himself accused. As I understand it from what the Secretary of State said, he has the option of, in a sense, accepting his guilt, even if he thinks he is innocent, and going through the special procedure, or fighting the case through the courts, where he may be found guilty. Let us suppose that he thinks he is innocent, but does not want to take the risk of being found guilty and serving a sentence. The temptation for him to take the new procedure and accept a guilt that he does not feel will be overwhelming. The historical record will be distorted, because he will have pleaded guilty to something for which no guilty plea was required.

Mr. Lidington: As my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green

[Mr. Lidington]

(Mr. Duncan Smith) explained, the problem is that we have a piece of legislation that has been drafted for one purpose, but to which has been added the possible cases of servicemen and police officers. That is the wrong way to proceed.

Mr. Wallace: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Lidington: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I want to turn to—

Mr. Hain: As the issue has been raised, let me again say that a serving or retired soldier—whatever member of the security forces he may be—is not forced to plead guilty at all. He can plead his innocence all the way through the process, through the special court or through the normal court procedure—he can choose either. The advantage of him choosing the special court procedure is that he can take advantage of not having to serve a prison sentence if he is found guilty. He may be acquitted, in which case there would be no stain on his character, just as there would not be following such a case in a normal Crown court.

For the record, it is interesting that the hon. Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams) is one of those who criticises this very provision. The hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) might want to ask himself why that is.

Mr. Lidington: The House will have heard the Secretary of State's comments.

One argument that the Government have adduced in support of the Bill is that the provisions are part of, or a natural development from, the process, central to which has been the 1998 Belfast agreement. Indeed, in a number of interviews the Secretary of State explicitly linked the Bill to the precedent of the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998 to justify the measure. However, as other hon. Members said, the measure appears nowhere in the 1998 agreement. It is a product of a bilateral side deal between the Government and Sinn Fein-IRA in 2001. That distinction is important because when it came to the legislation on early release, the Government relied heavily on what was said in the agreement and on the public endorsement of the agreement in the subsequent referendum.

On Second Reading of the 1998 Act, Mo Mowlam said:

> "All we are doing is implementing the agreement, which gained the support of 71 per cent. of the people of Northern Ireland in the vote."—[Official Report, 10 June 1998; Vol. 313, c. 1086.]

Ironically, in view of the Secretary of State's argument about unresolved matters and additional things that needed to be done after the 1998 agreement, the Government rejected amendments to the 1998 Act which, in their opinion, were not consistent with the agreement that they had negotiated. Dr. Mowlam also said:

> "If we cherry-picked and wrote extra provisions into the Bill that were not in the agreement, we would be departing from that agreement and would lose all moral authority to hold others fully to the commitments that they have made."—[Official Report, 18 June 1998; Vol. 314, c. 561.]

That is exactly what the Government are trying to do in this Bill.

Mr. Duncan Smith: My hon. Friend is making great progress, but will he take up this one point with the Secretary of State? The right hon. Gentleman used the phrase that these were "unresolved issues." If they were not included in the Good Friday agreement as signed, agreed and voted for, they were resolved not to be on the table and were therefore settled. Is not that the point? They were settled issues, not unresolved issues.

Mr. Lidington: My right hon. Friend is correct. When the Secretary of State says that without the deal at Weston Park, we could not have seen an end to the IRA campaign of terror, the House has to ask how that squares when set against the undertaking by Sinn Fein in the 1998 agreement that henceforward it would rely exclusively on democratic and peaceful means to attain its objectives. The logic of the Secretary of State's argument is that we have to do this because we could not trust Sinn Fein to stick to the word solemnly given in the 1998 agreement, now bound into an international treaty.

The proposals have never been endorsed by the people of Northern Ireland. They are opposed not just by the Conservative party and the Liberal Democrats, but by the Democratic Unionists, the Ulster Unionists, the Social Democratic and Labour party and the Alliance party of Northern Ireland. Only two parties support the Bill: Labour and Sinn Fein. I would have thought that that fact alone might have caused Ministers to pause before pursuing the route that they appear to have chosen.

Mr. Dodds: Was the hon. Gentleman struck, as I was, by the fact that during the entire length of the Secretary of State's opening remarks, there was not a single intervention from a Labour Member in support of the position adopted by the Government? Does not that tell us something?

Mr. Lidington: The hon. Gentleman is broadly right, although the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) made a heroic, if somewhat cautious, effort to come to the Secretary of State's aid.

Huw Irranca-Davies: The hon. Gentleman knows that many hon. Members have made passionate and heartfelt appeals, especially in terms of the victims, and that is right. Whatever Northern Ireland legislation is considered, the victims should be at the forefront because we have a duty to them. However, does he accept that there is also a duty to the wider community within Northern Ireland and to those people in England whose friends and families have suffered because of the bombings? That is what the Government are taking into account.

Mr. Lidington: I am afraid that the truth is that a deal was made—I suspect between the Prime Minister and the leaders of IRA-Sinn Fein—and successive Secretaries of State for Northern Ireland have been lumbered with a poisonous inheritance, with the parcel unfortunately landing in the lap of the right hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain).

It has been argued that the legislation is inextricably linked to getting the IRA to end its terrorist war and to enabling Northern Ireland to return to what the rest of us in Great Britain would regard as normality. The Secretary of State referred to the significance of the IRA's statement in July and its decommissioning announcement in September. His article in The Times yesterday contained a similar reference. I agree that both initiatives were important and welcome. My party and I want the republican movement to complete—at last, belatedly—the much-promised transition from terrorism to democratic and peaceful politics, but I also want to be confident that that process is permanent and irreversible. I think that after three decades of killing and bombing, we are entitled to test the IRA's good intentions over a period of time before accepting that they can be trusted.

Only 12 months ago Sinn Fein-IRA were talking to the Prime Minister and the right hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) about a new agreement on power sharing, while at the same time, we now know, they were plotting the raid on the Northern bank. Progress has been made—I go along with the Secretary of State that far—but the trouble is that the right hon. Gentleman and his fellow Ministers entertain none of the reservations on which other observers insist. Let us look at what has been said by the Independent Monitoring Commission, which is charged by Parliament and the Government with examining how the paramilitary groups are complying with their undertakings. The most recent IMC report, published in October this year, states that "it is too early to be drawing firm conclusions about possible overall changes in behaviour"

on the part of IRA-Sinn Fein. It also remarks that

"the leadership of the republican movement has shown a capacity in the past to turn on and off the tap of violence."

The language employed by the IMC echoes accurately remarks made earlier this year in the Dail by the Taoiseach.

We still have no commitment by Sinn Fein to support the police, nor any recognition of the legitimacy of the courts. The murderers of Robert McCartney have not been turned in; instead, his sisters have been driven from their homes by intimidation. Others exiled from Northern Ireland over the years by paramilitary threats are still unable to return home.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Is it not also true that there has been no expression of contrition or remorse at any stage?

Mr. Lidington: My hon. Friend is right. I believe that if there is to be reconciliation and closure, we should expect that of people who were once active in terrorist groups.

In the face of all that, I have to ask the Government why there is a need for such haste. What is it that Ministers fear will happen if they do not get the Bill through rapidly and in the form in which it has been presented to Parliament? The truth is that we cannot yet be certain that republicans have made a permanent and irreversible move away from violence—but even if we had that certainty, that confidence, I would still have grave concerns about the substance of the Bill.

The Secretary of State has repeatedly described the procedures embodied in the Bill as a judicial process, but it is a process from which the courts are at all stages deliberately excluded.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): The Secretary of State mentioned the importance of finding out what happened and making sure that people have some sort of closure, but clause 7, headed "Exemption from arrest etc", makes it clear that if someone has been granted a certificate of eligibility, no power to obtain information about anything that that person has done in connection with the certified offences may be exercised. We will therefore be unable to find out anything about the offences alleged to have been committed by a person who holds a certificate, so the chances of convicting that person and then letting him out on licence, by which the Secretary of State sets great store, are extremely slim.

Mr. Lidington: My hon. Friend makes a compelling point. The process in the Bill is not one known to any court in the United Kingdom. Once a certificate has been granted, the defendant is immune from arrest or detention and the tribunal will have no power to set bail or to impose bail conditions. A terrorist could therefore return to live in the next street or next door to the victim whom he has wronged. The police will have no power to enter premises or to search either people or property and they will have no power to take fingerprints or samples. Even evidence that the perpetrator gives about himself in order to obtain a certificate is, in the Bill, explicitly made inadmissible in any proceedings before the tribunal. In practice, once someone has a certificate, no effective further investigation can take place. As my hon. Friend points out, the rules seem to have been drafted to provide the smallest possible chance that any case before the tribunal will end in a verdict of guilty. That is a travesty of both judicial process and the rule of law.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): My hon. Friend will remember that when the Secretary of State was challenged on that matter by our hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner), the right hon. Gentleman suggested that the only reason why he was not putting such cases through the courts was that he feared they would jam the courts. He used a logistical argument to justify the difference. Does not that nonsense betray the fact that he has no faith in the courts to deal with the matter because he knows that they would exercise proper and rigorous scrutiny, which he does not want?

Mr. Lidington: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point. I thought that that particular argument advanced by the Secretary of State was astonishingly weak—it suggests to me the extent to which the Government are flailing around in their attempts to justify a measure that, in their hearts, they know is unacceptable.

Mr. Hain: I wish to remind the hon. Gentleman and the House of what I said. The procedures of the special tribunal will mirror those of the Crown court, except in respect of the defendant not having to appear. That is the only exception. The same rules of evidence and the same process in other respects of proper Crown court procedure will apply.

[Mr. Hain]

Mr. Lidington: I have to tell the Secretary of State that that is not my reading of the Bill, nor that of senior lawyers with whom I have discussed its contents.

Mr. Andrew Turner: If what the Secretary of State says is true, and I have no reason to believe that it is not, why does he not simply allow the courts to operate in the absence of the accused?

Mr. Lidington: I can only speculate. Given that I do not believe that the logistical argument about court business has any weight, I conclude that the reason is to do with pandering to the reluctance of Sinn Fein-IRA to recognise the courts—to recognise British justice and the legitimacy of the courts of the United Kingdom operating in Northern Ireland.

The Secretary of State made great play of the fact that someone who is convicted and sentenced to a period of imprisonment under the special measures would be released only on licence. There is a crucial difference, however, between that provision and the 1998 legislation. In 1998, to be eligible for early release someone had to serve a minimum term: A fixed-term prisoner had to serve at least a third of his sentence before qualifying, and a lifer two-thirds of his expected term. Under the Bill, even if someone commits a serious crime that is unconnected with terrorism—to pluck an example at random, let us take someone who is convicted of a bank robbery—he will not forfeit his licence or have it revoked unless he receives a prison sentence of five years or more. That is a serious gap in the licensing arrangements.

Lady Hermon: Even if the Bill completed its passage through the House and another place, is it not the case that it would not succeed if challenged on the ground that it was not compatible with the European convention on human rights? Its time scale is discriminatory and it does not guarantee an adequate remedy for breaches of the convention.

Mr. Lidington: It is highly likely that if the Bill is enacted—I hope that it will not be—there will be challenges in our own courts, and possibly at Strasbourg, on the ground set out by the hon. Lady.

Mr. Brazier: May I pursue that point and ask my hon. Friend to address the grave matter raised by the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who is from the Secretary of State's own ranks and pointed out that the measure will discriminate between terrorist murderers in Northern Ireland and terrorist murderers in the 7/7 bombing?

Mr. Lidington: The Government's arguments on counter-terrorist policy appear less persuasive when they are seen to apply different standards in that fashion.

The other key argument on which the Government have relied is that the Bill will produce closure and provide the equivalent of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission in South Africa. I fear that the contrary is the case—if anything, the Bill risks making things worse, and I shall explain why. It does not include a deadline by which a perpetrator must admit what he did to acquire a certificate. It provides no penalty whatever for refusing to tell the whole truth. My understanding of the South African experience is that someone's failure to divulge everything that they had done wrong was in itself an imprisonable offence if other misdeeds subsequently came to light.

Clause 5 explicitly envisages second or subsequent applications for certificates from the same individual. That is grotesque. It means that the terrorist can sit back, waiting to see how much of a case the police have, and can keep the victims dangling in suspense, confident that they have a get-out-of-jail-free card to play whenever the need arises. Nor is there any obligation for the defendant to appear before the tribunal. All he need do is send a letter to the certification commissioner. As was pointed out, he will then be entitled to full legal aid. He never has to turn up in person, and his lawyers can subpoena witnesses, perhaps including victims, and cross-examine them. The defence can seek discovery of sensitive material, and try to embark on fishing expeditions. Not once, however, will the defendant be required to appear.

Mr. Carmichael: Is not the situation even blacker than the hon. Gentleman paints it? If, having undergone that process, the defendant is convicted, for want of a better term, he would probably have cast-iron grounds for appeal, as he was not present to instruct his defence during the trial.

Mr. Lidington: The hon. Gentleman, who is an experienced lawyer, makes a good point, which we look forward to pursuing on Report and in Committee.

The lack of any obligation on the defendant to appear in person is of more than just procedural importance. The Government have consistently said that they have tried to put the interests of victims at the heart of the Bill, but the Bill denies those victims even the symbolic justice of seeing the terrorist who has perpetrated wrongs against them appear in court in person, either to own up publicly to what he has done or to have responsibility imposed on him by the judgment and subsequent sentence of the court. The House should insist that to bring about peace with justice in Northern Ireland, terrorists and paramilitary organisations should bring themselves within the rule of law. The Bill, however, sets aside the rule of law and proper process to implement a back-stairs political deal. Far from bringing about truth and reconciliation, I fear that it will conceal the truth and prolong the bitterness and grief of families who have already endured years of suffering. It is counter-productive and plain wrong.

I hope that the Secretary of State, having listened to what has been said by Members from all parts of the House, may yet pause. I hope that the House will tell him tonight that it wants him to take the Bill back and think again.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I remind the House that Mr. Speaker has placed a 15-minute limit on Back Benchers' speeches?

3.17 pm

Mr. Paul Murphy (Torfaen) (Lab): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak in this important debate.

Only two Members in the Chamber were present for most of the negotiations that led to the signing of the Good Friday agreement. At the time, however, many hon. Members, in both Northern Ireland and Great Britain, were aware of all the implications of the agreement. The Democratic Unionist party did not agree with the Belfast agreement, and it still does not. Its view was genuine and sincere, but I disagreed with it, because the Good Friday agreement was the only way we could make progress in Northern Ireland. When we examine, as we must, the nature of the release of paramilitary prisoners under that agreement, its implications for our debate will become clear.

The people of Northern Ireland in the referendum, and the people of Ireland generally, voted in support of the Good Friday agreement. In doing so, they voted to support the release of paramilitary prisoners, but in a context that included many other things. It was a difficult pill for everyone to swallow and, although I will support the Bill this evening, it still is.

I want to deal with one or two issues mentioned by the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) with which I agreed and which the Government could perhaps take on board in Committee and in the other place.

Mr. Robathan: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, who knows that I have great respect for him. Was he ever asked to introduce a Bill such as this while he was Secretary of State?

Mr. Murphy: Yes, I was. I was coming to that in a moment. Part of the difference between what happened in 1998, when the people of Ireland voted for the Good Friday agreement, including the release of paramilitary prisoners, and the situation later was, as I said, that the context was very different. However, there is no doubt that the issue was discussed at Weston Park in 2001. I was not part of that at the time, but two years later, in 2003, when the joint declaration was published after a long period of negotiations and discussions at Hillsborough castle, it appeared in the public domain. It did not form part of the main joint declaration because there was no agreement on it, but it was out there in public. So it is no real surprise to us all, although perhaps some of the details might be different, that the principle of the Bill was out there in the open.

Mr. Peter Robinson: One of the points that have been made is that that deal was done exclusively with Sinn Fein-IRA, both at Weston Park and at Hillsborough. Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether that was so, or whether any of the other parties were involved in discussions on the Bill?

Mr. Murphy: The other parties did not agree with the Bill.

Mr. Robinson: What was discussed?

Mr. Murphy: I cannot recall every detail of the discussions, other than that when the final joint declaration emerged, this part of the discussions, which were mainly with Sinn Fein and the British and Irish Governments, had to be published separately because people did not agree with it.

There are two issues that the Government ought to consider with a view to the Bill being accepted by people in Northern Ireland and in the United Kingdom generally. First, the Government should consider seriously some of the amendments that are likely to be proposed. A number have been mentioned this afternoon, including the hugely important one about the victims appearing in court at a time when the person concerned may not have appeared. I hope the Government will listen to the amendments proposed. The difference between now and 1998 is that there has not been a referendum and the context is clearly very different.

Secondly, it is extremely important to accompany the measure with other measures.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Can I take it from what the right hon. Gentleman has just said that he would support an amendment to ensure that the people in question had to appear in person in court to answer for their crimes?

Mr. Murphy: I would have a great deal of sympathy with such an amendment, but I would take the same view as the hon. Member for Aylesbury and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State—we will examine the details of the amendments when they are tabled. What I am saying is that the amendments are worth considering seriously, and I hope the Government will be in a position to answer some of these points in Committee and in the other place.

Lady Hermon: Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm whether the Government gave an undertaking to Sinn Fein that republicans would not appear in court? Was that a categorical assurance? May we have an amendment to make sure that they do appear in court?

Mr. Murphy: If my memory serves me right, the publication in 2003 would have included that provision.

The point that I am trying to develop is that time goes on, and the word "progress" rather than "closure" is sometimes important in this context. We made progress in Northern Ireland as a result of the Good Friday agreement, including having to take some very unpalatable and difficult decisions. If the Bill is to have the same effect, it must be accompanied by other measures, so that the whole community in Northern Ireland feels comfortable with the progress that we are making.

The hon. Member for Aylesbury made an important point in this regard. Although I welcome the statements made by the IRA in July and the decommissioning in September—everybody welcomes that—we must recognise that the Independent Monitoring Commission has a job of work to do, and that we cannot allow continuing criminal activity among the IRA or loyalist organisations to be in any way tolerated. The policing arrangements have now to be accepted by the republican movement in Northern Ireland, just as everybody else accepts what is, after all, part of the Good Friday agreement.

Mr. Hain: I pay tribute to the work that my right hon. Friend did in getting us to the point where the IRA gave up its terrorist campaign on 28 July. For the record, I confirm that his memory is correct. The proposals published in 2003 after Hillsborough, where he was present, as he said, stated—this was published and the House was aware of it—that the applicant would not be required to be present at the trial.

Mr. Murphy: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that. I am also grateful for not being in his position today. That is another matter, but he did valiantly.

The other issues that need to be addressed include the question of victims. That is paramount. The appointment of a victims commissioner is a huge step forward, and I know that hon. Members are grateful for that. A victims forum is very important. My hon. Friend the Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) has been pushing for that for some time. There should be some provision in the legislation that would prevent victims from having to go through a traumatic court appearance.

There are further issues that we should consider. Of the political parties in Northern Ireland, clearly it is only republicans who want the Bill to go through. My hon. Friend the Member for Foyle will make his own speech, if he catches the Deputy Speaker's eye this afternoon. The Unionist parties have made their position clear, as has the Alliance party. It is imperative, therefore, that measures are taken to give some sort of reassurance right across the community in Northern Ireland about other issues that people need to consider. My hon. Friend will raise some of those later.

There is also the matter of the Royal Irish Regiments and the home battalions. I refer not to the decision to run those battalions down, but to what happens in the future. That, after all, is a major redundancy issue affecting whole communities in Northern Ireland. Not only people in the Royal Irish Regiments, but people who work in ancillary services will lose their jobs. In order for the legislation to be accepted, it is vital that it is accompanied by other measures to provide reassurance across the board.

Mr. Carmichael: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the other group whose interests must not be forgotten and should be proceeded with in tandem are those who have been exiled as a result of paramilitary activities in the Province?

Mr. Murphy: That will be a matter for considerable debate during the passage of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman knows that the Alliance party in particular has taken up the matter over the years, but other parties are very much in favour of trying to tackle it.

Dr. Julian Lewis: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his generosity in giving way. Does he accept that the reason we are in a more peaceful situation has very much to do with the work of the soldiers and the security forces who were in the front line throughout the years of the troubles? Will he, therefore, from his experience throw light on the circumstances under which it was decided that there would be a historic review of any and every operation in which they were previously involved, which will far from reassure them that their work is appreciated or that their future is secured?

Mr. Murphy: I can certainly say that so far as the so-called cold cases were concerned, with the police, for example, I thought it very important that closure was brought to the cases of hundreds of police officers who had lost their lives when there had been no conclusion in terms of getting to the bottom of those cases. That was important, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State touched on that, too. That is a question of closure.

Ultimately, if we are to achieve peace, prosperity and stability in Northern Ireland, this measure has to be part of it, but it has to be part of many other measures too.

Dr. McCrea: If this agreement was reached between the United Kingdom Government, the Government of the Irish Republic and IRA-Sinn Fein, why is there a difference in the treatment of the murderers of Garda McCabe and the murderers of Reserve Constable Finlay, or any other of the police officers in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Murphy: It is not for me to speak on behalf of the Irish Government. It is for them to tell the Government and for the Government to tell the House, but I can understand the comparisons that the hon. Gentleman makes, and I have some sympathy with them.

If we are to get all the institutions of government in Northern Ireland up and running—the Assembly, the Executive and everything else—we must make progress on a number of issues, some of which are rather unpalatable, such as this one.

When I was Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, I was always conscious of the fact that not one single person in Northern Ireland had voted for my party and that I held no mandate in Northern Ireland in terms of its governance, although, of course, one must govern wisely, as best one can. The sooner that direct rule finishes and people in Northern Ireland can govern themselves, the better. Ultimately, the stability of Northern Ireland will be proved by the fact that the people there can work together to govern themselves. Therefore, for his measure to obtain any sort of acceptance—

Mr. Ellwood: The right hon. Gentleman talks about long-term prosperity. Is he not concerned about one of the remarks that the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) made to the Secretary of State, when it was implied that this measure is a condition of disarmament, and that unless it goes through, the peace process could be ruined?

Mr. Murphy: To be honest, I do not think that that was said. I do not think for one second that we will return to what we saw in the past, and I sincerely hope not. I am concerned—I touched on this in the course of my remarks—that we ensure that we tackle the continued criminality of paramilitary organisations. Unless it can be shown, through the Independent Monitoring Commission, that that has ended, this legislation will be as nought, because ultimately we will have an unwholesome society in Northern Ireland that we will not be able to cope with.

Mr. Francois: This point is not at the core of the Bill, but the right hon. Gentleman mentioned the disbandment of the units of the Royal Irish Regiment. He will know from experience that the Territorial Army has been in a different category in Northern Ireland for many years. Given that the TA is so under strength, especially the infantry, would there not be some practical utility in trying to convert some of those RIR units to TA infantry battalions to serve the country as a whole?

Mr. Murphy: There may well be, but it is not for me to answer that question.

I hope that the Government will consider seriously sensible amendments that are proposed to the Bill, and always, and most importantly, ensure that it is accompanied by measures that give confidence and some assurance to people in Northern Ireland who are not from republican backgrounds.

3.33 pm

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I thought long and hard about whether I should contribute today, but on the balance of considerations I thought that it was appropriate for me to do so, and I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will bear with me.

On the evening of Monday 21 November 2005, without warning and with a suddenness that one could never prepare for, my brother, Endel Öpik, died. He was born in Belfast, an Inst. boy through and through, although not a very good one, and he was 37 years old. We do not yet know the cause. We hope that tomorrow's post mortem will tell us.

More even than the death of my father in May this year, I have found his death devastating and difficult to deal with. However, I am making a contribution after much consideration because I feel that this will help me, my family and my friends to put his death into some sort of context, if a death so sudden can ever be regarded as having some message, lesson or meaning. I make it because Endel was greatly interested in parliamentary matters, and I am sure that he would want me to be here today, not least because to be mentioned in the Commons by name would appeal to his vanity.

I thank colleagues, including the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) and the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley), the leader of the Democratic Unionist party, for their comments. I am lucky to work with so many people who care for others in times of tragedy. All the same, such shocking personal news makes one think about all the things that one does—it alters one's sense of priorities. I am passionate about what we do here, and no one takes the business of the House and this legislation more seriously than me, which is why I have sought to fulfil my duties today. The passing away of that wonderful gentle giant from my life perhaps causes me to connect more closely with what I learned last week, when I met victims of terrorism in Northern Ireland. The connection is unexpected, and it is one that I would not have wished for, but it is important all the same.

When I met relatives of victims last week, I marvelled at their dignity and their words of sorrow, not of anger. I imagine that when they were first informed of the news, they felt that a mistake had been made. They may have felt that they would turn up at the hospital and see their loved one safe and well, or at least recovering. They will have felt angry and bewildered, because those victims of unexpected death were not done with their lives. They will have wished that there was a way to bring back their relatives. When I met them, I did not understand how they could be so circumspect, because their losses were so sudden and unexpected.

I hope that I find some peace from the verdict on what killed my brother, when we finally get it from the doctors, but ultimately I already know that fate took him. By contrast, the people who took the victims of terror are in part still at large. The relatives of victims have not had an opportunity to face the killer of their friend, their relative or their lover, which is what makes their loss so hard for them to bear. It is that, and my own loss, which causes me to come here not to confront the Government, but to seek to find a way to make the legislation right.

The Secretary of State has said that the Bill is about closure, and I used to use that phrase, too. I now realise that it is not really about closure, because it is hard to get closure about the sudden death of someone one loves, but it is about coming to terms with that loss. The Bill is about giving the relatives of the victims some control back, after an event in their lives that was totally out of their control. As the Bill stands, it does not provide a reasonable and balanced process to achieve that outcome. Let us examine the problems with the Bill and what we might do collectively to improve it.

At the outset, I note that the Government take wildly different approaches to terrorism and terrorists, depending on whether the terrorists come from Northern Ireland or elsewhere. On 9 November, the Prime Minister fought hard for the legislative power to detain terrorist suspects without charge for up to 90 days, but on that same day his Government introduced legislation to give Northern Ireland terrorist suspects on the run from the authorities the right to return home free from any danger of arrest or incarceration after a limited quasi-judicial hearing. In my view, that is a contradiction. Why do Ministers think it consistent to seek to allow those suspected of terrorism in Northern Ireland to return without sentence while detaining for 90 days those who have not even been charged with anything?

In general, I favour the approach adopted by the Government in Northern Ireland. I support their serious efforts to address the motivations behind terrorists, even if that directly contradicts their so-called war against international terrorism. I even agreed, as the Liberal Democrats collectively did, with the early release of politically motivated prisoners, which was one of the most difficult aspects of the Good Friday agreement. It was a bitter pill for many law-abiding people to swallow, not least the victims and the relatives of those victims. However, it was accepted, because it was part of the wider package agreed by the participants at the talks process in Northern Ireland.

The Bill has sparked an even greater storm, because across the political spectrum in Northern Ireland it was not recognised as part of the Good Friday agreement, and it was not part of a cross-party agreement.

Let us remember who the on-the-runs are. They are people suspected of terrorist acts who have never faced the courts, or they have escaped from prison. They include those suspected of involvement in all kinds of atrocities; the hon. Member for Aylesbury apprised us of a number of those. It is obvious that this should be addressed in a manner that is sensitive to the needs of all the people of Northern Ireland, not only the on-the-runs, nor the organisations from which they derive.

[Lembit Öpik]

Unfortunately, however, that was not the case. The first proposals for dealing with the on-the-runs came from the British and Irish Governments at Weston Park in July 2001. It was not part of a package that all the participants had negotiated and agreed to. We heard confirmation of that from the right hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy). It was asked for by Sinn Fein and, as far as I can tell, agreed to by the British Government. It was bipartisanship but of an unusual sort, because the two parties were Sinn Fein and the Government. Those original proposals amounted to an amnesty. At the time, Liberal Democrat Members stated very clearly that we would not accept such an amnesty.

Matters developed until the joint declaration in April 2003. The Secretary of State said that there was no written agreement with regard to the content of the Bill. In a sense, he is right, but then there is the dubious status of the attachment to the joint declaration. As he noted, it says:

"The applicant would not be required to be present at the trial."

I fully understand why a member of Sinn Fein or the IRA would interpret that as some kind of commitment, because it was proposed by the Government. However, very importantly, the Secretary of State confirmed today that no written agreement was made with Sinn Fein. That is important because, unless he is implying that a verbal agreement was made with Sinn Fein, it means that the Government have the latitude to improve the legislation here and in Committee without compromising any secret deal with Sinn Fein or the IRA. I do not need to speculate about whether there was a secret deal. If the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister stand by that statement that there is no secret deal, the Government are not constrained to reject proposals of the sort that are being made by us.

I recognise that the Government have to some extent moved on the issue since the original statements at Weston Park. The Bill proposes that an offender who wishes to return to Northern Ireland will have to apply to a certification commissioner. The case is then heard by a special tribunal presided over by a retired judge. There will be a special prosecutor to put the case for the state. There are various complicated appeals processes. As it stands, however, it is so far outside the normal judicial process that one has to ask why the Government do not simply use the procedures that are already there. If the crucial element in all this is licensing, I do not see why we are not discussing a simpler Bill which, although unpalatable to many, would unquestionably have much more support than the Bill that we are considering.

Let me look at the specifics. Qualifying offenders will not have to appear before the special tribunal in order to avail themselves of the scheme; instead, they will be able to be represented by proxies. As the special tribunal will have all the powers of the Crown court, the Bill creates a very distressing situation whereby victims and witnesses of the offences could be subpoenaed to appear in court to give evidence against an accused person who is not even there. How can anyone regard that as full judicial process? How can anyone regard it even as a process that can work?

Various explanations have been given for this but I find none of them plausible. First, it is simply not victim-focused. That is completely wrong. An appearance in court would give a limited sense of relief to some victims and relatives—small consolation, but it would be a start. It would clearly show that what the offender did was criminal and continues to be wrong, even if they were released on licence.

The second, related point is about the status of the court. We believe that the qualifying offender should be tried before the Crown court since one of the justifications for the Bill is that it generates full judicial process. If the Government want full judicial process, they should use it rather than creating a parallel quasi-judicial system.

Greg Mulholland (Leeds, North-West) (LD): I, too, wish to express my condolences to my hon. Friend. I also pay tribute to the courage he has shown by being here and leading our Northern Ireland team in the debate. That sends a clear message to everybody about the importance of the issue to him and to us.

I do not believe that the question that I want to ask has been addressed so far. If the people called to the cases that we are considering cannot be arrested or detained, I presume that they cannot be questioned. If that is the case, it is impossible to have any process that could be called justice; it makes a farce of the proposals.

Lembit Öpik: My hon. Friend makes a good point. I hope that the Minister in his summation will explain in what exactly the defendants can expect to participate if they are not involved in the most important element in the eyes of the victims—a personal appearance in court.

In addition, and connected to my hon. Friend's comments, if justice is not seen to be done, the Government send hopelessly mixed messages to terrorists of the past and vigilantes of the present and future. Again, the Government provide an extraordinary defence of the non-use of courts. The Secretary of State—I appreciate that he needed to leave to meet some relatives of victims—said that he did not want the process to jam up existing courts. However, did not the same Government repeatedly tell us that the number of on-the-runs was relatively small? In that case, why would the process jam up the courts?

If the Government regard the courts as jammed up by the process, what exactly is the legal system in Northern Ireland for? There is no more important subject to the relatives of the victims or to those who cherish the rule of law than the trial of people who escaped justice for some of the most atrocious terrorist offences. If the best that the Government can do is tell us that they are worried that the courts will be jammed, I challenge the Minister to state the more important cases to which we must give way.

Kate Hoey: Water charges.

Lembit Öpik: What is so important? Is it the water charges or some minor felony? To justify the creation of a parallel system by citing the fear of overstretching the existing one is not joined-up government and is disrespectful to the considerable needs and psychological requirements of the relatives and victims.

The Government could expand the legal system. That would be perfectly logical and I am sure that hon. Members of all parties would understand if there needed to be greater appropriation to fund the expansion of the existing legal service in Northern Ireland. Again, we find a contradiction—the contradiction of cost. Not so long ago, in a Standing Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Lorely Burt) proposed the increase in size of Diplock courts from one judge to three. The Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Woodward) opposed that suggestion. He said:

> "One issue as well as fairness that it is appropriate to consider in any judicial system is cost to the taxpayer."

He went on to say:

> "Those judges would have to be recruited and trained, and accommodation would have to be provided for them. If necessary—of course we would do this if we were to move to that system . . . That would have significant financial implications."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 8 November 2005; c. 25–26.]

So one of the key reasons the Minister cited for opposing the expansion of the number of judges on the Diplock courts from one to three was cost. But think of the cost of creating this new, parallel system to try what we are told is a relatively small number of on-the-runs. It is utterly inconsistent to oppose the relatively modest cost of expanding the size of a Diplock court while completely ignoring the financial implications of these proposals. I believe that all hon. Members would accept that, for the sake of justice, costs should be borne. The Government cannot justify what they said on the matter of the three judges, but this simply highlights the tactical and non-strategic way in which they have introduced this legislation.

Thirdly, the Government still resist an explicit linkage between the return of the on-the-runs and the return of those exiled by paramilitary organisations. Thousands were driven from their homes by loyalist and republican paramilitaries, even after the signing of the Good Friday agreement. The latest Independent Monitoring Commission report backs this up. It covers the period from March to August 2005, and states that

> "we believe there have been a number of instances during the period covered by this report where people have been forced from their homes by paramilitary groups or by their members—PIRA, RIRA, the UVF and the UDA . . . We have yet to find evidence that any paramilitary group is generally allowing the return of those it has exiled, or is considering doing so. The PIRA statement of 28 July makes no specific reference to this issue."

We accept that, while some exiles might be petty criminals, others simply fell out with the local paramilitary godfathers. This is a forgotten aspect of the peace process. In 2000, the Northern Ireland Select Committee noted the difficulties in quantifying the scale of the problem, as victims naturally feared reporting the intimidation that they were experiencing. It is obvious that they would. It is perverse to allow some paramilitaries to return in safety while those exiled by the paramilitaries are kept away. We feel that certification should be linked to a positive report on this matter by the IMC.

Fourthly, the grounds for revoking a licence were set very narrowly in 1998. All paramilitary activity constitutes a threat to democracy and the rule of law. During the loyalist violence this summer, however, Ministers treated as different the actions directed by paramilitaries against those "from their own community". A commitment to end all violence was supposedly at the heart of the recent IRA statement. It makes sense, therefore, to link the licence terms of the on-the-runs to the condition that there will be no engagement in any criminal activity, either by the individual or by the organisation with which they associate. This really must include exiles.

Our fifth core concern is the lack of a sunset clause in the Bill. Already, the hon. Member for Aylesbury has rightly pointed out the danger of creating a get-out-of-jail-free card that can be manipulated by the on-the-run in question, rather than achieving a settlement for the victims. Victims need a time frame for those accused of a particular offence to come forward. The uncertainty would otherwise present yet another trauma. Have they not suffered enough, without this extra open-ended wait?

In recent months, there has been little sense of an inclusive process that takes into account the whole community. We have seen a series of trade-offs between the Government and the republicans, and a parallel process of minor concessions to the DUP, presumably to balance out the concessions to the IRA and Sinn Fein. If the Government are exclusive, they will not create the consensus on which we absolutely depend for the restoration of devolution. Imposing unjust measures over the heads of the people of Northern Ireland will destabilise the process rather than consolidating it.

In its present form, the Bill looks like yet another concession. If it applied, in some high-profile form, to the legal system throughout the United Kingdom, I would question whether the Government would carry the vote. The reason they could well do so in this instance is that, being Northern Ireland legislation, the Bill is not as provocative as some of the other highly criticised legislation that we have debated recently. Being able to get the Bill through, however, is not a good enough reason to force it through.

Very little of what we say in the House directly affects the lives of the public, but our decisions do make a difference. There is no risk that the Government will lose face by doing the right thing. Indeed, their acceptance that the Bill should be changed will register only fleetingly in the public perception, but the changes will make all the difference to victims and their families. I would not regard movement by the Government as a sign of weakness. I would regard it as a sign of strength, and, crucially, a sign of compassion. By the same token, changes in the Bill do not constitute a defeat for Sinn Fein or the IRA. If promises made in the past by the Prime Minister or anyone else were unreasonable, it is obvious that those unreasonable promises should be seen for what they are, and that the case for a more reasonable settlement should be accepted today.

I ask the Government to show that they are serious enough about doing the right thing to change the Bill to meet the psychological needs of the victims, without dragging us through the normal process of brinkmanship and rejection between the two Houses between now and December. If the former perpetrators of terror are really serious about the peace, they will understand the reasons for the changes. Like other hon. Members, I know from meetings I have attended that former terrorists do understand the consequences of what they did. I appeal to them directly: surely, in their hearts, they recognise the needs of victims too.

[Lembit Öpik]

To those who have threatened us with the collapse of the peace process, I say this. Do the Government really believe that the peace is so fragile and flimsy that it will be brought down by a number of important but ultimately minor modifications to the entire body of law in Northern Ireland? I believe that it is more robust than that, because I have faith in what has been said. I urge the Government to believe their own words about that peace, and act with the courage of their convictions.

No one can pretend that the Bill is about victory for the Conservatives, the Liberal Democrats, the Democratic Unionist party, the Alliance party in Northern Ireland, the Social Democratic and Labour party or any other party. No one can pretend that this is a direct tussle between the Government and the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission, which also has major problems with the Bill. It is not about us. It is about the relatives—relatives who, bewildered, came to see their dearest lying injured or silent and lifeless in a hospital; relatives who stood there unprepared and uncomprehending that this could have happened to them.

I would like to find a way of supporting legislation to bring all this to a close, but as things stand, I cannot. That is why, along with the Conservatives, we tabled the amendment, and we shall vote accordingly later. There is too much emphasis on protecting the accused, and too little emphasis on supporting the bereaved. I understand that for those on the run it will be hard, but it will be easier than the sudden loss of someone, without warning, on a day that began as normal and ended in bereavement. I know that facing a court, and facing relatives in court, is hard for a defendant; but it is not as hard as waking every morning knowing that, for the rest of your life, someone whom you loved will never walk into your house again, and missing that person more than words can say.

4 pm

Mark Durkan (Foyle) (SDLP): Like other hon. Members, I want to offer my sincere condolences to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), who has just spoken so movingly not just of his own bereavement, but of the sense of grief and grievance that is still carried to this day by so many victims in Northern Ireland. It is a mark of the hon. Gentleman's sense of duty to Northern Ireland as well as to this House that he is in his place today at this difficult time in a very difficult debate. It must tax his emotions as well as his concentration today. He has our full sympathy and the regard of every hon. Member in the House.

I wish I shared the faith of the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire in much of what the Government have said, but unfortunately I do not. I do not because, as the right hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) reflected, a couple of us in our places today were present for most of the negotiations on the Good Friday agreement and we were in and around—if not always allowed to be part of—the various subsequent negotiations, including all the side deals, sub-deals and pseudo-deals that have littered the process ever since.

When we negotiated the Good Friday agreement and when it was put to the public in the referendum, yes, prison releases were certainly part—albeit a very difficult part—of the process. However, in the context of the referendum campaign, people asked hard and difficult questions about outstanding cases, including those for which there had been no convictions. People asked whether there would be an amnesty or a wipe-out or whether the files would be closed. Assurances were given by Minister upon Minister, including the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach, that all the outstanding cases would continue to be pursued and that those who had issues to face would be brought to court. It was said that, if convicted, they might have to spend only two years in jail, but they would appear in court, they would be convicted and they would spend time in jail. That is what the victims were told at that time. It was on the basis of that expectation that many people struggled to vote in favour of the agreement and did so. What is happening now betrays the commitments and promises that were given at that time. It is dishonest and disingenuous for the Government to claim that the Bill was always going to happen as it is simply a logical extension of prior agreements. It contradicts assurances and explanations that were specifically given at the time of the agreement and the referendum.

Mr. Robathan: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not be so foolish as to trust the Government again.

Mark Durkan: The Government know that I have never been quite so foolish as always to trust them. I have not always believed them, and even if I trusted them, I certainly would not rely on them—we found that to our cost.

As the Secretary of State and others have confirmed, the whole question of the on-the-runs first arose in the context of the Weston Park negotiations. Those were peculiar negotiations in which the two Governments talked to different parties about different issues. Yes, we were in the same premises, but we were all on a different agenda. The SDLP was being talked to about policing and the question of public inquiries in respect of the Finucane, Nelson and Hamill cases. Sinn Fein was talked to about OTRs, as that was the issue that it had raised, and decommissioning. The Ulster Unionist party were talked to about decommissioning and the institutions. We were all being talked to about different things.

The Governments came forward with declarations and promises at Weston Park and I note that the Secretary of State said that the Government feel that they are duty-bound to honour commitments. We were given commitments at Weston Park. The public were given commitments post-Weston Park in respect of the process set up to establish whether inquiries should go ahead. We were told that if Judge Cory recommended public inquiries, public inquiries there would be in certain cases. That promise was not honoured, even though it was part of an international agreement between the British and Irish Governments.—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea) says that we did not have guns. Weston Park was the third occasion since the Good Friday agreement on which the then SDLP leadership of John Hume and Seamus Mallon complained to the Government about how the process was conducted, particularly about the privileged and exclusive negotiating position given to Sinn Fein and, to a degree, to the Ulster Unionist party. It was also the third occasion on which the Prime Minister gave us what we regarded as a counsel of cynicism at the time—"You guys, your problem is you don't have guns". That is what the SDLP was told at Weston Park and it was the third time that we had been told it.

Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is making a profound criticism of this Government's handling of the peace process. Does he agree that the privileged status given to Sinn Fein-IRA during that process has been devastating for the fate of constitutional nationalism in Northern Ireland? Does he also agree that the Government's management of the peace process has ensured that republicans and their advocates have a strengthened political position, while the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues, who have stood honourably for constitutional nationalism, have lost out, as have their electors? Has not the process of building a democratic middle ground suffered as a direct result of the Government's tactics?

Mark Durkan: In many respects, what is devastating to the SDLP is neither here nor there. I do not want to go down that road. What is important is that different Governments have handled the process, through arrangements such as those made at Weston park, in a way that has devastated the Good Friday agreement. This Government's approach has not merely interrupted the implementation of the agreement, but corrupted it.

As the right hon. Member for Torfaen has said, that issue came up again in the Hillsborough negotiations of spring 2003.

Mr. Andrew Turner: In an earlier intervention, I asked whether the Prime Minister had made that appalling statement about the SDLP and the fact that it did not have guns. Am I right in thinking that the hon. Gentleman indicated his agreement that it was the Prime Minister who used those words?

Mark Durkan: Yes, and this is not the first time that the matter has gone on the record. Seamus Ma[illegible]on has referred to it before, as have I, in describing our criticisms and frustrations with how the process has been handled since the Good Friday agreement was reached originally.

In the Hillsborough negotiations, different parties again found themselves talking to the Government about different issues. There was to be a joint declaration at the conclusion of those talks, and it was originally to have five annexes. One of those annexes was to deal with the subject of OTRs. Another dealt with the establishment of the IMC and a menu of sanctions demanded by the UUP.

The UUP was very clear that it wanted no part of the provisions relating to OTRs, and completely disagreed with them. My party made it very clear, as we did at Weston park, that those proposals did not derive from the agreement. We repeated that any anomaly that needed to be addressed could be dealt with in the proper way, but that nothing should have priority over implementing the agreement. Sinn Fein had issues with the menu of sanctions outlined in the other draft annexe to which I have referred, as did my party.

The Government responded by reducing the number of annexes from five to three. Instead of being an annexe to the joint declaration, the OTR paper was to be published coincidentally and in parallel with it. The same thing was to happen with the paper on the IMC and the menu of sanctions.

That was a dishonest move. It was a deal that was a non-deal, in that it allowed Sinn Fein to say that it had secured provisions on OTRs but had not accepted sanctions. It also allowed the UUP to continue to say that it had never accepted OTRs and would continue to oppose any legislation on the subject emerging from this House, while claiming that it had secured a promise on sanctions.

That was no way to run a process originally founded on inclusion and which stemmed from an agreement whose institutions could work only on that basis. That is how the Government have got themselves into the mess and debacle that they face today as far as their credibility and sense of moral authority are concerned.

I deeply regret that. I have many criticisms and frustrations about the Government's handling of the process since the Good Friday agreement was reached, but I do not believe that any agreement could have been achieved without this Government and Prime Minister. Many good measures and benefits have flowed from the Government's positive handling of some matters, but they could have listened to better counsel in respect of Hillsborough.

The Bill springs from the commitments made to Sinn Fein at the time of the Hillsborough declaration. However, other commitments were made in the Hillsborough declaration that the Government still show no urgency about honouring. I could take this from the Secretary of State if every other commitment had been honoured to the letter and in the spirit in which they were given, but they have not been. A case in point is the joint declaration, at the SDLP's behest and supported by the Alliance party and some others, that consideration would be given to establishing a forum for victims and survivors. It still has not happened. All that we are told is that the new victims commissioner will look at the issue. Surely one point of having a victims and survivors forum is to allow victims and survivors themselves to advance ideas and proposals on how to deal with the issues of truth, remembrance and recognition that are so important to them. That is an outstanding promise from the Good Friday agreement that has still not been delivered to victims.

Only when we know that a framework has been sensitively and properly agreed with victims and survivors for dealing with truth, remembrance and recognition should we deal with the so-called anomaly of on-the-runs and decide how the perpetrators of the victims' hurt should be dealt with. As other hon. Members have said, if those issues have to be dealt with, surely it would be better to do so once we have certainty about where everyone is in relation to policing and the proper administration of justice.

We have in this Bill the anomaly that police officers will be forced to take part in pseudo-court proceedings and lend the authority of their office to them, while the people who will benefit from the proceedings will not have to turn up and can continue to impugn the legitimacy and credentials of those same police officers. In the same way, as other hon. Members have mentioned, victims—especially those who witnessed the crime in which they lost a loved one—could be compelled to be a party to proceedings with which they fundamentally disagreed, whereas the alleged culprits do not even have to appear. They can stay in the comfort of their home—in the comfort of their holiday home in some cases—and just receive a text message to confirm what has happened. They will find it harder to download a new ring tone than to obtain the benefits of the new system. The difference between the way in which the possible perpetrators of crimes will be treated, as opposed to the victims or the police who have tried to deal with those crimes, is invidious.

[Mark Durkan]

After the Good Friday agreement, victims were told that cases would continue to be pursued. One of the good things that the Government have done in recent years—I pay tribute to the right hon. Member for Torfaen—was to provide the resources to establish the cold cases review, or the historic inquiries team, which offered the assurance that the files would not remain closed, people would not be allowed to escape any liability and the truth would be pursued. The legislation will fundamentally undermine that commitment, because it will mean that if anyone is named by the review or has anything to hide, they can sit and wait in a calculated way. They do not have to take a chance and apply to benefit from the legislation, because there is no time limit as an incentive to disclose their involvement. That is normally what happens with tax and other amnesties. Instead, they can sit back and wait and see if a police officer ever knocks on their door about a particular crime. If the police officer knocks and the person is charged, they can play the Bill like a trump card. They can say, "Right, we're going to benefit from what Martin McGuinness and Gerry Adams have negotiated in the OTR concession." That will apply to everybody—not just republican paramilitaries, but loyalist paramilitaries and people in the state forces involved in a crime, whether committed by them directly or committed by paramilitaries and in which they were complicit, whether through collusion or other forms of crime solicitation. All those people will benefit from this legislation, and that is wrong. That is why more and more victims are expressing their shock, disgust and hurt at the legislation.

For victims, the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill is the Northern Ireland offensive Bill, and it is particularly offensive that the Government are presenting it in terms of closure. That shows neither sensitivity to victims, nor due regard for the intelligence of Members. The Bill is about closure for victim makers, to give them the comfort that they will never have to answer for their crime: not merely will they not have to spend a day in jail; they will not even have to spend a moment in court. It will be harder to appear on the X Factor than to benefit from the procedures that the Government are setting up. They will be open to anyone who has anything to hide about any crime.

The offence has to be

"in connection with terrorism and the affairs of Northern Ireland",

so it would not even have to be the murders or the more overtly political crimes we have been talking about; it could be any crime committed before April 1998. As long as the person claimed that they committed the crime as a function of their membership of this or that paramilitary organisation, or as a spin-off from their membership of the security forces, they can claim indemnity.

The Government say that the Bill is not an amnesty. It may not be called an amnesty, but it has all the DNA of an amnesty and the Government should not try to pretend otherwise. The Secretary of State has moved from the Prime Minister's argument yesterday, that an anomaly needed to be resolved, to the argument that the Bill is about bringing people to justice and making them answerable to justice. However, it is such a bespoke system, with so many guarantees and so many comforts and privileges for the accused that it is an amnesty in all but name. The Government should be more honest in their language if they expect Members to be reassured about some of their commitments.

We will vote against the Bill. We shall also table amendments in Committee, some of which will test the Government's sincerity as they will propose to limit the Bill only to the on-the-runs whom the Government and Sinn Fein say the measure was originally about. The Secretary of State challenged the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington), the Conservative spokesman, but I challenge the Government to tell us what they will do when we table amendments to make the Bill do no more than they committed themselves to do in their agreements with the Irish Government and with Sinn Fein. We shall see how the Government rise to that challenge.

I cannot conclude without again emphasising what the process means for victims. We must all be careful as we conduct the debate that we are sensitive to the fact that we are treading on the grief, even yet, of many people.

4.17 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): The Bill flies in the face of justice. It is about excuses for crimes, some heinous.

The Bill is fundamentally flawed. It is an attack on some of the most basic elements of justice and yet again demonstrates that the Government are prepared to enthrone expediency and dethrone principle. That is what is happening in the House today. I never thought that I would be a Member of the British House of Commons discussing such a Bill from any Government.

Recently, the whole of the United Kingdom was talking about the 90-day amendment, which was not accepted by the House, yet while Members who voted against the amendment were being impaled because they were soft on terrorism, the Government were issuing a Bill that characteristically is a complete sell-out of the British justice system. If the Bill goes through, we shall set up two systems of justice: one on which there is the light of democracy, liberty and law; while the other is a court that has on it the fingermarks of the IRA.

The Bill has been drawn up to give the IRA what it wanted. How happy I am that I took no part in all the conferences that have been described. The more that I am told of those conferences, the more I say, "Thank God, I was not there," but some today who criticised us for not going to those conferences have indicted some of the talks that took place. When hon. Members look at it, they will remember that the people of Northern Ireland were being deceived. Indeed, the Prime Minister came to Northern Ireland and put up on the wall—he became a graffiti writer—all the good things that would come from the Anglo-Irish agreement, but he did not tell us the things that the people who sat around the table knew, and those things have been declared today.

I have heard many criticisms of those who did not go with the Anglo-Irish agreement, but today the vast majority of people in Northern Ireland do not go with the agreement. The Government never told them that they could have another opportunity to express their wishes. Oh no, everything was done to proceed along a path that the people did not want to go down. That is why there is a distinct change in the representation from Northern Ireland. That is why there is a difference among Unionists in Northern Ireland today. We have come to the position where we must stand up for the basics of our British heritage. We must stand up for courts that are courts. We must stand up for justice that is justice. We must stand up for those elementary rights that are the basics of the British constitution.

When we come to what took place, we remember all the arguments that took place at the time. A senior Irish Government source said:

> "Ulster Unionist leader David Trimble's scathing portrayal of a proposed amnesty for fugitive paramilitaries as the last straw for unionists is deeply disingenuous. The UUP leader they point out was a participant at the Weston Park talks last summer when the principle of an amnesty for on the runs paramilitaries was approved by the Irish and British governments and Trimble was fully aware of the agreement and its implications at the time the document was drawn up."

Yet he was busy denying throughout the country that he had any knowledge of it. In fact, the former deputy leader of the party of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) at that time, Mr. Mallon, said:

> "Is the hon. Gentleman telling me that the leader of his party"—

the Unionist party, as he was addressing a Unionist Member of Parliament—

> "sat through seven months of negotiations that produced a document called the joint declaration which he did not see?"—[Official Report, 12 May 2003; Vol. 405, c. 121.]

So there was a conspiracy to keep from the people of Northern Ireland what those at the talks were really discussing.

How very different it was at Leeds castle. I was called in one night—it was almost after midnight—and I was told what I must do by the others. I said, "I'm not doing it. I'm going now to my bed." I called all my people out, and I said, "If you want to see me, Mr. Prime Minister, I'll be here at 7 o'clock in the morning. If you don't want to see me, I don't care. I'm not bending my knee to you. I represent people! Those people put me where I am, and I am going to keep my faith. When I leave politics, no Ulsterman or woman, whether Unionist or nationalist, will look me in the face and say that I did not keep the word that I pledged to my people." And I left, and when I got back, the Prime Minister was waiting to tell me that he was not proceeding with what everyone had planned, so they did not get anything out of me. They will not get anything out of me, other than what I am pledged to fight for on behalf of my constituents. I am here to represent them, and by the grace of God I am going to do that, and so is my party.

Dr. Alasdair McDonnell (Belfast, South) (SDLP) rose—

Rev. Ian Paisley: The Government can wheedle and say this, that or the other thing, but the straight line is this: there is only one remedy for Northern Ireland and that is pure democracy. We need a return to pure democracy.

Dr. McDonnell rose—

Rev. Ian Paisley: Does the hon. Gentleman want me to give way? He should ask for it—he might get it. I do not believe in silent people.

Dr. McDonnell: Was this on-the-runs stuff not in the comprehensive agreement of a year ago? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Well, it was very clear to most of us that there was some—[Interruption.] I am sorry, but there was some reference to it and there was a fair amount of detail of it.

Hon. Members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. It is for the Rev. Ian Paisley to respond to the intervention.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I say to the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell) that I wrote to the Prime Minister to tell him that I wanted him to sign a document to show that we had nothing to do with these things. I have that document, for I was not going to be fooled like other people—there was too much at stake.

Mark Durkan: I thank the right hon. Gentleman—I shall give you your proper title. What you say confirms that you knew that on foot of the Government's dealings with Sinn Fein, legislation would come forward and you would be in the position of opposing it in the House. That was the same position as the Ulster Unionist party—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind hon. Members of the need for the correct use of parliamentary language?

Rev. Ian Paisley: I shall leave the Ulster Unionists to answer for themselves. The people of Northern Ireland know what happened and they have given their verdict. I am not re-fighting the elections; elections come and elections go. The people of Ulster have given their verdict, and I wish that the House would heed that verdict.

Mr. Dodds: On 31 October 2005, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland said in the House:

> "I can confirm that the pro-agreement parties were consulted and gave their general endorsement to the joint declaration in 2003."—[Official Report, 31 October 2005; Vol. 438, c. 632.]

The on-the-runs proposal was part of the annexe to that joint declaration, as was the IMC.

Rev. Ian Paisley: All I can say is that I was in the House when the former Secretary of State for Northern Ireland read out a letter that had been sent by Mr. Trimble on that very issue. It is in Hansard, so hon. Members can read exactly what was in it. This is not something that we have made up in our minds. However, I am glad that the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) will be in the right Lobby tonight. I hope that he will table amendments for thorough discussion in Committee, because I agree with the former Secretary of State that there are matters with which we must get to grips because they run to the very depths of the matter of Northern Ireland and its good government. I am sure that hon. Members will be able to put their case in Committee.

I have been a Member of the House for a long time, but I have never before seen a Minister getting what the Secretary of State got today. Surely that message should get home to the Government. Surely the Government should say, "Hold on. What are we going to gain by this?"

What did Mr. Adams say today? He said that he did not believe that the police or the Army should have anything but the law of the land, but he wants a different law for his people. That is his attitude. He needs to get the message loud and clear that we all stand on a common platform: every man obedient to the law and every man equal under that law. When Northern Ireland gets that, we will have real agreement, peace and prosperity for our people, whether they be Protestants, Roman Catholics, Jews, Hottentots or anyone else—they will all share in it.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Especially the Hottentots.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Exactly. I always knew that the hon. Gentleman was very ecumenical.

The people of Northern Ireland are looking to the House to defend their rights. They do not want those rights trampled on. They want pure justice. I appeal to hon. Members: give us pure justice. If we have that, we will see our way through this, as we have seen our way through the past.

4.31 pm

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): May I first add my condolences to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) and say how brave he has been to come to the Chamber today and give us his views? I happen to agree with every word he said.

It is an amazing day in the House of Commons because the leaders of the two largest parties on the Unionist side and the nationalist side are, give or take a few nuances, virtually in agreement. It is also amazing that my Government are pushing through the Bill. They always say, "Why don't people in Northern Ireland get together? Why can't we get the good non-violent democratic constitutional parties to work together?", but that is what is happening with the Conservative party, the Liberal Democrats and, I hope, some Labour Members—yet the Secretary of State does not seem to be listening. I hope that many of my colleagues think that the only way to show the Government that the Bill needs radical change is either by voting against the Government or, if they cannot bring themselves to do that, at least to abstain.

I heard the Secretary of State on the "Today" programme this morning, when he went on about the Opposition. I am not here to defend them—they can do that for themselves—but it was strange to hear him say that the Conservatives and the Liberal Democrats are not supporting the Bill in the cosy bipartisan way that Labour always adopted when it supported the Conservatives on similar measures. When I first came into the House, I remember having almost to hide because I was not prepared to vote against the prevention of terrorism legislation and other measures. Many of my colleagues in the Labour party did not agree with the Opposition line. Even when the Prime Minister was shadow Home Secretary, we voted against some of the emergency powers legislation. I accept that the parties' views changed and eventually we voted for that legislation, but I reject the idea that all Northern Ireland legislation has to go through on a bipartisan basis.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): I note what my hon. Friend says, but is not it a fact that the Labour Opposition strenuously opposed the IRA atrocities, as we opposed the loyalist atrocities? We made it clear time and time again that the Government were right to resist the terrorist attempt to unite Ireland against the wishes of the majority of the people in Northern Ireland.

Kate Hoey: I respect my hon. Friend and he is right on that, but it does not get around the expectation that people should support the Government because we always support Governments on measures to do with Northern Ireland.

We hear over and over again that the Bill is a necessary part of moving the peace process forward. I am fed up with hearing people talk—the Prime Minister did it again today—about the pain and anguish that they feel. The Secretary of State talked about the difficulty of the situation. I do not understand how a measure that is against the fundamental principles of our judicial system can move the peace process forward.

Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom. Why should we allow a cart and horses to be driven through the judicial system? Who has signed up to the Bill? None of the constitutional democratic parties in Northern Ireland has done so. The Secretary of State told us today that there has been some sort of agreement with IRA-Sinn Fein, but we know nothing about that—we were not asked. It is shocking to me that the Bill is being pushed through against clear misgivings, even among members of my own party. Several hon. Members have said to me, "I really don't like this. I know that there is something wrong about it. If some appalling terrorist action took place in my constituency and someone was murdered, I could not vote for a measure that meant that the perpetrators would be able to come back and walk around and face the victims' families." I do not understand why we should treat Northern Ireland as though it were so different. The people of Northern Ireland are members of the human race. As people living in the United Kingdom, they are entitled to the same rights and duties as the rest of us.

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): It appears that part of the reason why we are being asked to move the process on by voting for the Bill can be found in the words of the Prime Minister. The other day, he seemed to suggest that Sinn Fein had demanded it as the price for ever again entering an Executive in Stormont.

Kate Hoey: I do not know what the Prime Minister has said about some of these things. I feel strongly that the commitments given under the Belfast agreement by the Prime Minister were not always kept. That is why there is so much discontent among the many people who, despite terrible worries, voted for the agreement because they thought that the Prime Minister and the Government meant everything they said. That did not happen. Now, it is the people who have not kept their promises—namely, Sinn Fein-IRA—who are getting everything they want.

Mark Durkan: The hon. Lady says that she is not sure what the Prime Minister has said in recent days. Yesterday, in front of the Liaison Committee, the right hon. Gentleman said:

> "I really believe it is best to get this issue out of the way so that we can get on with building . . . an executive"

and an

> "assembly that is back up and running again."

Later, he said:

> "I also genuinely believe . . . we need to get this out of the way and"

dealt with

> "so that we then get on with . . . the really tough thing, which is"

building "consent for the institutions."

He added:

> "if you do not deal with this you cannot move . . . forward. I think the most important thing is to move it forward".

The implication is that the Bill is a precondition for restoring the Assembly and the Executive. Whose precondition is it? What party has said, "We'll be in no Executive and no Assembly without it."? If we are to believe what the leader of Sinn Fein has said today—I know that that is a hard thing to ask of the House—it seems that Sinn Fein does not even want the legislation. It did not ask for the Bill or at least not for large parts of it, so who asked for it? Has any party demanded it as a precondition—and if none has, will the Prime Minister revise what he said?

Kate Hoey: The hon. Gentleman has quoted the Prime Minister's statement and I can only say that, in my view, we are faced with a secret, stitch-up deal with IRA-Sinn Fein to allow people who have carried out some of the worst atrocities of the past 35 years to obtain an amnesty—an amnesty with a pseudo-judicial face and one that has the appearance of a trial.

Many people—not just those in the pro-Union community in Northern Ireland, but people in all the communities—are profoundly disturbed by the secret dealings that go on between democratic Governments and an illegal armed group. That has been a real problem. It is why the constitutional nationalists and the constitutional Unionists have felt many times during the whole peace process that they are an unimportant bit on the side because, as the hon. Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea) said, they do not have arms.

I shall refer to a letter that many hon. Members have received from a very brave woman, Aileen Quinton, whose mother was murdered by the IRA in the no warning, poppy day massacre in Enniskillen in 1997 as she stood wearing her medals from service in the Royal Air Force. Aileen was in the group of victims whom many of us met last week when they came to Parliament. I agree with the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire that Aileen Quinton and the other victims have shown great dignity. They do not want revenge or retribution; as has been said, they just want justice. My distaste for people who get away with such crimes would be the same if the perpetrators were from a loyalist background. I resent the idea of Unionist versus nationalist, or Catholic versus Protestant. The sides that matter are the terrorists, their supporters, their apologists and appeasers, and the rest of us. We must decide which side we are on, and I hope that hon. Members will decide that they back the right to justice and the rights of our constituents.

I did not receive a proper answer from the Secretary of State when I intervened on him earlier. We did not see IRA-Sinn Fein dispose of their of weapons, but we know that they decided who would witness that disposal. I should have liked the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) and the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) to be present when Sinn Fein-IRA destroyed their weapons, but nevertheless, if it is not a threat any more—if that event took place and Sinn Fein-IRA are genuinely committed to democracy after disposing of their arms—why have we introduced the measure? Why is it needed? The explanation of closure does not mean anything, and it is clear that the whole thing has been brought about by secret agreement.

The Secretary of State said that everything was difficult. The Prime Minister, too, has talked about how difficult everything is. However, Aileen Quinton points out in her letter:

> "As for it being 'difficult', 'difficult' does not matter. We have been doing 'difficult' for over 30 years. We can handle 'difficult' and would be prepared to do 'difficult' for real peace, glad to in fact. This is wrong and it should be impossible."

I believe very strongly we have used the victims to justify the measure. The victims groups, however, have not asked for it. They want to tell the House that even if we do not particularly care about what happens in Northern Ireland—let us face it, many of my colleagues are listening to our debate, but other hon. Members on both sides of the House are not doing so, and will simply come to the Chamber tonight to go into the Lobby—everyone who lives in the United Kingdom has a vested interest in fighting this dangerous precedent, otherwise justice itself could become a victim.

We voted against holding people without trial for 90 days—I opposed internment, and was involved in the Anti-Internment League many years ago—because summary justice does not work and leads to more resentment. However, on the very day on which other hon. Members and I were accused of being soft on terrorism, the Government introduced a Bill that will allow all those people, whatever atrocities they have committed, to get away with it.

[Kate Hoey]

Many hon. Members wish to speak, so I shall conclude. However much the Government seek to dress up the measure as a judicial process, the reality is that it is a costly sham. It is masquerading as a judicial process and, if accepted, it will drive a coach and horses through the process of justice. It is an abomination and we should all think carefully before accepting it. If my colleagues are the slightest bit worried about how they will vote tonight, if they would not want it to apply to their constituency, and if they cannot bring themselves to vote against the Government, they should abstain. I hope some of my colleagues will do that.

I hope that the Government will listen. The Prime Minister is supposed to be in a listening mood these days. My party and the Government are supposed to be in a listening mood. They need to listen to the House. If we do not get rid of the detail of the Bill and change a large amount in it, we will be doing a huge injustice not only to the victims, but to people generally in the United Kingdom.

4.45 pm

Mr. Michael Mates (East Hampshire) (Con): It is always a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey), who speaks with sound common sense about a subject that she knows well.

In my 31 years in this place, I have followed the tortuous path from the height of terrorism to something approaching peace from both sides and in many different roles, but I have never heard in the House such genuine anger and concern about a measure that a Government have introduced. The right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley), the leader of the Democratic Unionist party, will forgive me if I say, with some affection, that we have had plenty of bluster from him and his hon. Friends, we have had some synthetic rage and we have had thunder and lightning, fire and brimstone. He even once accused me of being a bully, which brought to mind a parable about pots and kettles, but we will pass over that. Never have I seen such genuine upset at something that a Government are doing. The palpable unease of the Secretary of State as he behaved very generously and correctly at the Dispatch Box said it all.

For most people in Northern Ireland, the measure is almost the last straw. We have gone from the high point of the Good Friday agreement to the even higher point of the referendum—and that is when I believe it all started to go wrong. When there were doubts, the Prime Minister went to Northern Ireland during that campaign and, in answer to worries, said, "I am going to ensure that there is parallel progress in the implementation of this agreement by all sides." That is exactly what has not happened.

Measures have been forced on the Government by one side, with no response by the other. First, there were the prison releases. That was difficult, but instead of pausing and saying to the other side—to Sinn Fein-IRA—"It's your move", they were all let out. I have said this before, but it bears repeating—when I complained to the Prime Minister at Question Time one day, I met Mo Mowlam behind the Speaker's Chair. I admired her for many things. It was about five months after the referendum and she said to me, "Don't worry, Gerry Adams has promised me that the arms will be gone by Christmas." That was seven long years ago.

The Government have not learned from those mistakes. They have gone on making concessions. They have gone on doing things behind the scenes, which the right hon. Member for North Antrim rightly pointed out, although he played no part in it. Now, the Government are doing it again. Once again, a move is being made by the Government to move things forward. Why are Sinn Fein-IRA not making moves to move things forward? Why are they not letting the exiles back? Why are they not stopping the punishment beatings? Why are they not taking a grip on the criminality? Why are they still providing a paramilitary police force? No one says, "You do that and then we will consider your on-the-run people." It has all been the reverse, and every time yet another concession has been wrung from the Government, which has decreased enormously the amount of confidence that the people of Northern Ireland have in the peace process. It has been back to front from the beginning. This is another stage down that road, and it seems to be the last straw for many of us.

I shall not go over all the arguments; I shall say just two things. First, if the Bill is to go through, it should not go through without some specific guarantee about the exiles being allowed to return. Everybody pays lip service to that. It is not coincidence that it is in all three reasoned amendments, but the Government have nothing to say about it because Sinn Fein have nothing to say about it. Maybe the Government have done a deal. Maybe, when the Bill is passed, Sinn Fein-IRA will say something. Is it not their turn to move first? Should not the Government not be rather more robust in dealing with the matter?

I hope that the House will forgive me, but I want to be brief and end by saying something about victims, and it is a personal reminiscence. When I was in Northern Ireland, a case came on to my desk of a terrorist who had been convicted of attempted murder, had served 10 years, had moved on to the next stage of his life sentence and was eligible for parole, and I was supposed to sign him off. When I considered the case—I am choosing my words carefully because I do not want the case to be identifiable as I do not know what has happened to the victim or to the terrorist—I realised that the terrorist lived three or four doors away from the member of the security forces whom he had tried to blow up in his car. For the past 12 years, that person had been in a wheelchair, living with the pain but knowing that justice had been done. The proposition was that 12 years later the terrorist would be released to go back home to the same street.

Had the attempted murder been successful, it would have been a rather easy decision to make, because everything would have moved on in those 12 years. But there the victim was, still living with the consequences of what this man had done, and when he was released the victim would have to come face to face with him daily.

I did not believe that that was acceptable. I was advised that I had no choice, but I said that a way had to be found, and a way was eventually found.

If the Bill goes through unamended, there will be dozens of cases like the one of which I happen to have personal experience. A lot of people have been convicted and served their sentence, and one can at least say to the poor victim that he had some justice, but now there will be no justice at all. There will be confrontation between victims, their families, descendants of victims and the terrorists, who have paid no price for what they did. That is a fundamental denial of justice, and this therefore is a thoroughly bad Bill.

DEFERRED DIVISION

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I now have to announce the result of a Division deferred from a previous day.

On the motion relating to Criminal Law, the Ayes were 261, the Noes were 211, so the motion was agreed to.

[The Division Lists are published at the end of today's debates.]

Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

4.52 pm

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/ Co-op): When we last debated security in Northern Ireland, the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) spoke movingly about his hand being placed on the head of a curly-haired child who was weeping at his father's coffin, and this afternoon we heard the passion of the hon. Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea). I cannot speak with such passion and direct knowledge. I am not a victim of the terror in Northern Ireland, but I grew up knowing the troubles. I was born in 1969, and the terror we have seen in Northern Ireland, the peace process over the past eight years and the subsequent developments have been the backdrop to my entire life.

When I was thinking about today's debate, it occurred to me that when I was a teenager in the 1980s I was studying the history of the current situation in Northern Ireland while still living through it. I am now a mother myself, and despite the fact that my eldest child was born after the Good Friday agreement, we still today, as we debate these measures, have uncertainty and no directly elected Northern Ireland Government. I am sure that all mothers in the United Kingdom want their children to grow up in a world where the violence is at an end for ever, with Northern Ireland living in peace and harmony. Although there are real problems in Northern Ireland—as a member of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee, I see and hear about some of them, although I bow to the expertise of hon. Members who represent seats in Northern Ireland—we have gone a long way. I join other hon. Members in paying tribute to Secretaries of State past and present for their work in trying to bring that difficult situation to an end.

The Good Friday agreement marked an historic breakthrough. The subsequent referendum and meeting of the Northern Ireland Assembly showed what enormous progress was made between 10 April and 1 July 1998. Seven years later, however, the Northern Ireland Assembly is suspended and direct rule from Westminster is again in place. We have seen some major milestones and some major slip-ups on the road to lasting peace, which we all want to see. I welcome the fact that the IRA has recently decommissioned its arms and formally announced the end of its armed campaign.

The hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) criticised the Bill because it was not agreed by the people of Northern Ireland, which goes to the heart of today's debate. All hon. Members share that concern, whether or not they are present in the House. Surely the point of the whole process is that we should return to devolved decision-making, whereby the people of Northern Ireland are ruled by their directly elected representatives and not from Westminster.

Mr. Brazier: How can this Bill take us towards that objective, when all the democratic parties in Northern Ireland oppose it? Indeed, as the hon. Member for Foyle

[Mr. Brazier]

(Mark Durkan) pointed out, the Bill is being pushed through only because the one party that wanted it still had guns.

Meg Hillier: I am trying to address that point. We must deal with the remaining issues in Northern Ireland, whether that involves the Bill as drafted or whether that involves amending the legislation. The people of Northern Ireland deserve a directly elected Government, and they should decide not only matters of security, but all issues. Matters such as water rates or school reform should be dealt with not from Westminster, but from a devolved Northern Ireland Assembly. The issues that the Bill addresses must be tackled one way or another.

The perpetrators of heinous crimes on both sides of the terrorist divide must be brought to justice. My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) is right to remind the House that we are discussing not only IRA terrorists but loyalist terrorists. I know that all hon. Members condemn all terrorism, and we must make it clear that the Bill applies to all terrorists, regardless of their background.

I am only a new Member of this Parliament and was not a Member during the negotiations that led to the Good Friday agreement. We all know that negotiations in Northern Ireland are often tortuous, and they are difficult for relative newcomers to this House fully to understand from a distance. However, I understand that we must make unpalatable decisions, and the Government—Conservative or Labour—must take that responsibility.

I have some concerns about the Bill, and for me there are two benchmarks. First, we have seen the pain and pressures that the prisoner release programme created in Northern Ireland, but the prisoners who were released—republican or loyalist—all served time, even if many of them had their sentences cut very short for the crimes that they had committed. Internationally, the most comparable situation occurred in South Africa, where the truth and reconciliation commission meant that the perpetrators of crime had to face their victims.

Mr. Wallace: Does the hon. Lady agree that there are two key differences between the South African truth and reconciliation commission and the prisoner release programme in Northern Ireland: first, in South Africa people had to come forward within a time limit to avoid the risk of getting no amnesty; and, secondly, the people who attended the tribunals had to admit all their crimes, and if they were subsequently found not to have done so they lost the protection of their amnesty? Perhaps such conditions should apply to this Bill.

Meg Hillier: I was just coming to that. I was trying to judge whether the Bill measures up to two important benchmarks. The hon. Member for Aylesbury pointed out that those who did not attend the truth and reconciliation commissions faced a sanction.

Does the Bill measure up to the two criteria that I highlighted? Yes, it does, in the sense that the perpetrators will at least face some justice, but, no, it does not in the important sense that it does not even require them to attend the tribunals in person.

I have some serious questions for the Secretary of State. First, will he consider a requirement that those who are on the run and covered by the provisions of the Bill are required to appear at the tribunal in person?

Secondly, what consideration has been given to requiring that those charged and convicted of murder serve some time, at least equivalent to the time served by those who were released under the prisoner release programme?

Thirdly, what opportunity will victims have to see the evidence and to face the people who killed or maimed their loved ones?

Finally, how will the Secretary of State be sure that those who come back no longer have connections with paramilitary groups? Sir Hugh Orde, the Chief Constable, gave us some reassurance on that in the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee, but perhaps the Minister will clarify it when he responds.

I will vote for the Second Reading of the Bill with a heavy heart. I am to serve on the Committee that considers the Bill, and I trust that my Front-Bench colleagues will take seriously the points made in the House this afternoon, particularly as regards people appearing in person before the tribunal.

5.2 pm

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): I am happy to follow the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier), although I have to say that her conclusions did not exactly arise from the argument that she presented. I hope that she might reconsider her position even before the Division, and that, if that does happen, her expectation of being on the Committee will still be met.

For 40 years, murder and brutality have overshadowed life in Northern Ireland. During the worst of those days, as part of what seemed a numbing ritual, Ministers would emerge after each outrage and passionately pledge that the murderers would be tracked down and punished. Over all that time, Northern Ireland Members of this House have followed the coffins, buried the dead, wept with the families and come to this Chamber calling out in righteous anger for action to be taken. We would hear condemnation, receive understanding and be given sympathy. We would listen to the endless obligatory assurances that, no matter how long it took, the people of our war-torn Province could be sure of one thing: justice would be done.

What value should the victims place on the words of those assurances today? In my time in this House, I have witnessed the passage of some grotesque legislation, but nothing that this House has done before compares to the offence that some Members are about to commit against heaven and earth tonight. Let no Member go into the Lobby unaware of the import of his or her decision. What this House is being asked to do today is against every natural, ethical, moral, spiritual, political and legal principle on which civilisation has been founded.

At the heart of every ordered society lies the rubric that wrong-doing must be punished. At about this time last year, in my constituency of East Belfast, a young Roman Catholic man was murdered following an incident outside a public house. His name was

Robert McCartney. Among those involved in his murder were known members of the Provisional IRA. The IRA had not sanctioned his killing, nor had it planned it. It was clearly not in the interests of that organisation to do that. Indeed, I am even prepared to say that, had the IRA known, it would have done everything it could to stop it.

Yet, after it took place, the IRA swung into action. It tried to assist those responsible to get away with murder. Its members meticulously cleaned the scene and removed all the forensic evidence. In effect, they adopted the murder ex post facto. Condemnation was swift and widespread, but the police, the Independent Monitoring Commission and the British and Irish Governments were agreed on one issue. By assisting the murderers to escape punishment, the IRA had become partakers in their crime.

The Government may scantily dress up the provisions of the Bill in whatever legalese they like and attribute to themselves a pretence of worthy motivation in an attempt to cover their moral nakedness. However, in assisting murderers to escape punishment for their heinous crimes, they become partakers in their evil and they will be judged for it.

Through the Bill, the Government may gain legal authority for their shameful proposals, but the provisions will never gain moral authority. They tell us that they are introducing the Bill to keep the peace process alive. I tell them that they will not build peace on injustice. The blood of the innocent cries out against the measure.

Looking decidedly uncomfortable, the Prime Minister attempted to justify the Bill. In a transparently implausible defence, he said:

> "Under the Good Friday agreement in 1998, people who were convicted and in prison for terrorist offences pre-1998 got released. How can you possibly say they"—

the on-the-runs—

> "should be put in prison if the people already convicted have been let out? That is why there is a symmetry if you like about dealing with prisoners and on-the-runs."

Either the Prime Minister does not have a sound recollection of what happened to prisoners under the Belfast agreement or he does not know the meaning of the word "symmetry."

Hon. Members will have held their own views about the prisoner provisions of the Belfast agreement, which were enacted in the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998. I considered them to be morally wrong because they treated terrorists as a favoured class of criminal and accorded them special rights. I considered them to be politically wrong because they were not linked to paramilitary decommissioning and disbandment. I therefore voted against the legislation. However, whatever hon. Members thought of that Bill, it was an early release measure. Prisoners got immediate release only if they had served a third of their sentence, and those who had not were required to serve up to another two years.

Today's Bill is not an early release measure but a terrorist amnesty Bill. Those who benefit from it will not spend one day in prison either on remand or on conviction. The two situations are not alike. I must tell the Prime Minister that there is no symmetry.

The Prime Minister's second explanation is that we have to move forward. If he is moving towards a world that ditches justice and embraces murderers, I shall not go with him. If he regards forward movement as building a society in which victims are shamefully and callously treated and vile terrorists rewarded, he can move forward without the people whom I represent. The loathsome Bill is corrupt not only because its intended outcome is to assist murderers to escape punishment but because of the process used to achieve that goal. It defies reason that, under the Bill, accused terrorists will not even be asked to waste their precious time attending court for the farce of a trial. Moreover, some of them will even be able to maintain their anonymity under the provisions.

Another outrageous provision has been touched on today, but it requires further highlighting. It is the Government's attempt to assist the terrorists to achieve not-guilty verdicts in the poor imitation of a court that the Bill sets up. Clause 7 will exempt a person who holds a certificate issued under the Bill from arrest or detention, from having his or her property searched, and from being fingerprinted. In short, the police will not be allowed to question the accused about the crime that will be brought before the special tribunal. Yet, under clause 3, the certificate will be issued when the police have only > "reasonable grounds for suspecting the applicant to be guilty of an offence".

A case would never be brought before a court at that stage in normal circumstances. It is the stage at which the police would bring a suspect in for questioning, and at which they would build up the final aspects of their case. It is the stage at which they would follow up the leads that flow from questioning, and at which they would tie up and tidy their evidence. But not under this Bill. Under these provisions, the police will be required to produce their evidence even though it is incomplete, without even having an opportunity to question the suspect. Moreover, if they are denied the right to fingerprint the accused, they will not be able to check whether the person might be connected to any other crimes.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is right to focus on the asymmetry between the Bill's provisions and those that apply to prisoners released under earlier legislation. Those released under earlier legislation were questioned by the police and fingerprinted, and had to appear in court. None of those requirements will apply to suspects under this Bill.

Mr. Robinson: Under previous legislation, those people had been through the courts, been found guilty and convicted, and had been put in prison, where some of them then served a considerable part of their sentence. All of them had a minimum sentence that they had to serve. There is no symmetry between those arrangements and the Bill's proposals. If there is to be symmetry, the Government will have to table an amendment to the effect that people will have to serve a sentence of at least two years.

Under clause 7, the prosecutor will be asked to take half-baked cases into court, and the inevitable upshot of this crackpot scheme will be not-guilty verdicts. I wonder whether that is what the Government want.

[Mr. Robinson]

I was propelled into active politics after a school friend of mine was murdered by the Provisional IRA. He had just left school and was in his first job. The IRA bombed the premises of the Electricity Board for Northern Ireland, for which he worked. He was just a teenager, and his life was taken from him. No one has ever been found guilty of having planned that operation, but a Member who has not taken his Oath in this House was in charge of the Provisional IRA for the area in which this person was bombed and killed.

One evening in 1978, shortly after I became an elected representative, I was preparing to go out when I heard a very loud bomb explode. The target was close by. As it transpired, it was the La Mon House hotel. I went immediately to the site, and I witnessed the most horrific scenes. The bombers had hung their device on the security grille over the hotel window, and attached a large can of petrol to it. When the bomb was detonated, it sent a huge fireball through the hotel, incinerating all those in its path. Twelve innocent people were burned alive in that attack. Their charred remains were a gruesome image, and all who saw it will carry that image in their minds for the rest of their lives. What was their crime? They were attending an evening dinner with the Irish Collie club, a dog club. Gerry Adams was arrested and questioned about the attack, and was later released. The Bill will ensure that no one spends a single day in prison for those murders.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: As my hon. Friend knows, I have been dealing with the victims of the La Mon atrocity for some years, because it happened in my constituency. I asked in the House for a public inquiry, but sadly it was refused. I think that the refusal was based on the fact that, as my hon. Friend said, Gerry Adams's fingerprints were all over that atrocity, and he was arrested in the back hills of Castlereagh some time after it. What rights does my hon. Friend think the victims will receive under the Bill if the Government achieve their objective?

Mr. Peter Robinson: Under the Government's proposals, victims will have very few rights. In certain circumstances, they will have the ability to be informed that the case is being considered by the certification officer and will therefore go before the special tribunal. My hon. Friends and I will table amendments that would insert victims' rights into the Bill. They would allow time-limiting of the use of the application system for the terrorists, and open up the system to victims so that, if necessary, cases could be heard in absentia. That would give victims real closure, and those responsible for the crimes would have to serve their sentences.

I could list a catalogue of cases for which no one has yet been convicted, but I believe that I have made my point. We are not dealing with some tidying-up exercise. We are dealing with lives that have been cruelly and abruptly ended by evil terrorists, and we are dealing with the lives of those who loved them and who are now also victims. We are dealing with people whose hopes and dreams were crushed, and whose lives have been destroyed. We are dealing with decades of hurt and pain.

The Government have not produced the Bill because they think it right, decent or just. They have produced it because in 2001 at Weston Park and in 2003 at Hillsborough castle they made a shabby deal with the IRA. My right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) is not slow to point out to us all that it is never right to do wrong. This Bill is very wrong.

There are those who say that if we do not support the Bill, the IRA will go back to bombing and shooting. Is that where this great nation stands? Are we so craven and unprincipled that we cower before a bunch of corner boys and thugs who make demands of us? Are we cringing into submission because savage murderers demand that we throw out due process and British justice, or they will not co-operate with us?

Mr. Brazier: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robinson: I am afraid that I cannot. I have very little time left, and I would be allowed no extra time for the hon. Gentleman's intervention.

Justice is a two-way street. It brings punishment to those who cause suffering, and closure to those who have suffered as a consequence. Victims have rights too. Both the European convention on human rights and the United Nations convention against torture require the United Kingdom Government to provide victims with an effective remedy. The Bill is a violation of those rights, and if this House and the other place enact it, the Government can be sure that, as a result of their defiance of those conventions, they will face a challenge in the courts.

Members can complicate the issue if they wish, but tonight's Division will show whether they are on the side of appeasing terrorists or on the side of the victims. It will show whether Members are on the side of due process or on the side of a sleazy deal. It will show whether they believe in the separation of powers, or whether they support the Government usurping the functions of the courts. The Bill is immoral, obscene, cruel and unjust. I urge the House to decline to give it a Second Reading.

5.20 pm

Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): I would like to set out the background to the Bill as I see it. Since 1997, we have come a long way. In 1998, we had the Good Friday agreement, leading to the early release of 440 prisoners, and we have also had devolved government. With only 14 early releases being returned to jail for breach of the licence conditions—a 97 per cent. success rate—it would appear that the action has been significantly successful.

Even though devolved government has proved to be difficult to uphold, 1998 and 1999 saw the Patten commission producing a raft of proposals relating to crime and policing. Today, of course, we have heard much about Weston Park in 2001, when the commitment was reiterated to move the peace process forward. Consideration of on-the-runs seemed to emerge from that. In 2004, we had the Independent Monitoring Commission and this year saw the IRA statement ending the armed struggle. September then saw the historic act of decommissioning. Even more recently, we have seen the ending of the Ulster Volunteer Force and the Loyalist Volunteer Force feud and the LVF's decision to stand down.

Every one of those matters has been difficult—difficult for the Government, difficult for Northern Ireland political parties and difficult for the people of Northern Ireland—but each has moved the peace process forward and improved the stability and quality of life in Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland is, I believe, a better place in 2005 than it was in 1997, and there has been a 40 per cent. reduction in security-related incidents since 1997. In parallel, unemployment has dropped by 54 per cent. Many, both within and outside the House, should feel a good deal of satisfaction and pride for their role in delivering increased prosperity and stability to Northern Ireland. In view of the steps that I have outlined, it is arguably the case that the Bill is, as the Secretary of State has argued, an evolution of everything that has gone on before.

In 2002, the then Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, my right hon. Friend the Member for Airdrie and Shotts (John Reid), said in a written answer to the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson):

> "The Government have acknowledged that there is an issue concerning fugitives on the run who would stand to benefit from the early release scheme if they were convicted. As part of the package of measures proposed at Weston Park last July the Government made a commitment to take steps to resolve this issue."—[Official Report, 11 March 2002; Vol. 381, c. 705W.]

What we see today is part of the Government keeping true to that commitment and not hiding from very difficult issues.

The Bill includes a number of challenging areas, which I would like to deal with. First, some people oppose the Bill on points of principle. While I respect that viewpoint, I do not have to agree with it. For real progress to be made, difficult issues have to be faced and tough decisions taken. That certainly applies to the passage of the Bill.

I acknowledge that many victims and their families will have difficulties with the proposals, but I would like to make two points. First, the Bill provides a real opportunity to bring closure to many crimes—not for the victims, but for the crimes—and provides specific obligations, as we have heard, in respect of a certification commissioner and special prosecutor to provide a point of liaison for victims, to keep them informed of relevant cases and to see the concerns of victims as central to the role. Furthermore, the requirement for the certification commissioner to put an annual report before Parliament provides an additional level of scrutiny, which I hope is welcomed by right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Mr. Donaldson: One of my first memories of the troubles was of an horrific incident in which three young Scottish soldiers were lured by women connected to the IRA to a flat in west Belfast, where they were abducted by the IRA, brutally murdered and their bodies left on a road in County Armagh. Is the hon. Gentleman seriously suggesting that the right thing to do is to grant an amnesty to the men who perpetrated that deed? Will he return to his constituency and say that that is the right thing to do? That is what he expects me to tell my constituents in Northern Ireland.

Gordon Banks: What I will say is that it is right for Northern Ireland to move on and take advantage of all the benefits that have accrued since 1997.

Mark Durkan: My hon. Friend says that the Bill is necessary for progress, but what progress necessitates the Bill? Who says that we cannot have the institutions and other provisions set out in the Good Friday agreement unless we have this Bill?

Gordon Banks: I have not been party to those discussions, but my answer is very similar to the one that I gave to the previous intervention: it is that I believe that it is necessary to move forward so that there is a reduction—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We must have one debate, conducted in the correct manner.

Gordon Banks: We must ensure that crimes such as have been described today do not occur in the future. I do not want to hear that such things are continuing to happen, and I believe that the Bill will help us to make progress in that regard.

Mr. Richard Benyon (Newbury) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Gordon Banks: No, not at the moment.

Secondly, the Bill offers an opportunity to move to a safer and more tolerant Northern Ireland. That Northern Ireland will be able to put violence and prejudice firmly behind it and close the door on the paramilitary past.

Among other requirements, the Bill provides for the appointment of a certification commissioner to determine eligibility, an appeals commissioner to handle appeals, and a special prosecutor with at least 10 years' standing as a barrister or solicitor. The special tribunal, about which much has been said already, is perhaps the most difficult proposal. In it, eligible certificate holders will be tried for the certificated offence.

It is no accident that the tribunal system should be separate from Northern Ireland's existing judicial system. It has been designed to have all the powers of the Crown court, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, but without bottlenecking the existing system. The requirement for special tribunal representatives to have held

> "high judicial office or office as a county court judge in Northern Ireland or a circuit judge in England and Wales" is evidence of the serious consideration that the Government have applied to the Bill. It would be inappropriate for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to put forward a Bill that would damage the current judicial system.

Mr. Dodds: It says here.

Gordon Banks: If my right hon. Friend had written the speech for me, I am sure that it would be much better than my version. The Bill attempts to preserve the current system while addressing a situation that could be quite demanding, legally.

[Gordon Banks]

In various briefings, much has been made about the absence from the Bill of provisions for trial by jury. However, it is vital to understand that it deals with terrorist trials in the same way as all such trials in Northern Ireland are handled, and in which juries do not take part.

The lack of an end-date to the process has also caused concern for many people.

Mr. Wallace: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Gordon Banks: I want to finish this point. At this stage, it is difficult to predetermine an end-date, as we are not sure of the numbers of crimes involved. At present, there appear to be between 60 and 160 but, given that there are some 2,000 unsolved murders in Northern Ireland, it is difficult to predict the level of take-up that may emerge in future.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Gordon Banks: No, as I want to finish this point. That the Secretary of State has a power to end the programme is understandable. The Bill allows the decision to be taken at some future date, with a level of evidence and detail that we can only guess at today. However, if during consideration of the Bill we can come up with a proposal for a way to incorporate an end-date, I am sure that I and many other hon. Members would be able to support it.

Mr. Wallace: The hon. Gentleman may not be aware that, since July this year, in west Belfast there have been 21 armed robberies and 37 kneecappings, which have been attributed to paramilitary groups. Does he not agree that, before we reward the terrorist groups with a Bill like this, the paramilitaries should face up to their responsibilities under the Good Friday agreement and make sure that such incidents do not continue to happen?

Gordon Banks: I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. Gentleman.

The application of the Bill to members of the security forces, which was raised earlier in the debate, is a reasonable proposal. I have raised the issue with a Minister in the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee, and I believe that it would be unacceptable to apply the legislation to former paramilitaries who match the criteria, but not to members of the security forces.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. So that we may assess his credibility, can he tell us whether he has ever been to Northern Ireland? Has he ever met the victims? I suggest that he reads the book "Ulster—The Facts" by my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson), which shows in graphic detail the extent to which the IRA perpetrated its heinous crimes.

Gordon Banks: Yes, I have been to Northern Ireland. My viewpoint as a Member of Parliament is no less valid—and no more valid—than any other Member—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Gordon Banks: The difficulty is whether the Bill is in effect an amnesty, but it sets out a proper judicial process under which individuals will be prosecuted and, if found guilty, will have a criminal record and be on licence for the normal tariff for their conviction. If they break the law, in the terms set out in the Bill, they will be liable to imprisonment both for the new offence and for the certificated one.

Mr. Hollobone: The hon. Gentleman mentioned the 2,000 unsolved murders in Northern Ireland. What has he to say about clause 7, which will mean that the police will not be able to interview suspects brought forward under this legislation?

Gordon Banks: I understand that point, but if the Bill is enacted, the new process will be what we have, and that is why we are debating it today.

Like many people, I find the provisions on non-appearance in court difficult. If the individuals involved were required to make personal appearances in court, it would go some way to reducing the mistrust of the Bill, as we have already heard today. The ability of the defence to subpoena witnesses sits uneasily in the Bill if personal appearances are not required. I imagine that we will hear a lot more about that in Committee, in this House and in the other place. The lack of a requirement to plead guilty is also a challenge, but we must remember that the normal judicial process does not demand a guilty plea. Surely there should be an opportunity for people entering the process to be proven not guilty if the evidence and argument show that to be the case.

The Bill sets about attempting to move Northern Ireland forward, difficult though that will be—as we have seen today. Northern Ireland has as much right as any other constituent part of these islands to enjoy the economic progress made since 1997, but to enjoy such gains, peace is a vital factor.

Dr. McCrea rose—

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con) rose—

Gordon Banks: I do not intend to give way.

The last Conservative Government and, since 1997, the Labour Government, made significant strides in delivering peace in the Province. The Bill is designed further to deliver peace as well as to take a step towards closure on a very violent and disturbed past. Each society that moves from violence to a peaceful future has to face difficult and, at times, unpalatable situations in that quest. I believe that that is the case today.

The Bill provides a process to convict terrorists of their heinous crimes, but—the House will be pleased to learn—I consider it to be far from perfect. However, it is not possible to produce a perfect piece of legislation to deal with the issues set out in the Bill. There is always a need for people to give ground, although in a perfect world that would not be necessary. The people of Northern Ireland are being asked a big question, as are we in the House. Are we big enough to recognise the past but not let our entrenchments jeopardise the future? The future should be as positive for the people of Northern Ireland as it is for the people I represent in Ochil and South Perthshire. If we can secure the passage of the Bill, we will take another significant step towards delivering that aim.

5.34 pm

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): I have real affection for the hon. Member for Ochil and South Perthshire (Gordon Banks) who sits on the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs, but I do not think that contribution really did him justice. When he reads his speech I hope that he will be not exactly proud of it.

Like my right hon. Friend the Member for East Hampshire (Mr. Mates), who preceded me as Chairman of the Select Committee, I have never heard a Minister so savaged as the Secretary of State was today. The right hon. Gentleman behaved with great restraint and dignity and I have a regard for him. I am sorry that he is not in the Chamber at present. I know that he went to meet the victims and we are all glad about that. My hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) is talking to victims groups at present. As the Secretary of State has already seen the groups—I hope that he was converted by them, if not by us—his place is now in the Chamber and he should be listening to the remainder of the debate.

I have been a Member of the House for 35 years and I have never had to speak in a debate on a piece of legislation that was so illogical, shoddy and base. I understand why the Government are anxious to move, as they see it, the peace process on, but it was clear from the body language, and indeed the language, of the Prime Minister when I questioned him at the Liaison Committee yesterday, and of the Secretary of State this afternoon that their heart is not in the legislation. They know that they cannot justify it.

In many ways, this is the most bizarre day in parliamentary history, because whatever happens in the Lobbies tonight, if the Bill has its Second Reading—I hope it will not, but I suspect that it will—it will have been carried not by a majority of Government Members but by the influence of the hon. Members for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams), for West Tyrone (Mr. Doherty), for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Michelle Gildernew), for Mid-Ulster (Mr. McGuinness) and for Newry and Armagh (Conor Murphy). Five Members who do not take their seats in this place, who play no part in our deliberations and who, despite their recent protestations that they are moving towards democracy, play absolutely no part in the Parliament of the United Kingdom to which they have been elected—

Mr. Dodds: They take the money.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Oh, they take the money and they like the facilities, but they are not prepared to act as Members of the House; yet they have influence—I would even say malign influence. The leader of the Social Democratic and Labour party, the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan), who made a good speech, quoted what the Prime Minister had said to him about the power of the gun. They were the most chilling words that we have heard in our debate. The hon. Gentleman was honourably elected to lead his party and honourably returned to the House with his friend and colleague, the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell), who plays a valuable part in the Select Committee; yet at Weston Park, the Prime Minister pointed out that their words and their influence did not count for as much as that of people who have not eschewed terrorism, because they had relied not on the power of the bullet but on the power of the ballot. That is disgraceful—utterly disgraceful.

I do not know whether those people are personally implicated in any of the crimes that we are obliquely talking about today, but I know that in spite of the declaration in July, which we all welcomed, and in spite of the act of decommissioning that was real, if not total—none will know how total—there has not, as I said in an intervention on the Secretary of State, been one word of remorse or contrition.

David Simpson (Upper Bann) (DUP): Nor will there be.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Sadly, that is very likely.

If we are to draw a line, if we are to move forward, as we would all like to do, and if we are to create a United Kingdom where every part of that United Kingdom is as normal as the other parts, Sinn Fein-IRA must make a declaration that they have not just renounced the bullet or not just put away their arms, but that they have indeed entered fully into the democratic process. They need to take their seats and to argue their cause on the Floor of the House. They should take their place on the Select Committee. They should play a full and constructive part in building that Northern Ireland, which we all accept is part of the United Kingdom unless and until a majority of its population decides otherwise. We would respect that verdict, although I hope that that does not happen.

What have the Government done? They have introduced the Bill, which they had no need to introduce. It is not part of the Belfast agreement—nor was it in the Government's manifesto—but it is a gesture of appeasement towards those who have not properly embraced the democratic process. The grotesque juxtaposition of introducing the Bill on the very day that the Government were seeking to pass some of the most draconian legislation that the British Parliament has ever had placed before it is extraordinary, and it is indeed differentiating between terrorists.

The people who caused the atrocities to which hon. Members have referred in moving speeches today are as evil as the people who puts the bombs in the London tube, and let us not pretend otherwise. If those people who, on Remembrance Sunday 1987—this is seared on my memory; I shall never forget it—blew apart a community as it sought to honour its dead and created more dead are not prepared to say that they are sorry for what they have done, they are not really fit to sit down with the rest of us in a democratic forum. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman. Sedentary comments of that kind, coming from certain hon. Members, do not assist the debate. These are very grave matters, and they are diminished when that kind of sedentary comment—or sign—is made.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

Sir Patrick Cormack: I do not get injury time for your intervention, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but so be it.

I was about to make a point that I have made several times this afternoon: those people who are guilty of those acts should at the very least come into an open court before a judge and be faced with their victims. This business of issuing a certificate and sending it, as was said earlier, to their holiday homes is no way of closing or drawing the line; it is itself yet another grotesque act.

I hope that the Minister will pass on these comments to the Secretary of State, because we all wish him well. Every member of the Select Committee wants to see normality restored, wants to see the peace walls down and wants to see a Northern Ireland in which we can all take pride, but the Bill is not advancing that cause; it is retarding it. It is rewarding those who have caused desperate anguish and have been responsible for some of the worst tragedies in peacetime ever inflicted in our country.

As the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) was speaking—and how sensibly she spoke, Mr. Deputy Speaker—I thought again about the peculiar double standards by which we operate. She and I campaigned together at the time of the Bosnian atrocities. She and I would love to see Mladic and Karadzic brought to justice. They are on the run, but would anyone in Her Majesty's Government be happy to give them a little certificate because someone had been sent along to The Hague to say, "Well, give them a certificate. They're free now."? Those are the standards that the Government are trying to impose in a part of the United Kingdom for which they are responsible.

I am glad that the Secretary of State has returned—I am grateful to him. I beg him to listen carefully to what is said in the Chamber. Again, I say to him that the Bill is not by any definition emergency or urgent legislation. It is legislation over which we should take our time. The Bill must be subject to the most critical scrutiny and examination if there is to be any chance at all of creating something from it in which any of us can take any pride at all. As it is, the Bill is a shoddy document. It is fit only for ripping in half—as I now do—and nothing else.

The Secretary of State is a reasonable man who, as I said earlier this afternoon, has exercised great restraint. Will he reflect on what I am sure he heard this afternoon from the victims' groups? Will he reflect on the fact that almost every single hon. Member on both sides of the House who has taken part in the debate has said that they do not like the Bill? Will he either take the Bill away, which would be the best thing that he could do, or, at the very least, agree that the Select Committee or a Joint Committee of both Houses should be given six weeks to examine the Bill, go through it, take evidence and come up with something that is a little more worthy of the oldest of Parliaments and the greatest bastion of democracy? We are besmirching our reputation if we give a Second Reading to this Bill today.

5.47 pm

Dr. Alasdair McDonnell (Belfast, South) (SDLP): I am worried about the Bill because it is extremely far reaching. On the surface, as we have heard, it will affect on-the-runs—members of the provos who may be suspected of serious crimes. However, other elements of the Bill deeply worry me. There are members of loyalist paramilitary groups, and there are renegade members of the special branch police and Army intelligence who colluded with, prompted and handled Ulster Volunteer Force killers and, indeed, a few from the IRA. Cases are ongoing and we shall hear information shortly about some of the activities in north Belfast when members of the UVF conducted operations with the knowledge of the security services in which they killed a number of innocent people—both Protestant and Catholic—just to keep themselves amused. Some of those people will be absolved by the Bill.

There were members of the security forces who acted outside the law. Hon. Members referred earlier to people acting within the laws of engagement, but I shall not go there at the moment. However, there were members of the security forces who acted above and beyond the laws of engagement and the normal instructions to which they operated. Again, some of those people will be wrapped up in the Bill. Hon. Members of all parties feel threatened by the Bill because it is a catch-all measure that will absolve a lot of people from facing justice and accounting to their victims.

I shall make only a couple of quick points because time is running out and other hon. Members wish to speak. It is fairly clear that the Bill does not stem from the agreement. It is an add-on and a side deal. Perhaps it was initiated by Gerry Adams and the provos, but even he dissociates himself from it and denies that he had much to do with it.

The Bill does not deal merely with people who were sought pre-1998, as the Prime Minister said yesterday; it applies to anyone who might be charged, now and in the future, for 2,100 unsolved murders. It is open-ended and limitless. Anyone who is guilty or associated in any way with any one of those 2,100 murders effectively gets cleared of it. That includes 300 state killings that were in some way suspicious.

Not only does the Bill deny the victims justice, but, worse than that, it denies them the very truth that they need for closure. As there is no time limit, those involved in killing those 2,100 people can sit in their living rooms while they wait in comfort to see whether the police ever come knocking on the door. If the police do come knocking, all those people have to do is apply, from the comfort of their homes or, as my hon. Friend the Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) suggested, their holiday homes, for a certificate.

Sinn Fein specifically negotiated that those people do not even have to go to court. Regardless of Mr. Adams's denials, we are well aware of what happened. When the Bill was announced last week, Mr. Conor Murphy, another absent Member of the House, welcomed it before he had fully read it and realised what was in it. The contrast and distress for me—other hon. Members have made the same point, but it cannot be emphasised often enough—is that victims and police officers, under threat of penalty, can be compelled to turn up in court. Yet the perpetrators of some of those heinous crimes will not have to turn up.

My hon. Friend said that the SDLP will table amendments to undo the Bill's worst aspects. If we are talking just about a small number of people who are outside our jurisdiction, let us limit it to that. If that is the bitter pill that we have to swallow, let us swallow it, but let us not make the measure all-dancing, all-embracing and all-inclusive, so that we do not know where it will end up two or three years down the road. It has to be limited, tidy and exact. People have suffered—some for 20 years, some for 25 years, some for 30 years—and I pay tribute to my colleague, the hon. Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea), who expressed that well. People who have suffered are entitled to some closure, truth and honesty.

We have clarified that the deal was initiated as a separate side deal, starting at Weston Park and continuing at Hillsborough, between Sinn Fein and the Government. They did not involve us. We were often kept negotiating on something on the margins. All other parties were excluded from the discussions. The deal is far too vital for one-to-one negotiations, from which the vast majority of interests were excluded.

We warned of the dangers, but others went ahead. Time and again we made it clear that the deal was way outside the remit of the agreement and what people voted for in 1998. That is a matter of public record. We published different proposals on victims and the truth that is needed for victim satisfaction. We raised our concerns time and again in Downing street and with the two Governments. Our detailed proposals for the truth process for victims are a long way from any attempt to cover up, to exclude or to collude on the past, which is what is happening to a large extent.

Under separate legislation passed to implement the Good Friday agreement, on-the-runs would, at worst, have had to serve a maximum sentence of two years. Even if no one had to go to prison under this Bill, the victims—those who have suffered and whose lives can never be put together again, who are the main people in all this—should not be denied the truth, yet that is precisely what the legislation would do. My colleagues and I intend to propose as many amendments as we can to ensure that the innocent victims—some dead, but some still living and suffering—get a better deal than the Bill as it stands offers them. If we cannot get justice, we will work to ensure that at least they get the truth. To my mind, the Bill offers victims nothing—not even, as was suggested earlier, the limited benefits that victims got through the truth process in South Africa.

5.55 pm

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak on the Second Reading of this Bill, which I regard as so morally wrong, so morally bankrupt, that no amount of amendment—even if the Government wished to amend this wretched Bill—will ever get me to vote for it or support it. Judging by the speeches made this afternoon, I am not alone.

I should, of course, declare a particular interest in the Bill in that I am married to a former Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary. If Sir Jack were well, he would be appalled by what the Government—his Government—have presented to the House today. As right hon. and hon. Members—I congratulate the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley)—probably all know, Sir Jack has Alzheimer's. Today is his birthday. He is not aware that it is his birthday, but it is the reason why I always remember the date on which the George cross was awarded to the Royal Ulster Constabulary. It was rightly, though belatedly, awarded to mark the courage, dedication and sacrifice of 302 dead officers—302 police officers. It grieves me—as I know it would grieve Jack if he were aware of it, but as I said, mercifully he is not—that the Government are proposing that the murderers of policemen and women in Northern Ireland will never have to stand in court or face any tribunal; they will never have to apologise, put their hand up and say, "I'm sorry. I have done wrong." The Bill as it stands will never require them to do that. It must not leave this House without the firm requirement that whoever is guilty of perpetrating the most heinous of crimes, against not only police officers but the innocent people who were in La Mon House and the relatives and friends of the hon. Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea), be held to account.

All those people deserve the right to life to be respected as much in Northern Ireland as it will be respected in the rest of the United Kingdom. I say that as one who, once upon a time, was proud of the Government, when they made the European convention on human rights part and parcel of our domestic law. I was proud because the Government sent out the message to the world—not just to Northern Ireland or the United Kingdom, but to the world—that they respected human rights, the right to life and the right of everyone within the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom to an effective remedy for breaches of that convention.

The Bill proposes a certification commissioner—a wonderful title. I have no idea what it means, apart from being the title of the person who will recommend an amnesty for people who have committed the most terrible crimes. It also creates a special tribunal, a special appeal and a special prosecutor. My goodness, what an array of new appointments and gimmicks. I apologise to whoever takes up one of those offices for referring to them as gimmicks, but I mean it—it is gimmickry. It is not an adequate and effective remedy for those who have suffered through the years in Northern Ireland. I am ashamed and deeply embarrassed that my Government have introduced the Bill.

I appreciate the fact that the Secretary of State met the widows and families of Royal Ulster Constabulary officers, but with respect, he and his fellow Ministers cannot appreciate the depth of hurt and the enormous trauma experienced by a family when someone's life is taken by terrorist bombing and killing. Having spoken to RUC widows and families, I am sure that they would tell the Secretary of State that the first injury caused by losing a loved one was dreadful. I can tell him with confidence, as I am sure they have already told him, that the second injury is caused by their own Government giving an amnesty to those murderers, which is as deeply affecting and upsetting as the first injury.

I made a rather cross intervention on the Secretary of State—I apologise, but I was annoyed; there is a great deal of anger in the House this afternoon—to emphasise the fact that the Home Secretary and successive Home Secretaries have spoken in the House about increasing and improving public confidence in the criminal justice system. People in Bangor, Belfast and North Down are just as entitled to confidence in the criminal justice system and equality before that system as people in north Wales, north London and Bradford—unfortunately, that city comes to mind, because we collectively have lost another police officer, and I am terribly sorry about the death of that young woman. It is on the record that when the Criminal Justice Bill was proceeding through the House in 2003, the Home Office wrote to all Members serving on the Bill Committee to say that, under its provisions, Northern Ireland should not be perceived as becoming

[Lady Hermon]

"a safe haven for individuals who are seeking to avoid retrial".—[Official Report, 19 May 2003; Vol. 405, c. 798.]

Has the Secretary of State discussed the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill in detail with the Home Office, because the special tribunal, the certification commissioner, the special appeal tribunal and the special prosecutor probably amount, in his mind at least, to a trial? He has been trying to persuade the rest of us of that case without success, bar with a few hon. Members.—[Interruption.] With one hon. Member, in fact. If that is the case, will he confirm that where there is new and compelling evidence against anyone who benefits from the legislation, whether they are loyalist or republican paramilitaries or anyone else, there is joined-up thinking in the Government so that if there is new DNA evidence or if witnesses come forward, the Home Secretary's assurance to me that Northern Ireland would not be a safe haven for criminals means that those people can face another trial at any time in the future? The legislation does not come into force until 2007, and I should like a categorical assurance in the House that the Government will not obstruct the police if they wish to bring before the courts anyone found guilty of any crime in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Lady is characteristically persuasive. I can give that categorical assurance. Any police investigation will continue, and will be pursued however the police wish to pursue it prior to the implementation of the legislation.

Lady Hermon: I am most grateful for that assurance from the Secretary of State. I would like the additional assurance that if, in the Government's mind, the provisions of the Bill amount to a trial, the Criminal Justice Act 2003, which extends to Northern Ireland and drives a coach and horses through the old common law rule against double jeopardy, will apply. The Government legislated for Northern Ireland to assure the people of Northern Ireland that where new and compelling evidence becomes available at a later date, even if there had been a previous trial, as will happen if the Bill goes through, those who escape facing the courts and proper justice under the Bill will still be prosecuted under the Criminal Justice Act. I should be enormously grateful for such an assurance, which would go some way towards alleviating the great annoyance, anger and bitterness created by an unnecessary Bill being driven through the House.

Mr. Hain: I probably need to write to the hon. Lady to provide the clarity that she needs in response to her question.

Lady Hermon: I am extremely grateful to the Secretary of State. I should be pleased if he would place a copy of his letter in the Library for the benefit of all other hon. Members who need guidance on the matter.

As I said at the beginning, no amount of amendment will ever improve this morally reprehensible Bill. I am ashamed of the Government for bringing it before the House.

6.6 pm

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) in a compelling objection to a very bad Bill. It was all the more impressive on what must be a sensitive date for her. She followed the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell) who, like her, has immense experience of the Province. They have both reached exactly the same conclusion. I hope that when Members vote tonight, they will bear that in mind.

I welcome the Secretary of State back to the Treasury Bench. It is right that he has been away talking to victims, but may I update him a little on what has been happening in the Chamber? We have been debating the Bill for the best part of five hours and, apart from his predecessor, quite understandably, saying a few words of faint praise for the Bill, no other Member has done so, except for a strange speech from the hon. Member for Ochil and South Perthshire (Gordon Banks), who read a handout from the Whips Office. It was a painful experience.

We have had some exceptional speeches from Labour Members—from the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) and the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier), who has many objections to the Bill and spoke for the first time, I think, in a Northern Ireland debate with considerable wisdom. It is even more significant for the Secretary of State that every democratic party in Northern Ireland is opposed to his Bill. We had powerful speeches from the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) and from the hon. Members for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) and for Foyle (Mark Durkan). Surely they should be listened to.

I watched the Secretary of State carefully, and I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) that he spoke with patience, allowed us a considerable number of interventions and proved again that he is a proper Member of the House of Commons and a true parliamentarian. However, in the 25 years that I have been in the House, I have never seen a Secretary of State so isolated on Second Reading. I have never seen so few Government Members speaking in support of a Bill. I have never seen the Benches so thin.

It is a sad day and I genuinely feel sorry for the Secretary of State, but I do not believe that it is his fault—the fault lies elsewhere. At this late stage, he needs to consider not just that every party in the House is against the Bill, and not just that every democratic and peace-loving Member from Northern Ireland is against the Bill, but that so are the Police Federation for Northern Ireland and the victims to whom he has just been speaking.

Will the Secretary of State cast his mind back to a little earlier today to Prime Minister's Question Time when we were fortunate—the ballot sometimes works in mysterious ways—that the hon. Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson) had Question 1, which was a very significant question, the Prime Minister's answer to which was deeply inadequate? It will be recalled that a little later during Prime Minister's Question Time there was a moving question from the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Singh), who rightly mourned the police officer who was tragically murdered in his city at the weekend. Most of us find it difficult to understand the difference between bringing to justice those who murdered the police officer in Bradford, those who committed awful atrocities on 7 July in this city, and those who will, in effect, have an amnesty under this legislation.

We also find it bizarre—the Secretary of State rather lost his timing—that the Bill was published and received its First Reading two weeks ago, at the same time as the Terrorism Bill was being pursued. Does he not feel that there is something slightly wrong about trying to lock up people for 90 days without charging them on the one hand and giving this complete amnesty on the other hand? Did it not make it worse for the victims in Northern Ireland that that was happening at exactly the same time?As I say, I want to be fair to the Secretary of State because he knows that I have respect for him, but it was deeply insensitive for it to be happening at exactly the same time.

The Secretary of State mentioned closure again and again. I am afraid that that has become a meaningless word—and if he would take a little advice from me, it would be best not to use it again. I am sure that he now regrets saying that the main reason for the legislation is that the courts are log-jammed and it will help. That cannot be a satisfactory reason for bringing forward legislation that will do such harm.

Why is the legislation going ahead? We have established that it is absolutely nothing to do with the Belfast agreement, which the Minister of State and I supported. We have established from the Secretary of State that there has been no threat from Sinn Fein and the IRA that violence will be resumed if the legislation does not go ahead. We have heard from the hon. Member for North Down, who is an expert on human rights, that we could well be in breach of human rights legislation and be taken to the European Court of Human Rights if we proceed. So just why are we going ahead with the Bill at such a pace? Just what happened at Weston Park in private? What deal was done between the Prime Minister and Sinn Fein-IRA? We need to be told before we decide to vote tonight. If no deal was done, there is no sense in proceeding with a Bill that has been so mauled during its Second Reading debate and has so little support. Even at this late hour, I hope that the Minister will withdraw the Bill and consider it further, possibly in a Special Standing Committee, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire suggested.

This is a very bad Bill, but today has been a very good day for Parliament in the way that it has been debated.

6.13 pm

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): I welcome the opportunity to participate in this evening's debate. I agree entirely that this has been a debate of a very high standard, and many right hon. and hon. Members have spoken with considerable passion. At a personal level, I should say how much I admire the contribution made by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik)—I know how difficult it must be for him to be here today—and say from his many friends in Northern Ireland that we very much appreciate the contribution that he has made to the debate today.

I cannot say the same to the hon. Member for Ochil and South Perthshire (Gordon Banks), who will not be surprised by that. Whenever he ascends to the high office to which he undoubtedly aspires, I hope that he realises that some things in life are more important than political ambition. There are high principles in politics and justice that are worth preserving, and his contribution to this debate did nothing to persuade any of us that he understands those principles in the context of the Bill. I hope that he will take the time to come to Northern Ireland and meet some of the victims groups, and I certainly intend to send a copy of his speech to all the victims groups with which I am in contact. The central theme of his speech was, "It is time to move on and get over it." I hope that he will have the courage of his convictions and visit Northern Ireland to tell people that to their faces. I do not think that he has the slightest understanding of the hurt and pain that the Bill is causing in Northern Ireland.

I echo the comments of the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon), who spoke with considerable passion about the sense of injustice felt by RUC widows. I know that many of the other victims in Northern Ireland, such as the families of police officers and of Ulster Defence Regiment, Royal Irish Regiment and Army soldiers, share that sense of injustice. Indeed, the issue is not confined to Northern Ireland, because the families of soldiers who served in Northern Ireland have been denied justice, too. As my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) reminded us, many hundreds of civilians also lost their lives in the course of the troubles.

As has been said, the issue was not included in the Belfast agreement. I was involved in the negotiations leading up to the agreement, which I voted against for a number of reasons, including the provisions on the early release of terrorist prisoners. Nowhere in the agreement is there a justification for the Bill. Indeed, in an earlier response to an intervention, the Secretary of State acknowledged that the deal that he has done with Sinn Fein does not emanate from the agreement, although the Prime Minister has sought to draw such parallels. The argument has been advanced that the Bill is unfinished business and that we need it to achieve closure, but I respectfully inform the Secretary of State that in my opinion it will not achieve closure for many of the victims in Northern Ireland.

Last Thursday evening, my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson) and I met a large number of victims from south Armagh and Fermanagh, which are the areas with the largest number of unsolved murders in Northern Ireland. Hundreds of murders in which the perpetrators have not been brought to justice were committed in south Armagh and Fermanagh.

[Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson]

I do not like to single out individuals, but may I say how much I admire Miss Aileen Quinton's contribution to this debate? She lost her mother in the poppy day massacre in Enniskillen in 1987, which the Chairman of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee, the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack), mentioned earlier. I have heard Aileen conduct radio interviews, and she has shared her views in the national media with considerable dignity. The strength of her argument on this issue is unanswerable: Aileen, like so many of the victims who have suffered as a result of the troubles in Northern Ireland, feels that she will suffer doubly because of the injustice caused by this Bill.

We want a process of healing in Northern Ireland so that we can move forward. I would say to the hon. Member for Ochil and South Perthshire that I want to move forward, but I do not want us to trample over the rights of victims in our haste to do so. We must bring people with us. Dealing with the sense of injustice is part of the process of healing. Peace is not created by injustice.

The problem with the Bill is that it will lead to injustice. Some of the victims—this was expressed to us very clearly when we met victims' groups—will be re-traumatised as a result of this process. There is indignation that the perpetrators can remain anonymous throughout the process and do not have to appear before a tribunal to account for their crimes. It is an aberration to describe that as justice or due process. That simply does not wash with people in Northern Ireland. I am afraid that the legacy of the Bill will be that murder, intimidation and terrorism have proved successful for individuals who have engaged in such activities.

The Secretary of State made it clear that the purpose of the Bill is to meet a demand that has been made by Sinn Fein-IRA. That demand is coming from nowhere else but one source, and one source only. I accept that not only Her Majesty's Government but the Irish Government are party to the agreement that has been reached. The Irish Government are happy to support a deal that permits the murderers of RUC officers to walk free, yet say in their own jurisdiction that the men who murdered Garda Jerry McCabe will not benefit from the process. The hypocrisy of that position shows the extent to which double standards are applied in dealing with Sinn Fein-IRA. Of course, I do not wish the murderers of Jerry McCabe to benefit. I have met Garda McCabe's widow—a fine woman who has shown much courage in highlighting her case in the Irish Republic. Today, we met the widows and family members of RUC officers who were murdered and they cannot understand why that double standard should apply.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: Is my hon. Friend aware that the Taoiseach is on record as saying that he would rather be in opposition than share a Government with Sinn Fein?

Mr. Donaldson: Indeed. We have heard Labour Members trumpeting the July statement and the Secretary of State telling us that the totality of IRA weapons have been decommissioned. Yet even now the Irish Prime Minister says that Sinn Fein is still not fit to be considered as coalition partners in the Irish Government in Dublin, who will no doubt press my right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) and my party to form a Government in coalition with Sinn Fein. One standard applies in Stormont and another applies in Dublin.

David T.C. Davies: I am sure that many of my hon. Friends agree with every word that the hon. Gentleman is saying. Does he agree that the double standard, whereby British soldiers will now be treated in the same way as IRA murderers, will be hugely detrimental to our ability to recruit high quality men and women such as those who have for 30 years protected Catholic and Protestant civilians alike in the Province of Northern Ireland?

Mr. Donaldson: I agree, and I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. Some members of the security forces to whom I have spoken find it insulting to be categorised with terrorist murderers in benefiting from the measure. Let us not try to justify the Bill by saying that members of the security forces will benefit from it. That is not the motivation behind the measure. The motivation is to appease Sinn Fein-IRA—that is clearly the bottom line. The Government do themselves no credit by trying to shelter behind the argument that the Army and the police may benefit from the Bill.

The Bill is a raw deal for the victims. My hon. Friends and I will table amendments in Committee in due course. I agree with the hon. Member for North Down that that will not change my mind about opposing the principle of the Bill—I shall continue to oppose it.

Dr. McCrea: Will it not also be a raw deal for, and insulting to, the people of Northern Ireland and the victims if Her Majesty's Government order Labour Members to vote for the Bill? That means that they have not listened to the debate or heard the arguments, but will act as fodder for the Government. They simply obey the Whips.

Mr. Donaldson: My hon. Friend makes a telling point. May I say, as a friend and colleague, how much I appreciated his contribution to the debate? It must have been difficult for him to share some of his experiences with the House. I appreciate the passion and the emotion with which he spoke.

Surely, if the process is to go on, the victims must be given some rights. They should have the right to argue the case to the commissioner that a certificate should not be granted to an offender before going to the tribunal. That is a basic right, but the Bill does not afford the victims the right to put a case that the perpetrators should not receive the certificates that they seek. Victims should also have the right to make a statement in the presence of the offenders when they appear before the tribunal—if they appear. As my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East said, when offenders have not come forward, surely victims should have the right to approach the commissioner to establish whether the police have evidence or information about the person or persons responsible for the murder of their loved ones and to ascertain whether there is any intention to pursue tribunal proceedings against those individuals—yet not even that right is accorded them.

The measure contains nothing that enables the victims to receive some form of compensation for the crimes that have been committed against their loved ones. Victims groups ask how the Government are recognising them in the process. Such recognition is not apparent in the Bill. Let me be clear—the victims do not want blood money, but they are entitled to reparation and compensation for their loss. The Government need to deal with that.

FAIR—Families Acting for Innocent Relatives—in south Armagh recently submitted an application for a memorial centre for victims. As I said earlier, south Armagh is one of those areas where there has been high loss but low detection and conviction of the perpetrators. The Government could not even give the group the money for the memorial centre. They chided the victims group and said that it had to prove that it was engaging in cross-community activities. In south Armagh, that means working with Sinn Fein and republicans—the same Sinn Fein whose councillors on Newry and Mourne council prevented the victims group from hiring a community hall in Newtownhamilton. Thankfully, those councillors have been surcharged and I hope that they will be kicked out of office. The Government expect the victims to work with Sinn Fein in south Armagh, and if they do not they will not get the money for their memorial centre. What an appalling way to treat the innocent victims of terrorist violence. This shows that the Government have double standards. It is time that they gave proper recognition to the victims.

I welcome the appointment of the victims commissioner—the Secretary of State knows that—but the commissioner and other groups must be empowered and given due recognition in this process. There is too much money involved. I wonder how much this process will cost the taxpayer in the United Kingdom. I suspect that it will be millions of pounds. Would it not be better to give that money to the victims of IRA violence in Northern Ireland? Just to build a memorial centre in somewhere like south Armagh would not cost the Government that much, but they cannot even get that right.

Finally, I want to quote again the Superintendents Association. Its members are senior officers in the police service whose job is to uphold the rule of law, and it has looked at this legislation and found it to be deeply flawed. It states that it will be

> "injurious to the overall administration of the Criminal Justice Process in Northern Ireland, and public confidence therein."

That is the verdict of senior police officers in Northern Ireland, and it was, after all, this Government who told us that we should listen to senior police officers. Should not the Government listen to these senior police officers and catch on? They should drop this legislation and stand by justice and democracy. That is the only way to achieve real peace in Northern Ireland. Appeasement did not work in 1939 and it will not work now. If the IRA is genuine about peace, it should not need to have injustice.

6.31 pm

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): This is a shameful Bill. It relates to a deal that was obviously done between the Prime Minister and the leaders of the IRA. The right hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy), who was Secretary of State for Northern Ireland until May, would not introduce the Bill—at least, that is my reading of what happened. He made a good speech today, and he should vote against it, as should the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier). She pointed out the Bill's deficiencies, and she should vote against it. As the right hon. Member for Torfaen appeared unwilling to introduce it, he was replaced by the right hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), who was much more willing to do so. We know his background with the Troops Out movement, and we know where his real instincts and feelings lie. I believe that he was appointed because he was acceptable to the IRA and Sinn Fein, and that is why he is introducing this disgraceful Bill. I feared that the Belfast agreement might be built on sand, but I hoped otherwise. But as we have seen, Danegeld has been paid, and the thing about Danegeld is that one keeps on having to pay it. Concession after concession has been made. What will be the next one?

In this brief speech, I want to concentrate on the treatment of public servants. The RUC, to which I pay due respect, should certainly be considered, but I particularly wish to talk about the Army, as I served in Northern Ireland with certain hon. Friends sitting around me, and the Bill affects friends of mine. Loyal public servants who were doing the bidding of the Government will be in the firing line as a result of this Bill. What will be the next concession? The Saville inquiry was a concession to the IRA, costing £200 million and rising. I expect that charges against soldiers will result from it, because otherwise there would be no point in making that concession to the IRA. Under this Attorney-General, I expect that the commanding officer will be charged, for he was there, and possibly the adjutant as well. The adjutant was the present Chief of the General Staff, General Sir Mike Jackson.

Mark Durkan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robathan: I am sorry, I have not got time.

The former Chief of the Defence Staff, Admiral Boyce, has said:

> "The Armed Forces are under legal siege".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 July 2005; Vol. 673, c. 1236.]

We have seen the setting up of the historic investigation team by the 6th Regiment, Royal Military Police in Northern Ireland to help the Police Service of Northern Ireland in its historic investigation. But, of course, it is investigating only soldiers. It will be working with the historic inquiry team of the PSNI. More Danegeld is being paid.

I want to concentrate on two cases that I know a little about. Friends of all ranks were involved. The first was in Gibraltar in 1988. We all remember "Death on the Rock"—what a shocker that was. The Minister will tell us what the next concession will be, but I am sure that there will be an historic investigation into this case. Why? The terrorists were plotting to blow up the changing of the guard at Government House and they would have killed hundreds of people. An outrage was being planned. Actually, it is a moot point whether the soldiers were right when they shot the IRA terrorists, because the bomb was still in Spain. But that is the point. The historic investigation could therefore easily bring charges, although the soldiers were acting in good faith, on instructions from the Government and from their commanders, and prevented a dreadful atrocity. The Government will hang those SAS soldiers out to dry, as they have done to some soldiers in Iraq, to placate the IRA.

[Mr. Robathan]

The other case is even worse. In May 1987, eight IRA terrorists who were armed to the teeth drove a JCB with a bomb on it into Loughall police station and exploded the device. They were then ambushed by soldiers and police officers who had been so instructed by the Secretary of State. That took place with Government approval. I would say that it was a great success in the battle against the IRA, but I fear that that is not how it strikes this Government and this Secretary of State. This Government passed the Human Rights Act 1998. When the European Court of Human Rights said in May 2001 that the human rights of those poor murdering terrorists had been violated, the Government had to pay £10,000 to each family. Under the Human Rights Act, those soldiers are already guilty. It is no surprise that in a written answer to me on 11 November, the Secretary of State said through the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Woodward), that

> "the PSNI has advised us that this incident will be looked at by the Historical Enquiry Team in due course."—[Official Report, 21 November 2005; Vol. 439, c. 1641W.]

What confidence can any soldier or ex-soldier have in this Government? It is a disgrace. More SAS soldiers will be hung out to dry, and there will be another concession to the IRA.

Should Adams and McGuinness—both on the IRA army council, and both have blood all over their hands—appear before the tribunal and should they be released on licence, will they be allowed to sit in the House of Commons as murderers under licence? I make this prediction: I guarantee that, should it happen, this Government will make another concession.

Arguably, this is the worst Bill to come before the House in recent times—certainly while I have been a Member of Parliament. I should like Defence Ministers and senior commanders of the armed forces to stand up and say, "This is a disgrace", because it is a disgrace. The Sun accused me, and my hon. Friends, of being soft of terrorism. Where does it list the people who will vote for this disgraceful Bill tonight?

When we come here we should always know what we are doing, and we should know that what we are doing is right. We should always strive to do what is right. We swear before the House that we will try to do what is right. It is not right to pass this dishonest and corrupt Bill. I hope that all Members who vote for it will hang their heads in shame.

6.37 pm

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): When we think about Northern Ireland, many words come to mind—"courage" being one in so many instances. Before I deal with the Bill, perhaps I can be allowed to stray for a moment to speak of the courage of the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik). His must have been a very difficult speech to make, but he made it with his usual commitment to the issue. He will take this in the spirit in which I mean it: he has far more friends in this place than his modesty would allow him to think. I know that he will also take this in the spirit in which I mean it. He is a man with a great sense of humour, and his great strength of character will allow him to come through these difficult times. Every Member looks forward to the eventual return of the humour for which he is well known. He is a great Member of Parliament.

This has been a very passionate debate. I have been in the House for only eight years, but I cannot think of a time when I have seen the Government under so much fire from every corner of it. We heard a very effective speech from the former Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy), who says that he hopes the Government will consider serious amendments to the Bill, and will consider other people rather than just republicans. I think that I quote him accurately.

The hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) said that the Bill undermined assurances given about prisoners during the agreement referendum campaign. He also made the important point that loyalist terrorists have not decommissioned, yet they will benefit from the Bill.

The right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) spoke with his usual passion. He fairly said that the Bill introduces two systems of justice in Northern Ireland, but I suspect that he would accept that one of those systems is not justice at all.

As usual, the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) spoke extremely well. She pointed out that, in opposition, the Labour party did not always support anti-terrorism legislation. She asked why, if the IRA is no longer a threat, we need the Bill.

My right hon. Friend the Member for East Hampshire (Mr. Mates) said that there are too many concessions in the Bill and that they all point one way. He provided a moving personal account of the difficulties that he had faced in one instance as a Minister. He argued that the Bill might well lead to Ministers having to take more difficult decisions, perhaps compromising victims' rights time and again.

The hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) expressed great concern about the lack of any deadline in the Bill and the absence of any need for the accused to appear in court.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) spoke about the great injustices of the Bill. He rightly pointed out that, because of the limit on the amount of evidence that can be gathered, it assists in the achievement of non-guilty verdicts by the accused. He spoke movingly about the events that propelled him into politics, which are highly relevant to the issues surrounding the Bill.

Even the hon. Member for Ochil and South Perthshire (Gordon Banks)—I shall be kinder than others about him—expressed concern about the fact that the accused do not have to appear in court and about the ability of the court to subpoena witnesses, but not those who are accused.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) reminded us, in a wide-ranging speech, that the people that we are talking about in the context of the Bill are just as evil as those who bombed London. He provided a good analogy when he said that on-the-run mass murderers and terrorists from Bosnia would not be given a certificate for freedom.

The hon. Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell) spoke about the need to provide victims with justice and truth. Indeed, he felt that the Bill lets those victims down.

The hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) expressed shame at the Government for introducing the Bill and my right hon. Friend the Member for Bracknell (Mr. Mackay) appropriately asked exactly what deal was done at Weston Park.

The hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) spoke about the real hurt caused in Northern Ireland by the Bill. He pointed out that the Government said only a week ago that Opposition Members should have listened to police officers in respect of proposals for 90 days, yet police officers are clearly being ignored in respect of this Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan), who, along with some other colleagues, served in Northern Ireland, made a hard-hitting speech. He condemned the concessions that it seems the Government are making.

It is important to ask why we need the Bill. The Government have not provided the answer to that question. Who is the Bill for? It is certainly not for the victims, who do not want it. The only political party in favour of the Bill is Sinn Fein. It is rather alarming that the Government are prepared to negotiate with Sinn Fein but will not negotiate with constitutional parties about amendments to the Bill. The Secretary of State said that there was an agreement with the Irish Government, but they are certainly not implementing the terms of the Bill.

As hon. Members have already asked, what will result if the Bill is defeated? Let us suppose that it does not get through Parliament: what are the Government afraid will happen? The Government say that they believe the IRA when it says that the war is over. That leads me to the question of why the Bill should be introduced now. If the war is perhaps not over, is not the Bill premature?

We have heard the IRA statement and subsequent confirmation that the IRA has put its arms beyond use, but I am not aware that it has put the proceeds of the bank robbery beyond use. As far as I know, the Government still hold the IRA responsible for that robbery, as do the Irish Government and the police in Northern Ireland. While the IRA has the means to rearm and to pay its volunteers, is not the Bill at least premature?

The Secretary of State spoke about closure—what he described in his article in The Times yesterday as the end game. The Good Friday agreement makes it clear that its participants believe that the aims of the criminal justice system should be to "have the confidence of all parts of the community".

I do not think that we can say that this Bill has the confidence of all parts of the community when it comes to the so-called justice that it will deliver.

I shall give a very brief analogy. A few years ago, I and some other hon. Members visited Rwanda, where there had been the most awful genocide. I walked through the bones and skulls of some of the victims of that genocide, and then attended one of the court sessions. About 850,000 people had been massacred, and I said to the Justice Minister, "We have all these courts set up, and we are going to send people to prison, yet we are talking about reconciliation. Can we get the reconciliation if we go down that path?"

What a naïve question for me to ask. The Justice Minister said, "We have to have the justice before we can have the reconciliation." That is the point that hon. Members of all parties have tried to make today.

The Secretary of State said that we can never bring an end to the victims' hurt. That may be true, but we can make that hurt worse. I suspect that that is what the Bill will do.

The Secretary of State did not help the process with his article in The Times. He wrote that those returning would face the prospect of a "full legal process", but that is untrue, as they will not have to appear in court. He added that they would have to go through a special court before being let out on licence, but let out of where, let out of what? Those people will not have been inside for a single day. What a misleading article it was.

There is not time for me to go through all the Bill's flaws, as I want to give the Minister an appropriate time in which to respond, but I will say that I see the Bill as yet another concession to the IRA. As my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby asked, what will the next concession be? What will provoke it? Will it be that the IRA starts to make threatening noises again? That is unacceptable in a democracy.

I do not mean this as a personal comment to the Minister, but he will not be surprised to hear that we will take this Bill very seriously if it reaches Committee.

6.48 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. David Hanson): I appreciate the tone of today's debate. This is a difficult subject, with lots of raw emotion. I hope that the House will understand if I limit the number of interventions that I take, as I have only a short time in which to respond to a long debate in which very serious issues were raised. However, to show that the Government are not afraid of debate, I point out to the House that the programme motion—which I hope will be approved—allows for a long discussion in Committee. I assure hon. Members that I shall welcome prolonged consideration, and that provision has been made to allow the Committee's deliberations to go beyond the normal period.

I found the speech of the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) very moving and honest. I appreciate the effort he made to come to the House in today's difficult circumstances. On behalf of the Government and Labour Members, I want to express to him and his family our condolences at his loss.

I am also grateful to hon. Members of all parties for their efforts in addressing the very difficult issues associated with the Bill. I hope that I will have an opportunity to deal with some of the matters that have been raised, but I shall start with the question of victims. That subject has been at the heart of many of the contributions made today.

[Mr. David Hanson]

No one could have listened to the speeches of the hon. Members for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson), for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) or for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson), or to the very moving contributions from the hon. Members for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea) and for North Down (Lady Hermon), without thinking of the victims of the crimes that are the subject of the Bill before the House. I had the opportunity to meet victims, including Aileen Quinton and Willie Frazer, when the Bill was published two weeks ago. Yesterday, I also looked in the eyes of widows of policemen who had been killed in a brutal and cowardly way by members of the IRA. I have also met the children and parents of people who have been killed and seen the dignity with which they carry themselves. Nobody in this House can understand their pain, and nor can we look those people in the eye without recognising the further pain that this Bill will bring.

Mr. Donaldson: I was with Aileen Quinton when the Minister met her, by accident, in Central Lobby a couple of weeks ago. The Minister undertook to meet Miss Quinton before the Bill today. Did he do so?

Mr. Hanson: I have offered to meet victims. I met victims yesterday and I make an offer today to meet with any victims' groups. I also met police victims yesterday and I have said that I will continue to liaise with them. I have offered a meeting to the individuals concerned and will arrange to discuss the issues with them.

One of the reasons my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will introduce the victims commissioner from 1 December—Bertha McDougall is a victim herself—is to ensure that victims are recognised.

Michael Gove: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hanson: No, because I have limited time to reply.

In the Bill, there is a duty on both the certification commissioner and the special tribunal to liaise with, support and inform the victims during the new process.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen and the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) said, the Bill was the result of discussions not as part of the Good Friday agreement—which some hon. Members genuinely opposed—but after Weston Park in 2001 and 2003. It was not—as my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) suggested—published secretly. It was a published document that was made available. It was also indicated at the time what steps the Government would take to bring the matter forward.

The hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) asked, "Why now?" The Bill has been introduced now because part of the agreement and part of the building blocks for the agreement were to bring the IRA to the position it is now in, where it has made what I hope proves to be its historic statement in July.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hanson: I will not give way at this stage, because I wish to make some important points in limited time. My time to reply is limited because we wanted to give hon. Members an opportunity to make their points about the Bill.

We wanted to ensure that the Independent Monitoring Commission—whose reports are being considered—had the chance to recognise what the IRA has undertaken. As part of the political peace process and as part of the building blocks for that process, this measure has been introduced. And, yes, I do say to the right hon. Member for East Hampshire (Mr. Mates), to the hon. Members for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) and for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) and to my hon. Friends for Ochil and South Perthshire (Gordon Banks) and for Vauxhall, that we introduced the Bill at this time for those reasons.

The Bill, if it passes all its stages, will not come into effect until 2007 and we will have an opportunity to judge how the IRA performs between now and then. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) said, we need to restore the institutions in Northern Ireland, so that local people can decide local priorities.

Mark Durkan: If the Minister is as concerned as he says he is about victims, why are the Government stabbing new grievances into victims' grief and calling it closure? In relation to the Minister's last comment that the Bill will pave the way for the restoration of the institutions, I ask what will not happen if the Bill is not passed? What will be denied us, in terms of the institutions and the agreement, if the Bill is not passed?

Mr. Hanson: My hon. Friend will be aware that part of the discussions at Weston Park and part of the reason that the Bill has been taken forward is because it was part of the building blocks to get people to make the statement in July in the first place.

I wish to make it clear for hon. Members on both sides of the House that there are tight eligibility criteria for the scheme. People cannot qualify for the scheme if they are members of Continuity IRA, the Real IRA, the UVF, the LVF or any specified organisation. They cannot be involved in terrorism now and qualify for the scheme. They cannot have been involved in offences after 10 April 1998 and qualify for the scheme. They cannot have received a sentence for any further crime and qualify for the scheme. That is an important aspect.

Some Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall, the right hon. Members for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) and for East Hampshire, and the hon. Members for Aylesbury, for Foyle and for Montgomeryshire have called the measure an amnesty. That is a debatable point and people will argue about it, but individuals will come before a court, they will be prosecuted and could be found guilty; a situation where individuals could be subject to criminal prosecution and released on licence is not an amnesty as I understand it.

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hanson: No, there are only three minutes left. The hon. Gentleman has not been in the Chamber for all of the debate so I certainly will not give way to him.

Several Members referred to non-appearance in court. That is a serious matter and it was raised by the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell), my right hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen, the hon. Members for North Down and for Montgomeryshire, my hon. Friends the Members for Foyle, for Hackney, South and Shoreditch and for Ochil and South Perthshire and the hon. Member for South Staffordshire. Non-appearance in court is a difficult issue. We have taken a judgment, because we want to get individuals through the scheme. We want them to qualify for the scheme, to come to account and to face justice as a result of a criminal record.

For the reasons that we have outlined we support the Bill as it stands, but as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said we shall examine amendments in Committee, tabled by the hon. Member for South Staffordshire or others. We shall consider what has been said on both sides of the House today, including the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen and others. We shall consider the issue in Committee and in another place, and reflect on the all the points that have been made.

There will be a tight licence under the legislation. If convicted individuals breach the licence, become members of, or involved in supporting, specified organisations get involved in terrorism or are convicted of other crimes, they will face recall and imprisonment. Under the early release scheme that we introduced, individuals have lost their licence and faced the consequences.

My hon. Friends the Members for Ochil and South Perthshire and for Hackney, South and Shoreditch asked about end dates for the scheme. The Secretary of State will have the power to set an end date and we shall consider that in due course unless the scheme comes to a natural end.

I want to mention two further issues. My right hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen, the hon. Members for Montgomeryshire and for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) and the right hon. Member for East Hampshire mentioned exile. The Government certainly do not support the process of exiling. It must end and we utterly condemn activities of groups on either side of the community that are aimed at intimidating individuals in Northern Ireland. I understand the concerns that have been expressed today. It is our intention to listen to suggestions during the passage of the Bill to ensure that we tackle the question of exiling and ensure that intimidation does not occur.

The second point relates to interaction with the historical inquiry team. It is not our intention, in any way, shape or form, to undermine the efforts of the Police Service of Northern Ireland in reinvestigating old murders. Those investigations can take place until the Bill comes into effect. The PSNI can continue to pursue them, irrespective of their eligibility for the scheme. The Bill is about seeking justice, to ensure that individuals are given criminal records, that victims know who has committed the crime and that individuals are held on licence if they are convicted after 2007.

We have included the armed forces and security services because we feel that it would be unfair and impractical to hold an individual on a terrorist basis who could be released after 2007, whereas an individual from the military could be charged with a similar offence and find themselves in jail for that period.

This is part of the political peace process. It is the key to getting where we are today. It is the key to the future. It is the key to ensuring that there are no future victims in Northern Ireland. The Government's concern is to ensure that we do not create future victims. That is why I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 258, Noes 313.

Division No. 107] [7 pm

AYES

Afriyie, Adam
Ainsworth, Mr. Peter
Alexander, Danny
Amess, Mr. David
Atkinson, Mr. Peter
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Baker, Norman
Baldry, Tony
Barker, Gregory
Baron, Mr. John
Barrett, John
Beith, rh Mr. Alan
Bellingham, Mr. Henry
Benyon, Mr. Richard
Bercow, John
Beresford, Sir Paul
Binley, Mr. Brian
Bone, Mr. Peter
Boswell, Mr. Tim
Bottomley, Peter
Brady, Mr. Graham
Brake, Tom
Brazier, Mr. Julian
Brokenshire, James
Brooke, Annette
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Browning, Angela
Bruce, Malcolm
Burns, Mr. Simon
Burrowes, Mr. David
Burstow, Mr. Paul
Burt, Alistair
Burt, Lorely
Cable, Dr. Vincent
Campbell, Mr. Gregory
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Chope, Mr. Christopher
Clappison, Mr. James
Clark, Greg
Clarke, rh Mr. Kenneth
Clegg, Mr. Nick
Clifton-Brown, Mr. Geoffrey
Conway, Derek
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Cox, Mr. Geoffrey
Crabb, Mr. Stephen
Curry, rh Mr. David
Davey, Mr. Edward
Davies, David T.C. (Monmouth)
Davies, Philip
Davies, Mr. Quentin
Djanogly, Mr. Jonathan
Dodds, Mr. Nigel
Donaldson, Mr. Jeffrey M.
Dorrell, rh Mr. Stephen
Dorries, Mrs. Nadine
Duddridge, James
Duncan Smith, rh Mr. Iain
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Ellwood, Mr. Tobias
Evans, Mr. Nigel
Evennett, Mr. David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Mr. Michael
Farron, Tim
Featherstone, Lynne
Field, Mr. Mark
Forth, rh Mr. Eric
Foster, Mr. Don
Francois, Mr. Mark
Fraser, Mr. Christopher
Gale, Mr. Roger
Garnier, Mr. Edward
Gauke, Mr. David
George, Andrew
Gibb, Mr. Nick
Gidley, Sandra
Gillan, Mrs. Cheryl
Goldsworthy, Julia
Goodman, Mr. Paul
Goodwill, Mr. Robert
Gove, Michael
Gray, Mr. James
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian
Greening, Justine
Greenway, Mr. John
Grieve, Mr. Dominic
Hague, rh Mr. William
Hammond, Mr. Philip
Hammond, Stephen
Hancock, Mr. Mike
Hands, Mr. Greg
Harper, Mr. Mark
Harris, Dr. Evan
Harvey, Nick
Hayes, Mr. John
Heald, Mr. Oliver
Heath, Mr. David
Heathcoat-Amory, rh Mr. David
Hemming, John
Hendry, Charles
Herbert, Nick
Hermon, Lady
Hoban, Mr. Mark
Hoey, Kate
Hogg, rh Mr. Douglas
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Holmes, Paul
Horam, Mr. John
Horwood, Martin
Hosie, Stewart
Howard, rh Mr. Michael

Howarth, David
Howarth, Mr. Gerald
Hughes, Simon
Huhne, Chris
Hunt, Mr. Jeremy
Hunter, Mark
Hurd, Mr. Nick
Jack, rh Mr. Michael
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Johnson, Mr. Boris
Jones, Mr. David
Kawczynski, Daniel
Keetch, Mr. Paul
Kennedy, rh Mr. Charles
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Knight, rh Mr. Greg
Kramer, Susan
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Lait, Mrs. Jacqui
Lamb, Norman
Laws, Mr. David
Leech, Mr. John
Leigh, Mr. Edward
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Lewis, Dr. Julian
Liddell-Grainger, Mr. Ian
Lidington, Mr. David
Lilley, rh Mr. Peter
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Mackay, rh Mr. Andrew
Maclean, rh David
MacNeil, Mr. Angus
Main, Anne
Malins, Mr. Humfrey
Maples, Mr. John
Mates, rh Mr. Michael
Maude, rh Mr. Francis
May, rh Mrs. Theresa
McCrea, Dr. William
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
Mercer, Patrick
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Milton, Anne
Mitchell, Mr. Andrew
Moore, Mr. Michael
Moss, Mr. Malcolm
Mulholland, Greg
Mundell, David
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Newmark, Mr. Brooks
O'Brien, Mr. Stephen
Oaten, Mr. Mark
Öpik, Lembit
Osborne, Mr. George
Ottaway, Richard
Paice, Mr. James
Paisley, rh Rev. Ian
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Penning, Mike
Penrose, John
Pickles, Mr. Eric
Price, Adam
Prisk, Mr. Mark
Pritchard, Mark
Pugh, Dr. John
Randall, Mr. John
Redwood, rh Mr. John
Reid, Mr. Alan
Rifkind, rh Sir Malcolm
Robathan, Mr. Andrew
Robertson, Angus
Robertson, Hugh
Robertson, Mr. Laurence
Robinson, Mrs. Iris
Robinson, Mr. Peter
Rogerson, Mr. Dan
Rowen, Paul
Ruffley, Mr. David
Russell, Bob
Salmond, Mr. Alex
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Scott, Mr. Lee
Selous, Andrew
Shapps, Grant
Shepherd, Mr. Richard
Simmonds, Mark
Simpson, David
Simpson, Mr. Keith
Smith, Sir Robert
Spelman, Mrs. Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spink, Bob
Spring, Mr. Richard
Stanley, rh Sir John
Steen, Mr. Anthony
Streeter, Mr. Gary
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Swinson, Jo
Swire, Mr. Hugo
Syms, Mr. Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Matthew
Taylor, Dr. Richard
Teather, Sarah
Thurso, John
Tredinnick, David
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Viggers, Peter
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Walker, Mr. Charles
Wallace, Mr. Ben
Walter, Mr. Robert
Waterson, Mr. Nigel
Watkinson, Angela
Webb, Steve
Whittingdale, Mr. John
Widdecombe, rh Miss Ann
Wiggin, Bill
Willetts, Mr. David
Williams, Hywel
Williams, Mr. Roger
Williams, Stephen
Willis, Mr. Phil
Willott, Jenny
Wilshire, Mr. David
Wilson, Mr. Rob
Wilson, Sammy
Winterton, Ann
Winterton, Sir Nicholas
Wishart, Pete
Wright, Jeremy
Yeo, Mr. Tim
Young, rh Sir George

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Crispin Blunt and
Andrew Stunell

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Allen, Mr. Graham
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Armstrong, rh Hilary
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Austin, John
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Baird, Vera
Balls, Ed
Banks, Gordon
Barlow, Ms Celia
Barron, rh Mr. Kevin
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Begg, Miss Anne
Benton, Mr. Joe
Berry, Roger
Betts, Mr. Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Blizzard, Mr. Bob
Blunkett, rh Mr. David
Brennan, Kevin
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Mr. Des
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnham, Andy
Butler, Ms Dawn
Byers, rh Mr. Stephen
Byrne, Mr. Liam
Caborn, rh Mr. Richard
Cairns, David
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Campbell, Mr. Ronnie
Caton, Mr. Martin
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Chaytor, Mr. David
Clapham, Mr. Michael
Clark, Ms Katy
Clark, Paul
Clarke, rh Mr. Charles
Clarke, rh Mr. Tom
Clelland, Mr. David
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coaker, Mr. Vernon
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank
Cooper, Rosie
Cooper, Yvette
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cousins, Jim
Creagh, Mary
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs. Claire
Darling, rh Mr. Alistair
David, Mr. Wayne
Davidson, Mr. Ian
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Denham, rh Mr. John
Devine, Mr. Jim
Dhanda, Mr. Parmjit
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, rh Frank
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drew, Mr. David
Eagle, Angela
Eagle, Maria
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Ennis, Jeff
Etherington, Bill
Farrelly, Paul
Fisher, Mark
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Follett, Barbara
Foster, Mr. Michael (Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye)
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Godsiff, Mr. Roger
Goggins, Paul
Goodman, Helen
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Grogan, Mr. John
Gwynne, Andrew
Hain, rh Mr. Peter
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hall, Mr. Patrick
Hanson, Mr. David
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Healey, John
Henderson, Mr. Doug
Hendrick, Mr. Mark
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Heppell, Mr. John
Hesford, Stephen
Hewitt, rh Ms Patricia
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hodgson, Mrs. Sharon
Hood, Mr. Jimmy
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hughes, rh Beverley
Humble, Mrs. Joan
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Mr. Eric
Ingram, rh Mr. Adam
Irranca-Davies, Huw
Jackson, Glenda
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Johnson, rh Alan
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Helen

Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Lynne
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Kelly, rh Ruth
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Kennedy, rh Jane
Khabra, Mr. Piara S.
Khan, Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Kilfoyle, Mr. Peter
Knight, Jim
Kumar, Dr. Ashok
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lammy, Mr. David
Laxton, Mr. Bob
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
Mackinlay, Andrew
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahmood, Mr. Khalid
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marris, Rob
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall, Mr. David
Marshall-Andrews, Mr. Robert
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCafferty, Chris
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
McFadden, Mr. Pat
McFall, rh Mr. John
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McKenna, Rosemary
McNulty, Mr. Tony
Meacher, rh Mr. Michael
Meale, Mr. Alan
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Milburn, rh Mr. Alan
Miliband, rh Mr. David
Miliband, Edward
Mitchell, Mr. Austin
Moffat, Anne
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Moran, Margaret
Morden, Jessica
Morgan, Julie
Morley, Mr. Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, Mr. George
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Munn, Meg
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Olner, Mr. Bill
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Palmer, Dr. Nick
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pope, Mr. Greg
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Purnell, James
Rammell, Bill
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Reid, rh John
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robertson, John
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Rooney, Mr. Terry
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Christine
Ryan, Joan
Salter, Martin
Sarwar, Mr. Mohammad
Seabeck, Alison
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Sheridan, Jim
Short, rh Clare
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Simpson, Alan
Singh, Mr. Marsha
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, Ms Angela C. (Sheffield, Hillsborough)
Smith, Angela E. (Basildon)
Smith, rh Jacqui
Snelgrove, Anne
Soulsby, Sir Peter
Southworth, Helen
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Stringer, Graham
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Tami, Mark
Taylor, Ms Dari
Taylor, David
Thornberry, Emily
Timms, Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mr. Mark
Touhig, Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Turner, Mr. Neil
Twigg, Derek
Ussher, Kitty
Vis, Dr. Rudi
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Ward, Claire
Wareing, Mr. Robert N.
Watson, Mr. Tom
Watts, Mr. Dave
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, rh Mr. Alan
Williams, Mrs. Betty
Wills, Mr. Michael
Winnick, Mr. David
Winterton, Ms Rosie
Wood, Mike
Woodward, Mr. Shaun
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Ian Cawsey and
Mr. Frank Roy

Question accordingly negatived.

Main Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 62 (Amendment on Second or Third Reading):—

The House divided: Ayes 310, Noes 262.

Division No. 108] [7.14 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Allen, Mr. Graham
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Armstrong, rh Hilary
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Austin, John
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Baird, Vera
Banks, Gordon
Barlow, Ms Celia
Barron, rh Mr. Kevin
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Begg, Miss Anne
Benton, Mr. Joe
Berry, Roger
Betts, Mr. Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Blizzard, Mr. Bob
Blunkett, rh Mr. David
Brennan, Kevin
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Mr. Des
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnham, Andy
Butler, Ms Dawn
Byers, rh Mr. Stephen
Byrne, Mr. Liam
Caborn, rh Mr. Richard
Cairns, David
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Campbell, Mr. Ronnie
Caton, Mr. Martin
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Chaytor, Mr. David
Clapham, Mr. Michael
Clark, Ms Katy
Clark, Paul
Clarke, rh Mr. Charles
Clarke, rh Mr. Tom
Clelland, Mr. David
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coaker, Mr. Vernon
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank
Cooper, Rosie
Cooper, Yvette
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cousins, Jim
Creagh, Mary
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs. Claire
Darling, rh Mr. Alistair
David, Mr. Wayne
Davidson, Mr. Ian
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Denham, rh Mr. John
Devine, Mr. Jim
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, rh Frank
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drew, Mr. David
Eagle, Angela
Eagle, Maria
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Ennis, Jeff
Etherington, Bill
Farrelly, Paul
Fisher, Mark
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Follett, Barbara
Foster, Mr. Michael (Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye)
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Godsiff, Mr. Roger
Goggins, Paul
Goodman, Helen
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Grogan, Mr. John
Gwynne, Andrew
Hain, rh Mr. Peter

Hall, Mr. Mike
Hall, Patrick
Hanson, Mr. David
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Healey, John
Henderson, Mr. Doug
Hendrick, Mr. Mark
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Heppell, Mr. John
Hesford, Stephen
Hewitt, rh Ms Patricia
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hodgson, Mrs. Sharon
Hood, Mr. Jimmy
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hughes, rh Beverley
Humble, Mrs. Joan
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Mr. Eric
Ingram, rh Mr. Adam
Irranca-Davies, Huw
Jackson, Glenda
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Johnson, rh Alan
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Helen
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Lynne
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Kelly, rh Ruth
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Kennedy, rh Jane
Khabra, Mr. Piara S.
Khan, Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Kilfoyle, Mr. Peter
Knight, Jim
Kumar, Dr. Ashok
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lammy, Mr. David
Laxton, Mr. Bob
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
Mackinlay, Andrew
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahmood, Mr. Khalid
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marris, Rob
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall, Mr. David
Marshall-Andrews, Mr. Robert
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCafferty, Chris
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
McFadden, Mr. Pat
McFall, rh Mr. John
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McKenna, Rosemary
McNulty, Mr. Tony
Meacher, rh Mr. Michael
Meale, Mr. Alan
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Milburn, rh Mr. Alan
Miliband, rh Mr. David
Miliband, Edward
Moffat, Anne
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Moran, Margaret
Morden, Jessica
Morgan, Julie
Morley, Mr. Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, Mr. George
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Munn, Meg
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Olner, Mr. Bill
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Palmer, Dr. Nick
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pope, Mr. Greg
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Purnell, James
Rammell, Bill
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Reid, rh John
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robertson, John
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Rooney, Mr. Terry
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Christine
Ryan, Joan
Salter, Martin
Sarwar, Mr. Mohammad
Seabeck, Alison
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Sheridan, Jim
Short, rh Clare
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Simpson, Alan
Singh, Mr. Marsha
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, Ms Angela C. (Sheffield, Hillsborough)
Smith, Angela E. (Basildon)
Smith, rh Jacqui
Snelgrove, Anne
Soulsby, Sir Peter
Southworth, Helen
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Stringer, Graham
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Tami, Mark
Taylor, Ms Dari
Taylor, David
Thornberry, Emily
Timms, Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mr. Mark
Touhig, Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Turner, Mr. Neil
Twigg, Derek
Ussher, Kitty
Vis, Dr. Rudi
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Ward, Claire
Wareing, Mr. Robert N.
Watson, Mr. Tom
Watts, Mr. Dave
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, rh Mr. Alan
Williams, Mrs. Betty
Wills, Mr. Michael
Winnick, Mr. David
Winterton, Ms Rosie
Wood, Mike
Woodward, Mr. Shaun
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Ian Cawsey and
Mr. Frank Roy

NOES

Afriyie, Adam
Ainsworth, Mr. Peter
Alexander, Danny
Amess, Mr. David
Atkinson, Mr. Peter
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Baker, Norman
Baldry, Tony
Barker, Gregory
Baron, Mr. John
Barrett, John
Beith, rh Mr. Alan
Bellingham, Mr. Henry
Benyon, Mr. Richard
Bercow, John
Beresford, Sir Paul
Binley, Mr. Brian
Blunt, Mr. Crispin
Bone, Mr. Peter
Boswell, Mr. Tim
Bottomley, Peter
Brady, Mr. Graham
Brake, Tom
Brazier, Mr. Julian
Brokenshire, James
Brooke, Annette
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Browning, Angela
Bruce, Malcolm
Burns, Mr. Simon
Burrowes, Mr. David
Burstow, Mr. Paul
Burt, Alistair
Burt, Lorely
Cable, Dr. Vincent
Campbell, Mr. Gregory
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Chope, Mr. Christopher
Clappison, Mr. James
Clark, Greg
Clarke, rh Mr. Kenneth
Clegg, Mr. Nick
Clifton-Brown, Mr. Geoffrey
Conway, Derek
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Cox, Mr. Geoffrey
Crabb, Mr. Stephen
Curry, rh Mr. David
Davey, Mr. Edward
Davies, David T.C. (Monmouth)
Davies, Philip
Davies, Mr. Quentin
Djanogly, Mr. Jonathan
Donaldson, Mr. Jeffrey M.
Dorrell, rh Mr. Stephen
Dorries, Mrs. Nadine
Duddridge, James
Duncan Smith, rh Mr. Iain
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Durkan, Mark
Ellwood, Mr. Tobias
Evans, Mr. Nigel
Evennett, Mr. David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Mr. Michael
Farron, Tim
Featherstone, Lynne
Field, Mr. Mark
Forth, rh Mr. Eric
Foster, Mr. Don
Francois, Mr. Mark
Fraser, Mr. Christopher
Gale, Mr. Roger
Garnier, Mr. Edward
Gauke, Mr. David
George, Andrew
Gibb, Mr. Nick
Gidley, Sandra
Gillan, Mrs. Cheryl
Goldsworthy, Julia
Goodman, Mr. Paul
Goodwill, Mr. Robert
Gove, Michael
Gray, Mr. James
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian
Greening, Justine
Greenway, Mr. John
Grieve, Mr. Dominic
Hague, rh Mr. William
Hammond, Mr. Philip
Hammond, Stephen
Hancock, Mr. Mike

Hands, Mr. Greg
Harper, Mr. Mark
Harris, Dr. Evan
Harvey, Nick
Hayes, Mr. John
Heald, Mr. Oliver
Heath, Mr. David
Heathcoat-Amory, rh Mr. David
Hemming, John
Hendry, Charles
Herbert, Nick
Hermon, Lady
Hoban, Mr. Mark
Hoey, Kate
Hogg, rh Mr. Douglas
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Holmes, Paul
Horam, Mr. John
Horwood, Martin
Hosie, Stewart
Howard, rh Mr. Michael
Howarth, David
Howarth, Mr. Gerald
Hughes, Simon
Huhne, Chris
Hunt, Mr. Jeremy
Hunter, Mark
Hurd, Mr. Nick
Jack, rh Mr. Michael
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Johnson, Mr. Boris
Jones, Mr. David
Kawczynski, Daniel
Keetch, Mr. Paul
Kennedy, rh Mr. Charles
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Knight, rh Mr. Greg
Kramer, Susan
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Lait, Mrs. Jacqui
Lamb, Norman
Laws, Mr. David
Leech, Mr. John
Leigh, Mr. Edward
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Lewis, Dr. Julian
Liddell-Grainger, Mr. Ian
Lidington, Mr. David
Lilley, rh Mr. Peter
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Mackay, rh Mr. Andrew
Maclean, rh David
MacNeil, Mr. Angus
Main, Anne
Malins, Mr. Humfrey
Maples, Mr. John
Mates, rh Mr. Michael
Maude, rh Mr. Francis
May, rh Mrs. Theresa
McCrea, Dr. William
McDonnell, Dr. Alasdair
McGrady, Mr. Eddie
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
Mercer, Patrick
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Milton, Anne
Mitchell, Mr. Andrew
Moore, Mr. Michael
Moss, Mr. Malcolm
Mulholland, Greg
Mundell, David
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Newmark, Mr. Brooks
O'Brien, Mr. Stephen
Oaten, Mr. Mark
Öpik, Lembit
Osborne, Mr. George
Ottaway, Richard
Paice, Mr. James
Paisley, rh Rev. Ian
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Penning, Mike
Penrose, John
Pickles, Mr. Eric
Price, Adam
Prisk, Mr. Mark
Pritchard, Mark
Pugh, Dr. John
Randall, Mr. John
Redwood, rh Mr. John
Reid, Mr. Alan
Rifkind, rh Sir Malcolm
Robathan, Mr. Andrew
Robertson, Angus
Robertson, Hugh
Robertson, Mr. Laurence
Robinson, Mr. Peter
Rogerson, Mr. Dan
Rowen, Paul
Ruffley, Mr. David
Russell, Bob
Salmond, Mr. Alex
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Scott, Mr. Lee
Selous, Andrew
Shapps, Grant
Shepherd, Mr. Richard
Simmonds, Mark
Simpson, David
Simpson, Mr. Keith
Smith, Sir Robert
Spelman, Mrs. Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spink, Bob
Spring, Mr. Richard
Stanley, rh Sir John
Steen, Mr. Anthony
Streeter, Mr. Gary
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Swinson, Jo
Swire, Mr. Hugo
Syms, Mr. Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Matthew
Taylor, Dr. Richard
Teather, Sarah
Thurso, John
Tredinnick, David
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Viggers, Peter
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Walker, Mr. Charles
Wallace, Mr. Ben
Walter, Mr. Robert
Waterson, Mr. Nigel
Watkinson, Angela
Webb, Steve
Whittingdale, Mr. John
Widdecombe, rh Miss Ann
Wiggin, Bill
Willetts, Mr. David
Williams, Hywel
Williams, Mr. Roger
Williams, Stephen
Willis, Mr. Phil
Willott, Jenny
Wilshire, Mr. David
Wilson, Mr. Rob
Wilson, Sammy
Winterton, Ann
Winterton, Sir Nicholas
Wishart, Pete
Wright, Jeremy
Yeo, Mr. Tim
Young, rh Sir George

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Nigel Dodds and
Mrs. Iris Robinson

Question accordingly agreed to.

Bill read a Second time.

NORTHERN IRELAND (OFFENCES) BILL

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6) (Programme motions),

That the following provisions shall apply to the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill:

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

2. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on Thursday 15th December 2005.

3. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

Consideration and Third Reading

4. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on that day.

6. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Other proceedings

7. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments or on any further messages from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

Question agreed to.

NORTHERN IRELAND (OFFENCES) BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with bills),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of expenditure incurred by the Secretary of State by virtue of the Act.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

Question agreed to.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With the leave of the House, I shall put together the Questions on the two motions.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

CAPITAL GAINS TAX

That the draft Tax and Civil Partnership Regulations 2005, which were laid before this House on 24th October, be approved.

CORPORATION TAX

That the draft Tax and Civil Partnership (No. 2) Regulations 2005, which were laid before this House on 24th October, be approved.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

Question agreed to.

PETITIONS

Extreme Internet Sites

7.29 pm

Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): I present the petition of residents of Reading and others, numbering more than 50,000 signatures.

The petitioners declare their objection to the presence of extreme internet sites promoting violence against women in the name of sexual gratification and private profit. The petitioners note the recent horrific murder of the Brighton schoolteacher Jane Longhurst by a man who had become an avid user of corrupting internet sites. The petitioners wish their views to be taken into account in respect of the Home Secretary's consultation, which ends on 2 December.

The petition continues:

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government and Internet Service Providers to take action to block access to these sites; to introduce legislation to overhaul the Obscene Publications Act to make it a criminal offence to possess such images; to call for better international co-operation to close down sites hosted abroad; and to include internet images in the UK in the remit of OFCOM.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table

7.30 pm

David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion) (Lab/Co-op): I rise to present a petition on behalf of residents of Brighton and Hove and others, signed by some 2,000 individuals. The petition

Declares their objection to the presence of extreme internet sites promoting violence against women in the name of sexual gratification. The petitioners note the recent horrific murder of Brighton school teacher Jane Longhurst by a man who had become an avid user of corrupting internet sites such as 'necrobabes', 'death by asphyxia' and 'hanging bitches'.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government and Internet Service Providers to take action to block access to these sites; to introduce legislation to overhaul the Obscene Publications Act to make it a criminal offence to possess such images; to call for better international co-operation to close down sites hosted abroad; and to include internet images in the UK in the remit of OFCOM.

To lie upon the Table.

IsItFair Campaign

7.31 pm

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): I rise to present a petition signed by 374 of my constituents from Winchester and the surrounding villages calling for a fairer council tax system.

To lie upon the Table.

Susan May

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

7.31 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West and Royton) (Lab): I wish to raise the case of Susan May in the light of continuing concerns about the safety of her conviction and against the background of new material that has come to light in recent years.

Mrs. May was imprisoned on 5 May 1993, convicted of murdering her elderly aunt, Mrs. Hilda Marchbank. Mrs. May was Mrs. Marchbank's devoted niece and carer. She has always maintained her innocence, and having served the sentence set down by the court and now been released, she still strongly insists that her name should now be cleared.

The trial judge said that the main plank of the evidence against Mrs. May was the forensic issues, and I therefore start with those. The three forensic experts from the Forensic Science Service, were Mr. Michael John Davie, Dr. Javaid Hussain and Dr. Wilfred Basely. In June 1996, Mr. Davie was discredited in the Court of Appeal in the case of the Crown v. Doheny, where the conviction was overturned. The Forensic Science Service carried out an internal investigation, the Holman report, regarding Mr. Davie's conduct in Mrs. May's case, and was concerned that his work had fallen short of the standards expected. At second appeal, the prosecution asked that Mr. Davie's evidence should be withdrawn. I should add that the defence was only recently made aware of the contents of the report.

Regarding the second of the forensic experts at the trial, Dr. Hussain, in May 2004 forensic science students at Paisley university carried out an examination of the evidence that he presented at the trial. He had testified that in his opinion he was "certain" that the three stains were in blood. Dr. Hussain's area of expertise was fingerprint detection and enhancement, not blood analysis. The students pointed out that the tetra-amino biphenyl test Dr. Hussain used was not a test from which he could draw so certain a conclusion and that it is only a very general screening test. As they said:

> "Almost any biological material, in addition to blood, would show positive by this method."

Indeed, Professor Jamieson, who was formerly a police forensic expert and is now professor of forensic sciences at Glasgow university, has commented that it is very clear that in Mrs. May's case the prosecution forensic experts made declarations well beyond their remit which were prejudicial and damaging.

Turning to the third forensic expert, after the trial, Mrs. May's then solicitor sought for appeal purposes the assistance of a Forensic Science Service expert, Dr. Basely. That solicitor's behaviour at that time was considered to be "actionable" by Bindman & Co. solicitors who took over representation of Mrs. May's case.

My second main point is that Mrs. May's trial solicitor had been advised by Mr. Gartside QC to procure "independent" forensic expert advice for the defence. That advice was not acted on. The Criminal Cases Review Commission has chosen to use the Forensic Science Service, the same service that carries out work for the police, for its forensic analysis of Mrs. May's case. Again, I simply make the point that a conflict of interest must occur when the same forensic laboratory is asked to represent both parties.

The third general issue is that the use of DNA evidence in court by the FSS has been growing over the past 15 years, and many convictions have been secured on the basis of such evidence. There is, however, growing disquiet, because the criterion for DNA identification has been raised from identical readings at six locations to identical readings at 10 locations. Even that is now being described as unsatisfactory by Dr. Jefferies, the founding expert in the DNA field, who prefers identification on the basis of identical readings at 15 locations.

In Mrs. May's case, when the police took the cleaner to the house three days after the murder, they did not ask whether she had seen stains on the wall when she cleaned the house on the day before the murder. Her evidence, which was key to the prosecution case, was sought only some four weeks after Mrs. May's arrest, which was seven weeks after the murder. The cleaner was never given the opportunity to see the stains on the wall. The stain was not taken off the wall until five days after the murder, and it did not arrive at Dr. Basely's laboratory until 29 April, which was about seven weeks after the murder.

My fourth point concerns the disclosure of evidence to the defence by the police, which fell well short of complete openness. There are a number of examples of non-disclosure or only part disclosure in Mrs. May's case, and I shall briefly present three of them. First, a red car was seen parked outside the house on the night of the murder at approximately 12.45 am. Although the engine was running, there was no one in the car, which was there for 15 minutes. The defence did not draw the jury's attention to those facts. The three occupants have never been identified. Two separate witnesses saw the car. The defence was told that it was never found. Since the second appeal, it has come to light that the police did in fact locate a red car fitting the description. It belonged to the sister of a violent burglar, Michael Rawlinson, who had been drawn to the attention of the police as having been involved in this murder by two people who knew him. The sister had advertised and sold the car within three days of the murder. Forensic evidence taken from the car was never processed.

Secondly, in the police log for the first day of the investigation, clothing "fibres" are recorded as having been found on Mrs. Marchbank's hand. When taken to the forensic laboratory, they were described as

> "visible fibres from left hand".

When that exhibit appeared in Mr. Davie's statement, which is the document from which the defence started its investigation, he had recorded them as "hairs", which would have been of little interest to the defence because in 1992 hairs were not able to provide a person's identification. Further investigation has shown that the police could not match any of Mrs. May's or the deceased's clothing with those fibres. The jury was robbed of significant discussion regarding the origin of the fibres because of the mischievous labelling of the exhibit.

Thirdly, the jury were told of an exhibit labelled, "Craftsman Baker Paper Bag"—a rather odd description—which turned out to be a paper bag containing meat scraps that tested positive for blood. There were finger marks on the outside of the bag that should have been tested but were not. All that I can say—I do not think that one could go further than this—is that that exhibit presents an innocent source of blood from which it is possible that Mrs. May could have made the stains on the day prior to the murder, but it was lost to the trial by a sloppy or mischievous forensic process.

[Mr. Michael Meacher]

I call on my hon. Friend the Minister to insist, on behalf of the Home Office, that the Criminal Cases Review Commission adopt a policy of forensic examination that is completely independent of the Forensic Science Service, the organisation that carries out most of the police forensic analysis. I further call on her to instigate a system of total disclosure to the defence of all case evidence, from whatever source, that is relevant to this case, without the need for itemised requests.

After a clearly flawed process, in forensic and legal terms, before and during Mrs. May's trial, those are the minimum conditions required for justice to be seen to be done. I therefore earnestly ask that those procedures be now put in place so that the continuing and significant doubts and uncertainties about this case can finally receive the fullest and most transparent examination of all the relevant facts that have previously been denied.

7.44 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher) for giving me the opportunity not only to provide brief responses to the specific points that he raised, but to explain how this case has been handled so far. He will be familiar with much of that.

I know that my right hon. Friend has maintained an interest in the case. I also know that since her conviction, Susan May has pursued her case with two appeals against the conviction, two applications to the Criminal Cases Review Commission and a complaint against the police. I should like to take the opportunity to say something brief about each of them. Afterwards, I shall deal with the specific points about disclosure and the Forensic Science Service.

I am glad that we have a system that enables the Criminal Cases Review Commission to consider and reopen such cases, because I believe that if there has been a miscarriage of justice, we are most likely to be able to determine it through that mechanism.

Let me start with the first appeal. Four years after her conviction, Susan May lost her first appeal on 14 February 1997. The Court of Appeal rejected the fresh medical evidence that Susan May had suffered a memory gap about the circumstances of her aunt's death and said that it did not regard the conviction as unsafe. The appeal was followed by the first Criminal Cases Review Commission review. The case was one of several that was transferred to the commission from the Home Office in April 1997 following its establishment under the Criminal Appeal Act 1995. The commission considered an application from Susan May and concluded that it was worthy of further judicial scrutiny. In November 1999, the CCRC referred it to the Court of Appeal.

In 1993, Susan May also made a complaint against the police, but because of her impending criminal trial, it remained on the table and stayed there until 1998 while she pursued her first appeal. Greater Manchester police carried out the investigation of the complaint under the supervision of the Police Complaints Authority in accordance with the procedure that then pertained. In July 1999, an investigation report was submitted to the Police Complaints Authority, which issued a statement to the effect that the complaint had been investigated to its satisfaction. After that, the investigation report was submitted to the Crown Prosecution Service, which closely examined the report and concluded that there was no evidence that could secure a conviction.

The next step was to consider disciplinary action and, on 21 October 1999, Greater Manchester police submitted their proposals to the Police Complaints Authority. The Police Complaints Authority concluded that all bar one of the 22 allegations had not been substantiated because there was insufficient evidence to prove that any police officer had breached the police discipline code. The substantiated allegation was to do with an early interview by the police. It took place before Susan May's arrest and before she was cautioned. As my right hon. Friend said, she wanted to make the point that she should have been regarded as a suspect and not a witness, thereby having full protection under the law. The Police Complaints Authority agreed with her, and that became one of the subjects of Susan May's second appeal.

At the second appeal, the Court of Appeal heard arguments on the bloodstained handprint on a wall at the murder scene and the treatment of Susan May as a witness rather than a suspect, thereby denying her the protection under the law in relation to various comments that she made. The appeal judges ruled that her conviction was not unsafe and dismissed the second appeal on 7 December 2001.

Let me consider the second review by the CCRC. In August 2002, Mrs. May made a renewed application to the commission, and the second review is still going on. As my right hon. Friend knows, it would be inappropriate for me to discuss in detail the specific issues involved. I have inquired into that. The case is complex and I understand that the CCRC is carrying out several lines of investigation. A decision about whether to refer the case back to the Court of Appeal—I reiterate that that is a decision solely for the CCRC—will be made once its investigations are complete. In deciding whether to refer the case back to the Court of Appeal, the commission will apply the statutory test of whether there is a genuine possibility of the conviction being quashed. The decision on whether a conviction should be quashed rests with the Court of Appeal. That process means that I cannot deal with some of the detailed matters that my right hon. Friend raised.

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): It would be extremely helpful if we could have an indication of the time scale of the review being carried out by the Criminal Cases Review Commission. If the Minister cannot give us such an indication, will she at least take the message from the House that it is important that the commission now expedite the matter, given that the lady has now been released and wants some closure so that she can live her life afresh?

Fiona Mactaggart: I assure my hon. Friend that I shall communicate to the chairman of the Criminal Cases Review Commission the views that hon. Members have expressed in this debate about the importance of bringing this matter to a conclusion. Of course, that is a matter for the chairman, but I shall ensure that he is made aware of the feeling in the House.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West and Royton mentioned two specific issues relating to the case. The first involved disclosure. I should start by pointing out that the common law disclosure arrangements that applied up to April 1997 were superseded by a statutory scheme in the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996, which pertains thereafter. We have recently strengthened the 1996 Act in part 5 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003. The relevant amendments came into force on 4 April this year. Although the legislation has been amended, its fundamental principle remains the same: that justice depends on full and frank disclosure by the prosecution of all relevant material.

Under the Act, the prosecution is under a statutory obligation to disclose to the defence all material which the prosecution case, or of assisting the defence case. This duty applies throughout the trial. This is a strong test designed to ensure that the defence gets the material that it needs and that the trial focuses on the points at issue. To ensure that the prosecutor has all the necessary information, there is a statutory code of practice, which has recently been revised, and which obliges the police to retain, record and reveal all relevant investigative material to the prosecutor. I might add that the Criminal Justice Act 2003 strengthens the scheme of prosecution disclosure. Under the unamended Act, two different prosecution disclosure tests applied, one before the defence had produced a defence statement and one after. We have amalgamated those into a single new test, the effect of which will be to ensure that the defence gets discloseable material at an earlier stage than hitherto.

"might reasonably be considered capable of undermining"

My right hon. Friend's suggestion that all case material should be handed over to the defence is, I fear, unrealistic in most cases. Many cases generate large volumes of investigative material, and under my right hon. Friend's proposed arrangements it would fall not only to the prosecutor to consider unused investigative material, but to the defence as well, thereby duplicating effort. Considerable time would be wasted in considering large volumes of material that did not satisfy the disclosure test. It is also important to note that some material cannot be handed over to the defence. This includes so-called sensitive material, such as that relating to the identity of informants. Such material might sometimes have to be withheld from the defence on public interest immunity grounds, provided, of course, that the court had made an order to that effect.

To conclude, the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996 already contains a strong disclosure scheme that provides adequate safeguards for the defence. The key is for practitioners to apply the Act correctly in all cases. We have a responsibility in all aspects of the prosecution service and elsewhere to ensure that it is properly applied.

John McDonnell: It would be useful to put on record that, in this case, neither the volume nor the sensitivity of the material was used as an argument for barring the disclosure of information which I believe could have ensured that this lady was proved innocent.

Fiona Mactaggart: I said that I would draw the attention of the chairman of the Criminal Cases Review Commission to the debate. He will note what my hon. Friend has said. I am trying hard not to make specific comments about a case that is under consideration by that body, which is the proper body to decide on these matters. I am trying to deal with the general issues.

My right hon. Friend raised a general issue about the Forensic Science Service, and about the circumstances in which its services should be secured. The Forensic Science Service is an executive agency of the Home Office, and is the principal provider of impartial forensic science services to the police and other investigating forces. It provides information to support the investigation of crime and evidence for the Crown Prosecution Service and the courts, and it also gives independent advice to the Home Office and others who serve the administration of justice, including the Criminal Cases Review Commission.

The Forensic Science Service works within the criminal justice system for both the defence and the prosecution, and takes pride in its impartiality. I think it perfectly possible for an independent forensic science service to provide proper advice on different occasions and examine evidence scientifically for different parties in circumstances such as these. I think we should make it clearer that the duty of experts giving evidence should be to the court and to justice. The Criminal Procedure Rule Committee has published a consultation paper that examines the issue of expert evidence and responsibility in relation to the court. While there may be contestability in regard to particular issues of expert evidence, it is important that the court should be satisfied about the expertise, and satisfied that it has been deployed properly in specific cases.

I asked about the different tests in the Susan May case to which my right hon. Friend referred. I was told that the tests for the police were for blood, while those for the commission were for DNA. Two different processes are involved. The tests for the commission were carried out in Birmingham, and a report on the results was compiled by a Forensic Science Service employee in Wetherby. Those involved in the DNA tests were not involved in the original inquiry.

I believe that it is quite possible for a body such as the Forensic Science Service not to seek to justify an initiating decision, but to provide impartial, accurate, expert evidence in cases such as this. If there is evidence that demonstrates that it has failed to do that in a particular case, it should be taken into account by the Criminal Cases Review Commission in its review.

Mr. Meacher: I made it very clear that three of the forensic science experts who were brought in as witnesses had since been discredited. No one is casting aspersions on the Forensic Science Service in general. All I am saying is that it is important for the Criminal Cases Review Commission to have access to wholly independent evidence. I am sure that those who are concerned about the case would be satisfied if the CCRC were to seek such evidence from a wholly independent source, in the light of the very bad experience in this case.

[Mr. Meacher]

Fiona Mactaggart: As I have said more than once, how the CCRC conducts the review is a matter for it. The principle is important. My right hon. Friend was probably involved, as I was, in campaigning for an independent body to be able to review miscarriages of justice. It cannot provide that independent function if Ministers tell it how to conduct its business. However, as I said, I will ensure that the chairman of the CCRC is made aware of this debate and all the points that have been raised in it. That is, I think, the only appropriate assurance that I can give from the Dispatch Box.

We want the criminal justice system to be fair, open and accessible. Those who believe that they have a genuine grievance, as does Mrs. May, should have recourse to redress. Her case to date, since her trial and conviction, has been exposed to a great deal of scrutiny. She has used the criminal justice system in pursuit of justice for herself and it is right that she should have the opportunity to do so. She has a further opportunity in the present review of the CCRC. We look forward to its result.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Eight o'clock.

Deferred Division

CRIMINAL LAW

That the draft Criminal Justice Act 2003 (Commencement No. 12 and Transitory Provisions) Order 2005, which was laid before this House on 27 October, be approved.

The House divided: Ayes 261, Noes 211.

Division No. 106]

AYES

Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Armstrong, rh Hilary
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Austin, John
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Baird, Vera
Balls, Ed
Banks, Gordon
Barlow, Ms Celia
Bayley, Hugh
Begg, Miss Anne
Benton, Mr. Joe
Berry, Roger
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Blunkett, rh Mr. David
Brennan, Kevin
Brown, rh Mr. Gordon
Brown, Lyn
Browne, rh Mr. Des
Burden, Richard
Burnham, Andy
Butler, Ms Dawn
Byers, rh Mr. Stephen
Byrne, Mr. Liam
Cairns, David
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Campbell, Mr. Ronnie
Caton, Mr. Martin
Cawsey, Mr. Ian
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Chaytor, Mr. David
Clark, Ms Katy
Clark, Paul
Clarke, rh Mr. Charles
Clarke, rh Mr. Tom
Clelland, Mr. David
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coaker, Mr. Vernon
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank
Cooper, Rosie
Cooper, Yvette
Cousins, Jim
Creagh, Mary
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
Darling, rh Mr. Alistair
David, Mr. Wayne
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Devine, Mr. Jim
Dhanda, Mr. Parmjit
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, rh Frank
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Eagle, Angela
Eagle, Maria
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Ennis, Jeff
Etherington, Bill
Farrelly, Paul
Field, rh Mr. Frank
Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Follett, Barbara
Foster, Mr. Michael (Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye)
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Goggins, Paul
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Grogan, Mr. John
Gwynne, Andrew
Hain, rh Mr. Peter
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hall, Patrick
Hanson, Mr. David
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Healey, John
Henderson, Mr. Doug
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Heppell, Mr. John
Hermon, Lady
Hesford, Stephen
Hewitt, rh Ms Patricia
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg
Hodgson, Mrs. Sharon
Hood, Mr. Jimmy
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Hughes, rh Beverley
Humble, Mrs. Joan
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Mr. Eric
Ingram, rh Mr. Adam
Irranca-Davies, Huw
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Johnson, rh Alan
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Helen
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Joyce, Mr. Eric

Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keen, Alan
Kelly, rh Ruth
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Kennedy, rh Jane
Khabra, Mr. Piara S.
Khan, Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Knight, Jim
Kumar, Dr. Ashok
Laxton, Mr. Bob
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
Mackinlay, Andrew
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahmood, Mr. Khalid
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall, Mr. David
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCafferty, Chris
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McDonagh, Siobhain
McFadden, Mr. Pat
McFall, rh Mr. John
McGuire, Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McNulty, Mr. Tony
Meacher, rh Mr. Michael
Meale, Mr. Alan
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Milburn, rh Mr. Alan
Miliband, Edward
Moffat, Anne
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Moran, Margaret
Morden, Jessica
Morgan, Julie
Mountford, Kali
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Munn, Meg
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Olner, Mr. Bill
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pope, Mr. Greg
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Purnell, James
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Reid, rh John
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robertson, John
Rooney, Mr. Terry
Roy, Mr. Frank
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Christine
Ryan, Joan
Salter, Martin
Sarwar, Mr. Mohammad
Seabeck, Alison
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Sheridan, Jim
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Singh, Mr. Marsha
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andrew
Smith, Ms Angela C. (Sheffield, Hillsborough)
Smith, rh Jacqui
Snelgrove, Anne
Soulsby, Sir Peter
Southworth, Helen
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Stringer, Graham
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Tami, Mark
Taylor, Ms Dari
Timms, Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mr. Mark
Touhig, Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Turner, Mr. Neil
Twigg, Derek
Usher, Kitty
Vis, Dr. Rudi
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Ward, Claire
Wareing, Mr. Robert N.
Watson, Mr. Tom
Watts, Mr. Dave
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, rh Mr. Alan
Williams, Mrs. Betty
Winnick, Mr. David
Winterton, Ms Rosie
Woodward, Mr. Shaun
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek

NOES

Afriyie, Adam
Ainsworth, Mr. Peter
Alexander, Danny
Amess, Mr. David
Atkinson, Mr. Peter
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Baker, Norman
Baldry, Tony
Baron, Mr. John
Beith, rh Mr. Alan
Bellingham, Mr. Henry
Bercow, John
Binley, Mr. Brian
Blunt, Mr. Crispin
Bone, Mr. Peter
Boswell, Mr. Tim
Brady, Mr. Graham
Brake, Tom
Brazier, Mr. Julian
Brokenshire, James
Brooke, Annette
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Browning, Angela
Bruce, Malcolm
Burns, Mr. Simon
Burrowes, Mr. David
Burstow, Mr. Paul
Burt, Alistair
Burt, Lorely
Cable, Dr. Vincent
Campbell, Mr. Gregory
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Chope, Mr. Christopher
Clappison, Mr. James
Clark, Greg
Clarke, rh Mr. Kenneth
Clifton-Brown, Mr. Geoffrey
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Cox, Mr. Geoffrey
Crabb, Mr. Stephen
Curry, rh Mr. David
Davies, David T.C. (Monmouth)
Davies, Philip
Davies, Mr. Quentin
Djanogly, Mr. Jonathan
Dodds, Mr. Nigel
Donaldson, Mr. Jeffrey M.
Dorries, Mrs. Nadine
Drew, Mr. David
Duddridge, James
Duncan Smith, rh Mr. Iain
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Ellwood, Mr. Tobias
Evans, Mr. Nigel
Evennett, Mr. David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Mr. Michael
Farron, Tim
Featherstone, Lynne
Field, Mr. Mark
Foster, Mr. Don
Francois, Mr. Mark
Fraser, Mr. Christopher
Gale, Mr. Roger
Garnier, Mr. Edward
Gauke, Mr. David
George, Andrew
Gibb, Mr. Nick
Gidley, Sandra
Gillan, Mrs. Cheryl
Goldsworthy, Julia
Goodwill, Mr. Robert
Gove, Michael
Gray, Mr. James
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian
Greening, Justine
Greenway, Mr. John
Grieve, Mr. Dominic
Hague, rh Mr. William
Hammond, Mr. Philip
Hammond, Stephen
Hands, Mr. Greg
Harper, Mr. Mark
Hayes, Mr. John
Heath, Mr. David
Herbert, Nick
Hoban, Mr. Mark
Hogg, rh Mr. Douglas
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Holmes, Paul
Horam, Mr. John
Horwood, Martin
Howard, rh Mr. Michael
Howarth, David
Howarth, Mr. Gerald
Hughes, Simon
Huhne, Chris
Hunter, Mark
Jack, rh Mr. Michael
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Jones, Mr. David
Jones, Lynne
Kawczynski, Daniel
Keetch, Mr. Paul
Kennedy, rh Mr. Charles
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Kramer, Susan
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Lait, Mrs. Jacqui
Laws, Mr. David
Leech, Mr. John
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Lewis, Dr. Julian
Liddell-Grainger, Mr. Ian
Lidington, Mr. David
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Mackay, rh Mr. Andrew
Main, Anne
Maples, Mr. John
Mates, rh Mr. Michael
May, rh Mrs. Theresa
McCrea, Dr. William
McDonnell, John
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
Mercer, Patrick
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Mitchell, Mr. Andrew
Moore, Mr. Michael
Moss, Mr. Malcolm
Mulholland, Greg
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Newmark, Mr. Brooks
Öpik, Lembit
Osborne, Mr. George
Ottaway, Richard
Paice, Mr. James
Paisley, rh Rev. Ian
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Penning, Mike
Penrose, John
Prisk, Mr. Mark
Pritchard, Mark
Pugh, Dr. John
Randall, Mr. John
Redwood, rh Mr. John
Reid, Mr. Alan
Robathan, Mr. Andrew
Robertson, Hugh
Robertson, Mr. Laurence
Robinson, Mrs. Iris
Robinson, Mr. Peter
Rogerson, Mr. Dan
Rowen, Paul
Russell, Bob
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Scott, Mr. Lee
Selous, Andrew

Shapps, Grant
Simmonds, Mark
Simpson, Alan
Simpson, David
Simpson, Mr. Keith
Smith, Sir Robert
Spelman, Mrs. Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spink, Bob
Spring, Mr. Richard
Stanley, rh Sir John
Streeter, Mr. Gary
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Swinson, Jo
Syms, Mr. Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Matthew
Teather, Sarah
Tredinnick, David
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Viggers, Peter
Wallace, Mr. Ben
Walter, Mr. Robert
Waterson, Mr. Nigel
Watkinson, Angela
Webb, Steve
Whittingdale, Mr. John
Wiggin, Bill
Willetts, Mr. David
Williams, Hywel
Williams, Stephen
Willis, Mr. Phil
Willott, Jenny
Wilson, Mr. Rob
Wilson, Sammy
Winterton, Ann
Winterton, Sir Nicholas
Wright, Jeremy
Yeo, Mr. Tim

Question accordingly agreed to.

House of Commons

Thursday 24 November 2005

The House met at half-past Ten o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION

The Secretary of State was asked—

Trust Schools

1. Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): What primary legislative changes will be required to create the new category of trust school and implement the other measures in the recent education White Paper. [31309]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Ruth Kelly): Annex A to the White Paper sets out the legislative changes needed to implement trust schools and the other measures in the White Paper.

Mr. Vaizey: I thank the Secretary of State for that reply. Her colleague in another place said that hardly any legislative changes were needed for trust schools. Is not that because these proposals have been watered down so that, in reality, trust schools are no different from foundation schools? Can the Secretary of State give me three specific differences between trust schools and the existing arrangements?

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman is right to suggest that we are building on a model that is already out there—schools that can acquire a foundation. Voluntary-aided schools are a good example of that in practice, and there are many others. We propose to put safeguards into the Bill to ensure that external partners that want to get involved with schools are committed to raising educational standards, have charitable objectives, are able to avail themselves of the power to innovate, and have a duty to promote race relations and social cohesion.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Government have been hoist on their own hyperbole by talking rather carelessly about independent trust schools? The fact is that, as it says in the White Paper, they will be part of the family of local authority schools and will not have the independence that academies have. In many ways, the local authority relationship will be just as it has been in the past.

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend, who has great knowledge of these matters, is right to say that under the new mechanism trust schools will be part of the local authority family of schools. They will be funded by the local authority, which will play a strategic role in improving standards and in commissioning school places in the right places to meet pupil needs and the demands of parents.

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): According to newspaper reports this week, restricted policy documents circulating within the Minister's Department state that trust schools will be able to decide on the admissions criteria that are in their best interests. Will the Minister confirm that such a document exists? Does she accept that that means that schools could use academic selection as part of their criteria? Does she accept that the Prime Minister, the White Paper and education experience in Northern Ireland have proved that that is the fairest and best way of selecting youngsters for post-primary schools?

Ruth Kelly: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's case. I have been clear about this, and the White Paper is clear about it. Trust schools have to operate with regard to the code of admissions, within the law, which means that there will be no return to selection and the divisive 11-plus. If any unfair criteria are used, they can be overturned by the adjudicator, which acts on a statutory basis in the public interest.

Natascha Engel (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Speaker: I call Kerry McCarthy.

Natascha Engel: I have obviously made a great impression!

What obligation will trust schools have to looked-after children, who are among the most vulnerable children in society? We talk about children who leave with five good GCSEs, but what are we doing about those who leave with no qualifications at all?

Ruth Kelly: I assure my hon. Friend that she has made a great impression on me in the months that she has been in this House, and I am sure that she will continue to do so in years to come.

My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to looked-after children. They are a group of children very close to my own heart, and in the months to come I would like my Department to produce quality proposals specifically dealing with their educational attainment. We need to make regulations to give looked-after children priority in admissions not only to community schools but to trust schools. I am committed to doing that.

Mr. Speaker: I hope that I am right this time. I call Patrick McLoughlin.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): I am pleased to say that you are, Mr. Speaker, as always.

Does the Secretary of State accept that the great difference between trust schools and grant-maintained schools is that the latter were established only after parents had a ballot? What right will parents have as to whether schools are trust schools?

Ruth Kelly: It will be up to the school's governing body to decide whether it wants to bring in an external partner, following consultation with parents. As a last resort, the local authority will have the ability to decide whether the trust is in the best interests of the pupils in that area, whether educational standards would rise and whether the majority of parents would feel happy with adopting a trust.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Teachers in Stafford are much more interested in behavioural measures in school and individual learning plans tailored to students' needs. Will such measures be introduced without the need for lengthy legislation?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend is right that we need a clear right to discipline. We are committed to introducing that in the legislation. However, trust schools will make it easier to replicate success. For example, when they tailor education specifically to the needs of pupils in their area or link up with a local business on a charitable basis that can provide work placements and use the flexibility to tailor the curriculum to meet the needs of pupils in the area, it will be much easier via the trust school mechanism to replicate that model. All the trust model is trying to do is encourage collaboration throughout an area where a trust has a specific plan to encourage that sort of education.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): Will the Secretary of State publish before the recess all the research that she has on the impact on social segregation of allowing schools to set their admissions policy? Does she regret the fact that a few schools already discourage from attending and weed out local disadvantaged children? How would allowing thousands more schools, including primary schools, to set their admissions policies stop those unfair practices?

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman and I had a good discussion about that yesterday. I drew to his attention the fact that the Department is working on drawing up a measure on social segregation. We do not believe that existing measures in the public domain do justice to the issue. In comparing local authorities and considering the impact of own-admission policies on social segregation, the preliminary conclusions of our research show that there is no correlation between the number of own-admission authorities and social segregation. Indeed, they show that, in some areas where the vast majority of schools are community schools, social segregation has been much higher. When we have finished the research we will be in a position to publish it.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend knows that there is concern about the exact status of the code of practice on school admissions. Does she think that it is worth considering the argument for including the code of practice as a schedule in the forthcoming Bill?

Ruth Kelly: If my hon. Friend is asking whether we are prepared to make the code of practice statutory, I do not believe that that is necessary to achieve the objectives that he sets for the policy and the Department. The code is established on a statutory basis, but there is discretion and flexibility in it to adapt admissions to meet the specific ends of a school and the pupils in the area. For example, if a school wanted to develop a specialism, the code provides that it could choose 10 per cent. by aptitude. The adjudicator operates on a statutory basis and can make binding decisions for all non-religious schools. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the code's importance in ensuring that all schools in the maintained sector operate on the basis of fair admissions.

Mr. Speaker: I call Mr. David Cameron.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): Thank you for recognising me, Mr. Speaker.

The White Paper states that the Government's aim is

"the creation of a system of independent non-fee paying schools."

We support that principle. Part of it is giving the new trust schools, such as the academies and the foundation schools, control over their admissions. Instead of endlessly reassuring her Back Benchers, will the Secretary of State explain what benefits she thinks the new freedom will bring?

Ruth Kelly: It can be important for a school in certain circumstances to have control over the criteria that it sets for its admissions. For example, if a school operates in an area where specific ethnic groups are highly concentrated, it might be appropriate for it to move away from a catchment-area system towards one that promotes a mixed-ability intake from a much broader area. On the other hand, it may be appropriate, as I explained to my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor), for a music college to be able to select 10 per cent. by aptitude to build up an orchestra in the school. It could then share best practice on music with other schools in the area. That is the sort of freedom that I want. I do not want the sort of freedom that the hon. Gentleman talks about when he says that his only objection to the city academy programme is that it cannot select on ability.

Mr. Cameron: Three weeks ago, the Secretary of State said that the code of practice on admissions would not be made a statutory code. Today, she said that she did not think that that was necessary. Can I ask her to go a bit further and rule out that change?

Ruth Kelly: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the code achieves its ends of ruling out selection by ability on its current statutory basis. He is confused—the code already operates on a statutory basis. Schools take it into account, and then the adjudicator, which is also statutory, can use its discretion to say whether the school has interpreted it correctly. Interpretation of the code, however, is very important for schools that want to create their own distinctive ethos.

Bookstart

2. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): What criteria are used in selecting books to be given free to pre-school age children under the Bookstart programme. [31310]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): Bookstart is administered by Booktrust, an independent charity that invites all UK publishers to submit books for consideration. If accepted, they are generally acquired from sponsoring publishers at a fraction of the usual retail cost. Booktrust chooses books on the basis of quality and adherence to safety standards, as well as content and suitability. It operates a selection panel that meets approximately every six to 12 months. The panel consists of librarians, health visitors, speech and language therapists, early-years educationists and Bookstart team members. It is independent and has no Government involvement.

Tim Loughton: May I add my support for the invaluable work that Booktrust does and for the Government's support for the Bookstart programme? We all know that reading between parents and very young children, which is an important part of attachment theory, can help their development later. What is she doing to ensure that as many parents as possible are able to access this scheme, particularly if they have reading difficulties themselves? Given the great expertise shown by this charity, which has been going since the 19th century, will she ensure that the choice of books and materials is left to the experts at the charity, and is not undermined by the heavy hand of political correctness and interference from within her Department?

Maria Eagle: We do not interfere with the way in which Bookstart carries out its functions. We encourage all parents, local authorities and Sure Start units to make sure that they take advantage of it. Between 2005 and 2008, we expect to give out 4.5 million books. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman supports the aims, which are to enable and support children's early communication, language development and social and emotional development, and to get parents used to reading to their children and sharing storytelling and rhymes. That will assist all children who are able to access the scheme to develop to their full potential.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): The Minister mentioned the number of books that she anticipates being distributed. What is her assessment of the impact that the scheme will have on improving reading standards, and how will that be measured?

Maria Eagle: We always evaluate such schemes. Obviously, it is too soon to do so in this case. The scheme is going national, in its three different phases, from this year. There will be evaluation, but it stands to reason to expect that children who read early and often, and who get into the habit of doing so with their parents, will develop earlier the kind of skills that they need to succeed in school.

Further Education

3. Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): What assessment her Department has made of Sir Andrew Foster's report on the further education sector; and if she will make a statement. [31311]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Ruth Kelly): Sir Andrew Foster published his report "Realising the Potential: A review of the future role of further education colleges" on 15 November. We think that it is an excellent report. It sets out clearly and convincingly the priorities that we must address. We want to take time to consider the report in discussion with colleges and other stakeholders. We shall announce in the spring the next stage of our reform of further education.

Mrs. Dorries: The Minister will be aware of the significant funding gap between FE colleges and mainstream schools. She has said that she will close that gap by only half. Given that, according to the Association of Colleges, our FE colleges take many children from poorer backgrounds, does she really believe that teachers in FE colleges should be paid less than those in secondary education?

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Lady is confusing two things: the funding gap and how we fund further education colleges, and the use of the money that we grant to further education colleges. Over the past eight years since 1997, funding for further education colleges has increased by 48 per cent. in real terms. Furthermore, last week, I was able to tell the Association of Colleges that we have proposals that will narrow the funding gap by 5 percentage points by the 2006–07 academic year. From 2008, further measures will narrow it by another 3 percentage points. I should have thought that she would welcome those measures.

Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): What plans has my right hon. Friend to improve basic skills training for the most difficult and disadvantaged young people? Will further education colleges work with independent providers such as Rathbone, a charity that works with young people who are not in education, employment or training? How will my right hon. Friend ensure that the "easy" young people are not cherry-picked, and that efforts are focused on those who are terribly disadvantaged and most in need of those efforts?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend has made an important point. It is a fundamental requirement of social justice for those who do not acquire basic skills at school, or do not secure the equivalent of five good GCSEs, to have a second, third or even fourth chance to do so later in life. I recently announced that more than 1½ million adults had taken advantage of our skills for life initiative, and had acquired basic skills in the work place.

The way to deal with my hon. Friend's concerns is to give individuals the entitlement to receive that training and extra help free of charge. We are therefore reprioritising funding in the way that I described to the Association of Colleges last week. We are ensuring that public funds are used to give the most effective support to the learners who need it most.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): Walford and North Shropshire college delivers 500 courses to more than 8,500 adults at 150 venues. It is proposed that such activity be undertaken by voluntary groups, museums and libraries. That is totally inappropriate in a thinly populated rural area. May I bring the principal of the college, Mr. Ron Pugh, to meet the Secretary of State and explain that the Foster report is an urban-based document that cannot work in rural areas?

Ruth Kelly: I do not accept that it is an urban-based document that will not work in rural areas, although of course we will consider all the issues raised in it carefully over the next few months. I am not aware of the position of the hon. Gentleman's further education college, but if he puts it in writing I shall be happy to discuss the best course of action with him.

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on announcing last week that she would reduce the funding gap. Her announcement was welcomed by all who are genuinely interested in further education. While the momentum is in our favour, may I urge her to go that little step further and examine the treatment of sixth-form and further education colleges for value-added tax purposes? Will she try to ensure that they are governed by the same regime as schools?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend has raised a complex and important point. As he knows, tax issues are dealt with by my right hon. Friends in the Treasury, but we discuss the issues regularly to ensure that we use facilities to best effect and meet the requirements of learners who need them most.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): The Foster report has been welcomed by the Government and, indeed, by Members in all parts of the House. On page 52, it makes two criticisms: of the Department's micro-management of the Learning and Skills Council, and of the Learning and Skills Council's micro-management of the further education colleges. When will the Secretary of State stop micro-managing, and stop her Department micro-managing, those two disasters, in order—I quote Foster's damning verdict on the Government—and monitoring,

> "to lighten the impact of centralised control"

> "and minimise the duplication and undue central demands"?

Ruth Kelly: I think that the report is absolutely right to draw attention not just to the situation in FE colleges, but to what the Department and the LSC could do better. We need to reflect on the report and see whether we can improve our management of the situation. The LSC has just announced a radical programme of change, which will mean the loss of 1,300 jobs as it moves away from the process that the hon. Gentleman describes as "micro-management" towards much greater regional clarity about its role.

I accept that my Department needs to define the boundaries between what it does and what is done by the LSC, and we are discussing with the LSC how that can be achieved.

School Refurbishments

4. Mr. Robert Flello (Stoke-on-Trent, South) (Lab): How many schools will undergo a major refurbishment in 2005. [31312]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): We are investing £5.5 billion in school buildings and information and communications technology in 2005–06, including £2.1 billion for "Building Schools for the Future". The first wave of investment will enable BSF to transform secondary schools in 17 local authorities, including Stoke. BSF aims broadly to build half the schools, refurbish 35 per cent. and carry out minor works on 15 per cent.

Mr. Flello: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for making almost £200 million available to Stoke-on-Trent city council as part of the first wave. I am delighted that the Sandon new school will be up and running by 2007. Will my hon. Friend urge the local education authority to consult widely on how the money will be spent and which new schools will be developed, particularly with respect to Longton and Edensor high schools?

Maria Eagle: Yes, my hon. Friend will be well aware that the organisation of Stoke schools is a local matter that is subject to statutory procedures. Any proposals will have to go through those procedures, a large part of which requires consultation—and preferably agreement—locally. If local agreement is not reached, however, provision can be made for conclusions to be reached.

Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): The Minister will know that in Scandinavian countries, schools are built for the future through the principle of school choice. In Sweden, for example, that has resulted in 500 new schools. Translated into this country, that would mean 5,000 new schools over the period of a decade. In his foreword to the education White Paper, the Prime Minister spoke in glowing terms about the Swedish reforms, but no mention is made in the body of that paper and if funding does not follow—

Mr. Speaker: Order. By my reckoning, the question is about the refurbishment of schools. The hon. Gentleman is going far too wide of the mark.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): As my hon. Friend is aware, part of the programme is about extending the school day and ensuring that pupils have access to sports facilities. Will she ensure that the refurbishment links in closely with the new opportunities fund, which I believe is still lagging a little behind? It is important to make strategic choices about where the sports facilities go in local schools to match the needs of local communities.

Maria Eagle: Yes, my hon. Friend is right to mention both extended schools and the possibilities that they provide for children and young people to have somewhere to go and things to do. He is also right to stress the importance of sport and ensuring co-ordination between different capital funding streams. He will be aware that, during the spending review period, £17.5 billion of capital investment is going into our schools. That should equate to many new sports facilities all around the country.

Temporary Classrooms (Dorset)

5. Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): How many temporary mobile classrooms are in use for mainstream lessons in schools under the control of Dorset local education authority; and if she will make a statement. [31313]

The Minister for Schools (Jacqui Smith): Dorset local education authority did not include any data about temporary buildings in its asset management data sets returned to the Department, but I understand that there are approximately 220 temporary mobile buildings at their schools. Dorset schools will receive nearly £90 million for buildings over the next three years.

Annette Brooke: I thank the Minister for her answer. Is she aware that 35 of those classrooms are on the site of Lytchett Minster upper school, representing 52 per cent. of its classrooms? They have been there for five and a half years, following a serious fire. To date, the Conservative-controlled county council has not even submitted a planning application. Meanwhile, costs are escalating, so will the Minister and her officials investigate what can be done to break through this impasse and ensure that this really good school can keep up its high standards?

Jacqui Smith: I can understand the hon. Lady's frustration on behalf of her constituents, particularly in view of how long those classrooms have been there since the fire at Lytchett Minster school. There is, of course, a limit to what the Government can do to ensure that Conservative authorities carry out their responsibilities, but I am sure that they will have listened carefully to what the hon. Lady has said today. I hope that they will make good use of the considerable extra investment in school buildings that the Government are putting into Dorset.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): Does the Minister agree that a bigger issue facing parents in my constituency is the county council's refusal to promote change, competition and choice by not allowing Highcliffe comprehensive school to expand—an expansion that could be facilitated by the use of temporary classrooms?

Jacqui Smith: If the hon. Gentleman is talking about Dorset, I am sure that he has taken up this issue with his political colleagues on the county council. This issue has been very important to this Government. In fact, we have facilitated, through capital funding, the expansion of popular and successful schools. It is of course important that local authorities also bear in mind the needs of parents and the need to ensure fair access to a diverse range of schools, and that they use the additional funding that the Government are making available to ensure that that happens. The hon. Gentleman will doubtless put pressure on his political colleagues to ensure that they do.

Further Education

6. Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): What discussions she has had with the Treasury about further education funding for Somerset. [31314]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Phil Hope): On 21 October, the Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning, my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Bill Rammell), wrote to all MPs setting out the strategic direction for the learning and skills sector for 2006–08. This includes a greater funding focus on our priorities of ensuring a place in school or college, or an apprenticeship, for all young people; and—as was mentioned earlier—a focus on adults who lack a solid foundation of employability skills. These priorities are spelled out in the 14-to-19 White Paper and in the two skills White Papers that were agreed with the Treasury. They are also reflected in our FE allocations to providers in Somerset, which increased by 4 per cent. above inflation this year.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Will the Minister comment on the fact that if a 16 to 18-year-old goes to a secondary school, they attract automatic funding for the school, but not if they go to a tertiary college? That puts Somerset at a severe disadvantage, because we have five excellent tertiary colleges that attract a lot of pupils from outside the county boundary, where funding does not follow the pupil. The situation is made much worse by the Government's cut in adult education funding to those colleges. Will the Minister look again at the particular problems faced by such colleges in Somerset—problems caused by his Department and the Treasury?

Phil Hope: There has been no cut in FE funding; indeed, it has increased by some 48 per cent. in real terms since 1997. That contrasts starkly with the four years in the run-up to 1997, when the average funding unit per FE student fell by about 14 per cent. So let us be clear: resources have been going into FE. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the differing funding rates for young people in different institutions. If he was in the Chamber earlier, he will have heard my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State point out that we are closing the funding gap between FE and sixth forms. It will be down to 8 per cent. next year and we will narrow the gap further. That will mean that young people can look forward to continuing investment in their education—in Somerset and elsewhere.

John Penrose (Weston-super-Mare) (Con): Is the Minister aware that in my part of Somerset, Weston-super-Mare college, of which I am a governor, is suffering—along with many other colleges throughout the country—from a problem that the Association of Colleges has identified as arising from the introduction of the new entitlement to free level 2 courses? That has meant a substantial loss of fee income to FE colleges from large employers in industries such as construction, engineering and catering. Such money must now be made up by the taxpayer as a dead-weight cost of the new policy, before any additional educational benefit is achieved.

Phil Hope: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has raised the question of level 2 funding for adults in the workplace. We have a huge skills gap, as Members in all parts of the House recognise, and we need to shift our focus—as we are doing—in the way that the Foster report described, on to providing funding for adult skills in the workplace. This system will provide a huge opportunity for colleges in the next two years, as the demand-led roll-out of the national employer training programme gives employers free, full-level entitlement. They will be able to choose the colleges that provide the training that they want, at the time when and in the place where they want it. That demand-led system will drive up skills in the work force, and provide a good opportunity for investment and for the provision of training by FE colleges.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): To return to the county of Somerset, does the Minister appreciate the difficulties that we are experiencing, as even a cursory comparison of funding for FE colleges in Somerset with that for other authorities in the south-west shows? The disproportionately high number of 16 to 18-year-olds in Somerset who go to FE colleges—rather than school sixth forms, of which there are very few—has produced a distorting effect that has squeezed substantially adult education in Somerset's FE colleges. Will the Minister talk to the Learning and Skills Council about this and look again at the figures? We are concerned that some very good college education is being lost as a result.

Phil Hope: I want to make two points. First, to meet the needs of young people in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and its neighbours, funding for 16 to 18-year-olds in Somerset has gone up by no less than 12 per cent. Secondly, although there has been a shift in public funding for adult places, the hon. Gentleman should ask his local colleges about their fee structure. We are asking colleges to collect more fee income from adult learners as part of the process of rebalancing what is provided by taxpayers, learners and employers. We believe that there is scope to increase colleges' fee income so that they can maintain the courses that people value.

Truancy

7. Jeremy Wright (Rugby and Kenilworth) (Con): How many pupils were recorded as having at least one incident of truancy in 2004–05. [31315]

10. Mrs. Theresa Villiers (Chipping Barnet) (Con): How many pupils were recorded as having at least one incident of truancy in 2004–05. [31318]

The Minister for Children and Families (Beverley Hughes): Figures are collected not for truancy but for unauthorised absence as a whole. In 2004–05, around 1.4 million pupils, out of a total maintained school population of more than 6.5 million pupils, were recorded as having at least one half-day session of unauthorised absence. Unauthorised absence includes pupils who arrive late, term-time holidays taken without the school's permission and absences for which the explanation is unsatisfactory, such as shopping.

Jeremy Wright: I am sure that the Minister will agree that the figure is far too high. The Government have spent just under £1 billion on combating truancy, yet the rate of unauthorised absence is higher now than when Labour came to power. Does she think that the taxpayer is getting good value for money from the Government's anti-truancy schemes?

Beverley Hughes: The amount of money that the hon. Gentleman quoted goes towards a wide range of measures, most of which, contrary to press reports, are focused on behaviour rather than truancy. However, Opposition Members need to understand the real story, which is that the 1995–96 absences total of more than 7.5 per cent. of half-day sessions missed was a record high since statistics were first collected. Since the Government took control and started bearing down on absences as a whole, the figure has fallen every year for the past four years and is now down to below 6.5 per cent. The hon. Gentleman must also understand that head teachers are trying to bear down on authorised as well as unauthorised absences—for example, by refusing to give parents permission to take their children out of school for holidays in term time. That is bringing down the overall level, but it has resulted in a very small increase on last year in authorised absences. He has to take the picture as a whole—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the Minister could write to the hon. Gentleman.

Mrs. Villiers: Does the Minister agree that the Government's manifest failure to tackle truancy has been a significant contributory factor to the epidemic of antisocial behaviour under Labour? That has caused much misery to many thousands of people across the country—sadly, including in my constituency of Chipping Barnet.

Beverley Hughes: Unfortunately, the hon. Lady is very ill informed. As I have just explained, unauthorised absences cover circumstances that go well beyond persistent truancy. We reckon that about 2 per cent. of pupils are persistent truants, and Government action has caused schools to bear down on that in a very deliberate way. Hot spots have been identified, and there is a fast-track system of individual case management for the young people involved. Various measures for parents, including penalty notices and prosecution, are helping to tackle the problem in a meaningful way. It is also important to give support to young people, some of whom truant because of self-esteem problems or family difficulties. For the first time, those problems are being dealt with in a real way.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): May I urge my right hon. Friend not to lose sight of the fact that truancy is often linked to poor behaviour in schools, and in particular to bullying? That is what causes pupils to absent themselves. As well as bearing down on parents who wilfully refuse to send their children to school, will she ensure that the causes of some children being absent are tackled properly?

Beverley Hughes: My hon. Friend is right. Persistent truancy will not be tolerated: that is the bottom line, and the approach that we are encouraging schools to take. However, pupils truant for a variety of reasons. Poor self-esteem is the reason for some, while others feel that they are not doing well in school or experience serious problems at home, with parents who cannot help them to go to school regularly. It is very important that those problems are also dealt with, and schools work with local authorities and social services to ensure that that happens.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): My right hon. Friend should take no notice of the Conservative party, because when it was in power it could not care less about truancy. I praise the Government for giving our council tremendous support in tackling truancy. [Interruption.] If you wait a minute, I will tell you. Middlesbrough council—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is out of order. I call Mr. Bercow.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Given that one way to minimise the incidence of truancy is to maximise the number of interesting and productive lessons, will the Minister confirm that in future there will be no place whatever in our schools for the advice of Kimberley, Meek and Miller on the teaching of reading, for those three academics are on the record as saying:

> "Within the psychosemiotic framework the shared reading lesson is viewed as an ideological construct"—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps someone will get the supplementary right.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley) (Lab): I share my right hon. Friend's concern that we should worry about persistent truants rather than those who have one absence in a period. What action is being taken to make parents take their responsibility seriously and to give them support in preventing children from becoming and remaining persistent truants?

Beverley Hughes: Schools are operating a fast-track case management system that requires them to identify persistent truants and develop an individual action plan that involves their parents. It enables schools to use penalty notices and the threat of prosecution if parents cannot within 12 weeks show an improvement in their child's attendance. It is an individualised, focused approach that enables schools to address some of the needs of young people and parents. It is showing good results. There has been an overall 11 per cent. improvement where the fast-track management system is being used.

Setting/Streaming

8. Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): what measures her Department has introduced since 1997 to promote setting and streaming in schools. [31316]

The Minister for Schools (Jacqui Smith): Since 1997, when the Government's first White Paper on schools made clear the presumption that setting should be the norm in secondary schools, we have used our national strategies, the gifted and talented programme, case studies and research evidence to help schools to consider a range of ways to group by ability. That is why there is more setting by ability in secondary schools now than there was in 1997.

Mr. Evennett: I note the Minister's reply, but for the past eight years the Government have allowed political dogma to dominate their education policies, not the best interests of children. We welcome some aspects of the recent White Paper and hope to see the return of setting and streaming across the majority of schools. What assurances can the Minister give that setting and streaming will become the norm in all schools to allow children to develop their full potential and achieve excellence at their own pace and according to their own aptitude?

Jacqui Smith: I think that the hon. Gentleman has let political dogma get in the way of, first, listening to my answer and, secondly, understanding what the Government have put in place. In 1997 we made it clear in the first schools White Paper that, unless a school can demonstrate that it is getting better than expected results through a different approach, we would presume that setting should be the norm in secondary schools. We backed that up with support for our national strategies through guidance to teachers—the sort of guidance and support that, in the 11 years I spent as a teacher, I never received from the previous Government.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): After more than 20 years as a parent and governor in secondary schools, I strongly support setting and welcome what the Government have done since 1997, but will the Minister decouple streaming and setting? Streaming can have negative effects. It can reinforce social class divisions, it can lead to bias and inconsistency in the allocation of pupils to sets and it can reduce the teaching expectations of the less able. Does my right hon. Friend agree?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and he speaks from knowledge. The advantage of setting is that it enables a sophisticated targeted approach for different subjects, where it would be appropriate in some cases and less so in others. That is why, for example, there is variance across subjects, with more than 80 per cent. of maths lessons being set, but probably less than 10 per cent. in classes such as physical education. It is for head teachers, with the support and guidance of Government, to make the decisions that, in their professional judgment, are right for their schools. That is the approach that the Government take—not trying to run schools from Whitehall, as I suspect the Opposition propose.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): As my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) said, one of the elements of the White Paper that we support is the encouragement for schools to adopt setting, as we also did when that policy was first announced in the Government's White Paper in 1997. So why today are 60 per cent. of academic lessons in secondary schools still being taught in mixed-ability classes? Why, if the Government are serious about encouraging setting in secondary schools, did they remove from Ofsted inspection criteria the requirement to monitor and record whether lessons are setted?

Jacqui Smith: As the hon. Gentleman knows from the various parliamentary answers I have given him recently, Ofsted changed the way in which it measures grouping by ability—[HON. MEMBERS: "When?"] In 2003–04, precisely so that there could be a more sophisticated and clearer understanding of grouping by ability, rather than conflating, banding and setting. The key point, as I emphasised earlier, is that we have made clear our support for setting. We have put more guidance and practical support into schools to deliver setting. There is more setting in our secondary schools than there was when we came into government. The hon. Gentleman appears to be arguing for the running of schools, the setting of timetables and the division of pupils from Whitehall rather than from the head teacher's office. That is the approach that he is proposing, but he is wrong. The approach that we are taking is much more likely to ensure that pupils can progress and that schools can make the decisions that are right for them.

Higher Education

9. Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the funding of the higher education sector beyond 2007. [31317]

The Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning (Bill Rammell): Government expenditure on higher education is increasing by about £2 billion between 2004–05 and 2007–08, to almost £9.5 billion. Higher education institutions are also benefiting from increases in research funding. Government funding beyond 2007–08 will be decided as part of the comprehensive spending review. Institutions will have an extra income from variable fees that is estimated to reach £1.35 billion in steady state by 2010.

Alison Seabeck: I thank my hon. Friend for that detailed response, but I must press him a little further. Will he allay the concerns raised with me by Plymouth university—a popular new university that is growing fast and attracting students—that post 2007–08 there could be a reduction in funding in direct relation to the increase that universities receive in fees, as happened in Australia and New Zealand? Were that to happen, it would be very damaging to universities such as Plymouth.

Bill Rammell: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. I certainly share her view about the good work that Plymouth university is doing. Vice-chancellors regularly raise the issue with me and I highlight to them, as I do to my hon. Friend, the fact that we are currently maintaining the unit of teaching resource, which is a reversal of the policy that we inherited from the Conservatives. No Government can make a commitment beyond the current spending review; however, in discussing that review we shall very much keep in mind the priority that universities give the issue.

Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): Given the benefits that universities have as a result of the tuition fee system introduced by the Government, can the Minister assure me that he will look favourably on proposals to allow universities to lift the current cap on their tuition fees, and on proposals by universities to retain more of those sums rather than having them centralised in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Bill Rammell: This is a matter of balance, but I am intrigued by the hon. Gentleman's question as I thought that the Opposition opposed variable fees. Clearly, things are moving swiftly. I remind the hon. Gentleman of our policy position, which has not changed since we took the Higher Education Bill through Parliament: by law it will not be possible to lift the cap before January 2010 at the earliest; no decision will be taken until the independent commission has reviewed the introduction of the first three years of the system; and after 2010 the cap can be lifted only if approval is given by both Houses of Parliament.

School Finance

11. Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): If she will revise the funding formula for schools to take greater account of the mobility of school populations. [31319]

The Minister for Schools (Jacqui Smith): In developing our proposals for the new dedicated schools grant, we considered with our partners whether there should be a mobility factor in the distribution of funding for local authorities and decided against it. Of course local authorities can already take account of pupil mobility in their local funding formulae. We will announce in the near future our final decisions on the distribution of the new dedicated schools grants for 2006–07 and 2007–08.

Simon Hughes: The Minister will know that, in boroughs such as mine, in most of inner London and in much of the rest of the country, people will be extremely unhappy with that answer. Given that some schools have a 60 per cent. turnover in classes in the same year and, in many, a third of the pupils change between the first and second sets of tests, will she look again at what the Prime Minister's strategy unit said only two years ago and at what the Association of London Government report said in June this year, both of which make it clear that a fair funding formula to reflect rapidly changing pupils in classrooms is necessary for equal educational opportunity?

Jacqui Smith: The hon. Gentleman rightly makes the case that the challenge with respect to pupil mobility rests on the individual schools in which a large proportion of pupils are mobile. That is why it is absolutely right that local authority funding formulae can and should take account of differential funding for schools with high mobility. Given the wide spread of mobility across a range of local authorities, the effect of distributing between authorities on the basis of mobility would have been to flatten and reduce the extra contributions to those authorities with additional educational needs on the basis of deprivation, not to benefit authorities such as the hon. Gentleman's. That is why the decision was taken.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

The Solicitor-General was asked—

Witness Initiatives

21. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the Merseyside "No Witness, No Justice" initiative. [31301]

The Solicitor-General (Mr. Mike O'Brien): Under "No Witness, No Justice", the pilot witness care unit opened in Sefton in March. It helps to increase witness attendance at court by about 20 per cent. As a result of that success, a new centralised witness care unit is being set up in Liverpool to cover a wider area, and I understand that it will open next Monday.

Ben Chapman: I very much welcome both the opening on Monday and the increased attendance of witnesses that the scheme has brought about. Given that the MORI survey that was commissioned to look at the issue also found an increase in both witnesses' and victims' confidence in the criminal justice system, how does my hon. and learned Friend assess the scheme's potential, when it is rolled out in Merseyside and elsewhere, to bring about more speedy and effective justice?

The Solicitor-General: The aim is to ensure that we encourage witnesses to attend court, give evidence and help to secure justice. The Liverpool centralised unit is intended to cover the Wirral and Merseyside, and it aims to provide a better service for witnesses and victims. Victims will have a single point of contact to ensure that they get information about how their cases are proceeding. The unit will keep them informed of progress, offer help with issues such as child care, transport to and from the court or referral to witness support if they need it. We will also seek to ensure that, when people attend court, the witness service meets them and looks after them while they are there. The aim is to get a better deal for witnesses and victims, and a better deal for the public because more offenders are brought to justice.

Sentencing Policy

22. Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): If he will make it a requirement for sentencing in all road traffic cases where a fatality has occurred to be made at the Crown court. [31302]

The Solicitor-General: Currently, offences of causing death by dangerous driving and causing death by careless driving while unfit because of alcohol or drugs are triable at the Crown court. Careless driving is dealt with at magistrates courts. The Government intend to create two new imprisonable offences of causing death by careless driving and causing death while driving while disqualified, unlicensed or uninsured. Magistrates will decide the appropriate venue for sentencing, taking into account all the circumstances of the case, including the driver's culpability.

Bob Russell: I am grateful to the Minister for that very encouraging response, but does he not accept that, on some occasions when a guilty plea is made at a magistrates court for careless driving, the magistrates are not made aware of the fact that there has been a fatality? Does he not agree therefore that, on every occasion where there has been a fatality, the court needs to know and, preferably, the case should go to Crown court for sentence, even on a guilty plea?

The Solicitor-General: It is certainly my view that if a fatality has occurred following a traffic incident, magistrates should be informed. It is then for the court to decide the appropriate venue for sentencing. The court is, to a considerable extent, best placed to make that decision. The sentence depends on the culpability of the defendant, rather than the consequence. Obviously, the death of someone is a horrendous consequence, but culpability inevitably varies according to the circumstances of a case. Cases involving a momentary lapse of concentration are different from those involving consistent erratic driving. Magistrates will have to judge whether they are able to deal with a case, or whether it should be dealt with at the Crown court, but they should certainly be aware of the fact that a fatality has occurred.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): I am pleased that the Home Office has decided to create the new offence of causing death by careless driving, which is being put into the Road Safety Bill [Lords]. The offence will carry a maximum sentence of five years, so it is likely that most cases will be dealt with in the Crown court, provided that the prosecution charges manslaughter—at the worst—death by dangerous driving, or the new offence. Will my hon. and learned Friend give me a commitment that he will issue guidance to prosecutors throughout the country to ensure that one of those offences is charged in every case of death for which there is some culpability?

The Solicitor-General: It will be for the CPS to assess the appropriate charge in individual circumstances under the code of practice and based on the evidence. Clearly, guidance will be provided. I cannot give entirely the undertaking that my hon. Friend wants. I want to examine the way in which the guidance should be drawn before I reach a decision. However, I will certainly write to him as soon as a decision on the nature of the guidance is taken.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): The Solicitor-General will be aware that historically in our country we have been reluctant to criminalise a consequence when the cause of that consequence is inadvertence or negligence. Certainly, draconian penalties have not been imposed. I was thus pleased to hear him say that there will be cases in which death by careless driving can be dealt with in the magistrates court. Does he agree that there will be cases in which although the consequence might have been tragic, the extent of culpability will be such that the matter should stay in the magistrates court? Moreover, can he tell the House anything further about how a distinction will be made between dangerous driving and careless driving, given that the maximum penalty of five years for careless driving that is contemplated is a very substantial sentence indeed and well in excess of the majority of sentences imposed for death by dangerous driving at present?

The Solicitor-General: We must carefully examine the way in which the courts will deal with the new offences in practice. That was why I was careful when I responded to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) about the guidance. Following the consultation that was completed in May, we took account of the views of hon. Members and people outside the House who thought that we needed to introduce the new offences in the Road Safety Bill. During the consultation, it was clear that the initial suggestion that the matter should be dealt with primarily in the Crown court was not viewed by the professionals as the right approach—they thought that it should go either way. There will thus be circumstances in which the magistrates court can appropriately deal with cases, so we must look at the detailed guidance for prosecutors on how they address magistrates on the matter.

Crown Prosecution Service

23. Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): What steps he is taking to speed up decision making by the Crown Prosecution Service. [31303]

The Solicitor-General: Every effort is made by the Crown Prosecution Service to make decisions within a reasonable period. However, owing to the complexity of some cases, some decisions obviously take longer. The CPS must balance swift decisions with the need to get the decision right, based on a careful analysis of the evidence by experienced lawyers who operate under the code for Crown prosecutors.

Ms Keeble: My hon. and learned Friend is aware of the particular case about which I have been concerned. I appreciate his efforts and those of his colleagues on that. However, may I press him again and ask him to ensure that the CPS understands that there is not just a question of distress to the family, which obviously wants matters dealt with properly? There are much wider policy implications attached to some cases, and they cannot be progressed as long as the CPS does not take decisions. Will he ensure that such wider issues are also understood?

The Solicitor-General: I know well the case that my hon. Friend raises and have spoken to the Director of Public Prosecutions about it on a number of occasions. I know that she has also spoken to the DPP.

Cases sometimes take a long time to reach a decision because of the need to collect evidence. My hon. Friend has raised concerns about the way in which that restricts the ability to discuss wider issues about how institutions of the penal system, in particular, operate. As there has been a delay in making a decision on the case, she has been unable to raise those concerns. I understand, however, that the Procedure Committee will consider the matter. I hope that the issues that concern my hon. Friend can be brought to its attention and that it considers the restrictions on her raising them in the House.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Are Law Officers willing to consider whether Crown prosecutors in different areas can be publicly accountable for the speed of decision making, as mentioned by the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble), or for the success of their prosecutions, so that there is public engagement with the people who make decisions on our behalf?

The Solicitor-General: Crown prosecutors can engage with local MPs, and the hon. Gentleman can talk to the chief Crown prosecutor in his area if he wants to. Indeed, many hon. Members do that. The Law Officers supervise the Crown Prosecution Service and are answerable in this place for what happens. From time to time, the DPP has been brought before Select Committees, and other Crown prosecutors can appear before Select Committees on request.

There are a number of ways in which the CPS can engage publicly. To some extent, it depends on parliamentarians making the request. If the hon. Gentleman has a particular request, we would be happy to discuss it with him.

Business of the House

11.32 am

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): Will the Leader of the House give us the business for next week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The business for next week will be as follows:

Monday 28 November—Second Reading of the Childcare Bill.

Tuesday 29 November—Second Reading of the Health Bill.

Wednesday 30 November—Remaining stages of the Terrorism (Northern Ireland) Bill.

Thursday 1 December—There is a change from the business that I previously announced. We will now take the remaining stages of the Council Tax (New Valuation Lists for England) Bill.

Friday 2 December—Private Members Bill.

The provisional business for the following week will be:

Monday 5 December—Second Reading of the Work and Families Bill.

Tuesday 6 December—Remaining stages of the London Olympics Bill.

Wednesday 7 December—A debate on fisheries on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Thursday 8 December—Estimates [1st Allotted Day], subject to be confirmed by the Liaison Committee.

At 6 o'clock the House will be asked to agree all outstanding estimates.

Friday 9 December—The House will not be sitting.

Chris Grayling: I have told the Leader of the House how annoyed hon. Members are about the decision to postpone next week's debate on police reform. Will he give an absolute assurance that he will hold the debate before Christmas?

Has the Leader of the House seen media reports that when the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, Lord Drayson, was chief executive of PowderJect Pharmaceuticals, he was responsible for selling substandard vaccines to the national health service, and that concerns about the company's practices were raised with the Government by regulators here, in Ireland and in the United States? Does he accept that there needs to be an immediate statement to the House about the allegations and that Health Ministers need to tell Members what they are planning to do to investigate the matter?

Furthermore, will the right hon. Gentleman also ask the Secretary of State for Defence to come to the House to make a statement on whether any of the vaccines provided by Lord Drayson's company to our armed forces were also substandard? Does he agree that if that proves to have been the case, Lord Drayson's position as a Minister would be in serious doubt?

I know that the Leader of the House is aware that since I raised the subject of energy supply with him at Prime Minister's questions three weeks ago, the wholesale price of gas has rocketed. Indeed, it was discussed at Prime Minister's questions yesterday. We will either have gas shortages this winter or consumers and businesses will pay much more for their energy. Why does the Leader of the House continue to refuse to hold a long-promised debate in Government time on energy, and when can we expect to hear more about the way in which the Government plan to respond to the growing crisis?

Despite all their promises, the Government plan to negotiate away the British rebate in Brussels in the next few weeks. In a recent visit to Brussels, the Deputy Prime Minister said:

> "We have put our abatement on the table. It is not the best way to spend European money."

Can we have an urgent statement from the Prime Minister about the rebate, and will the Leader of the House admit that the promises made by the Prime Minister to the House in the summer were worthless?

Finally, last week, the Leader of the House was dismissive of the absurd rules and regulations in barmy Britain. Let me try again, and ask for a statement from Health Ministers. The guild of friends in my local cottage hospital has agreed to spend a few hours each week tending the flowers in the wards, but they have been told that before they can even top up water in the vases they must provide evidence of their identity and address to the Criminal Records Bureau. Does the Leader of the House not think that that is truly barmy?

Mr. Hoon: I am always grateful to the shadow Leader of the House for the entertainment that he provides, no doubt after scouring the pages of many local newspapers to produce the information that he sets before the House. As for the specific points that he made, I make it clear that the Government regard the debate about police reform as a matter of great importance. We could hold the debate in Westminster Hall before Christmas if the Opposition insist on it. [Hon. Members: "No."] There may not be time to hold the debate on the Floor of the House before Christmas, but I assure them that if it needs to be held here we can arrange that early in the new year.

I have seen the reports about my noble Friend Lord Drayson. As for the question of substandard vaccines in general, I am confident that the vaccine supplies both to this country and to Her Majesty's armed forces are of the required standard. As for the energy supply, I am sorry to spoil the scaremongering tactics deployed by the shadow Leader of the House, but I should like to acquaint him with some important facts about the energy supply. Gas prices are rising throughout Europe, because they are linked to oil prices—that is a fact. The great majority of our businesses are not affected by the changes in gas prices, because they have contracted to buy their gas at fixed prices—again that is a fact. Gas prices here, despite the rise in the past year, are still some of the most competitive in Europe, and the same is true of our household bills—again, that is a fact. The national grid, which knows rather more about these matters than some Opposition Members, has made it clear in its winter outlook statement that there will not be a problem for domestic gas customers and smaller businesses and organisations, however severe the winter, barring freak technical disruptions. That, too, is a fact. It is important that Opposition Members consider the facts instead of entertaining us with their scaremongering tactics. They should bear it in mind that, as Age Concern has pointed out, it is the elderly and the most vulnerable in our society who are most concerned about the kind of material that the shadow Leader of the House and others are issuing in a deliberate effort to upset people. That is simply intolerable and should not happen.

[Mr. Hoon]

As for the British rebate, Opposition Members have become obsessive about it over the years, but the Government's position has not changed. The rebate, as I made clear last week, was a direct consequence of the fact that the United Kingdom was paying a disproportionately large amount to the EU budget as the result of the common agricultural policy. The Government have made it clear that if the CAP is reformed to bring about lower payments by the UK the need for the rebate disappears. That is perfectly logical and proper, and it has been the Government's position throughout. As for the hon. Gentleman's final point, it is obviously important that individuals who are prepared to volunteer to help people in our hospitals should do so with the minimum possible inconvenience.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): May we have an urgent debate on corporate governance, particularly the corporate structure of the Tchenguiz family? We know them well in the north of England because they run a company called the Estates and Management group, which gives a tough time to elderly and vulnerable leaseholders in many of the northern towns, using all sorts of strategies to extract money. They have a corporate structure that the House of Commons Library describes not just as a chain of companies, but as a spaghetti of companies registered in the Virgin Islands, the Bahamas and elsewhere. May we have a debate on the company, which is involved in a major takeover of a restaurant and pub chain? Let us find out exactly who owns it, where it is owned and how it conducts its business.

Mr. Hoon: I cannot promise my hon. Friend an early debate, but there are opportunities that he might seek to exploit by way of an Adjournment debate or a debate in Westminster Hall. If I may say so, he has probably made his point just as effectively today.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): In the light of tragic events overnight, may I yet again ask the Leader of the House when we will have a debate on the political situation in Iraq, which, extraordinarily, we have not had in the lifetime of this Parliament? Perhaps we might also have a debate on the role of the Attorney-General and his attempt to gag newspapers with the threat of the Official Secrets Act not on the grounds of national security, but on the grounds of potential embarrassment to the Prime Minister or to any presidents with whom he happens to have conversations.

I echo the widespread irritation and annoyance at the cancellation of the debate next Thursday on police restructuring. The Leader of the House must realise that already the options have been reduced without Members having any opportunity to express an opinion. In my part of the country, the south-west, we face the prospect of a police force whose area runs from the Isles of Scilly to Tewkesbury in Gloucestershire. Tewkesbury is nearer to Scotland than to the tip of Cornwall. Many hon. Members want to raise important questions. Westminster Hall is not an adequate substitute. We need a debate in the Chamber.

Lastly, has the right hon. Gentleman come across the "Fantasy Health Minister" website? I understand that the Secretary of State for Defence is a frequent player. Is the Leader of the House aware that one can accumulate a large number of bonus points for allowing colleagues a free vote on the issue of smoking?

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and for Defence have regularly come before the House to set out the position in Iraq. Foreign Office questions takes place next Wednesday, I believe. There are regular opportunities for hon. Members to raise the matter of the political situation in Iraq, and I have never been in any doubt that they seek every opportunity to do so, and very successfully.

I am slightly surprised, but perhaps I should not be, to hear yet again Liberal Democrats not even prepared to see effective enforcement of important legislation that safeguards our security and liberties. If the hon. Gentleman is really telling the House that there are no circumstances in which the Attorney-General should exercise long-standing powers under the Official Secrets Act, he needs to say so a little more plainly, rather than resorting to the kind of sub-editor's headlines that he tends to speak in. The Attorney-General has a legal responsibility, which I suspect was given to him by a Liberal Government. It needs to be exercised from time to time. That is done with great restraint and only in certain limited circumstances, but it is an important power that must be exercised from time to time.

I have said all that I intend to say about the debate on policing. It is an important matter. I have dealt with the hon. Gentleman's final point already.

Mr. Ian Austin (Dudley, North) (Lab): May we have a debate on the irresponsible and antisocial use of fireworks this year? Everybody enjoys bonfire night, but I do not see why my constituents should have their lives made a misery in the days and weeks running up to and after bonfire night each year. Such a debate would enable us to examine the extent to which police and local authorities have been using the new powers that were given to them last year, and it would give us the chance to discuss whether tougher restrictions would enable my constituents to live free from the noise, nuisance, disturbance and danger that fireworks can cause.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has raised an important issue, which inevitably comes up each year. May I assure him, having examined the figures on the number of complaints this year, that there has been a significant reduction, not least because of the very effective measures the Government have implemented to limit concerns in the community, particularly among the elderly and the vulnerable? If there is a requirement for additional change and reform further to reduce the threat to people, we will re-examine the matter.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Will the Leader of the House arrange for an Education Minister to make a statement about the decreasing number of students coming forward to study physics and chemistry, which is causing grave problems for important manufacturing industries such as pharmaceuticals? AstraZeneca, the largest employer in my constituency, has spoken to me at length about the matter. The problem is that too few teachers are prepared to teach those subjects in secondary schools, which therefore reduces the number of students who go on to study them at university. Chemistry and physics are vital to the future of this country.

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman is right. I am sure that he had an opportunity to raise that question in the past hour with Education Ministers at Education Question Time.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I tried.

Mr. Hoon: I am always delighted to serve as a substitute for those hon. Members who fail to get called at Question Time. I am delighted to emphasise to the hon. Gentleman the importance that the Government attach to training teachers in physics and chemistry, not least as someone whose physics teacher advised him never to darken his door again—advice that I was glad to follow. The issue is important for industry, and we must continue to train the right number of physicists and chemists for the future of our high-technology industries.

Mr. Marsha Singh (Bradford, West) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend find time to debate the south Asian earthquake disaster, which The Independent described today as "the forgotten disaster"? I am proud and pleased about the response of the Department for International Development and the British Government, but 100,000 people could die during the winter. Tents and shelters are still needed, and 2.3 million people will need food. In my constituency, concern is growing, especially among my constituents with Kashmiri or Pakistani backgrounds, that too little is being done too late. Will my right hon. Friend find time for that debate?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the issue. The international community clearly needs to emulate the example set by the British Government, which my hon. Friend has generously acknowledged, in ensuring that there is not a further disaster this winter in remote and inclement parts of Pakistan. He is right to raise the issue, which the British Government are, I assure him, keeping at the forefront of their mind.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): After yesterday, does the Leader of the House believe that he can persuade the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to return to the Dispatch Box, this time to explain the major changes he intends to make to public administration in Northern Ireland, including local authorities? The Secretary of State was smuggled into a Belfast hotel earlier this week, and he has not made a statement to this House, which would have allowed hon. Members an opportunity to ask questions. Will the Leader of the House ensure that the Secretary of State comes to this House to explain himself?

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland was here yesterday both answering questions and initiating debate. I know that the hon. Gentleman is a skilful and successful parliamentarian, and I am surprised that he did not take the opportunity when my right hon. Friend was smuggled into the House to put those questions and participate in that debate. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have further opportunities on future occasions.

Ms Celia Barlow (Hove) (Lab): Will the Leader of the House make time for the Home Secretary to make a statement on the case of my constituent, Amir Nazabzadeh, who was arrested at his home on 15 November, pending deportation? I strongly feel that my office was misled by Home Office officials, who told us that Amir was served with a removal order on 10 November, although the removal order was dated 15 November, that no removal directions had been set, although he was scheduled for removal on the next morning, and that he had been moved from Heathrow, although he was still there. Will my right hon. Friend assure me that Amir will not be removed until my representations of 6 October have been fully considered and until the friends of Amir have had time to take guidance on a judicial review?

Mr. Hoon: I will certainly ensure that my right hon. Friend is made aware of my hon. Friend's concerns on this matter.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): Will the Leader of the House consider an urgent debate on the crisis in adult learning? The Federation of Women's Institutes, in my constituency, is deeply unhappy with the Government's funding policies, particularly as they affect adult education, and that a sacrifice will be made in non-vocational subjects, especially in rural areas.

Mr. Hoon: I am well aware of the concern that has arisen throughout the country. I am sure, however, that the hon. Gentleman will accept the principle that is being operated, which is that the resources that are available should primarily be devoted to ensuring that people have the opportunity of gaining employment, which means that we will concentrate more of the available money on training and on vocational opportunities. That is not to say that adult learning is not an important part of the wider learning programme that the Government intend to continue. We must obtain the right balance between the contribution from those who are participating in what are often leisure activities rather than simply pure learning and the contribution that the Government make. I am not in any way dismissing these proper concerns and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising the matter.

Mr. Siôn Simon (Birmingham. Erdington) (Lab): My constituents, whom I will not name but whose case is well known, who are victims of Professor Roy Meadow and have never been charged with anything, are faced with their third child having been kidnapped by Birmingham city council social services department and being adopted against their will. As a result of the secrecy of the family court there is nothing that I can do about it, as their representative. There is nobody that I can talk to about the matter. May we have a debate about family courts in general, the kidnapping of my constituent's child and children in particular?

[Mr. Siôn Simon]

Mr. Hoon: I will not comment on a specific legal case, but I accept the more general point in relation to the operation of family courts. I know that it is something about which my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor is concerned. The question of secrecy and the way in which the courts operate is an issue. I emphasise that these are particularly sensitive and difficult issues affecting children, their relationship with their parents and the role of local authorities. It is important to look at different ways in which these courts might operate, but we must have paramount regard to the interests of the children in question.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): May we have an early debate in Government time on the Prime Minister's refusal to allow Lord Birt to appear before a Select Committee of this House? Is it not an unacceptable restriction on our ability to hold the Executive to account for the Prime Minister to have a personal veto on our witnesses?

Mr. Hoon: I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman raises the issue in that way. He is usually rather more fair-minded about the approach that he takes to these issues. He will know that it is a long-standing aspect of the Osmotherley rules governing who may appear before Select Committees that it is a matter for the Minister in question—I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman was in this position at some stage in the past—to decide whether any particular civil servant will or will not represent him before a Select Committee. That has been part of the rules since they were first drafted, and that remains precisely the position.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for a statement to be made on the Government's thinking on corporate responsibility? I ask that question against the background that when politicians act irresponsibly and endanger people's lives they receive lengthy prison sentences, but when company directors do likewise they often escape prosecution, and when they are prosecuted they receive paltry fines. Surely that is unfair.

Mr. Hoon: Certainly a great deal of attention has been given to this aspect of the law in recent years. It is important that we ensure that those who are responsible for the commission of criminal offences are brought before the courts and prosecuted, and that remains the Government's position.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): May I ask the Leader of the House to take the removal of the debate on police restructuring a little more seriously? I ask him to do that both as an east midlands Member like him and as the shadow spokesman on the police. The police restructuring debate was on the future business section of the Order Paper. It has been removed, and no reason for its removal has been given, either by the Home Office or by the Leader of the House this afternoon. The Adjournment debate initiated by the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) in Westminster Hall is not a substitute. This is a matter of huge public concern. It concerns the most major restructuring of the police for about a third of a century. Simply to dismiss the matter as something that might be dealt with in Westminster Hall or at some time in the new year is not good enough. Will the Leader of the House, who is a decent person, ensure that the Government do their duty to the House and bring a substantive motion before the House before Christmas?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He was clearly getting into [illegible] contentious area in the later part of his remarks. I appreciate the vote of confidence, if that is what it was. I was not in any way failing to recognise the seriousness of this issue for right hon. and hon. Members throughout the country. The issue affects all Members of the House. I was not suggesting that a debate in Westminster Hall was a substitute. I was suggesting that if Opposition Members believe that it is important to have such a debate before Christmas, that is an opportunity. If, however, the wish is to have the debate on the Floor of the House, I assure the House that opportunity will be given early in the new year.

Ms Diana R. Johnson (Kingston upon Hull, North) (Lab): I am sure that my right hon. Friend is aware of early-day motion 801, which calls for the vote at 16 and has the support of 91 Members across the parties in the House.

[That this House believes that the time is right to lower the voting age to 16; recognises that at 16 and 17 young people's lives are as rich and varied as at any other age, that they have considerable responsibilities that routinely involve making complex decisions and that are unrecognised in their current democratic rights, that many youth-led organisations have been campaigning for the voting age to be reduced, and that lowering the voting age could play a huge role in helping young people feel more connected with political processes which would strengthen local and national democracy and is the next logical extension for citizenship education; and calls on the Government to use the Electoral Administration Bill to legislate to lower the voting age to 16 for all public elections in the UK.]

As a constitutional moderniser, does my right hon. Friend agree that, given that we have citizenship classes up to the age of 16 in all our schools, it is a great pity that young people will have to wait until they are 18 to exercise the right to vote?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend raises an important issue, and it is something that the Government continue to consider. Making such a major change is not something that can be done lightly. It requires a great deal of thought and consideration. I assure my hon. Friend that this is a matter that the Government are keeping under close review.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): May I return to the question of next Thursday's business and offer the Leader of the House a suggestion? Consideration in Committee of the Council Tax (New Valuation Lists for England) Bill took barely more than an hour and a half, and I doubt whether the remaining stages will detain the House for very much longer than that. Could we schedule the debate on the Bill so that it takes place for a shorter time, and then return to the original debate, which is of great importance to Members on both sides of the House, for the rest of that day?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting constitutional question about the willingness of Opposition parties to participate in the scheduling of Bills. Their enthusiasm for ensuring that consideration of Bills continues for a limited period on the Floor of the House is something that I will note, and may rely on in future.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) (Lab): May I press my right hon. Friend on the suggestion that a free vote be held on the extent of the restrictions on smoking when the issue is debated next year? He will recall that our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, at annual conference, said that whenever he introduced a reform he always thought in retrospect that he had not gone far enough. We are in danger of introducing a measure that makes no one happy. I put it to him that the way round that is to allow a free vote on the extent to which the restrictions should apply.

Mr. Hoon: I have dealt with this question on a number of previous occasions, and I am sure that I have tested the limits of your patience, Mr. Speaker, because this is not strictly a matter for the Leader of the House or for the Chamber. I suggest that my right hon. Friend raise the matter at the regular meetings of the parliamentary Labour party. That seems to me to be where decisions on whether a free vote should be allowed should properly be discussed.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): I should place on the record my interest as a warrant-holding special constable. The Leader of the House is fully aware that chief officers have been given a desperately short period in which to respond to the proposals contained in "Closing the Gap". That consultation closes, and therefore effectively the debate closes, on 23 December. It is therefore ludicrous to suggest that the debate in the House should be held in the new year. Is he aware that it is an insult to the Chamber and to the police to suggest that an hour and a half in Westminster Hall is sufficient? The right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that that hour and a half debate could not possibly be followed by a vote. There are many Members who require a vote on this subject. The Government have recently paid particular attention to the views of the police. If the Leader of the House and the Prime Minister receive representations from the Association of Chief Police Officers indicating that it is concerned about this, will he guarantee a debate before Christmas?

Mr. Hoon: The first stage of the consultation is scheduled to be concluded by 23 December, but that will happen only where police forces agree to amalgamation. If there is no such agreement, there is a further opportunity for consultation lasting another four months. There is every opportunity for right hon. and hon. Members to set out their concerns, and it is important that the matter be widely discussed. I do not intend to repeat what I have already said about the need to give right hon. and hon. Members the opportunity to set out their views in this Chamber, but should any structural changes be required there will obviously be opportunities for Members to vote on them once any necessary legislation is brought before the House.

Mr. Fraser Kemp (Houghton and Washington, East) (Lab): Will the Leader of the House ensure that when the education Bill comes before the House there is ample opportunity to discuss its anti-bullying aspects so that we can share the experience of Sunderland city council and of local schools? They have a very innovative and pioneering scheme involving the use of mentors, including 14-year-old Demi Stanners from my constituency, where all the evidence and experience shows that people will respond more to people of the same age in dealing with the evil that is bullying in many of our schools.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that important issue. All of us who are concerned about discipline in schools are worried about bullying, which is part of the problem that, sadly, too many of our children and young people face when they go to school. That is why the Government's most recent White Paper on education includes a chapter that specifically mentions bullying.

Mr. Shailesh Vara (North-West Cambridgeshire) (Con): We have learned today that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office made a number of mistakes at the time of the Asian tsunami. Can we have a statement here from either the Foreign Secretary or the Secretary of State for International Development explaining what the mistakes were and why they occurred, and, most importantly, giving an assurance that they will never be repeated?

Mr. Hoon: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I believe that he is being somewhat harsh on the Foreign Office and the work that it did in response to the tsunami. The National Audit Office report is critical of certain aspects, but overall it makes it clear that there was a significant and very effective response on behalf of the United Kingdom. What is important about such reports is that we learn lessons from them, and I assure him that we will do so.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): Is the Leader of the House aware that opinion in Wales is more united against police reorganisation than it has been on any issue since Liverpool decided to drown Tryweryn in 1965? People are saying, quite sensibly, that we do not want to have three years of disruption and upheaval from a reorganisation that will distract the forces from their task of keeping the peace.

Does the Leader of the House realise that the Government have given no figures on the cost of this, although the North Wales police have said that it will cost £50 million, which will be an additional burden on the council tax payers of Wales? Following the postponement of next week's debate, can we take some comfort from the Government's waking up to the fact that the demise of those fine police forces would be as futile as most people believe?

[Paul Flynn]

Mr. Hoon: I am slightly surprised to hear my normally radical friend taking such a conservative—with a small c—line on such an important matter as police reorganisation. As the Government have made clear, it is necessary to organise our police forces in the best way to allow them to do the job. My hon. Friend refers to the up-front costs, but I can assure him that the projected savings from police reorganisation are significant. Those savings will allow more effective policing in Wales and, indeed, in other parts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): Will the Leader of the House reorganise the business programme so that we can discuss the amalgamation of the police forces next week? He must understand that there is a deep anxiety in the House about that. In my constituency, there is very robust opposition to the suggestion that the Lincolnshire police force should be grouped with adjoining forces, because it is felt that that will lead to prejudice against rural areas. The House needs to discuss this matter on the Floor of the House, with a vote, immediately.

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. and learned Gentleman makes his point with his customary style, and I have noted his remarks.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Highways Agency is blocking much needed development of business and housing in my constituency on the basis that that would add to congestion on the A1 western bypass around Gateshead and Newcastle? Can we have an early debate on the powers of the Highways Agency, which has failed over many years to take any action whatsoever to relieve congestion on that trunk road and is now using its powers to block much-needed development and redevelopment in my constituency?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising what is obviously an important issue for him as a constituency Member of Parliament. I will ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is made aware of his concerns and responds accordingly.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): If the Leader of the House is going to persist in tying the EU rebate to the common agricultural policy, will he instruct the Prime Minister to come to the House urgently and tell us in terms that any surrender of the rebate will be based only on an absolute and actual reform of the CAP, not a promise, an undertaking or a wish; otherwise, nobody will believe a word that either he or the Prime Minister says?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his confidence in my abilities to instruct the Prime Minister to come to the House. I am sure that the Prime Minister would respond to a warm, friendly invitation to set out the Government's position, and he will do that, as he regularly does, after the forthcoming summit.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): In the light of what the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) said about support for the chemical industry, may I tell my right hon. Friend that there is a great deal of concern about the gas price increases that were announced at the weekend? Two companies in my area, Terra Nitrogen and Huntsman, are worried about reduced capacity and shutdowns. It is a very important issue for the chemical industry and for manufacturing. Can we have a debate on the Floor of the House on the future of the chemical industry? I am sure that Members on both sides of the House would benefit from that.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right to raise the important issue of the chemical industry, which is a vital employer and a supplier of significant technology in the United Kingdom. By and large, chemical companies that are large consumers of gas tend to have financial arrangements with the energy suppliers, particularly in relation to gas, based on the spot price on any given day. Indeed, that price fluctuates—it fell overnight. I assume that large chemical corporations arrange their supplies of energy on the basis of what is most cost-effective. Some companies have long-term contracts at fixed prices for the supply of gas. I assume that chemical companies choose not to do that as a financial judgment that they make as being in their own best interests.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): When I recently asked the Leader of the House about the debate on police restructuring, he said that he was > "confident that there will be every opportunity to discuss any decisions before they are implemented."—[Official Report, 10 November 2005; Vol. 439, c. 490.]

That perhaps reveals his thinking. I should draw his attention to the fact that we like to discuss such decisions in this House before they are taken, not implemented. As he should be aware, most of the proposed changes do not require primary legislation to be brought before the House, so there will be no opportunity to debate such legislation in detail on Second Reading. I, too, urge him to reinstate the debate for next Thursday.

Mr. Hoon: I have nothing to add to what I have said on several occasions about the need for a debate. The hon. Gentleman quotes me accurately and I agree with what I said.

Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend find time for a short debate on the beers offered for sale in Strangers Bar? Will he lend his authority as Leader of the House to my concerns about the replacement of Youngs ordinary bitter—one of the most famous cask-conditioned ales in this country, which has been on sale in Strangers for more than 10 years and is brewed in Britain's oldest brewery, based in my constituency—with San Miguel, a lager from the Philippines, which is not only greatly inferior but far more alcoholic? In the name of good taste and parliamentary sobriety, will he help us to get Youngs back?

Mr. Hoon: I never cease to be amazed by the range of my responsibilities. I am delighted to discover that I might have responsibility for that matter. I am sure that it will be investigated now that my hon. Friend has raised it so eloquently.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): In his opening remarks, the Leader of the House told us that there would be no debate next Thursday on police restructuring, but he did not tell us why. If he does not answer that question clearly, there is a danger that it will give my constituents and many others the impression that the Government are either frightened of debate or have no intention of listening to the House.

Mr. Hoon: Given that I announced that there would be a debate, it is a little unfair of the hon. Gentleman to suggest that the Government are alarmed, concerned or frightened of holding one. Indeed, I made it clear today that there will be such a debate. The reason for adjusting the business is clear: it is necessary to complete the remaining stages of an important Bill, which must be taken on the Floor of the House.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): I add my support to a free vote on the smoking restrictions. May I urge my right hon. Friend to do all that he can to help settle the dispute with the House of Commons contract cleaners, perhaps by asking the House of Commons Commission to get involved? Yesterday I went to a meeting with other hon. Members in which the cleaners were supported by a delegation of cleaners from Europe, who have much better pay and conditions than the people working in this building. The dispute has been going on for six months, and I urge him to do what he can because it is humiliating that it is happening in the heart of democracy. Will he do all that he can to get it settled before Christmas?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right to raise the matter and it is important to try to move towards a settlement. However, I emphasise that the House of Commons authorities are not party to the contract. It is important that negotiations continue between the employer and the employees. I recently met the deputy general secretary of the Transport and General Workers Union and the Trades Union Congress, when the issue was raised. I made it clear that I am willing to meet other representatives of the cleaners to try to resolve the matter fairly and properly.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): May we have a debate about the availability of digital television, especially as we move towards analogue turn-off? Large parts of my constituency receive no digital services but my constituents will still be expected to pay the inflation-busting licence fee hike that the BBC proposes. Does the Leader of the House agree that there is a case for a differential in the licence fee when full services are not available?

Mr. Hoon: As I understood it, the reason for changing the licence fee was precisely to allow digital services to be extended throughout the country. That is part of the Government's undertaking to promote digital services and provide an enhanced service to people throughout the United Kingdom.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Does the Leader of the House agree that crime is a local problem that should, as far as possible, be tackled locally and that communities lie at the heart of the criminal justice system? If so, will he ask the Home Secretary to come to the House to explain his proposals for the probation service, which deals with 300,000 offenders annually? The Home Secretary is proposing to take control of it before parcelling it out and selling it off to the private and voluntary sectors, with which the probation service has worked successfully for a long time. Next year will be the 100th year of its existence. Should not we allow it to celebrate its successes rather than wave farewell to it?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right that it is important that all agencies that deal with crime locally be adequately staffed and have the appropriate resources to make a difference as close to the problem as possible. However, I hope that he agrees that, to make the resources available, it is only sensible to examine the management and organisational structures of the different agencies to ensure that they generate maximum efficiencies and do not, for example, simply duplicate services in small areas that could be tackled better regionally. We need to balance the importance of effective local services with the best management structures.

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): May I urge the Leader of the House to reconsider the cancellation of the debate on police amalgamation, which was scheduled for next Thursday? There is clearly widespread, cross-party concern about it. Losing that important debate is symptomatic of the Government's approach to police amalgamation. When the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety commissioned the O'Connor report, which will result in the changes, she asked for publicity on the matter to be kept low key. Are not the Government trying to rush through the proposals with little or no debate either here or elsewhere?

Mr. Hoon: No.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): May we have a statement from a Health Minister on the spread of MRSA? On Monday, when we discussed part 2 of the Equality Bill on religious equality, Labour Members said that the "proper" withdrawal of Bibles from hospitals was nothing to do with political correctness but that they were agents of the spread of MRSA. I have a Reuters report, which states that Gideons International was so shocked by the implication that the Bibles might be harbouring disease that it commissioned a study by a micro-biologist and a surgeon who said that it was nonsense. The Government and Gideons International cannot both be right, so what is the answer?

Mr. Hoon: The Government have invested an extra £68 million in tackling MRSA and it is showing results.

[Mr. Hoon]

There has been a significant reduction of around 6.4 per cent. in cases of MRSA in the past year and it is at its lowest level since 2001.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The Leader of the House was careful in the way in which he quoted from the national grid winter outlook. He made no comments about its prospects for major manufacturing industry. When the all-party aluminium group met leaders of the aluminium industry on Monday, they were extremely worried about prospects for the winter. Their next meeting after the all-party group was with officials at the Department of Trade and Industry who had invited them there and wanted to know from manufacturing industry the impact on it of interruptions in supply this winter. Why on earth should DTI officials want to know from manufacturing industry what would happen if there were interruptions to supply if the Department were not worried that there might be power cuts? Please may we have a debate on energy policy in Government time soon, because manufacturing matters to Conservative Members?

Mr. Hoon: And to Labour Members. Perhaps in contrast to the long period of Conservative Government, when many people lost their jobs, we do something about manufacturing industry rather than simply talking about it. However, the hon. Gentleman raises an important point about security of energy supplies. Speaking in a slightly different capacity, I made it clear to the House that planning, preparing and ensuring that we had contingency plans in place in the event of a severe winter was part of Government policy. That is the reason for the sort of meetings to which he referred.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): The Turner commission on pensions is due to publish its report soon. May we have an assurance that there will be not only a statement when that happens but an early debate in the House on an important matter to the pensioners of today and tomorrow? It appears from reports today that the Chancellor is already ruling out any link between pension rises and earnings. When in opposition, the Labour party supported restoring the link, which is vital for the future prosperity of Britain's pensioners.

Mr. Hoon: I am confident that if there are specific proposals for changes, there will be every opportunity to debate and discuss them in the House. Equally, we anticipate in due course an important report by the Turner commission considering pensions in the longer term, which is vital for all those whom we represent. Let me make it clear that there will be opportunities to discuss that in future.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): To return to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Mr. Vara), as today's published report vindicates those many British nationals who were stranded in Thailand at the time of the tsunami who believe that they were badly let down by the Foreign Office—particularly in Thailand, where the service offered was totally inadequate—can we ensure that the Foreign Secretary makes a full statement? As the Leader of the House said in answer to earlier questions, we must learn lessons, but in doing so, we must also be able to cross-examine the Foreign Secretary to satisfy ourselves that the lessons have really been learnt.

Mr. Hoon: I have said that the report is important, and that we must learn lessons from what was an overwhelming tragedy not only for the countries affected but for many citizens of this country who were caught up in those terrible events. There is an opportunity next Tuesday, at Foreign Office questions, to begin the process to which the right hon. Gentleman refers, and it is important that we go on learning lessons and subjecting Ministers to proper political accountability.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Is the Leader of the House aware that the fourth Secretary of State for Work and Pensions in a year announced on the "Today" programme this morning that there would be a statement next week on the Turner report? Why is the Leader of the House not able to tell us, when he announces the business, what statements are planned? Is it because, from week to week, the Government are in such chaos that they cannot tell us what the programme will be?

Mr. Hoon: In the dim and distant past, as a very young member of the Opposition Whips Office, I used to admire the skill and ability of the Conservative Whips Office in its management of parliamentary business. I recall asking a similar question from the Opposition Benches on one occasion, and I will give the right hon. Gentleman exactly the same answer as I received—that that is a matter for the Government.

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): Will the Leader of the House arrange a debate on the scope of the NHS, at a time when GPs are being encouraged by Ministers to turn people away who are not critically ill or elderly? The flu jab costs £25. The average wage is now £12 an hour. Therefore, if the jab prevents the flu, the cost is saved in two hours. Is the universal NHS that we have had now restricted to those with life-threatening conditions?

Mr. Hoon: On the contrary, the Government have made tremendous progress in extending the availability of flu jabs each year. This year, something like 14.6 million doses will be available. In 1997, under the previous Conservative Government, a mere 6.1 million jabs were available. A huge improvement and increase in protection has been made available to the British people under this Government compared with the Conservative one.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on freedom of speech and, as we approach the Christmas season, on freedom of religion? Is it not the case that the Government have passed successive legislation that is creepingly anti-Christian?

Mr. Hoon: I do not accept that at all. The Government have recently proposed a change in legislation to protect religion more extensively than in the past. Given that the hon. Gentleman has raised this issue, I am slightly surprised that he did not support that legislation.

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): Bedford hospital, which cares for my constituents, has just closed two wards. It is £8.5 million in deficit, and as part of its recovery plan, has announced a list of further closures. It will restrict neo-natal services for premature babies, stop 10 theatre sessions a week, close a ward at weekends, close the Mulberry unit—the list goes on and on. Those cuts in services are affecting patients on the front line. Will the Minister make time for a debate so that we can all discuss in more detail the NHS deficits that affect all our constituencies, and the effect on the most vulnerable people who need the services?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Lady knows full well that a significant increase in resources has been made available to the Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire strategic health authority. If she is not aware of the figures, let me tell her that there are 2,975 more nurses, 659 more doctors and 168 more consultants. That is a huge change in the numbers of people available to serve her constituents. Clearly, they require paying for, but in paying for those extra resources available to her constituents, it is important that the management of those resources is as effective as possible.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): May I re-emphasise to the Leader of the House how bad it looks that we will not have a debate on police restructuring? Given that both Surrey's police authority and chief constable have expressed considerable reservations about the short time scale, have gone through one proposal and are now being invited to consider five different strategic proposals to go back to the Home Office by 23 December, and that the Surrey police authority will manage to have a public meeting on 19 December before their latest submissions go to the Home Office, surely to goodness we can debate the matter on the Floor of the House before Christmas?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman knows full well that this Government have put enormous extra resources into policing—something like an extra 14,000 police officers across the country. It is important that we have the right structures to support those police officers who are doing a tremendous job. That is why we need to debate and discuss these issues, and why I have repeatedly made it clear that the House will have the opportunity to have the debate that he requests.

Points of Order

12.26 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want to follow up the point of order that I raised on Tuesday. As you will recall, I raised the question of the Ministry of Defence holding a press briefing in advance of the publication tomorrow of the National Audit Office's major projects report. You kindly responded that you would look into the matter, and you have written to me, with a copy to the Secretary of State and a copy placed in the Library, saying that you do not find it desirable that a Department should arrange a briefing so close to the publication of the NAO report. I thank you, on behalf of all Members of the House, for your vigilance on our behalf and the protection that you seek to give to us.

Nevertheless, may I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that the briefing given by the noble Lord Drayson as Minister with responsibility for defence procurement was headed, "Major Projects Report 2005"? When I raised the matter with you on Tuesday, I was concerned that the debate about such an important report, as the Leader of the House knows, in the annual cycle of Ministry of Defence activities might be tainted or pre-empted by the Ministry of Defence, which had sought to present a favourable gloss on it. I understand that I could have had access to that report earlier this week, as you have pointed out to me in the letter placed in the Library. The fact is, however, that Members generally are not able to use those reports until they are available from the Vote Office.

The headline written up by journalists in yesterday's newspapers was that the Ministry of Defence had cut the overspend by £699 million—the precise figure contained in the report to be published tomorrow. I submit that the Ministry of Defence did not say in its briefing to journalists that the NAO's conclusion was that > "The decrease in forecast costs results mainly from changed requirements or reductions in the quantity or capability of equipment being procured."

In other words, the savings have not come from Ministry of Defence efficiency savings but from cutting the capability or numbers of major projects to which the report refers.

It therefore seems that the noble Lord has been somewhat cavalier with the House in presenting a partial view of what the National Audit Office was due to release tomorrow. I have written a note to you, Mr. Speaker, and I would be grateful if you could consider the matter again on behalf of the House.

Mr. Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me notice of his point of order. I have already made clear my views on the general issue, both in my initial response to his first point of order and in the letter that I sent to him and copied to the Ministry of Defence, but I do not wish to be drawn into the detailed points that he has now put to the House. He should pursue them with the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On 27 October Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary rated West Mercia police the most efficient in the country, yet by 23 December West Mercia will be rammed into a new regional police force. What—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must stop the hon. Gentleman there, because that was a not a point of order. The hon. Gentleman raised it because he was disappointed that I had not called him during business questions. I shall bear him in mind during business questions next week: he will be at the front of the queue.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I assume that, as is customary, there will be an Adjournment debate before the Christmas recess. Such debates are normally attended by a junior Minister. Will you use your good offices to ensure that a senior Home Office Minister is on the Bench for the forthcoming debate—and will you confirm that it is in the House's power to force a Division on the Christmas Adjournment motion?

Mr. Speaker: There cannot be a Division on the Adjournment motion itself. I ask for Ministers to come to the House, but their rank is up to the Departments concerned. I cannot force a Secretary of State to attend.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can you confirm that you still have the power—under Standing Orders, so I think that this is a point of order—to enable two Westminster Hall debates lasting for an hour and a half to be combined as a three-hour debate, should a sufficient number of Members write to you asking for a particular subject to be raised?

Mr. Speaker: I have that power. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has raised a point of order with which I can deal. As he said, if a sufficient number of Members write to me, the power lies with me.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I have a ruling on an important matter? In column 897 of the Official Report, dated 15 November, a Government motion states that there is a maximum NHS waiting time of six months. In my constituency, some patients are being asked to wait for between nine and 12 months. May I have a ruling on how that wording can be amended?

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for me, but the hon. Gentleman is bound to want to pursue the question of how his constituents are treated. He can ask for an Adjournment debate, or table parliamentary questions. I am very sympathetic to new Members who seek Adjournment debates.

Mr. Paterson rose—

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con) rose—

Mr. Speaker: I am a very patient Speaker—there is none more patient than I—but the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) may be pushing his luck.

John Bercow: I hope not!

Mr. Speaker: We will try the hon. Member for North Shropshire.

Mr. Paterson: Further to the point of order raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin), Mr. Speaker. What mechanisms exist to allow a vote on an Adjournment motion?

Mr. Speaker: There are no mechanisms to allow a vote in Westminster Hall, but the hon. Member for West Derbyshire, a very experienced Deputy Chief Whip, mentioned the possibility of joining together two Westminster Hall debates to make a three-hour debate. That would make a very good Adjournment debate down in Westminster Hall.

John Bercow: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry if I temporarily suffered an identity crisis earlier: I realise that I could not for a moment be mistaken for my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson).

I seek your guidance, Mr. Speaker, on a matter of some importance and immediacy. Is it in order for the Government to send representatives to the World Trade Organisation ministerial conference in Hong Kong, at which binding and irrevocable decisions will be made that will have a dramatic effect on the poorest and most destitute people on the planet, without first arranging for a statement to be made on the Floor of the House or, better still, for a proper debate?

Mr. Speaker: I certainly do not think that is a matter for me.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During business questions, I asked the Leader of the House a question relating to the review of public administration in Northern Ireland. The advice tendered by the Leader of the House was that I should have broken into yesterday's debate on the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill to raise the matter, which would clearly have been in defiance of the House. Will you rebuke the Leader of the House for his advice, Mr. Speaker, and will you advise him that it would be much better for a Minister to come to the House and make a statement?

Mr. Speaker: I get on far too well with the Leader of the House to rebuke him publicly.

Orders of the Day

European Union (Accessions) Bill

Considered in Committee.

[SIR MICHAEL LORD in the Chair]

Clause 1

ACCESSION TREATY

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

12.35 pm

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): Clause 1 enables us to implement the accession treaty in United Kingdom law, paving the way for United Kingdom ratification of the treaty later in the year and for Bulgaria and Romania to join the European Union. The clause should be recognisable to all who are familiar with past accession Bills.

Subsection 1 specifies the accession treaty for Bulgaria and Romania as one of "the Community Treaties" covered by the European Communities Act 1972. In broad terms, the Act grants automatic effect to directly applicable treaty provisions, and otherwise allows designated Ministers to make regulations amending existing UK legislation to the extent that that may be necessary to implement the treaty.

It is difficult to speak about this part of the Bill without repeating many points that were covered on Second Reading. I shall be brief, not least because there was a welcome cross-party consensus in the House then on the broad principles of accession.

With this enlargement, we are continuing to lay the ghosts of the last century to rest. After the bitter divisions of the two world wars and the cold war we are building a more secure, stable and prosperous Europe, and it is a Europe of which Bulgaria and Romania deserve to be part. Both have made giant strides in their political and economic development. Let us not forget that it was only 15 years ago that Ceausescu was overthrown in Romania and communism collapsed in Bulgaria. Today both states meet the European Union's criteria for membership, which is an enormous achievement. Their transformations are not yet complete, however, and as I stressed on Second Reading, accession in 2007 is not a fait accompli for either country.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): The Minister speaks of laying the ghosts of the last century. Does he accept that 1.5 million of the ghosts are those of the people who suffered in the Armenian massacres? Will he take steps in the future to ensure that some agreement is reached on how the massacres took place before we enable more countries to join the European Union?

Mr. Alexander: I did not expect that issue to be raised directly in relation to clause 1. The British Government's position on the Armenian massacres is a matter of record. Obviously we regard them as a terrible tragedy. I understand that the Government have not designated them a genocide because of the lack of categorical evidence relating to their scale and nature, but I shall be more than happy to write to the hon. Gentleman. I know that the matter continues to be of public concern, and that it has been raised in the context of our other discussions on accession, notably Turkey's accession.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): The Minister said that Bulgaria and Romania were undergoing a transition. Does he expect the transition to be complete by the time of accession, or will further steps have to be taken after that?

Mr. Alexander: There are criteria that must be adhered to. We look forward with interest to the Commission's next report, which will be issued in the spring. It will contain the Commission's latest guidance on the progress that has been made. However, recognising the legal requirements—the adoption of the acquis, for example, is necessary for all countries to become full members of the EU—does not diminish the further progress that can be made once countries are members. One needs to consider, for example, the continued economic progress that has been made by the so-called A10 countries joining the EU in 2004. There was no arbitrary stop to the progress that those countries were making towards the European mainstream when accession took place, but we should recognise that there should be rigour and transparency in the process. That is why I applaud the efforts of Olli Rehn, the European Commissioner responsible for enlargement, when he published the last report. I cannot prejudge the outcome of the next report.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend referred to "transformation" in Romania and Bulgaria, but would he accept that, in the case of Bulgaria, the judicial system is one respect in which insufficient transformation has taken place?

Mr. Alexander: Yes, is the answer to my hon. Friend's question. It is, of course, a matter of profound concern to her and her constituents, in view of the particular consular case about which we have met and in relation to which I offered in an Adjournment debate in the House to have a further meeting with my hon. Friend and her constituent's family. There is scope for further progress in that respect, but I have to tell my hon. Friend candidly that I believe that all who want to see that sort of progress carried forward in Bulgaria should support the country's accession to the European Union. That has already been one of the drivers that has led to some of the progress secured to date. I fully accept, in the light of my hon. Friend's question, that further progress needs to be made. If I recall correctly, that point was reflected in the earlier Commissioner's report to which I referred.

Progress is also required in the matter of corruption. That means tackling head-on the problem of organised crime, and it also means continuing at a greater pace the programme of judicial, agricultural and environmental reform that both Bulgaria and Romania have already embarked on.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): The Minister has, if I may say so, given a series of very elegant answers to penetrating questions, but I would like to ask him a blunt question in the hope that he might provide a blunt answer. If either Romania or Bulgaria fail to meet their obligations in the accession negotiations, does it not remain the case that accession can—and, indeed, should—be refused?

[Sir Menzies Campbell]

Mr. Alexander: I yield to no one in my admiration of the elegance of the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell), who could certainly teach many of us lessons in elegance, but not in bluntness. The level of rigour being applied to Bulgaria and Romania easily bears comparison with the A10 countries that entered the EU in 2004. That is why there is tighter provision in respect of the transparency of the standards to which they need to adhere and in the transparency of the process itself than was the case in 2004. Provision has been made for a so-called super safeguard clause—sometimes alternatively described as the emergency brake procedure—whereby accession would be delayed by a year from 1 January 2007 until 2008. There are also safeguard clauses in respect of areas in which further progress was identified as necessary in Romania.

We also need to emphasise that powerful safeguard mechanisms are available to the European Commission in respect of any accession country for three years following its entry into the EU. Those measures are not time limited, but there are clear processes whereby steps can be taken if difficulties emerge once a country joins the EU, and serious infraction procedures can be brought, which would have a very direct bearing on the interests of the countries concerned. Thus there are safeguard clauses and super safeguard clauses and it remains the case, as we have repeatedly said, that we stand four square behind the European Commission in having both transparency and rigour in assessing the necessary standards.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Alexander: I have already been generous in giving way and I am keen to make a little further progress.

Members on both sides of the House can be assured that we continue to make the point to the Bulgarian and Romanian Governments that more progress is necessary—and, indeed, that both countries need to be aware of the scale of the challenge that they continue to face—but we remain optimistic that they can meet the demanding requirements for membership by next year. The fact that both countries have already demonstrated a capacity to realise impressive change in a relatively short period of time supports that contention.

The successful transformation of both countries from planned to market economies is perhaps the most visible and tangible evidence of progress. Since the start of the process of European integration in 1999, the gross domestic product of both countries has grown by around 25 per cent. Restructuring and the privatisation of inefficient, and in many cases bankrupt, communist state industries has taken place. Their banking industries have also been privatised and the two states have rapidly integrated themselves with western European and world markets. Indeed, the EU has been the accession countries' main trading partner for several years now.

Profound changes in the business environment have also taken place, with the creation of food standards agencies, competition regulators, labour inspectorates and even insurance market supervisors. That will, I believe, help UK firms doing business in and with those two countries.

The prospect of EU membership has given a major impetus to ongoing improvements in both states' environmental policies and their health and safety standards—[Interruption.]

12.45 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. We have heard a statement about how keen these countries are to come into the EU, but is it not rather surprising, after the fiasco of the European constitution, that neither country conducted a referendum on whether their people wanted to join?

Mr. Alexander: It is not for me to prescribe either to the other 24 members of the EU or to candidate countries the mechanism by which they should seek to enter into their international obligations. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman and, indeed, many hon. Members, would look askance at another country trying to dictate to the UK what constitutional mechanism was appropriate in those circumstances.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): The Minister speaks authoritatively about Romania. One of his predecessors, the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), admitted in a previous debate that he had spent all of six hours during his ministerial career visiting Bucharest. How often has the Minister visited Romania, and does he intend to visit the country in future so that he can be better prepared to discuss it than his predecessors?

Mr. Alexander: I am happy to answer the question directly and acknowledge that, in view of the burdens of our presidency obligations since my appointment back in May, I have not yet visited Romania. I did take the opportunity early in my ministerial post to meet our British ambassador and discuss with him the progress that continues to be made—I am pleased to say with the assistance of British civil servants as well as a range of other bodies—in Romania. Not least because it is standard procedure when meeting British ambassadors to request a visit to the said country, I gave an undertaking to the British ambassador in Bucharest that I hoped to be able to visit Romania fairly shortly after the end of the British presidency. One can readily imagine, in view of the number of countries within the EU at the moment—and on account of future financing, which I have no intention of discussing this afternoon—that pressures on ministerial time are considerable and that a range of visits already lie ahead for me in the remaining weeks of the British presidency.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Alexander: I will give way one final time, but then I want to make further progress.

Kelvin Hopkins: My right hon. Friend was talking a few moments ago about privatisation in Romania and Bulgaria. Is privatisation being made a requirement for those countries before they enter the EU or are they just being encouraged to privatise where appropriate? Given that many of the larger industries in western Europe are still under public ownership and do very well in the public sector, are we to press those two countries to privatise beyond what is expected here?

Mr. Alexander: I sense that, as far as my hon. Friend is concerned, that debate is not restricted to the Romanian or Bulgarian economy. We have had the opportunity and privilege of debating similar matters in respect of the UK, never mind the potential accession countries to the EU in the past. It is a commonsense point that the EU is a union of liberal democracies that operate on the basis of market economies, so I make no apology for the fact that transition was necessary in Romania and Bulgaria from the state-controlled industries of the communist era—under the leadership of Ceausescu and others—to the position today, whereby impressive levels of economic growth have been achieved year on year. In the light of the domestic policies followed by Bulgaria and Romania, it might be challenging for my hon. Friend to examine his own prescription for securing economic growth and compare it with that taken forward by the Governments of those two countries.

Subsection (2) approves for the purposes of section 12 of the European Parliamentary Elections Act 2002 the provisions of the accession treaty in so far as they relate to the powers of the European Parliament. It is important to note that the accession treaty does not create new powers for the Parliament; rather, it increases the geographical scope of the existing powers by making provision for the future participation of MEPs from Bulgaria and Romania. It consequently applies those existing powers to nationals of states to whom they could not otherwise have been applied before the treaty's entering into force.

Mr. Brady rose—

Mr. Alexander: As with the previous Bill on accession, the inclusion of this provision is therefore a precautionary measure to put beyond doubt Parliament's approval of those parts of the accession treaty concerned with the European Parliament's powers.

Mr. Brady: I am not sure whether the Minister is giving way or has finished. [Interruption.] Given that he has finished, I hope that he will respond in due course to the point that I was about to put to him—I shall raise it later—had he accepted an intervention from me.

The Minister was commendably brief and I shall seek to be likewise. He knows, given the nature of our debate on Second Reading, that there is broad agreement across the House on the desirability of Romanian and Bulgarian accession, and, indeed, a broad welcome for enlargement of the European Union. As has been touched on in some interventions, accession is beneficial to the new member states, and the process itself brings benefits, as we are seeing in Romania and Bulgaria and in other places. It also benefits the EU as a whole, helping to lock in the benefits of democracy and the rule of law, and the importance of tackling corruption, fraud, and organised crime. All such efforts have been redoubled in recent times during the accession process. However, there is still a long way to go, as the Minister accepted.

The Minister spoke throughout his speech about Romania and Bulgaria as though they are proceeding in parallel, with no difference between them. It would help the Committee to know the Government's and the Minister's own assessment of the two countries' separate progress toward accession, and the extent to which each has met the required criteria.

Mr. Douglas Alexander: As the hon. Gentleman is kind enough to allow me to intervene on him, I am happy to confirm that the British Government have no assessment independent of that made recently by the Commission. I think that he is anticipating the question of whether we recognise that each country should be judged on its own merits, rather than being taken together in all circumstances. I am happy to assure him that, notwithstanding the nature of the reports simultaneously produced for Bulgaria and Romania, we absolutely recognise the importance of each country's being judged on its own merits.

Mr. Brady: I am grateful to the Minister. It is important that each country be judged on its own merits, not least because, as I mentioned on Second Reading, there is the slightly odd arrangement whereby the mechanisms for assessing the two countries are different. We need to bear that point in mind.

Progress is being made in tackling corruption and organised crime, but the importance of doing so cannot be overstated, not least in the context of accession to the EU itself, and of the implications within a single market once these countries have joined EU-funded programmes. We should bear in mind the possibility of very large sums of British—and other EU countries'—taxpayers' money going in to Romania and Bulgaria at a time when they perhaps lack the administrative capacity to manage such sums in an acceptable way.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Does my hon. Friend share my and the Commission's concern at the fact that not a single successful high-level prosecution for corruption has been made in these accession countries?

Mr. Brady: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The countries in question know that they are being monitored in this regard, and we hear a great deal of talk about their determination to improve. This is an extremely important issue, particularly given the implications for the EU itself and for current member states, should accession take place in the near future.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is extremely positive that the political consensus in both Romania and Bulgaria is that joining the EU is an essentially positive move?

Mr. Brady: Absolutely, and I might go a little further by pointing to the welcome—if slightly unusual—development whereby consensus on EU matters exists in this House.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con) rose—

Mr. Brady: I spoke too soon, Sir Michael.

Mr. Cash: I am afraid that my hon. Friend did speak a little too soon. Having listened to representatives from Bulgaria and the Czech Republic, and given events in Hungary concerning the excessive deficit procedure, my feeling is that—notwithstanding those of us who are in favour of enlargement—some people are living in complete cloud cuckoo land on the question of the kind of Europe that we need to develop. I will not go into that issue in detail now as I hope to make a speech on it later, but we need to be very cautious in assuming that, by absorbing the whole of the existing legal framework of the European treaties, we can maintain the consensus that enlargement is a good idea. That is to say nothing of the question of Turkey.

Mr. Brady: I am delighted that there is consensus. Although we welcome the move toward the final objective of accession for Romania and Bulgaria, Members in all parts of the House accept that there are some real difficulties, as my hon. Friend rightly highlights. I shall return in a moment—briefly—to the specific issue that he raised.

The timetable set out for accession is very short indeed. If accession is to take place in January 2007, satisfactory progress must have been made in the next few months—by April 2006, I think. There is strong support in this House for the accession of both countries, but it must take place at the right time and under the right circumstances. It is worth noting the remarks of the Enlargement Commissioner, who said as recently as last week:

> "If needed, we won't hesitate to recommend, in spring 2006, to postpone accession by one year".

We must accept that, even in that event, we are looking a very short timetable for what is a significant programme of work and change in the two accession countries.

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that one reason for delaying accession—I am wholly in favour of Romania and Bulgaria joining the EU—is the level of people trafficking, particularly child trafficking, in both countries? There is no offence of child trafficking in this country, as I found out by tabling a parliamentary question on this issue. Does he share my desire that this appalling and obscene practice be stamped on as hard as possible, and does he agree that the British Government should do all that they can to ensure that that happens?

Mr. Brady: Absolutely. My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point; the whole House will want that issue to be tackled with great vigour.

We should note that we are considering not just the accession treaty but the protocol to it, which has particular implications for the applicant countries. Here, I return to the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) made in an intervention. Of course, I cannot go down the route of discussing an amendment that was tabled but not selected, Sir Michael, but I should point out that the protocol provides for the constitution's implementation in both accession countries, should it be in place at the time of accession. I do not want to go into detail on this issue, but it is absolutely clear that we ought to be much more certain about the kind of EU that we are considering bringing new member states into.

The accession process continues: today, we are considering Romania and Bulgaria, and accession talks began recently for Croatia and Turkey. The more countries begin the process, the greater the need for real clarity about the nature of the EU.

1 pm

Mr. Cash: Is my hon. Friend aware that on 18 November the German coalition Government—and I believe that Angela Merkel is here today—made a commitment to complete the ratification of the constitutional treaty during the German presidency of the EU in the first half of 2007? I have just been hearing evidence about the charter of fundamental rights, but putting to one side that charter's implementation, there is no doubt that there is an impetus to achieving treaty ratification. Although my hon. Friend is completely right to raise the treaty question, what do we do about it? What sort of Europe do we really want?

Mr. Brady: I hesitate to stray too far from the subject of this debate, but my hon. Friend is right to say that the German coalition has committed itself to driving the constitution forward. Several other member states remain committed to the project, and one of the unfortunate missed opportunities of the British presidency over the past five months is that the Government have failed to put an end to the constitutional treaty process. However, that must happen if we are to accommodate the more diverse and larger EU that is emerging, and make it easier for countries such as Turkey to join. The EU that will thus develop will have the sort of flexibility that will make our relationship with it easier and more comfortable.

The Opposition strongly support the objective of Romanian and Bulgarian accession to the EU, but it is essential to get it right. We support the Bill, but urge the Minister and his colleagues to give the applicant countries the closest possible scrutiny, as well as the support and assistance that they need as the progress towards accession.

Mrs. Ellman: The matters being considered under clause 1 are extremely important. Accession to the EU is of great importance to the applicant countries and to the UK. Applicant countries have to be assessed by the European Commission, as must the compatibility of their domestic legal practices with the European convention on human rights. Only then can ratification take place.

I want to register my grave concern that Bulgaria may not be ready for admission to the EU in January 2007. I ask the Government to withhold support for that country's application.

I submitted a written question to my right hon. Friend the Minister about the European Commission's enhanced monitoring report on the state of Bulgaria. In his answer of 21 November, he said that he accepted the Commission's view that Bulgaria should review its pre-trial phase and improve the accountability of its justice system. I am interested in this matter because of the experience of my constituent Michael Shields.

Michael Shields, now aged 19, is serving 15 years in prison in Bulgaria for the attempted murder of Martin Georgiev near the Big Ben fish and chip bar in Varna at around 5.30 am on 30 May. Another man, Graham Sankey, has confessed to the crime, saying that > "an innocent man has received blame for what I did,"

but he has not been questioned about that confession. Michael has always protested his innocence. He says that he was asleep at the time and has produced evidence to substantiate the claim.

I held an Adjournment debate on this subject on 17 November, which can be found in the Official Report for that date, columns 1211–16. I set out the reasons for my concern in detail then, and I repeat my thanks to ministerial colleagues for their help in this matter. In this debate, however, I want to focus on the judicial aspects of Michael Shields's experience, which are relevant to our consideration of the accession treaty. I shall look at the European Commission's expressed concern, and the compatibility of Bulgaria's practices with the ECHR.

My first point has to do with the status of the prosecution in Bulgaria. The defence in the Michael Shields case has stated that the prosecution is part of the judiciary. If that is true, it raises major questions about the principle of equality of arms—that is, the status of the prosecution in relation to the defence. There is a major question about the quality of justice if the defence is put at a disadvantage in court, in breach of article 6 of the ECHR.

Secondly, I draw the House's attention to the detail of the conduct of the trial, and of the pre-trial phase. Stephen Jacobi, the renowned human rights lawyer and director of Fair Trial Abroad, was the international observer at the trial of Michael Shields in Varna. In a written report, he has stated that the way in which identification was authenticated was "quite appalling".

In addition, there appears to have been no protection of the crime scene and no forensics were undertaken to assist identification of witnesses. In court, witnesses resiled from their police statements that they could not remember the face of the assailant. Dock identification was permitted—a practice that Stephen Jacobi says was outlawed 50 years ago in the UK. The prison governor produced a prejudiced statement in court, but it was not questioned by the defence, and there were major queries concerning the identity parade and pre-trial publicity.

Moreover, witness accounts differed. People in the bar said that they had not seen the whole incident, but all of them claimed that a stone had been clutched to the assailant's chest before being dropped on Martin Georgiev. People outside the bar saw more of the incident, and said that the stone had been brought down from above the assailant's head.

Another problem has to do with the new witness, Mr. A. His eye-witness evidence has been notarised and legalised, and he has stated that he is absolutely certain that the perpetrator was not Michael Shields. When he returned to the scene of the crime the following morning, a witness whom he had seen the night before told him that he and at least another 10 people would testify that the perpetrator was

> "a fat lad with black hair".

Mr. A. therefore felt assured that there were numerous witnesses, and so did not offer evidence himself. However, those same bar witnesses said in court that the fair-haired Michael Shields was the guilty party. Mr. A. has now come forward and given a legalised and notarised statement, and is willing to testify in Bulgaria.

Mr. Steen: It may help the hon. Lady to know that three members of the European Scrutiny Committee are in the Chamber today, and that I am due to visit Bulgaria in about 10 days. If she will furnish me with further information, I should be pleased to take the matter up with the Bulgarian authorities.

Mrs. Ellman: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention and shall certainly take up his very kind offer.

I am concerned that the ECHR could be infringed by the court's bizarre failure to question Graham Sankey following his confession. The court's rejection of that confession, with no questioning of Mr. Sankey, is inexplicable. It is inconsistent with the actions of the Bulgarian authority in attempting to question Graham Sankey before that confession was made.

I am deeply disturbed by the wrong information that has been recorded in the Bulgarian official record of judicial proceedings. The official statement entitled, "Reason for the Judgement" dated 10 November 2005 states that Graham Sankey

> "was not summoned to the court hearing as the English authorities could not find him and serve him with a writ of summons."

The facts are very different. The facts, as authenticated by our Home Office, are that the Bulgarian authorities issued a summons for Graham Sankey incorrectly. The summons arrived at the Home Office on 11 July, giving the United Kingdom central authority nine days rather than the required six weeks to serve it. The UK authority did not attempt to serve the summons, so the Bulgarians tried to speak to Graham Sankey before he made the confession. They handled that wrongly. Their record of what happened is factually incorrect yet, when he made the confession, the Bulgarians did not attempt to question him. As the matter is under Bulgarian jurisdiction, it is entirely a matter for the Bulgarians. They can, of course, ask the United Kingdom police to inquire on their behalf, but they have failed to do so.

I am also extremely concerned to see contradictory information in official reports from Bulgarian judicial authorities in reference to this case. The indictment issued by the Varna prosecutor's office stated:

> "At the time of the offence Shields was not under the influence of any psychoactive substances, alcohol or cannabis."

Yet the official statement entitled, "Reasons for the Judgement Returned" relating to Michael Shields's failed appeal issued on 10 November 2005 said:

> "At the time of the offence the defendant was influenced by alcohol."

Those are two contradictory statements made by official judicial bodies in Bulgaria referring to this case. I find that of added concern.

The details that I have given are examples of a large number of concerns about Michael Shields' situation. I have given them because I believe that they underline the

[Mrs. Ellman]

European Commission's concerns about the readiness or otherwise of the Bulgarians to become members of the EU. I am extremely concerned about my constituent Michael Shields. His family are devastated. They are campaigning strongly for justice and I will continue to stand with them until we receive it.

I have referred to this matter in this Committee because it is relevant to Bulgaria's joining the EU. The EU monitoring has drawn attention to the deficiencies in the Bulgarian judicial system, including accountability, openness and the pre-trial phase. The illustrations from Michael Shields's case demonstrate that principle in a clear way, and I am extremely concerned. I therefore ask my right hon. Friend the Minister to reject Bulgaria's accession pending further investigation of this unacceptable situation and to enable consideration to take place of whether it is indicative of the wider concerns expressed by the Commission on Bulgaria's judicial processes. This is a matter of justice for Michael Shields, but it is also about the suitability and readiness of Bulgaria to become a member of the EU in January 2007.

1.15 pm

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): As a newcomer to this Committee and a pro-European one at that, I can be lulled into a great sense of comfort that there is such a great deal of cross-party consensus about the Bill and clause 1, notwithstanding the eloquent evidence that we have heard from the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman) about the plight of Michael Shields and the clear failings in the Bulgarian judicial system, and notwithstanding the slightly more—how can I phrase it?—ideological objections to the whole process of the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash).

Mr. Cash: No, practical.

Mr. Clegg: Practical concerns. Therein lies a great and, I fear, adjacent debate that will no doubt arise at another time.

Notwithstanding that cross-party consensus, some tension and legitimate concern arises from clause 1 and the terms on which Bulgaria and Romania are joining the EU. The treaty of accession provides a short-term safeguard clause that could jeopardise the final entry of Romania and Bulgaria into the EU, but only for 12 months. The hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) raised that issue on Second Reading. It is a legitimate one, and it has been echoed by the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady).

What happens if Romania and Bulgaria are proved to have failed in their final preparations to become members of the EU? I fear that we are caught in a cleft stick. The accession treaty commits us to accepting Romania and Bulgaria into the EU almost come hell or high water. While there is a safeguard clause, it only defers but does not permanently postpone or put off accession. At a political level, once they have joined, the ability of the EU authorities to exercise any leverage over the domestic reform process is significantly weakened.

As I mentioned on Second Reading, the manner in which the final stages of the accession of Romania and Bulgaria are handled would set an important precedent for much more controversial accessions, notably that of Turkey, if the negotiations with Turkey are ever concluded. The EU needs somehow, within fairly narrow parameters, to exercise influence over Romania and Bulgaria in the remaining stages of the accession process in as rigorous a manner as possible.

I draw the attention of the Minister to the annexes, with which he will no doubt be familiar, to the accession treaty, which spell out in considerable detail what Romania and Bulgaria are expected to do to get over the final hurdle of their accession. I cite annexe IX, headed, "Specific commitments undertaken, and requirements accepted, by Romania at the conclusion of the accession negotiations on 14 December 2004". It says that Romania—the same applies to Bulgaria in a separate annexe—undertakes

> "To . . . implement an . . . Action Plan and Strategy for the Reform Of The Judiciary", to enact anti-corruption legislation, and ensure

> "the effective independence of the National Anti-Corruption Prosecutors' Office . . . To conduct an independent audit of the . . . current National Anti-Corruption Strategy", to introduce

> "a clear legal framework for . . . co-operation between, gendarmerie and the police" and so on.

In a separate annexe, there are similarly detailed requirements for Romania to respect the Schengen action plan and ensure a high level of control and surveillance at Romania's external borders, which will of course act as the external borders of the EU. Those are substantive commitments set out in some detail.I have no doubt that the Commission will return to an examination of those commitments when it draws up its own monitoring surveillance report—I forget the formal title—in spring next year.

I am grateful to the Minister for his confirmation that, if the Commission recommends a further 12-month delay because of any failure to implement those annexes, which I think are a legally binding part of the accession treaty alluded to in clause 1, the Government will accept that as necessary. In common with previous speakers in the Committee, I ask what will happen if, after that 12-month period, Bulgaria and Romania have failed to implement the requirements to tackle corruption, ensure a secure external EU border, reform the judiciary and implement the necessary legislation to root out malpractice in the criminal justice system? What could we possibly do? The Minister referred to a period of three years during which the EU would be able to take some exceptional safeguard measures, but I should be grateful for any further detail he can provide about how they would operate during that crucial period, after which, I take it, there would be almost no meaningful leverage over the domestic reform process.

Kelvin Hopkins: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Europe referred to privatisation and his opposite number on the Conservative Front Bench, the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) talked about corruption. I want to bring the two subjects together.

In other accessions to the European Union, we have seen rushed privatisation and a degree of corruption. In Hungary, for example, the leader of the alleged Socialist party made a personal fortune from privatisation. His party is now so keen on privatisation, so right-wing and so free market, it is no longer a socialist party in any sense. Indeed, the New Statesman cast a slur on the character of Baroness Thatcher by suggesting that, if she were Hungarian, she would vote for the Socialist party. That is unfair, because it is not at all a nice party. It is significant, however, that the Hungarian opposition party, which is Catholic-based, conservative and anti-communist, resists the privatisation of public services, and has become the party of the left.

The Catholic collectivism that was typical of Christian Democrats in Europe is being broken down by a rush to neo-liberalism and the free market. That is where the real division is occurring, significantly in Germany where Angela Merkel is trying to move away from Catholic collectivism and towards the market. That causes tension in Germany, even in her party.

I look forward to Bulgaria and Romania becoming members of the EU. Neo-liberalism and the free market should not be conditions of their membership. One reason I am so keen on enlargement is that it would inevitably mean a much looser association of member states, where each country could determine its own economic policy according to its democratic choices. That is the Europe I want and I think one or two Opposition Members want that, too. They may choose to take a much more conservative approach to running economies. I might choose a more social democratic or democratic socialist approach, but we would have that democratic choice; it would not be determined by the EU.

Mr. Cash: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I have attempted to put those arguments on a number of occasions. Does he agree that it would be better to try to reform the system before it implodes with possibly extremely dangerous consequences for democracy throughout Europe? We can draw on the example of what happened in France recently, which some of us predicted, as an indication of the creation of a compression chamber that simply does not work.

Kelvin Hopkins: I have some sympathy with what the hon. Gentleman says. In Hungary, the economy is doing well in some senses, but poverty—certainly relative poverty—has increased. It is said that some people were better off under communism. If the market leads to poverty and to a serious division between rich and poor in those countries, people will say such things.

Mr. David: Does my hon. Friend accept that the idea of a market economy is fundamental to the whole concept of the European Union?

Kelvin Hopkins: We have lived in a market economy since the second world war, but the extent of the state's role in the economy and the degree of public or private ownership is for each country to choose. Since the second world war, we have had a mixed economy, which worked extremely well in the first three decades. I advocate that approach to running our economy even now. It certainly worked better than what has happened since. In many areas of Europe, public utilities and services are still run in a traditional, social democratic, post-war way and they work extremely well. I would argue that case for the UK as well as for Europe.

In Russia, after the collapse of communism, there was a rush to privatisation and at the same time the adoption of a hard rouble policy, which caused economic chaos. There was a serious reduction of output and living standards fell. Only when the rouble was floated and the process slowed down did the Russian economy begin to recover.

Each country should be able to choose the exchange rate appropriate to its economic needs. One reason why I support the Chancellor so strongly in keeping us out of the euro is that we can choose the exchange rate suited to our needs. Exchange rates are essential springs and buffers between economies. They are necessary; they can be stable, there can be a pegged system, but they should be changeable. That is how we should operate with the new member states. They should not be encouraged to join the euro. While they are weaker, they should be able to decide what is best for their economies—choosing their own exchange rates, interest rates and fiscal balance between tax and spend.

Bulgaria and Romania should be allowed to decide what is best for their economies and not be told how to run them from outside by the EU. That may lead to problems and voices may call for a return to the old authoritarian system, although that would not be the wish of the democrats in the EU. The EU should not press strongly that those economies operate in a particular way; it should allow them to operate as is best in each case. We should open our markets to some of their goods and allow them to depreciate their currency if that would make them more competitive. We should urge them to adopt proper rules for their workers, such as good trade union standards and employment rights, so that workers have a proper share of the benefits of their developing economies, but we should not insist that they privatise their economies.

Recently, I visited Austria and Hungary with the Rail Freight Group to look at rail freight facilities. In Hungary, we spoke to senior figures in the Government and the railway industry about rail freight. The bulk of the rail freight system is still publicly owned and it is doing well. It makes a profit and provides the Government with funds that help the Hungarian people. There is a small private sector that is losing money but there is still pressure to privatise. If the Hungarian rail freight system was privatised and bought up, perhaps by a Russian oligarch with plenty of spare cash, the profits would not go to the Hungarian people. It could go towards buying expensive football clubs in Britain—who knows? At present, the benefits of that publicly owned freight system go to the Hungarian people. That is what we should allow those countries to do, not force them to privatise.

Mr. Clegg: The hon. Gentleman makes an articulate case for his allegation that the terms of accession impose a neo-liberal economic philosophy on countries that join. He will be aware that, for other critics of the EU, many of whom can be found on the Conservative Benches, there is not enough imposition of neo-liberal economics. For them, the EU is a hotbed of over-regulated, social democratic, wishy-washy economic mismanagement. Does he accept that both allegations cannot be right and that it is conceivable that both are equally wrong?

[Mr. Clegg]

Kelvin Hopkins: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. There is a serious debate both in the EU as a whole and in its member states. I hope that I am participating in that debate and making a strong point for the social democratic systems that worked so well after the second world war, which are being systematically dismantled. That is a great mistake. Opposition Members may choose a neo-liberal approach. We might choose a social democratic approach, but we should be able to choose democratically in our own countries. We should not be told, or even advised, by the bureaucracy of the EU to operate in a particular way.

I finish by referring to corruption, which seems to be almost endemic in the EU. The European Court of Auditors has failed to approve the EU's accounts for 10 or 11 years running. The European aid system is inefficient and corrupt and the aid does not go to the right places. The Department for International Development does a much better job, and we have made that point many times as well. The EU must look hard to itself if we want to stop corruption developing or even getting worse in countries such as Romania and Bulgaria, which are much weaker.

1.30 pm

It is significant that corruption in the poorer world is almost endemic. It is only when countries become relatively egalitarian and rich that corruption can be addressed seriously. However, we have those things in western European countries, and we still have corruption, so there is a problem. The best way to avoid corruption is when countries have to look after their own economies. If they are spending someone else's money, they will be much more casual about how they spend it and what they do with it.

I urge the House to support the entry of Bulgaria and Romanian into the EU, but we should allow them to develop their economies as they see fit—subject, of course, to proper human rights, as my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman) said, and employment rights, environmental conditions and all those other things that are beneficial to the whole world. However, we should allow them to run their own economies, not force them into a particular mould.

Mr. Cash: I am very glad to follow the hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins), partly because we have tracked each other's thoughts on these subjects for the best part of 10 years or so, but also because this is a critical time at which to consider the accession of new countries. I have repeatedly stated that I am in favour of enlargement, but I have asked as a rider to that argument what kind of Europe we want and what kind of Europe we should have. The problem is exacerbated or illustrated by, for example, what has been going on in France and the Netherlands. The rejection of the referendums in those two countries illustrates the political divorce that has emerged between the people and the elites, whether in individual countries or the EU as a whole.

I told my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) that I thought an element of cloud cuckoo land was apparent. I was referring not specifically to what he was saying, but to the inability of Opposition or Government Front-Benchers to grapple with the vacuum that has emerged between the realities of what is going on in Europe and the aspirations that, for example, are contained in the European constitution. We are still waiting for the Government to announce what they will do having secured the Second Reading of the European Union Bill, which dealt with the constitution. [Interruption.] I do not know what the Minister is chuntering about—perhaps he would like to intervene.

Mr. Douglas Alexander: I was just observing to my colleague the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham), that the words "Bulgaria" and "Romania" had not yet been uttered by the hon. Gentleman and was pointing out the fact that we have debated the Bill on Second Reading, when hon. Members had the opportunity to range widely in their remarks.

Mr. Cash: I regard that as a pretty irrelevant comment. The nature and form of the EU will be affected by these accession arrangements. For example, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development says that the current gross domestic product per capita of the 25 member states is $21,800. That figure happens to be half that of Norway and Switzerland, and it will inevitably decrease when Bulgaria and Romania join. The important point is that we have a regressive, declining EU economy, which will be made worse by bringing in countries that will inevitably drag that figure further down. We could avoid a lot of those difficulties if we were to have a different kind of Europe.

The kind of Europe that I should like would be based on associate status, along the lines of the European Free Trade Association. Some adjustment may be needed, but that is basically the direction in which we should be going. Indeed, a recent ICM poll showed that, when the people of this country were asked what kind of EU they wanted—whether they wanted one as it stands now, or one with associate status along EFTA lines—60 per cent. of all those asked and 68 per cent. of 18 to 24-year-olds said that they wanted the latter. So there is a political problem for the Government.

Mr. Bone: I understand that the Prime Minister stated that enlargement could not take place without a European constitution, so I wonder whether he is beginning to agree with my hon. Friend that we must consider a different form of Europe?

Mr. Cash: Indeed. The Prime Minister's speech to the European Parliament and his and the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speeches on the reform of the EU—all of which will have an impact on Bulgaria and Romania, let alone the other countries in eastern and central Europe and elsewhere—combine to illustrate the fact that, struggling against the elite of Europe, there are apparently glimmerings of Euroscepticism in the future Prime Minister, by which I mean, in immediate terms, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Everyone knows that that change will happen in the next 18 months, and anyone who has read the books of people such as Robert Peston and others who provide well sourced, intelligent analyses of what is going on know what elements are involved.

I refer, for example, to the Treasury pamphlet that the Chancellor of Exchequer produced the other day in which he clearly repudiated even the social model for Europe. I should be interested to know whether or not the Minister was party to that pamphlet, which amounted to a repudiation of the existing European economic model. The Chancellor called for more global markets and more competitiveness. He illustrated his concern that the Lisbon agenda was not functioning properly.

Mr. Clegg: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that a man whom I doubt is close to his affections—Jacques Delors, the former President of the European Commission—has also stated on record on a number of occasions his own doubts about the pursuit of an over-integrated EU social model in terms with which the hon. Gentleman would agree? Does he not agree that his stereotype of what it is to be sceptical or pro-European is wildly out of date, when fervent pro-Europeans such as Jacques Delors agree with him, at least in part, on something as crucial as social policy?

Mr. Cash: I am extremely glad that that is taking place. It certainly was not when I met Mr. Delors in the 1980s, since when things have changed significantly and, I am glad to say, in the right direction. Indeed, my point about the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister shows that the glimmerings of realism are coming into the picture. The hon. Gentleman may not know that I was brought up in Hallam. I spent my early childhood there. My parents still live there.

Kelvin Hopkins: Do they vote Liberal Democrat?

Mr. Cash: They certainly do not vote Liberal Democrat.

The Prime Minister himself said in February 2000 that Britain could, of course, survive outside the EU and that we could probably access the single market as Norway and Switzerland do, but think of the changes that have taken place since then. I have strongly urged my party to be realistic about getting reforms under way—whether that is while we are in opposition or, hopefully, when we are in government—before the compression chamber that is being created implodes.

The application of the Maastricht surveillance criteria is about as deadly, boring and tedious a subject as one can possibly imagine, but I was glancing at a book in the Library last night about the impact of EUROSTAT case law. I suspect that no one has the faintest idea that such a book is there to be read, even if they had the time or inclination to do so. However, the application has an extremely serious impact on the way in which the criteria for each member states are collated by the European Union through EUROSTAT. That is the basis on which economic forecasting is made and economic criteria are judged for member states, including—under the Bill—accession states such as Bulgaria and Romania.

It might surprise some hon. Members that Hungary, which has been brought into the loop of member states only recently, is being pursued under the terms of the avowedly failed stability and growth pact. I opposed the pact vigorously when my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) was Chancellor of the Exchequer and exchanged strong correspondence with him about it. He wrote to all Members of Parliament to say what a wonderful deal it was, and I wrote to all Conservative Members to tell them not to vote for it because it was going to be a disaster. It was an accident waiting to happen—sure enough, it did.

Due to the failed stability and growth pact, it is suggested that action by Hungary under the excessive deficit procedure is inadequate. The country is being told that it is simply not complying with the rules. The Commission states that in September 2005, the Hungarian authorities submitted a revised excessive deficit procedure notification to announce that it had a 2005 deficit of 6.1 per cent. of GDP instead of the targeted 3.6 per cent.—that is double.

Kelvin Hopkins: I am interested in what the hon. Gentleman is saying. Does he agree that forcing countries with high unemployment to tighten fiscal policy and deflate their economies further is indeed stupid, as Signor Prodi has said?

Mr. Cash: I would go further—I cite the idea that such countries should be fined, although countries that are not members of the eurozone do not suffer a fine. Look at the situation regarding Italy, for example. The stability and growth pact is such an enormous failure because it is simply unrealistic. It does not work, and the remedies that are applied to ensure that there can somehow be compliance with the rules impose further penalties on countries, which makes it even less likely that they can achieve their objectives.

I differ from the view expressed by the hon. Gentleman about the importance of human rights legislation. Just before I came into the Chamber, I was taking evidence from a distinguished European lawyer about the charter of fundamental rights. It might be news to several hon. Members in the Chamber that the charter is alive and kicking. It did not go down with the constitution—I can say that unequivocally. Although it appeared to have done so, it did not in practice. The European Court of Justice itself is applying the criteria of the charter, so that will be of direct relevance to countries such as Bulgaria and Romania, especially given the problems to which the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman) referred in her important remarks. For example, there is the problem of the Roma.

1.45 pm

The promotion of employment law, the right to work and a raft of social measures are part of the charter of fundamental rights. A communication from the European Commission has announced that all legislation initiated by the Commission—in other words all European legislation initiated—must henceforth be compliant with the charter of fundamental rights. As the Commission is able to do that due to its right of initiation under the existing treaties, nothing can stop the charter from being brought in piecemeal through every piece of legislation that is initiated.

[Mr. Cash]

The communication will be debated in a European Standing Committee in January—thanks to myself and one or two other members of the European Scrutiny Committee—and much good may it do us. However, as the Minister knows only too well, there is no mechanism for ensuring that a vote in such Committees is effective against further orders passed by the House.

The economies of Europe are failing within the framework of the European Union because of the mistakes that were made over the Maastricht criteria, the mistakes that were made with the working time directive and the mistakes that were made in a whole raft of social legislation. However, we find that the charter of fundamental rights will itself be brought into our legislation through section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972. It will be enforced by our courts and by the European Court of Justice. The Bulgarians and the Romanians will find that the problems with their economies, which have already been explained by the Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West, will be exacerbated because measures such as the charter of fundamental rights will have an adverse impact on the way in which they are run. It is a Catch-22 situation.

The problem is that the economies of Europe, whether that is the economy of Europe as a whole, or the economies of individual member states—and of Bulgaria and Romania in particular—are all in disarray, which is creating low growth and high unemployment. That was the root cause of the reason why the French and the Dutch rejected the constitution. People said, "Oh, that was because the French didn't like Chirac," but they did not like Chirac because the economy was not working, and the economy was not working because of these crazy rules, all of which are based on an ideology that does not work—it does not work for the developing world, either.

Members of the European Scrutiny Committee had the pleasure of meeting a delegation of Members of Parliament from the Czech Republic the other day. By the way, they were not, with one exception, from the right of that country's political spectrum. They were social democrats. I shall not mention their names because that would be unreasonable. They said that they had been enthusiastic about entry to the EU, probably, one must say, because they knew that they would get a lot of money out of it, as well as stability and improved relationships with other countries to address the vacuum in central and eastern Europe on matters of defence and foreign policy. However, they said that their enthusiasm was becoming significantly reduced. What they had anticipated is not what is happening. They criticised the regulation and interference of European legislation and said that before joining the EU, the Czech Republic had been self-sufficient in agricultural products, but owing to European regulations, it is now a net importer. The sugar beet market had been badly hit by the imposition of EU regulations, and unemployment is coming out of that. That is all because of crazy European rules, which are doing devastating damage to countries that have just come into the EU.

Kelvin Hopkins: Does not the hon. Gentleman make the case for each country to determine its own agricultural policy rather than being forced to accept a policy that applies across the EU?

Mr. Cash: Absolutely, and I should not have to stand here making an obvious case. I would love the Minister to explain to us what on earth the Foreign Secretary and, more particularly, the Prime Minister think they are doing by creating all the ingredients for the collapse and implosion of the EU.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. That would have to be done within the context of clause 1 stand part, which might be difficult. I think that the hon. Gentleman should confine his remarks to that.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cash: I thought that might produce an enthusiastic response from Labour Members.

The reality is that the Czechs are suffering. The same can be said of other member states that are affected by the way in which the EU has been going.

Mr. Bone: Is my hon. Friend aware that in a survey commissioned by the delegation of the European Commission in Romania, 56 per cent. of Romanians believed that accession would bring more drawbacks than advantages in the short term?

Mr. Cash: I am glad that my hon. Friend has done that research. Again, that is the realistic position. The debate is clearly about Bulgaria and Romania in particular, but when talking about the EU, we cannot dissociate the problems of individual member states from the impact it has on the whole. If they have to come in on terms that simply will not work for them, the case for reform is crystal clear. As I said, the Czechs have discovered serious drawbacks to the system. The same goes, therefore, for the prospects of those from Bulgaria and Romania.

We also discussed corruption in the judicial process and so on, and there are serious and critical problems at every point on the compass. In a report in The Times today, we even find, from an announcement by the Commission yesterday, which has not yet come before the European Scrutiny Committee, that nine areas of criminal law are to be brought into line to co-ordinate criminal law throughout Europe. Again, that is all part of the accession process. Are accession countries aware of what they are letting themselves in for?

It is not negative and anti-European to be pro-democratic. The problem is that there is a complete and total refusal by the Government, the Minister and the Prime Minister to be realistic about what is going on. The simplest answer would be to have a thorough examination of existing treaties, as conducted by the European reform forum. Today we had evidence from Liberty and Justice. We have heard from Lord David Owen, and Lord Dahrendorf will also give evidence.

The forum is examining existing treaties with a view to highlighting the problems in which Bulgaria and Romania will find themselves. I make no apology for using this opportunity to get across to the House, through Hansard, the importance of having effective and serious reform. Otherwise, there will be withdrawal from the EU sooner or later. If we continue to pursue such policies, an implosion is on its way. The Prime Minister knows that because of the failure of the Lisbon agenda, his presidency and the French and Dutch referendums. Those failures are indicative of what is to come, and the warnings have been given. It is up to those in government to listen. If they do not, when Europe dissolves into greater difficulties, and perhaps even chaos, with movements to the far right on the back of instability and racial tension, the responsibility will lie with the Government, their Ministers and the European Union.

Mr. David: This has developed into an interesting and broad debate. I hope that the House will forgive me if I try to bring things back to Bill and the clause in particular. I shall also keep my comments brief.

I have visited Bulgaria regularly for a number of years and have seen at first hand the remarkable progress there. There is genuine political consensus and, I believe, a feeling throughout the country that joining the EU is essentially desirable because it will enhance the economy and reinforce Bulgaria's democratic development.

Successful negotiations have led to the treaty that we are considering. The European Commission has conducted various reports. Recently, however, it concluded that there are serious shortcomings in Bulgaria and that problems need to be addressed rapidly and firmly before it is adjudged ready to join the EU. The comprehensive monitoring report set out clearly and starkly both what progress has been made and what needs to be done. We are waiting for the final recommendation of the European Commission to the Council in April or May next year.

Among the concerns expressed by the European Commission about Bulgaria are the large number of uninsured vehicles, shortcomings in the veterinary sector, and the need to reinforce the administrative structures, in particular with a view to administering European agricultural and structural funds effectively. Concerns have been expressed about the criminal justice system and, as has been mentioned, how the Roma minority are treated.

Some of those issues were discussed yesterday in the European Scrutiny Committee. The Bulgarian ambassador took part in that discussion. He went to great lengths to reassure us that the concerns were being taken seriously and were being addressed effectively. It is worth reinforcing that great strides have been made in Bulgaria. The country is now a true democracy. Democratic reforms are firm and, in my view, irrevocable. Most of the European acquis communautaire has been implemented in Bulgarian law. Economic growth is consistent. In 2004, for example, the rate was 5.6 per cent. It undoubtedly has a functioning market economy, as the European Commission concluded.

In fairness, however, it is true to say that over the past few years there was a decline in the momentum towards reform, but since the election of a new Government in June this year, the reform process has gained momentum. A new penal code has been introduced, and there cannot be any doubt that there is a strong political commitment to ensure that the remaining reforms are implemented effectively and speedily.

2 pm

The European Commission should give an objective analysis of what is happening in Bulgaria. It is important, both for the interests of both Bulgaria and the EU, that the Commission make a firm assessment. However, there is danger of being too insistent that all the i's are dotted and all the t's are crossed so that things are meticulously in place before Bulgaria can join the EU. In the last wave of accession, a number of countries expressed concern about Slovakia's preparedness to join the EU, given that other accession states had made advances. Nevertheless, the benefit of the doubt was given to Slovakia, and since it joined the EU, it has made remarkable progress. Arguably, it has done so quicker than any other country that joined at the time.

We should look fairly and objectively at what is happening in Bulgaria, but we must also look at the way in which things are changing before we determine whether a one-year delay would be detrimental to progress in that country or would enhance it. We should be firm but fair. As well as looking at what is happening in Bulgaria and Romania, we must always keep at the back of our mind the centrality of the process of enlargement to Europe's development. A vision of the EU is developing not as a union of elitist or exclusive nation states but as an expanding union always seeking to embrace more countries. That is a positive process.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman is right that there is move away from elitism, but does he not accept that the problem will not be resolved without radical reform of the system? However, when reforms are proposed, particularly on the acquis communautaire, nothing happens.

Mr. David: It is important to acknowledge that reforms are under way in the EU. Reforms introduced by the Government both before and during their presidency have struck a chord with many EU states, particularly central European countries that have recently joined. There is an increasing acceptance that what we want is not a highly integrated centralised state but a loose association of sovereign countries that pool their interests from time to time.

Mr. Bone: I am pleased to hear what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but does he not agree that the EU and states party to the North American Free Trade Agreement should join together to create a transatlantic free trade area?

Mr. David: I said at the outset that this is an extremely broad debate, but extending it to north America takes it a little too far, so I shall resist the temptation to comment on the hon. Gentleman's suggestion.

To return to the central point that I was making in response to the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash), it is important that we recognise that enlargement is a positive process that reinforces the well-established trend of the EU continuing to develop as a loose association of sovereign countries that decide to pool their sovereignty from time to time in their mutual interest. That is the best definition that I can give off the top of my head of what the EU is developing into, and I believe that enlargement will reinforce that development.

[Mr. David]

In conclusion, having visited Bulgaria on many occasions over a number of years, it is my impression that most Bulgarian people take that view. They do not want a giant, centralised European Union that will rob them of their national identity, but they do want to be part of a progressive, forward-looking EU that gives them security both politically and in broader defence issues. That is extremely positive, and it is why I trust that in the near future—hopefully, in January 2007—both Romania and Bulgaria will meet the terms of entry and become full members of the European Union.

Mr. Dodds: I, too, intend to be brief. In general, I welcome the enlargement of the European Union, because it will help it to become the loose association to which the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) referred, and diminish the centralised, unified approach that has characterised it thus far. The Bill is therefore welcome.

It is important to remember how far countries in the former Soviet sphere of influence have come. Slovakia, the Czech Republic, Poland and parts of the former Soviet Union are now members of the EU, and are party to discussions about the accession of Romania and Bulgaria. That demonstrates how far they have come in recent years, as the Minister said. We welcome that progress, but we accept that there is still much more work to be done in those countries. Leverage can be exerted to reinforce human rights, tackle corruption and improve the judicial process, particularly in Bulgaria and Romania, both in the coming period and for a short time following accession. After that, however, the pressure that can be brought to bear will dissipate rapidly, so a signal should be sent to Romania and Bulgaria that accession is not an automatic process. Genuine progress must be made in a number of areas.

I should like to focus on human rights, the judicial process and the rule of law in Romania. I sympathise greatly with the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman), who spoke forcefully about her constituent's family. I trust that everything will be done to assist her in her efforts to achieve justice. A church in my constituency that helped to run an orphanage in Romania approached me because it was concerned about child trafficking—an issue raised earlier in our short debate—and the way in which the Romanian authorities can interfere arbitrarily in children's welfare. Laws on adoption, for instance, are loosely applied. The church has expressed genuine concern about children's welfare and the attitude of the Romanian state towards the subject. In the coming period when, as I said, leverage can be applied, I urge the Minister and the Government to do everything in their power to ensure that such matters are progressed, particularly in relation to human rights and the rule of law. It should not be a question of turning a blind eye to some of these issues for the greater good. We should make Romania and Bulgaria, particularly the Romanian authorities, live up to their responsibilities as part of a wider Europe.

Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con) rose—

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. May I say to the hon. Gentleman and any other hon. Members who are unsure that the best way of catching the eye of the Chairman is to rise promptly in one's place?

Mr. Hands: Thank you very much, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall be—

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry, but we have to make a second correction at this point. When the House is in Committee, the forms of address are "Mr. Chairman" or "Sir Alan".

Mr. Hands: Thank you, Sir Alan, for correcting me and helping me.

I shall be brief, as I spoke at some length on Second Reading. We should not underestimate the importance of the accession treaty. Although we are dealing with only two countries this year, whereas last year we were dealing with the accession of 10 nations to the EU, there are some important strategic objectives and changes that need to be borne in mind.For the first time, the EU will reach to the Black sea, and Greece will be connected to the rest of the EU. Romania will have the seventh largest population in the EU, after Spain, Poland and the big four. This is a significant enlargement, not just a tidying-up exercise.

I agree with other speakers about the changes that have taken place in Bulgaria and Romania over the past 20 years. I first travelled to those countries in the late 1980s as a student. The changes since then, in the space of one generation, are incredibly dramatic and could serve as a model for many other countries seeking to introduce free market economies, democratic systems and so on. It was the Conservatives under Margaret Thatcher who first outlined in the Chamber the possible accession of these two countries. The first mention of the possibility of Bulgarian and Romanian accession to the European Union came on 31 January 1990 in a speech made by the then hon. Member for Warwickshire, North, now my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude), who said that he was looking forward to seeing various countries join the EU, including Bulgaria and Romania. Accession and enlargement have long been on the Conservative agenda.

I shall outline some of the problems that we need to bear in mind with the accession. Bulgaria and Romania are not necessarily perfect candidates, but I am not sure that three or four years back, Poland and others were perfect candidates. The first problem is corruption, about which other hon. Members have spoken. It is a problem in Bulgaria more than in Romania. The second is organised crime, mafia-style crime problems and assassinations. Only about four weeks ago in Bulgaria, one of the country's most senior bankers was assassinated. Significant improvements still need to be made on environmental matters in towns such as Ruse and in areas of Transylvania.

There are problems in relation to minorities—the Hungarian community and the Vlach community in Romania, and the Turkish community and Roma community in both countries. Finally, drug and people trafficking will probably always be a problem in those countries, partly due to their geography, as they are situated at the entry point to Europe. Practically every new trafficking problem has come through the Bosphorus and up into Europe over the past century.

I broadly welcome the Bill. It is important to view it as significant in its own right, not just as a tidying-up exercise. We should congratulate Romania and Bulgaria on their accession. We need to keep an eye on the problems that I and others identified on Second Reading and in Committee, but we should warmly welcome the Bill nevertheless.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 1 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT FOR WORKERS

2.15 pm

Mr. Brady: I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 1, line 16, at end insert—

'(1A) The Secretary of State shall lay before Parliament a report no later than four months before the date of accession on the Government's assessment of the effect the free movement of workers from the acceding States will have.

(1B) The Secretary of State shall lay before Parliament a report every six months on the effect of any regulations made on the free movement of workers under this section until the end of the seven year transitional period.'.

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Amendment No. 2, in page 2, line 18, leave out 'or transitional'.

Amendment No. 1, in page 2, line 18, after 'supplementary', insert 'and'.

Clause stand part.

Mr. Brady: As we come to consider the part of the Bill dealing with the free movement of workers, one of the unintended aspects of free movement of workers applies to the Conservative Benches: my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), who was to have dealt with the amendment, has to be in another Committee shortly, so I am moving into her shoes—an unwise thought, perhaps.

Clause 2 and the amendment tabled by the Opposition Front-Bench team, No. 9, relate to an important aspect of the Bill and some of the implications of membership. It is particularly important because of the recent history of the accession of new member states to the EU. Clause 2 represents a welcome acceptance by the Government that their projections of the consequences of the free movement of workers from the accession countries last year were wrong by a significant factor. Whereas they suggested that only a few thousand workers would come to the UK following accession, some 277,000 workers have come under the registration scheme. I accept that that process has gone smoothly and there have been no particular difficulties.

It is interesting that the Government none the less saw the importance of putting the measures in place in clause 2. As was alluded to by a number of hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) and Opposition Members, the two accession countries that we are considering today are quite different from many of those that came into the EU last year. The difference in economic strength is much more profound. The provisions that the Government are putting in place and the powers they are seeking to take to control the free movement of workers in that context are wise. It is inevitably possible that, given the marked difference in income between Romania and Bulgaria and the existing member states, especially some of the wealthier member states such as the United Kingdom, there could be significant pressure of migration. It is sensible that the Government should take a precautionary approach regarding the free movement of workers.

That is particularly important in view of the geographical perspective provided by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Hands), relating to the routes into Europe that the new accession countries constitute both for people trafficking and for the drugs trade. Bulgaria is known to be a major transit country for illegal drugs, as well as a producer country. It is important and appropriate that the measures should be taken.

The Government have, however, not yet enlightened the Committee about the outcome of their assessment or analysis, whether they anticipate using the powers in clause 2, and whether they envisage instituting any major control for a transitional period, making use of the available derogations to prevent significant unforeseen movement of people into the United Kingdom. That is why my hon. Friends and I have tabled amendment No. 9, which seeks to introduce some transparency to the process. It would require the Government to lay before Parliament no later than four months before the date of accession a report on the Government's assessment of the effect of the free movement of workers from the acceding states, and it would also require subsequent reports on the actual effect of such movements of workers.

As I have said, given the marked difference between the predictions about the previous 10 accession countries and the actual number of migrants who have come to the United Kingdom, it seems important and appropriate that the Government should publish a frank and detailed assessment of what they anticipate will happen and provide this House with regular, detailed updates as the accessions move forwards.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North) (Lab): The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) has rightly described clause 2 as the provision that will regulate the migration of workers from Romania and Bulgaria to the United Kingdom.

Many negative things have been said about migration. One does not need to look very far in the tabloid newspapers to see migrants being made the butt of nationalism, jingoism and, from time to time, racism. That is not peculiar to the United Kingdom, although our tabloids might be a little bit more energetic than others in generating public heat on the issue. From time to time, political parties are tempted to crawl down that path. We saw that at the recent general election, when more than one political party referred to immigration—they probably regret having done so.

When my right hon. Friend the Minister for Europe interprets clause 2, he should consider "provision" in a positive context. The tabloids, to which I have already referred, say that immigration sometimes has to happen and that it is generally negative because we do not want to change our way of life. I do not know what our way of life is in the United Kingdom, and I do not exactly know what our way of life is in Europe. Our way of life is internationalised and we operate in a global world. The movement of people is one of the key features of a global economy and an internationalised society, which is not something new—if one reads biblical history, there were lots of movements of people in the period before Christ. If one considers the history of the United States and Canada in the 19th century in particular, there were massive movements of people. From time to time, people have moved into EU countries. In the 1960s, Turkish immigrants into Germany specifically serviced the up-and-coming light engineering industries. In this country, especially in the 1950s and 1960s, we experienced waves of immigration from the Caribbean and elsewhere, again to meet our particular labour needs.

[Mr. Doug Henderson]

We live in a different world in which the migration of people is not an exception—it is the norm—and people will continue to move more and more. In this country, highly skilled people who are looking for a better opportunity might go to work elsewhere in the EU or the United States. Why should we be different from people from developing countries or people from countries that used to be part of the Soviet Union and that have acceded or will accede to the EU?

I suspect that we will see ever-increasing migration. It used to be said that the catering industry in London was full of people from all around the world, and particularly from some of the eastern European countries, but that is now true throughout the whole of the United Kingdom. In Scotland and the north-east of England, where I travel fairly regularly, many eastern European people are working in the catering industry.

In what I call the direct works industry—house maintenance and, to some extent, house building—there is an ever-increasing need to use skilled labour from eastern European countries. An arm's length management organisation runs council housing in Newcastle, and a programme has been agreed between the local authority, which sadly we do not control any more, and central Government.

Sir Menzies Campbell: Why is that?

Mr. Henderson: My right hon. and learned Friend and I agree on many things, but not on that.

The ALMO cannot meet the targets laid down by central Government because of a shortage of labour. We still have some unemployment on Tyneside, although it is less than half what it was in 1997, but we do not have an adequate supply of skilled labour or people who are prepared to train to take up those skills. In the case of the ALMO in Newcastle, we need to train local people as best we can, but we should not be embarrassed if we fail to train sufficient numbers and must look elsewhere to find skilled labour. We can all provide examples from our constituencies of that pattern, which arises across Europe. Germany is now a honey pot for immigrants from a much wider area than Turkey, and the Scandinavian countries and Ireland now contain a large proportion of immigrants, who are meeting vital labour shortages.

When I ask the Government to be positive in their interpretation of clause 2, my central point is that migration has changed the nature of our economy in the same way as Mexican migrants have changed the American economy. When I studied economics a very long time ago, we referred to overheating in the south and the lack of heat in the north—the main reason why we had to adopt deflationary policies was that the south overheated when the necessary labour was not available. Labour demand shot up wage rates, which had a detrimental effect on the whole economy.

Migration has enabled a number of countries, including our own, Scandinavian countries and Ireland, to maintain a high level of aggregate demand and to continue to have growth without having wage inflation. Jobs have been filled by people from other parts of Europe, particularly. That is the same pattern throughout the developed world. In that context, migration has been a positive factor in the UK economy. It has not been a negative factor for those who have been left, for instance, in Moldova, Romania or Bulgaria. People working here have been remitting funds to their own countries. That has helped to raise living standards in those countries. Statistics show that more than 40 per cent. of Moldova's GNP is the result of remittances from countries in the EU. That is positive for everyone.

Mr. Bone: The hon. Gentleman advances a good argument. Does he agree that some of the most skilled people who have been leaving Romania and Bulgaria and coming to this country have done so to the detriment of those economies? That slightly concerns me.

2.30 pm

Mr. Henderson: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. I would not deny that in the short term. However, there is the relationship between Ireland and the United States. It could be said that 15 or 20 years ago the immigration of skilled technicians in the IT industry and in other industries to the United States denuded the Irish economy of key workers. Once those people have enjoyed some life in the United States and perhaps picked up other skills, many of their skills have returned to Ireland. For example, some of my wife's family have returned from making their money, so to speak, in the United States. They have come back to Ireland, where they continue to run businesses and so on. The same has happened to some extent already in Poland. Some people have returned to Poland who perhaps have been within the EU for some while. An optimistic prospect is that the same will happen in Romania and Bulgaria.

I do not want to pretend that it is all easy—all sun and light. It is not. Problems arise from international migration. The main benefit is the countering of wage inflation in the developed world. In our case, we should spend more resources on raising the levels of education of those immigrants who come to our nation. They do not all have the skilled to which I have been referring. Some lack skills, and they need to be skilled by us. They need to learn more about our way of life.

It is impossible ever to prevent people who move from one part of the world to another from staying in close proximity to the people and the culture that they know, and to the friends that they have. People will do that. The Scots, the Geordies and the Irish do that wherever they go in the world, and so will people from Romania, Bulgaria and elsewhere. However, it is vital that they begin to understand the way of life in this country. That is not the way of life that might have been stereotyped in the 1950s. There is a different way of life in Britain in the first decade of the 21st century. People who come to our country have to learn that way of life and help to contribute to change that way of life by the next decade.

I strongly support the Bill. I anticipate that the Government will be able to accommodate the general points made by the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West. We all want to know what is happening and we all need a statistical basis. Please let us interpret clause 2 in a generous and enlightened way. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will tell us that he intends to do so when he replies.

Mr. Bone: I agree with much of what the hon. Gentleman said. I hope that all Members will be concerned about one part of the free movement of labour, and that is the dreadful problem of human trafficking, particularly of young women for the sex trade. I am concerned that there is nothing in the Bill that deals with that issue. I am worried that free movement will make it easier for the degenerates who bring young women into this country for the sex trade.

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): The Bill sets out the necessary legislation for the freedom of movement of workers from Romania and Bulgaria. Hand in hand with the Bill, we need to examine carefully what happens when migrant workers come to this country from new EU member states. Many of these workers are enticed here by promises of terms and conditions that sound better in theory than they do in reality. We need particularly to tighten up on the use of zero-hours contracts by agencies, which mean that workers who come here to take up full-time posts can find that sometimes they have so few hours of work in a week that they do not earn enough in that week to pay their rent. We need to improve agency regulation to eliminate sharp practices and ensure a level playing field between agencies that abide by the rules and those who ruthlessly exploit workers. We need to ensure that the increasing use of migrant labour does not undercut our workers and depress wage levels.

We also need a better transfer of information between all EU member states about dangerous offenders to avoid a repeat of a dreadful incident in which a nasty sexual attack was carried out by a man who had come from eastern Europe to work in my locality. Only afterwards did it became clear that he was a known offender with a previous conviction for rape in his own country. I was horrified to discover from the local chief inspector of police that there is no transfer of information about sex offenders from original or from new EU countries. We must develop a proper unified system of notification of such offenders across the whole of the EU to reassure and protect local people.

I welcome these new opportunities for migrant workers from Bulgaria and Romania, but we must ensure that we can be proud, not ashamed, of their working conditions.

Mr. Hands: I want to speak in favour of the amendment.

I am in favour of migration in general. My constituency might have more migrants from the 10 countries that acceded last year than any other. We have a vibrant Polish community and we are home to the excellent Polish cultural centre.

Both parts of the amendment are extremely sensible. The first part would ensure that an assessment takes place no later than four months before the accession. That is not fundamentally different from what happened last year, when the Home Office announced the worker registration scheme on 23 February 2004, in advance of accession. In other words, an assessment was, rightly, made at that time, and the rules were changed slightly. It would be sensible to make an assessment four months in advance to judge what the effects are likely to be based on how the previous accession has gone, and so on.

The second part of the amendment would ensure proper parliamentary scrutiny of the system. That does not mean that we should review the two countries' membership of the European Union but that we should review worker registration from those two countries over a period of seven years. That is an eminently sensible provision. If we are to have the worker registration scheme, it is sensible to use the data that arise from it to see whether it is working properly. Last year, the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart), said:

> "The purpose of the scheme is to allow us to track properly our commitment. It will give good information to the authorities and the Home Office about how, in practice, the right to work of people from accession countries is operating."

She went on:

> "We have a good pattern of what is happening, and if, against all expectations, there were adverse impacts on our labour markets—let me reiterate that we do not expect that—we could act immediately to re-impose restrictions.—[Official Report, 2 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 876.]

The basis of the worker registration scheme was sensible, and we should use the data from it to monitor whether it is working in practice.

I do not say that because I believe that a flood of people will come in from Bulgaria and Romania. I think that a healthy number of people will come to this country bringing very useful skills. However, it would set a good precedent to do this now for the purposes of future EU accession. If, say, Turkey or Russia become EU accession countries, there may be genuine concerns about a very large number of people coming into this country and distorting our labour market. It would be useful to have a precedent in place to ensure that Parliament assesses the likely impact of the accession four months beforehand and then monitors the actual impact every six months for seven years. It is better to set that in stone in 2005 rather than some point in the future when large countries may join the EU.

The amendment is sensible and I hope that the Government will support it. It ensures extra parliamentary scrutiny, which is always a good thing.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Andy Burnham): I thank colleagues from all parties who have made helpful and welcome comments about clause 2. It is encouraging that there is such broadly-based support for the measures that we want to introduce. I shall deal with the detail of the amendment and make some general points about the clause.

[Andy Burnham]

Let me briefly comment on the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman) on clause 1. She made a powerful speech, the force of which will carry further than the House and especially to anyone who is watching our proceedings. As a dedicated Everton supporter, I emphasise that rivalries are put aside in such cases. She knows that the solidarity between football supporters in our city runs deep and our thoughts are with her. She will have the solidarity of football supporters everywhere and I wish her well in her campaign. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary leads on such matters. Through me, he would like to reiterate the offer of a further meeting with her and the family to ascertain whether we can make some progress.

Clause 2 is consistent with the Government's managed migration agenda, which makes decisions on the UK's labour market dependent on the number and type of gaps that exist. The clause provides enabling powers, which will allow the Government to set the terms on which any access will be granted to Bulgarian and Romanian workers after accession during a transition period. That can range from maintaining a form of the current work permit arrangements to full, free access to the market, including a version of the worker registration scheme that is in place for nationals of the eight accession countries. A decision will be made closer to the accession date. I listened to the remarks of the hon. Member for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Hands) but I hope that he understands that it is right to make the decision when we know more about the date of accession for the two countries.

We would also like to take other considerations into account, such as the state of the domestic labour market and other member states' decisions about access to their labour markets. Of course, all member states have to go through the same process as us. We will also take account of further analysis of our experience with the first round of accessions.

Mr. Bone: Why do we have to wait to find out what our European Union partners do before we make our decision?

Andy Burnham: We do not. The decision is in our hands, but it is sensible to ascertain what other countries are planning to do before taking a unilateral decision. However, the hon. Gentleman knows that, with Sweden and the Republic of Ireland, we made a different decision from that of our partners about the eight accession countries. Nevertheless, the views of our partners have a bearing on the overall decision and they are a factor that we need to take into account.

The strength of the clause, which the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) acknowledged—I thank him for that—is that it enables us to keep our options open and make a decision that balances all the factors that I outlined. We believe that that is the right response, because it affords the Government the flexibility that we need with the approval of Parliament.

Mr. Dodds: Will the Under-Secretary help us about numbers? What is the estimated number of workers from Bulgaria and Romania who are likely to want to come to the United Kingdom to work?

Andy Burnham: That is precisely one of the factors that we would seek to ascertain in the run-up to accession, which is why it is premature to make any firm commitments about the situation. When we know that there is a firm date of accession, we must take a view, considering the effect on the UK labour market in particular. Obviously, that is a predominant concern in making any decision. I will deal with this in more detail when I speak about the amendment, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that we will seek to back up any decision with strong research on precisely that question.

2.45 pm

Reference has been made to previous underestimates. I should say that the figures before the previous accession related to people seeking permanent settlement, and not necessarily to people who had joined the worker registration scheme. The comparison might not therefore be completely accurate. Nevertheless, 293,000 people have come in to date. We believe that that has only added to the UK labour market.

Mr. Brady: It is my understanding that the existing worker registration scheme does not include the self-employed. Would he consider introducing such a provision, either for existing new member states or the two new accession countries? Do the Government have any estimate of how many self-employed workers there are in addition to the 293,000 who have registered to date?

Andy Burnham: There are such figures. I do not have them immediately to hand, but I can certainly make them available to the hon. Gentleman. Nationals of Romania and Bulgaria are, of course, also registered to work here legally as self-employed persons running their own businesses.

We believe that it is the right approach, with the approval of Parliament, to judge the decision in response to circumstances at the time of accession, whether that be 1 January 2007 or 2008. Furthermore, we believe that a decision now on what level of access to grant Bulgarian and Romanian workers on accession would clearly be premature and not take into account the relevant factors that I mentioned.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) made a helpful contribution, in which he urged me and other Home Office Ministers to consider the positive side of migration, and to take a positive view of the measures before the House. He is right to put it in that way, as we should conduct this debate positively. If some of the newspaper headlines at the time were to be believed, the world was going to end the day after the last round of enlargement. Of course, that did not happen. As he rightly pointed out, a story is run in parts of the media that migration is wholly bad, or is to be tolerated at the edges for bringing a marginal benefit. He is right to take those arguments head-on, and the Government should do so. As he said, the experience of opening our labour markets and allowing greater access than do some other European countries has been good for the UK economy, and for the regional economies of this country.

I would wager a lot of money that those 293,000 people have put far more into this country than they have taken out. As the figures show, there has been very little recourse to in-work benefits and other social security support. Their contribution is therefore huge. They are filling gaps in our labour market and performing a vital role. I accept my hon. Friend's basic point that our precise decision must be guided at the time by relevant factors such as those that I have laid out. I agree, however, that our earlier decision has been good for business and the regional economies of this country, and for our standing in the European Union, particularly among the 10 member states that we are talking about today.

I want to run through some of the structure of the clause before turning to the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West. Subsections (1) and (2) allow regulations to be made that will grant Bulgarian and Romanian workers the rights of European economic area nationals to enter and work in the UK. Subsections (3) and (4) provide for the implementation of a possible compulsory registration scheme. Subsection (5) provides for supplementary or transitional measures which may be required, for example, to move Bulgarian and Romanian nationals currently in the UK under a work permit scheme to a future registration scheme. It also allows for the regulations to make different provision for different cases. They could, for instance, distinguish between Bulgarian and Romanian workers, or indeed between plumbers and doctors. That relates to some of the information sought by the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West a moment ago, which I shall try to provide for him.

Subsection (5) relates to an amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen). I am relieved that he is not here to speak to it, as it was entirely pointless, and the Committee will not now be delayed by unnecessary debate on it.

Let me correct a popular misconception about the free movement of persons within the EU. That right exists outside clause 2, and it is important for that to be made clear. Free movement is a fundamental principle of the European Union. Under the accession treaty, nationals of Bulgaria and Romania will have the right to enter and reside in all the existing member states for a wide variety of purposes, including holidays, study, retirement and indeed business activity. That was agreed unanimously by the 25 current member states.

The transitional measures allowed by the treaty relate solely to the free movement of workers. Nationals of Bulgaria and Romania affected by the measures will not automatically be allowed to enter and reside in the 25 EU member countries for the purpose of employment, but they will be able to do so for the other purposes to which I referred.

For those reasons, the transitional periods are limited in scope. They are also limited in time. All the measures for which clause 2 provides will be relevant for a maximum of seven years after accession. Free movement for workers across the Union remains the medium-term objective, and it is essential for the efficient functioning of the single market. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Europe made that point.

That is why the accession treaty requires the Council to conduct a review of restrictions on access to workers about two years after accession. Indeed, we are close to the date for the review of restrictions imposed on new member states in May 2004. The Government will communicate their decision on any further arrangements in spring next year. It is likely that, following the review, several more of the 15 EU member states will join the UK, Sweden and Ireland in allowing full access to their labour markets. That will be a positive development for them.

As I have said, our experience of enlargement has been extremely positive. Most of the workers who have travelled to the UK since May 2004 are young and have taken jobs throughout the country that have been left vacant. They have been employed in a broad range of industries, from health care to business administration to farming—industries in which there are serious gaps. They are contributing to our economic growth and to our tax revenues. It seems that many young people are coming for short periods to find out what living in this country is like, and then going back. That can only be a positive development, and I believe that it will benefit both countries in the long term.

Mr. Brady: Does the Minister share the view expressed—I think—by the hon. Member for Llanelli (Nia Griffith) that one effect of the arrival of a large number of young migrant workers has been the depression of UK wage rates?

Andy Burnham: All those working under the worker registration scheme have full employment protection and full access to the national minimum wage. There is no difference between a British worker and another EU national in that respect. As these workers are filling gaps in the labour market, I am not sure that I agree with the hon. Gentleman's analysis. He probably speaks to the CBI often, and I expect he is aware that it strongly supports these measures. I suspect that it will continue to do so.

I believe that amendment No. 9 is premature. It asks us to include a requirement for a report on the effect of the free movement of workers from the acceding states. Actually, it assumes that we have taken the decision to allow that. However, as I have explained, that decision has not yet been taken, so building such a commitment into the Bill is premature.

I hope to offer the hon. Gentleman some assurances that we can meet the effect of the amendment, so that it will not be necessary for him to press it. For example, as I have already mentioned, we undertake to carry out research into the potential effects of opening access to the UK labour market before a decision is taken to do so, and we would of course share that information with the House. We will continue to monitor the position and, should the decision be taken to open access to our labour markets, he will know that regulations would create the basis for any transitional arrangements. He will also know that those regulations would be subject to the affirmative procedure, so there would be an opportunity to give them full parliamentary scrutiny. That also meets the point raised by the hon. Member for Hammersmith and Fulham: parliamentary scrutiny is guaranteed under clause 2. I can also give a commitment to laying as much research as possible before the House in order to have a fully informed debate on the effect of the regulations. The amendment, which would place a rigid requirement directly in the Bill, is therefore unnecessary.

[Andy Burnham]

Mr. Brady: The Minister is being very helpful and I am grateful. Can he be just a little more helpful by undertaking to publish regular analyses to update the position following accession?

Andy Burnham: I certainly will. The hon. Gentleman will know that, since we set up the worker registration scheme, the Home Office, together with the Department for Work and Pensions and other Departments, is monitoring the effect on the labour market by analysing the figures relating to that scheme. In respect of A8 nationals, the statistics are published on a quarterly basis via the accession monitoring report and the latest figures were issued this week. I hope that I have persuaded him that his amendment is unnecessary as we fully intend to continue the arrangements whereby regular quarterly reports are made available. The whole point of the scheme is to enable us to track and monitor the effect on the labour market and on the take-up of social security benefits. As I say, we will want to share such information with the House as much as possible.

I hope that I have dealt with all the points raised in the debate. The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) made an important point about human trafficking. The Home Office wholly concurs in emphasising the importance of making progress in that respect. As part of our presidency of the EU, we have given considerable priority to that matter and we have sought to make concrete progress in that regard. Work is being carried out by Europol and others, particularly with respect to Romania. We most certainly are focused on dealing with that matter, though the Bill does not include direct provisions relating to it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Nia Griffith) raised an important point about the potentially criminal behaviour of people in the worker registration scheme. She mentioned a case from her constituency and I assure her that such people, if they were imprudent enough to commit offences during their stay here, would be subject to the full force of the UK criminal justice system. Powers remain at the disposal of the Home Office to deal with European nationals in respect of removal where criminal behaviour is involved. The main point is that the full force of British law will apply. I hope that that reassures my hon. Friend.

We have had a good and encouraging debate. It is pleasing to see the Conservative party coming round to acknowledging the benefits of managed and legal migration to this country. I hope that that will continue to be the position held by Conservative Members in the months ahead. I urge the House to reject amendment No. 9 and to approve clause 2.

Mr. Brady: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 2 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported, without amendment.

Order for Third Reading read.

3 pm

Mr. Douglas Alexander: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

We have had a good afternoon's debate, with stimulating and thoughtful contributions from all parts of the House. Let me begin, as I did on Second Reading, by paying heartfelt and genuine tribute to the all-party nature of the consensus in this debate at every stage of the Bill's passage. I welcome the strong and powerful arguments that we have heard in support of enlargement, and in particular of Romania's and Bulgaria's accession. It is clear that all Members recognise the important role that enlargement has already played in developing the prosperous and stable Europe in which we live today. Romania's and Bulgaria's accession will further contribute to political stability and security in our neighbourhood, and create new economic opportunities for British citizens and companies.

As we have discussed, it is clear that there are a number of areas in which more work is needed if Romania and Bulgaria are to be ready for European Union membership in 2007. The Commission's comprehensive monitoring report, which was published in October—it has been the subject of debate already this afternoon—set out a range of issues in the fields of justice and home affairs, agriculture, environment and administrative capacity that require urgent attention. I know that this was a matter of concern to the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds), and I can assure him and the House that we are working closely with both Governments to help them to implement these outstanding commitments. In recent meetings with both countries' Europe Ministers, I underlined the importance of tackling the remaining problems. I am pleased to say that both expressed a real commitment to implementing the necessary reforms, and they set out a number of areas where progress is already being made.

This Third Reading is an important and historic moment. The Bill may be small, but its impact will be substantial. For 30 million people, European Union accession represents a new dawn and the final step in a difficult journey from dictatorship to democracy. The impact of accession will not, of course, be limited to Romania and Bulgaria; their accession will bring benefits to all of Europe. I know that I speak on behalf of the whole House when I say that the United Kingdom looks forward to welcoming Romania and Bulgaria to the European Union. I commend the Bill to the House.

3.3 pm

Mr. Brady: I am pleased to follow the Minister in what has been, as he said, a helpful and constructive series of debates on the Bill. There is broad cross-party agreement on the objective of bringing Bulgaria and Romania into the European Union, without for a moment belittling the great difficulties that remain and that need to be overcome. The Minister acknowledges that there is a serious programme of work to be undertaken in the coming months to get those countries to the point where they may be ready for accession.

We have had some very useful contributions to this debate, including a helpful one from the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham). He gave us some assistance, thereby enabling us to withdraw our amendment on the free movement of workers. My hon. Friends the Members for Totnes (Mr. Steen) and for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) rightly raised some very important points about people trafficking and the scandal of such abuse.

I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) has returned to his place. He was quite right to raise some of the more profound issues to do with the future shape and direction of the EU as a whole and the type of EU that Romania and Bulgaria might join. In not too many years' time, other countries such as Turkey and Croatia will become members, and even Russia may do so one day, although that may take a little longer.

The Opposition are pleased to welcome the progress being made on enlargement, both with this Bill and with the beginning of the accession talks for Turkey and Croatia. Our proceedings have been very consensual so far, so I cannot resist saying that it looks increasingly as though the steps to enlargement may be the only achievements of the UK's EU presidency. This week, Foreign Ministers from various member states have commented on the discussions about the future EU budget. For example, the Finnish Foreign Minister said:

> "As there is nothing new to discuss, I have got nothing new to say",

while the Belgian Foreign Minister said:

> "We are sitting here wasting our time", and the Portuguese Foreign Minister said:

> "They have done nothing about the financial prospects . . . We are not going to get any numbers today, just words."

I am pleased to restore a little contention and rancour to our debate, as we do not like to have too much uninterrupted consensus in our proceedings. However, it is fortunate that we have something to show for the UK presidency, especially in respect of the more difficult talks about Turkey, and I have given the Minister and his colleagues credit for that before. The accession of Bulgaria and Romania should bring both countries great benefits, as it will ultimately to all member states.

Enlargement is hugely important, both for the progress that it brings in the candidate countries and for what it does to aid the development of a more diverse and flexible EU. Recent discussions about the future EU budget have sometimes given the unfortunate impression that the whole point of membership for some of the newer members and applicant countries is to obtain grants and cash transfers from the EU or the wealthier members. That is entirely wrong, as it leads to the absurd proposition that has been raised this week—that the new members are paying for the UK rebate. Given that the UK is a major net contributor to the UK, that is clearly nonsense.

Yet we must stress that the real value of EU membership for Bulgaria, Romania and the others that have joined recently is that it will reinforce their freedom, democracy, security and rule of law. It will also ensure their access to a single market, and we hope that that can be achieved in a way that is not overly bureaucratic or regulated.

The Conservative party has always been an enthusiastic supporter of enlargement, whether that has involved the 10 states that joined last year, or Bulgaria and Romania, or Turkey and Croatia. We very much support the proposed accession that we have debated this afternoon, but the Minister knows well that the path to membership for Romania and Bulgaria will not be easy. The enthusiasm for the objective behind the Bill is shared by all parties, but that should not lead the Government or the EU to proceed uncritically in their assessments of the readiness of the two applicant countries for entry in 2007 or 2008.

I believe that the Minister accepts the importance of bringing Romania and Bulgaria into the EU, but I hope that he is also aware that it is vital that we get it right.

3.9 pm

Mr. Clegg: I should also like to join in this festival of cross-party consensus, which I trust will be a rare, if valuable occasion. It underlines the importance of this positive step not only for Romania and Bulgaria but for the European Union as a whole. I join others in reminding the House that the vision of an ever-wider and more diverse EU has for a long time been a particularly British vision of the European Union and before it the European Community, which has united political opinion across parties for a long time. It is good to see that that fundamental view has held true here today. It is not a view that is shared in other parts of the EU. I doubt that in Paris one would find quite the same amount of cross-party consensus on this latest step in the journey of EU enlargement. It remains an expression of great strategic vision on the part of Britain as a whole that we have prosecuted this process as successfully as we have.

Some important points have been made during the consideration of the Bill about the final steps of the accession of Romania and Bulgaria into the EU and the absolute need for real rigour in ensuring that the outstanding measures that need to be taken in those two countries are taken and that the safeguard measures are used in all seriousness and not merely as a fig leaf for enlargement and accession at all costs. That concern about the final stages of accession should not be viewed as some last-minute series of obstacles to their rightful claim to join the EU. It is born of a serious belief that if further enlargements are to occur in a politically, economically and socially sustainable way in the decades ahead, we must set the right precedent today.

3.11 pm

Mr. Bone: I was disappointed that the Bill was not amended in Committee, but I was grateful for the comments made by both Ministers. I broadly welcome the Bill. Enlargement of the European Union is good for everyone. The larger the single market, the more prosperous its peoples become. Clearly, the addition of 30 million consumers from Bulgaria and Romania is to be welcomed. It is an added bonus that we are bringing in people who have been freed from the tyranny of communism. I would go on to argue for the enlargement of the EU to such an extent that it joins with the North American Free Trade Agreement to create a transatlantic free trade area, which would create a huge market and be of enormous benefit to its peoples. In this regard, we should welcome and encourage Romania and Bulgaria into the EU.

[Mr. Bone]

I have concerns on two fronts. One is the process of Bulgaria and Romania's accession. The other is the effects on the UK of these countries joining the European Union. Bulgaria and Romania are two countries that are only now emerging from the throes of Soviet domination. The defeat of communism in those countries and the creation of freedom and democracy were of course championed by Baroness Thatcher and her Conservative Governments. The two countries are now entering into the most fundamental change since the fall of communism. However, one of the great freedoms that the people of Bulgaria and Romania have gained from the fall of communism is the right to determine their own affairs and to vote on issues that affect their lives. Yet the Bulgarian and Romanian people have not been given the chance to vote on this fundamental change. That shows the ultimate failing of the system and highlights how undemocratic the process of EU accession is.

The EU can demand all sorts of regulations and laws and practices, but the one thing that it does not demand is that the people of the countries acceding to it have a choice in whether they want to be part of the EU. Is that because the EU fears the verdict of the people? Has it not learned from the fiasco of the European constitution? Should it not be a condition that every country that wants to join the EU should hold a referendum?

As the citizens of those two countries have not been given the chance to vote on whether they want to be part of the EU we have only the views expressed in opinion polls to show the strength of opposition to accession. Every second person surveyed in Bulgaria was concerned that their country would have to contribute more than it would receive from the EU budget. More than half of those surveyed in Bulgaria feared that accession would create difficulties for the country's farmers. In a survey commissioned by the delegation of the European Commission in Romania, 56 per cent. of Romanians believed that accession would bring more drawbacks than advantages in the short term.

The Minister may rightly point out that no such referendum was held in the United Kingdom. One sunny morning, I woke up and the people of the United Kingdom found that they were no longer in the European Community but in the European Union. The people of Britain were never given the chance to say whether they wanted to be in the EU. They were never asked whether they wanted to be in a European superstate, with its own Parliament, its own President, its own flag and its own Court, all of which is costing billions of pounds a year and represents a significant loss of British sovereignty. However, that strengthens the argument that Bulgarians and Romanians should have the right to a referendum. The citizens of those accession countries are denied a fundamental democratic choice.

My second concern is that the Government have not made clear what restrictions, if any, will be imposed on the accession countries with regard to free movement to the UK, notwithstanding the Minister's earlier comments. The Government's prediction of immigration from the 10 accession countries fell severely short of the actual figure. Surely, they need to outline the restrictions they will impose on the two accession countries before it is too late, because it could be little more than a year before Romania and Bulgaria are admitted to the EU and I do not see why we should have to wait to hear what our partners say about the issue before we make our decision.

It is not unreasonable to ask for details about the restrictions that will be imposed on the free movement of workers from Bulgaria and Romania. There are no details in the Bill about whether people coming to the UK from Bulgaria and Romania will automatically be entitled to benefit. Will they be entitled to housing benefit, jobseeker's allowance or incapacity benefit and if so, when? The Bill does not answer those questions.

Many of my constituents are concerned that migrants from eastern Europe are automatically entitled to benefits. I am not making that point to produce headlines; in fact, it is the reverse. It can be argued that migration has not significantly increased the number of people on benefit, but because it is not clear in the Bill what the restrictions might be, we may attract headlines when Bulgaria and Romania accede.

My greatest concern about free movement, which is shared by all Members, is that human trafficking will be made easier under the Bill. I am particularly concerned about the hideous trafficking of young women in the sex trade. Young women from eastern Europe are promised a new life with legitimate employment and opportunities in the UK, but they finish up as sex slaves sold from one degenerate to another. They are subject to the most appalling violence and intimidation, which goes as far as telling them that back home, perhaps in Bulgaria or Romania, their child will be killed if they do not continue to serve as sex slaves. That is worse than the intimidation and violence suffered by slaves in the 19th century. Will the Government bear that outrageous and disgraceful trafficking in mind when drawing up regulations for work permits?

Before Romania and Bulgaria become part of the EU, they should toughen up regimes in their countries to stop human trafficking. That should be a crucial condition of their accession.

I hope that the Government will take those points on board, and that my speech has been constructive and not party political.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

RIGHTS OF SAVERS BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with bills).

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Rights of Savers Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(1) any expenditure incurred by a Minister of the Crown or government department under the Act; and

(2) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums which under any other Act are payable out of money so provided.—[Mr. Timms.]

Question agreed to.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

INVESTIGATORY POWERS

That the draft Retention of Communications Data (Further Extension of Initial Period) Order 2005, which was laid before this House on 3rd November, be approved.—[Kevin Brennan.]

Question agreed to.

Essential Drugs (Northern Ireland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Kevin Brennan.]

3.20 pm

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): I want to take this opportunity to highlight the importance of the availability of life-altering and, sometimes, life-saving drugs and to reiterate the fact that the Government must take the lead on the issue and not simply offload responsibility for it on to health boards in Northern Ireland.

The mailbag to my constituency office is dominated by health queries, and one of the most common problems is access to essential medications. I acknowledge the extra funding that the Minister has announced recently for high-cost medications, but I want to know how much of that is genuinely new money. Perhaps the Minister can detail that during his remarks.

Guidance from the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence does not extend to Northern Ireland. However, I understand that the Minister has given consideration to the matter, and perhaps he will take this opportunity to detail the latest position. In Northern Ireland, patients do not have the luxury of NICE guidelines to ensure that they receive critical treatments. The health boards can allocate their budgets as they please and can choose not to spend money on any of those essential drugs if they so desire. The Minister must give clear direction on access to those drugs.

Herceptin has gained significant press coverage in the Province during the past few weeks, particularly in relation to whether it can be used in the treatment of early breast cancer. An aggressive media campaign has been waged and concerned patients have threatened legal action. Those waiting for other drugs now fear that they may suffer as Herceptin is now provided to those who need it. Can the Minister guarantee that those with other cancer conditions will not suffer as a result of the funding for Herceptin?

In relation to multiple sclerosis, for example, a young woman who works in the health service has written to me. She has suffered pain and loss of feeling in her limbs and developed visual anomalies. She will not be able to obtain an MRI scan to confirm her diagnosis until the middle of next year. Only after that scan can her neurologist add her to the waiting list for beta interferon, and another long wait will commence.

That young woman is currently off work. She wants to work and realises that, if she remains off work and requires state benefits, her condition will end up costing society a great deal more than early treatment would have done. She feels that the provision that she is receiving is simply not good enough. Like many others who are in a similar position, she wonders what the point is of paying taxes and contributing for years to the public purse.

Unfortunately, the funding for MS drugs, such as beta interferon and glatiramer, have not improved and the waiting lists are increasing, both in terms of the number of people on the lists and the time that they are forced to wait. At the end of October 2005, 156 people were on the waiting list for disease-modifying therapies. The imbalance in numbers on the waiting lists from board to board raises fears of another postcode lottery for treatment if funds become available.

[Mrs. Iris Robinson]

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Lady for securing the debate. Is she aware that people face the same problems in not only Northern Ireland, but places such as Wellingborough?

Mrs. Robinson: I have absolutely no doubt about that. However, investigations by outsiders have indicated that we in Northern Ireland get 20 per cent. less for health care per head of population by comparison with the rest of the United Kingdom. The hon. Gentleman should also bear it in mind that some conditions are caused by stress and mental illness due to 35 years of ongoing terrorism. I hope that he can put the matter in perspective and appreciate that we have a greater need because of all the terrorist activity that we have come through.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): I commend my hon. Friend on securing the debate. Democratic Unionist Members admire her work to highlight in the local media the problem in Northern Ireland. Does she agree that many illnesses that require specialist treatment are stress-related? There is evidence to link the higher incidence of stress-related illnesses in Northern Ireland to the troubles, so we must think about the necessary funding to help people there, who are coming out of a traumatic situation. The Government must think about the problem in that context, rather than considering simply funding under the traditional methods used in the national health service.

Mrs. Robinson: I thank my hon. Friend for raising the matter. Having spoken to several psychiatrists in Northern Ireland, I totally concur with his views. One of the Cinderella-type structures in Northern Ireland is the mental health service. I intend to raise the question of mental health services and what is available in a future debate, because the situation is intolerable and unacceptable. Children have to go into adult units, although that is detrimental to them and certainly does not enable them to move on and progress as we would like them to.

Let me go back to what I was saying before I took interventions so that I can make my point. The imbalance in the number of people on waiting lists from board to board raises fears that there will be another postcode lottery for treatment if funds become available. That is because in 2004–05, one person in each board each month was given treatment. Surely that is a ludicrous means of distributing life-altering therapies in this day and age.

Even if NICE guidelines are eventually adopted in the Province, those whose treatment is currently being delayed might not fit the guidelines when funding becomes available due to the inevitable progression of their conditions. The psychological effect of being told that a treatment will help one's quality of life, but then learning that it is not available for funding reasons, is totally immeasurable in human terms. An increasing number of people are being recommended for treatment by their neurologist, but are informed in the next breath that it might be two years before they can commence treatment because there is no money to fund it.

To highlight the impact on individuals involved, I want to read from a letter that arrived in my office earlier this week. It was written by a lady from Killinchy, which is in my Strangford constituency. I will quote the letter in full, so please ignore all the nice things that she says and do not think that I am being conceited.

The letter says:

> "I am writing to you to plead with you to please put forward a very strong case for the desperate need for Betaferon for MS patients in Northern Ireland. We desperately need more funding for Betaferon as it is the only specific drug available for patients suffering from this dreadful debilitating disease, in that it will help to slow down the progression of their symptoms. I was told yesterday, by Dr. Hawkins when I saw him for my appointment at the City Hospital, that I no longer have remitting relapsing MS, but have now got secondary progressive MS. Even though I have been suspecting this for quite a while myself, it still came as an awful shock when it was actually confirmed. Of course it causes all kinds of emotions to run through your mind. I was very tearful when first told—it was almost like being told your original diagnosis all over again. I was suddenly very frightened all over again, having got used to learning to live with it and learning to cope with the fact that everything is just starting to slow down—now having to fear that I am definitely just going to get progressively worse. I was a nurse, and so this probably sounds very naïve, but it's incredible how much your mind can block out when you're in self-denial. When I was told that I met the criteria for Betaferon, it at least seemed like a light at the end of the tunnel—until—I was told that there was a long waiting list, and it would be quite some time before I would be able to get the drug that I so desperately needed now. The MS nurse that I saw was loathe to put a time scale on it".

Unless by some chance extra funding was released specifically for beta interferon, that would be the case and she might pass the date when the drug could help her.

The letter continued:

> "Please, please, please could you make an appeal to the government on behalf of all the people, whose lives would be made that bit more tolerable, if they could just be given the drugs that would ease their suffering and make their disease a bit more bearable and a bit more under control.
>
> I know that you do a lot of work for the MS Society and I thank you for that, but I am still begging you to do that little bit more by putting forward our case to the Government."

How does the Minister respond to such a cry for help? That letter shows the strength of feeling and emotions experienced by patients awaiting disease modifying therapies.

Also within the past few days, another lady from Belfast wrote to me saying:

> "I am 49 years of age, married with one daughter. I am writing to you as I have been informed by numerous people of the excellent work you have done in fighting on the side of multiple sclerosis sufferers. In April this year I was diagnosed with MS, which devastated both myself and my family, but I am determined to fight the disease in every way that I can. As I'm sure you know, the most effective treatment for MS is Interferon, which was prescribed by Dr Watt, the consultant neurologist in the Royal Victoria Hospital, but I was told that I would be placed on a waiting list as the Eastern Health Board had no funds to meet the cost of this treatment for approximately two years. I now purchase this drug privately, at a cost of £687.85 every four weeks, which is financially devastating to my family and I don't know how long I am going to be able to keep on funding this medication, which I have to tell you that I do feel the benefit of.

> I have read with great interest the statement made by the Minister of Health ... regarding the £14 million being made available for the purchase of drugs over the next two years. I feel that the case of Interferon for MS sufferers should be impressed on the"

Minister and the Eastern health and social services board, under whose jurisdiction this lady falls.

The letter continues:

> "Interferon is the treatment to give hope of quality of life to fellow MS sufferers like myself. I can't believe that I have been put through all this just so the health authority can balance the books. Human life cannot and should not be measured in pounds. Like many other sufferers I'm scared of what the future may hold."

Those are very moving and challenging remarks, as I am sure we would all agree.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): I join my hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) in paying tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) not only for securing the debate and raising this important subject, but for her work on health matters in Northern Ireland, which is widely respected and admired.

Many hon. Members could also refer to letters that they have received that tell a terrible tale of emotional stress and anxiety caused by denying people the treatment to which they are entitled. That also imposes guilt on family members who cannot contribute to the private purchase of those medicines, as they may feel that they are letting their loved ones down. My hon. Friend is right to highlight that important factor.

Mrs. Robinson: I concur with my colleague. If the lady whose case I raised does not receive the appropriate drugs she may face the inevitability of selling her home and going into public sector accommodation. In this day and age, it is an utter disgrace that families should be put under such strain to obtain appropriate care for their loved ones.

The situation for rheumatoid arthritis sufferers is no better than it is for people with multiple sclerosis. Waiting times in Northern Ireland for anti-TNF medications such as Enbrel and Remicade are four times longer than they are in England, and are much worse than they are in the rest of the United Kingdom or Europe. Rheumatology provision in the Province is much worse than in Great Britain. The recent strategic review of rheumatology services in Northern Ireland called for root and branch modernisation. We have the lowest number of rheumatologists per head of population in Europe, and we need more consultant rheumatologists, specialist nurses and allied health professionals. We also need a properly resourced paediatric rheumatology service, because young people with juvenile arthritis currently have to wait four months for a first appointment. We need an appropriate paediatric rheumatology service with a lead consultant and a paediatric rheumatology nurse specialist.

We deserve parity with other UK regions in the provision of anti-TNF therapies. More than 440 people in Northern Ireland will have to wait more than two years for Enbrel or Remicade, while their condition worsens all the time. More than two thirds of consultant rheumatologists in England and Wales are satisfied that they can prescribe those drugs when necessary, yet on 31 October, at Musgrave Park hospital in Belfast alone, there were 365 people on the waiting list for anti-TNF drugs, 62 of whom have been waiting more than two years. Money that hospitals were led to believe would be made available this financial year has not materialised. The message from the Department is that there will be a generous allocation in the next financial year, but those hospitals were given to believe that that would be the case this year. Arthritis sufferers fear that the publicity over the breast cancer drug Herceptin will result in treatments such as anti-TNF medications losing out. As I said earlier, I would be grateful if the Minister confirmed that the £14 million of additional money that was provided in the recent announcement will aid the availability of those drugs.

A rheumatologist recently commented:

> "I'm afraid we are getting pretty despondent again about this. The Boards were due to receive the Department's response to their Health and Wellbeing Improvement Plans about a month ago (which included additional allocations for high-cost drugs) but we haven't heard anything from them, and there are rumours that we may not get any additional anti-TNF funding this year. This is despite the fact that our anti-TNF waiting list now stands at well over 2 years. Indeed, we were led to believe that we would be getting additional funds in the current financial year to treat well over 50 new patients in Musgrave Park Hospital alone."

Velcade is another drug for which there is great demand across the Province. It is the only new licensed treatment for multiple myeloma in the past 10 years, but patients in Northern Ireland cannot gain access to it, even though patients in Scotland, Wales and England can. Velcade offers both increased life expectancy and improved quality of life for patients with myeloma, who would otherwise face a terminal decline in their condition. Myeloma receives much less attention than other more notable cancers, but is a far bigger killer than both testicular and cervical cancer. Survival rates for myeloma patients have not improved in the past 10 years, with only 23 per cent. of patients living for more than five years.

In Northern Ireland a very small number of patients would be suitable for Velcade. The cost would not be great, but the difference that it could make to the patient's quality of life and life expectancy would be immense. Velcade is a licensed drug. The decision to prescribe in Northern Ireland is not dependent on any assessment authority. Denying myeloma patients the treatment is a purely financial decision. Every year in Northern Ireland between 85 and 120 people are newly diagnosed with the disease. In 2003, 63 people died of it, including one young person in their 30s.

Velcade is prescribed for patients who have received at least two prior treatments and whose condition is worsening. It is undergoing trials as a second-line treatment, owing to the success seen in its current use. It has been appraised by the Scottish Medicines Consortium and the All Wales Medicine Strategy Group. It is funded and available on the national health service in Scotland and in Wales. Although universal access to Velcade is not expected in England until NICE produces guidelines, a number of trusts already prescribe the drug. Clinicians are free to make a clinical judgment to prescribe unappraised drugs such as Velcade. Indeed, Department of Health circular 99/176 makes that clear to all primary care trusts.

In Northern Ireland, funds for Velcade have not been made available because of the withdrawal of contingency funds to health boards, despite the fact that Belfast City hospital is the location for clinical trials for the treatment. Clinical trials for Velcade carried out in Northern Ireland were so promising that one trial was halted early to ensure that as many people as possible received the treatment. It is extraordinary, therefore, that the place where so much effort was put into testing the drug is the one UK region where it is not available. Many patients are left to wonder what the point is in conducting all that multimillion pound research, only to find that afterwards there is no money to fund the treatment.

[Mrs. Robinson]

Another drug on which I have been lobbied is Teriparitide for the treatment of established osteoporosis in post-menopausal women. I understand that boards have not identified funding for it in the current financial year. Is this another drug that the Minister had in mind when he announced extra funding for drugs in Northern Ireland?

Are the boards free to allocate the recent extra funding for drugs as they wish, or are there restrictions on which medications can be included? Can the Minister assure us that he will make the availability of essential drugs a priority in the Province, and that the Department will take responsibility for ensuring that there is adequate provision across Northern Ireland?

3.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Shaun Woodward): I congratulate the hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) on securing the debate on access to essential drugs in Northern Ireland. She is indeed a doughty champion, as I know from my own postbag. She passes on the letters of every constituent who writes to her and raises many of these matters in written questions. I am well aware that few MPs could claim to have such a proud record as she has in taking up the health needs of her constituents.

The hon. Lady asked me to make a number of guarantees, and she will understand that I may resist making them as guarantees. However, one of the questions that she posed was from a constituent, who asked, "What is the point of paying all my taxes?" Well, the fact of the matter is that health spending in the current year in Northern Ireland will exceed £3.5 billion. For the next two years, I have secured an additional £450 million for the health service, which is £50 million more than the previous budget. I recognise that even that sum of money, which matches the best figures in England, is not enough in Northern Ireland. In that context, I announced major reforms to the health service this week in order to find more efficiencies and put that money into front-line services.

Of the £3.5 billion that we will spend this year in Northern Ireland, some £400 million will be spent on prescribed medicines. The majority, £340 million, will relate to GP prescriptions, while the balance, some £60 million, will be spent in the hospital sector. Those costs represent only a proportion of the total cost of treating a patient with a particular drug. For specialist drugs, many of which the hon. Lady has mentioned this afternoon, there are also additional costs associated with the infrastructure required for the administration of the drugs.

Today, people are living longer. With our ageing population, we should expect more age-related chronic diseases and higher levels of drug prescription. At the same time, patient expectations are increasing, and rightly so. Patients and their families are rightly much more aware of the treatments available and—again, quite rightly—they expect to receive the latest and best drug treatments for their particular condition.

Hon. Members will be aware of the recent report by Professor Appleby. One of the issues that it considers is the potential for greater use of generic medicines in Northern Ireland. He estimates that there would be savings of some £55 million a year, if Northern Ireland's use of generic medicines were as good as the practice in England. That £55 million is effectively being wasted in Northern Ireland because of prescribing habits, which must change. I am determined that my Department will pursue these changes in order to put that money into front-line health services.

New and revolutionary specialist drug treatments are emerging all the time. In some cases, new drug products have been developed; in others, new ways have been found to use existing drugs more effectively and for new conditions. All that is good news for patients, since better treatments are now available to cure or control the symptoms of a range of severe conditions. Improvements in drug treatments may also reduce the number of hospital admissions that patients require.

It is essential when new drugs are introduced that we continue to monitor all the available evidence in relation to their safety and effectiveness. Sometimes that will account for why we delay the introduction of some drugs. Although most drugs will prove to be effective, some medicines, despite their initial promise, may be shown to be not so effective or, indeed, they may subsequently be found to be unsafe. In those circumstances, difficult decisions will need to be taken, and the drugs may need to be withdrawn.

One very recent example of a drug with huge potential is, as the hon. Lady has mentioned, Herceptin, which has been licensed and is available to patients in Northern Ireland for use in advanced breast cancer. Early results from clinical trials indicated potential benefits for suitable patients with early-stage breast cancer, which understandably led to calls from patients and their elected representatives, including the hon. Lady, for Herceptin to be made more widely available for this new indication.

I took the view then—I still hold it now—that the decision to use Herceptin or any other drug in a new way should always be a clinical decision and that it should not be driven by political campaigns or the media, although I recognise the role that the media may play in drawing further attention to the positive effects of certain drugs. In that specific context and in what must be regarded as exceptional circumstances, I announced on 11 November that doctors should be free to make clinical decisions about the prescription of Herceptin for patients in the earlier stages of breast cancer. It was also important, as I made clear on 11 November, that despite what was undoubtedly an excellent campaign in the media, and an excellent campaign fought by a number of politicians for the prescription of Herceptin for early-stage breast cancer, few people in that campaign discussed the negative effects of Herceptin, and the extremely serious side effects reported in The Lancet, which may occur in some patients and which may include heart failure.

Mrs. Robinson: Would the Minister accept that if someone is diagnosed with a life-threatening illness, and despite, possibly, the downside of using a drug, if that drug gives people hope they will ask to be the guinea pigs, as might be said; and that we cannot fault people for wanting something that possibly offers a higher percentage positive outcome than a negative one?

Mr. Woodward: Of course we could not fault anybody who is facing a life-threatening illness for asking for a new treatment. It follows also that we have a responsibility to ensure that because a patient asks for something, they are prescribed something that will make them better. Further, it follows that if we are aware of serious side effects that may occur, we have a responsibility to make them aware of serious side effects.

It is worth remembering that in Northern Ireland we have a very good record of dealing with breast cancer. Obviously, no doctor would want to prescribe a drug for a patient that may lead that patient to an even worse condition as a result of the application of that drug. I am reminding the hon. Lady that when we have campaigns for the prescription of drugs, often the downside of prescribing the drugs is forgotten. There is a responsibility in media campaigns and in political campaigns, when we are trying to get the application of certain drugs, to be responsible in telling patients, "Yes, let us all hope that this is a wonder drug." I think that every Member of this place would want to recognise that if Herceptin holds out that hope for women in the early stages of breast cancer, it would indeed be a wonder drug if it turned out to be everything that everyone hopes of it. However, we are not yet sure of that. It is extremely important, particularly important for very vulnerable people who are facing life-threatening illnesses, that expectations are not raised to a point that we cannot at this stage fulfil.

I am committed to improving access to specialist medicines that offer the potential for significant improvement in patient care. In recent years we have made some progress, although we still have further to go.

For example, the number of people receiving anti-TNF treatment for severe inflammatory arthritis has doubled between April 2004 and April 2005. In April, 178 people were on these drugs. There are now 361 on them. This represents an additional investment in this one area alone of about £2 million.

There has also been a significant increase in the number of people with multiple sclerosis receiving disease-modifying therapies such as beta interferon. The number of people receiving these drugs has increased from 442 in April 2003 to 577 at present. This represents about 17 per cent. of people with MS in Northern Ireland, and compares favourably with other areas of the UK. New drugs have also been made available to combat hepatitis C, HIV, inherited genetic disorders and cancer.

Not for one moment should I or anybody in my Department be complacent. Despite the increased number of patients receiving specialist medicines, the hon. Lady rightly draws our interest to the numbers of people waiting for these drugs. I share with her the concern for the number of patients with severe inflammatory arthritis waiting for anti-TNF treatment, and the numbers waiting for treatment for MS. As the hon. Lady said, 146 patients are currently waiting to begin disease-modifying treatment for MS. Some of these patients have been waiting for more than 12 months.

Mr. Bone: Last week, the Secretary of State for Health led us to believe that nobody in the UK had to wait more than six months for treatment. That needs to be corrected because, to me, that is fundamentally untrue.

Mr. Woodward: Unfortunately, I cannot answer for my right hon. Friend. I am the Minister with responsibility for health in Northern Ireland. Undoubtedly we will draw the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Four hundred and fifty-six patients are currently waiting to begin anti-TNF treatment for severe inflammatory arthritis. Some have been waiting for more than two years, in pain and frustrated that they cannot access the treatment they need. I agree with all hon. Members that that is intolerable. Behind every waiting list there are desperate personal stories of patients experiencing great difficulty because of their condition.

We intend to improve access to these drugs, which undoubtedly have the potential to transform patients' lives. We will not be able to turn the current position around overnight. I have, however, taken initial steps to bring about real improvements. First, an additional £5 million has already been invested to improve access to specialist medicines in Northern Ireland in the current year.

Secondly, I expect to be able to invest a further £9 million in 2006–07. That money will be invested to fund new drug treatments and the infrastructure required to administer them. Next year, there will be significant additional investment in anti-TNF drugs, beta interferon for MS, and existing and new specialist medicines for cancer treatment. The additional investment of £9 million will help to reduce waiting lists for specialist treatments and to ensure that patients in Northern Ireland have access to the very latest specialist drugs. But even those investments will not be enough to meet the growing demand for new and existing drugs. Resources and funding will always be an issue. If we want these drugs, the Government have a responsibility to work out how we are going to pay for them.

The hon. Lady is aware that next week I will bring forward my proposals for water charges in Northern Ireland. Although I know that she and her hon. Friends bitterly resist those proposals, it is worth putting it on the record that the money that will come from water charges in Northern Ireland will bring an additional £300 million into the Exchequer over the next three years. We can put that money into essential services in Northern Ireland. I understand that until now the hon. Lady and her hon. Friends have resisted the introduction of water charges. However, it is important that she face up to the fact that when she asks for more money for drugs—I absolutely understand that we have a responsibility to find the money for those drugs and to deal with the waiting lists—we in Northern Ireland have a responsibility, where we can, to find that money from our own resources. That is appropriate if we are to create parity with the rest of England, Wales and Scotland.

Mr. Donaldson: What assessment has the Minister made of the savings that will accrue from the changes in the governance of health in Northern Ireland outlined in the proposals published this week under the review of public administration? Will he give a commitment that savings that accrue from the structural changes in the health service will be channelled towards extra funding for specialist treatments?

Mr. Woodward: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that issue. As I said this week in my statement on reform of the health service in Northern Ireland, the cost of administering the health service and social services in Northern Ireland is some £155 million. We have a population of just over 1.7 million people. That is about the same as Kent, yet Kent has fewer than 10 trusts and we have 19. We have four boards that in effect work as strategic health authorities. I propose to turn the 19 trusts into five plus an ambulance service trust and to get rid of the four boards, which employ 600 people, and replace them with one strategic health authority. Also, four patient councils will be replaced by one patient council.

I hope that at least £15 million—perhaps £30 million—can be found out of the current cost of running health and social services. I have already undertaken that all the money from the savings that are achieved by reforming the health service infrastructure should go into front-line patient services and into doing something about the application of new drugs and the misery that people suffer while waiting for them.

Mrs. Robinson: Although my point is not about drug availability, have the Government made an assessment of the savings that will accrue through our introduction of the no-smoking ban in public places in Northern Ireland? That will have a major effect on all sorts of illnesses that derive from smoking.

Mr. Woodward: We did that when we made the impact assessment. In the long-term, the proposals will save a huge amount of money. Three thousand people a year die from a preventable illness caused by or related to smoking and passive smoking. However, in the short-term, we are unlikely to experience any savings because, regrettably, much of the damage will have already been done to people and the health service should look after them, regardless of whether they should have smoked.

I intend to put money into health promotion campaigns to encourage people to stop smoking and into cessation services to enable people to stop smoking. In the short term, I expect to spend more money on encouraging people to stop smoking than will accrue in savings.

Infrastructure savings can undoubtedly be made given the inefficiency and the waste of the bureaucracy of the current health and social services system. As I said earlier this week, that is not a reflection on the staff—the doctors, nurses, consultants or many people who form part of the secretariat. We have managed to create a highly inefficient system in Northern Ireland that is too bureaucratic. We can slim it down and put the £30 million into drugs and patient services.

Mr. Dodds: I am interested in the amount of money that the Under-Secretary is talking about saving and putting into front-line services. We are all in favour of that. When is that money likely to find its way to front-line services?

Mr. Woodward: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the proposals that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State set out in the review of public administration could take three to four years to be implemented. Although the proposals that I announced this week are related to the RPA, they are not dependent on it. I intend to change the number of trusts from 19 to five plus one and to start work on it in January 2006, with a view to the five new trusts being up and running for April 2007. There will be redundancy costs and I anticipate that the substantial savings will probably not start for the best part of 18 to 24 months. However, I am ensuring that, for the long-term future of people in Northern Ireland, we make the decisions now and tackle the issues. That means that we can deal with the outrageous, intolerable and almost immoral waiting lists for the drugs that we are considering.

We will therefore be relentless in driving through the reforms to pay for the drugs. Again, I wish to add a cautionary note. Despite additional investment in the next two years, the changes that I am making in the efficiency structures of the health service of Northern Ireland, the Appleby report and the savings that will derive from the RPA, demand will continue to grow.

Matching resources to that demand will always involve making difficult choices and selecting priorities. The emergence of new specialist medicines has provided an opportunity to treat diseases that were considered untreatable until recently. Patients have the right to expect to be able to access those medicines when they need them.

The hon. Lady mentioned the National Institute ~~for~~ Health and Clinical Excellence. Its guidelines currently have no formal status in Northern Ireland. The Department is finalising links with NICE which will give its guidance formal status in Northern Ireland. I expect the new arrangements with NICE will be in place by spring 2006.

I would prefer to deal with the hon. Lady's specific points in writing. They are very specific and they should be given the proper consideration that they deserve. The current waiting lists for some specialist medicines are a serious priority for the health service in Northern Ireland. We will make improvements as quickly as we possibly can. The hon. Lady made her case strongly this afternoon and I shall do everything I can to improve access to the drugs that she mentioned and ensure that the new treatments and new drugs that people want in Northern Ireland are made available as quickly and as effectively and—critically—as safely as possible.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at four minutes past Four o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Tuesday 8 November 2005

[DAVID TAYLOR in the Chair]

Political Parties (Funding)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Cawsey.]

9.30 am

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): I welcome the opportunity to debate the Electoral Commission's report, "The Funding of Political Parties", which was published last December. I commend the authors for a thorough and well researched report, which they submitted along with their recommendations to the Department for Constitutional Affairs. Nearly a year has passed without it being debated in the House and without any response from the Government. I therefore welcome the opportunity to take the matter forward.

I am glad to see my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) in the Chamber. He has written extensively and with insight on the subject. I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) is here and I welcome the Minister. She has her plate full, with the Electoral Administration Bill being discussed in the House later today. I am also pleased to see the spokesman for the Liberal Democrat party here.

At business questions on 16 December shortly after the report was published, I asked for a debate on the report. In response, the then Leader of the House said:

> "I am very sympathetic to the idea of a debate on that".

He also showed a bit of ankle by saying,

> "It might be possible, on an all-party basis, to move towards extending—not introducing for the first time, but extending—public funding for parties in designated areas", and said specifically:

> "In that respect, it is interesting that the Electoral Commission has recommended tax relief on donations of up to £200. We can consider the proposals in due course".

Due course, by any reasonable interpretation has come and gone, but there has been no consideration.

During the exchange, another hon. Member referred to "maverick millionaires", and said that such matters were > "not doing any good to the battered reputation of Parliament".

The person who said that was the then Liberal Democrat spokesman, now Lord Tyler, speaking before Mr. Michael Brown—a maverick, if ever there were one—appeared on the scene with his cheque book. In response to Paul Tyler, the Leader of the House said:

> "We can move forward on a consensual basis on this and the Electoral Commission provides an interesting way of doing so.—[Official Report, 16 December 2004; Vol. 428, c. 1822–25.]

I followed up such matters on 14 July by asking the current Leader of the House for a debate. He played a straight bat and said:

> "These matters are important and the House should discuss them."—[Official Report, 14 July 2005; Vol. 436, c. 968.]

He was supporting the end, but not providing the means.

Hon. Members may wish to focus on many recommendations in the report, such as spending limits—national and local—political donations, policy development grants and the extension of freepost to local elections. I shall focus on the recommendations that would improve the viability of our political parties and put matters into context. It is common ground that all is not well with our parliamentary democracy. Turnout has fallen in general elections—an important barometer of political engagement. If turnout continues to decline, it could undermine the legitimacy of our Parliament. Our main parties have declining membership. The Labour party is down from more than 400,000 in 1997 to about half that number now. In 1977, we had a membership of about 400,000 and it is now down to about 300,000, most of whom are opening their envelopes as I speak.

Collectively, politicians are held in low esteem, somewhere near that of journalists and estate agents, although I note that local Members of Parliament, as individuals, are more highly regarded. There is widespread cynicism and apathy about the political process with young people, in particular, disengaging. Abstention from elections is something that they boast about rather than apologise for, and there are signs that their disengagement is becoming permanent as they grow older.

There is no off-the-shelf remedy that will restore the health of our political system. We need a variety of solutions. The Puttnam report, commissioned by the Hansard Society, has some radical proposals for improving the interface between the House of Commons and the world outside. We need to continue examining how we conduct our business within the House. We must make it more relevant and accessible to those whom we represent. We need to reform Prime Minister's questions. Parliament needs to be more representative of society as a whole. We need to do more of the work that my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden has been doing at universities and with young people. Ministerial conduct needs to be beyond reproach. We must make intelligent use of technology to interact better with our electorate.

However, part of the solution is healthier, more broadly based, more representative and more active political parties. Political parties are much maligned, but they are essential to the democratic health of the country. They recruit, motivate and train the people who stand for public office; none of us would be in Westminster Hall this morning were it not for our parties. Parties provide policy platforms that give voters a choice of administration at every level, and then seek to deliver that programme in office. They provide a legitimate means of expression for the political, economic and social interests in our society. They are the channels for political and intellectual discourse and debate and for refining new ideas into practical policies. They promote interest and turnout in elections and engage with the electorate both locally and nationally.

Our main parties have long histories and proud achievements. They have nurtured the great leaders of our country—one of whom needed succour from two parties—and then given them a platform from which to conduct the affairs of state. However, parties need infrastructure to ensure that they can discharge the demands of the political system. Our parties are hollowing out and dying on their feet. They are heavily in debt. Paragraph 3.34 of the Electoral Commission report says:

[Sir George Young]

> "it is clear that most parties are having difficulties raising sufficient funds to meet their day-to-day costs let alone the burden of funding major election campaigns. Borrowing appears to be used to meet the shortfalls."

The report goes on to say that

> "It is . . . no exaggeration to say that if political parties were businesses some could be regarded as trading while insolvent."

Parties have never been less popular. Fewer people identify with them, vote for them or join them. There are many reasons for that, but the way in which they are funded is partly responsible for that disengagement and disenchantment. All parties have been hit by bad coverage deriving from the current regime, which obliges parties to seek large donations from individuals and their companies. Enron, Mittal, PowderJect and Ecclestone have hit this Government; ours was hit by Asil Nadir and others. The Liberal Democrats were hit by Michael Brown. The consequent adverse publicity surrounding funding leads to a vicious spiral; there is then less incentive to join and support the parties that have become so tainted, and that leads in turn to more dependence on large donations. Some 58 per cent. of the donation income received by parties between 2001 and 2003 was obtained from donations in excess of £100,000. Such rows hit not just the party concerned, but the political process. Because of the transparency of the donations on the one hand, and the complexity of the decision-making process and political networks on the other, it is difficult to allay accusations that no one gives that sort of money for nothing.

Page 15 of the Electoral Commission report includes the proposition that

> "Funding parties by voluntary donations is unfair because there is a risk that wealthy individuals, businesses and trade unions can buy" votes. That proposition was supported by 70 per cent. of those surveyed. More recently, trade unions have been asking what they get for their money. If a new super-union emerges it, together with Unison, would account for almost half the Labour party's income; that is an almost unprecedented concentration of power.

Paragraph 1.6 of the Electoral Commission report summed up the problem as follows:

> "Despite enhanced levels of public scrutiny of party finances since the introduction of PPERA, there is continuing public unease about the possible influence of large donations on the political process."

I believe that we need to encourage broad-based political parties with a wide membership if we are to reduce dependence on those donations. The measure that I support is not a pretext to put up one's feet; on the contrary, it is an incentive to get out there and recruit more members.

There is a way forward; it was outlined by the Neill committee in 1998 and repeated in a modified form by the Electoral Commission in 2004. The Neill committee recommended tax relief, limited to the basic rate, on donations of up to £500 to eligible registered political parties. The committee noted that in several countries, including the United States, Canada and Italy, personal donations to political parties qualified for income tax relief, and it suggested that a similar tax relief should be introduced in the UK to encourage an activity that the committee regarded as both

> "meritorious and . . . a contribution to the democratic process."

In the committee's view, the principal advantage to such a scheme was that it would encourage a different pattern of political donations, so that parties would not rely for their funding needs on a relatively small number of donors, each making large donations. The committee said:

> "We have found very widespread support for the view that it is more democratic, and therefore in the public interest, that political parties should be funded by a large number of small donations rather than by a small number of large donations."

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): In that case, does my right hon. Friend favour a ban on large donations?

Sir George Young: I shall come to whether the introduction of tax relief should be accompanied by a cap on large donations. I think that there has to be a trade-off, and I shall touch on that in a moment.

The quotation concludes:

> "A system of tax relief which increases the value to political parties of smaller donations is likely to encourage the parties to make greater efforts to obtain them".

In addition, the committee noted that one further advantage to this method of party funding over the direct payment of state funds was that

> "the allocation of the relief is in the hands of individual taxpayers and requires a contribution from them."

I believe that tax relief would give the right signal that engagement with a political party is a civic activity to be encouraged. A citizen should be proud to be a paid-up member of a political party, not regarded as someone from a Bateman cartoon.

I remember the married couple's allowance, and I do not think that anyone got married to claim that allowance. However, the existence of the allowance was a statement by Parliament that the institution of marriage deserved support and gave stability to society. Likewise, I believe that tax relief would have a symbolic importance; it would be a statement that joining a political party was a worthwhile civic activity. Such a regime, as I have said, would be taxpayer-led, not Government-led. It would encourage a democratic response and begin to redress the danger of large institutions or individuals gaining disproportionate influence.

The Government voted this recommendation down when we debated Neill. Indeed, I think that it was the only Neill recommendation that they did not implement. These were their reasons:

> "the Committee proposed that donations to political parties, below a certain level, should be eligible for income tax relief at the basic rate. The Government is not persuaded by this recommendation. Tax relief would amount to general state aid by another route. A tax-relief scheme would be expensive for the Inland Revenue and political parties to administer relative to the > likely level of take-up. Furthermore, the Government has to balance the loss of revenue (likely to be upwards of £4 or £5 million a year) against other spending priorities."

Of course we have to keep an eye on public expenditure, but any hon. Member worth his salt could find £5 million out of the Government's budget in half a day. The Neill committee rightly rejected the Government's arguments. It said:

> "We are disappointed that you have decided against our proposals in relation to a tax relief system on the ground, amongst others, that it 'would be expensive for the Inland Revenue and political parties to administer relative to the likely level of take-up' . . . Bearing in mind that tax relief is given to thousands of charities, we thought it unlikely that the administrative costs would be prohibitive. In a recent Written Answer . . . Lord Bassam of Brighton . . . has stated that the administrative costs of a tax relief scheme have not been estimated. We invite you to make such an estimate, and we strongly urge you to reconsider our proposals on tax relief on political donations in the light of your conclusions as to the administrative cost of their implementation."

To date, it appears that the Government have not responded to that request.

I understand the Conservative party's aversion to increases in public expenditure and I would not force any party to accept the money if its scruples prevented it from so doing. However, I remind my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden, who may be clutching a hostile brief, that we all voted for the Neill recommendations at the time.

However, I accept a related argument that, if we want more public support, we must put our house in order. There is excessive expenditure at election time—what economists call "conspicuous consumption"—and I have no objection to the national cap on expenditure coming down, not that we see much of that in my constituency of North-West Hampshire. There are campaigning styles that irritate and switch off the voter, and I would like to see a less media-intensive campaign that cost a lot and more locally based campaigns using volunteers.

Since Neill reported, the position has got worse. We had the slump in turnout in 2001. Indeed, the Neill Committee recognised that > "it was likely that some of our recommendations would inhibit the parties' ability to raise funds and result in additional pressures on the finances of political parties which were already under strain."

The committee was right to be so worried.

The Electoral Commission took over the baton from the Neill committee and made a similar recommendation in the report that is the subject of this morning's debate. Its scheme is built on the gift aid scheme, under which, again, individual donors, not the Government, decide. The purpose is to reduce the dependency on large donations and to broaden the membership base. After reviewing how such schemes and match-funding schemes had operated in other spheres, the commission recommended:

> "A system of income tax relief on small donations to political parties should be introduced. The scheme should be limited to relatively small donations, up to a value of £200 (or the first £200 of larger donations) in any tax year, the value being up-rated in line with inflation. We recommend that tax relief should be given on membership subscriptions and cash donations, but not on benefits-in-kind or on payments which involve a potential benefit to the donor.
>
> The system should be open only to those registered parties that can demonstrate representation or a significant level of electoral activity at the Westminster, European, devolved or local level."

The commission further recommended that donations from non-taxpayers should attract an additional sum to the party, equivalent to the level of tax relief.

That concept of support for political parties is not new; we have policy development grants, Short money—Margaret Thatcher was the first Prime Minister to be elected using state funding—party political broadcasts, freepost and the free hire of public buildings. The Electoral Commission is advocating a logical and necessary extension of a system that is already in existence.

On the intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester, I also favour a cap on donations, so that the public can see that money cannot buy influence or leave politicians beholden to funders. I recognise that the Electoral Commission is not pressing for that at the moment, and my hon. Friend might develop his point if he catches your eye, Mr. Taylor.

The public seem to want an end to large donations, with all the problems that they involve. However, people need educating about the fact that, if that source of income is cut off, and parties are to continue doing what is expected of them, the shortfall will somehow have to be made good. The proposals that I advocate will not replace such donations, and that is perhaps one reason why we should not ban them at once. If we want to phase them out, however, we need to begin to phase the alternative regime in.

I understand that a Government who are perhaps not popular might not want to risk further unpopularity by going down that route. A survey commissioned by the Electoral Commission showed initial hostility to the proposition of taxpayer subsidy. However 70 per cent. also said that funding parties by means of voluntary donations is unfair, because there is a risk that wealthy individuals, businesses and trade unions could buy influence over parties. Cragg Ross Dawson, which conducted research for the commission, found that the public, after deliberation, were broadly in favour of increased, or total, public funding of political parties, even if it would necessarily be funded through the tax system. The reasons given included less sleaze, the low cost to taxpayers and a fairer system.

The Labour party was the only party to comment on party funding in its manifesto for the general election. It said:

> "Having been the first government to take action to clean up the funding of political parties, we will continue to work with the independent Electoral Commission to explore how best to support the vital democratic role of political parties while recognizing that campaigning activity must always be funded by parties from their own resources."

Just two months ago, in September, Lord Levy—his appetite for raising funds apparently beginning to be exhausted—announced that he would retire from his position as a Labour party fundraiser when the Prime Minister retired. He said:

> "I think it is important that an overall review takes place on the issue of party funding. In that framework the issue of state funding should be explored."

He prompted a brief exchange of letters in The Times and received support from Vernon Bogdanor, a constitutional expert, who supported limits to individual donations and match funding. I believe that that would be the right move and I am sure that the Prime Minister would welcome it, as indeed would the Minister, if it meant more evenings at home, instead of sitting in a ball gown in Grosvenor house next to some boring but rich potential donor discussing the taxation of offshore oil exploration. The beginning of a new Parliament is the right time to make such a move.

[Sir George Young]

I rest my case. Two independent bodies have given their verdict, one at the specific request of this Government. The other was a new body that was set up by them and is charged with examining our electoral system. The Government have so far rejected the common recommendation and they have made the problem worse by some of the other actions that they have taken. The right time to take the matter forward is at the beginning of a Parliament, with some political cover from some members of the Opposition. I look forward to a positive and encouraging reply from the Minister.

9.50 am

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): I have spoken and written about this subject quite a bit, but I will not rehearse what I said, standing where I am now, when I succeeded in securing a debate on this issue three years ago.

I want to pick up on a number of points. My right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) has done a superb job in setting out the field. I agree with almost everything that he said and I hope that the Labour Government are listening carefully.

There is a huge gap between the public image of us and the reality. The reality is that the vast majority of MPs are uncorrupt and the vast majority of British politics is conducted in an uncorrupt fashion. It is probably more uncorrupt than any other major democracy. We have a huge number of people dedicated to public service in this institution. The tragedy is that this is completely swamped and swept aside by the image created as a consequence of a relatively small number of problems which derive from the way in which we run our constitutional and parliamentary affairs. One of them is donations to political parties, which is why we need to address it.

In that regard, there is a stench of political corruption in the nostrils of the electorate. Frankly, it is not all a stench of their imagining: there has been the Ecclestone £1 million; the PowderJect donation; Mr. Mittal's donation in exchange, it appears, for the letter that went to the Prime Minister of Romania about its steel industry; the Hinduja £1 million donation to the dome, which was alleged to be in exchange for a passport application; and the blind trust, which we still have. How blind can a blind trust be when the key person running it is the doorkeeper to the Prime Minister and his key assistant for the first half of Labour's term was the hon. Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson)? That does not build and sustain the electorate's confidence in party donations.

There have also been honours sales on a massive scale: Messrs Bragg, Gavron, Haskins and Sainsbury. The front page of The Times today leads on the story, lest the public are beginning to think that the stench in the nostrils is diminishing. The headline states: "Sleaze row as election donors get peerages". So, there have been some more honours sales. Of course, both sides are involved.

The unions have been at this for many years. They have demanded changes in employment policy. For example, the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers demanded such changes and said that if it did not get them, it would withdraw constituency support from a number of Labour MPs. The Liberals have had a scandal of their own.

At this point, a number of hon. Members must feel that I have decided to ignore my party. I am completely devoid of an answer to the good piece of research by the Institute for Public Policy Research into the allocation of peerages prior to the 1997 election, which showed that 50 per cent. of knighthoods and peerages went to companies that made donations to the Conservative party, whereas only 6 per cent. of them went to other companies. I have not been able to think how that extraordinary imbalance could have come about other than its perhaps involving just a whiff of the stench of political corruption in our own nostrils as well.

The truth is that there is a conspiracy of near silence—a shuffling of the feet on the part of all parties, including the Liberal party and, in particular, the major parties. We need to bring it to an end, and the only way to do that is to ban large donations. It is such donations, whether from unions, rich individuals or companies, that create a bad impression. I would favour setting a cap as low as £1,000, but I have been persuaded that it should perhaps be £5,000.

If we were to introduce such a low cap, parties would be short of cash—but how short? One of the illusions that we have allowed to develop in the minds of the electorate is that parties are somehow self-funding and that state funding scarcely exists. My right hon. Friend mentioned some of the state funding that exists. If he had turned that into numbers, he would have found that there is a reasonable case for saying—an orthodox view—that, taking into account total state funding in cash or kind, including free access to television and radio for party political broadcasting, and other forms of support such as the free drop during general elections, roughly half of all party political activity in Britain is funded by the state in one way or another. Therefore, we are talking about the other half.

How much of the other half consists of large donations? It is probably 50 or 60 per cent.—between a quarter and a third of the total cost of party politics. Either we will have to plug that gap or parties will have to operate on rather less cash. British democracy would not collapse if parties had less funding with which to fight elections. Indeed, another of the Electoral Commission's proposals to which my right hon. Friend alluded was the possibility of reducing the limits on party funding during elections.

My right hon. Friend has supported strongly the proposal that there should be tax relief on political donations. I am sympathetic to that view, but I do not think that it is the best way forward. However, I would not allow the best to be the enemy of the good. A matching funding scheme is the most sensible way forward, for several reasons. One is that it is easy to adjust the amount that ends up in the hands of parties because it does not have to be a 50 per cent. match; it could be a 60:40 or 30:70 match, which would ensure some continuity of funding to political parties. It is also very direct. I could turn up in my constituency and say, "If each of you will raise x, I can get y back." That is clearer and more direct than saying that people should fill in a form to enable them to get tax relief, so that is the scheme that I favour.

The Government's arguments against those proposals scarcely stand up. They say that it is state funding by another route, but we already have huge state funding in cash and in kind. They also claim that it would be too expensive, and my right hon. Friend correctly swept that argument aside with a wave of the hand, saying that they could find a few million very quickly. It is also worth bearing in mind that we already spend a huge amount—far more than the £5 million or £8 million that might be required—trying to bolster the public's confidence in the electoral system in other ways. For example, increased funding has gone to the Electoral Commission, which probably costs three times as much to run as it cost to administer the task in the Home Office, which ran the system prior to the creation of the Electoral Commission.

The seismic change has to be the complete banning of large donations. If we do that, we have a good chance of restoring some of the electorate's faith in political parties and we will certainly make it much more difficult for people to claim—I am afraid with some justification—that honours can buy power and influence and have been bought by party donations. Such party donations are listed on the front page of The Times today.

I have raised the matter on numerous occasions, and I get the standard replies from the Government that have obviously been prepared carefully in the Department. I have also raised it with Sam Younger. I thought that he produced an excellent report, but unfortunately it funked this key issue. Only last week, in the Constitutional Affairs Committee, I said to him that

> "you shied away from the key recommendation which might have addressed it, did you not?"

He replied:

> "Yes . . . it is fair to say that we did".

He then explained why, and I think that this is quite interesting. He said that the trouble is that on the one hand, the electorate said:

> "We do not like the idea of big money being able, as we see it, potentially to buy influence", and that, on the other hand, people said,

> "'Is it right that public money should go to political parties', the answer is 'no'."

Of course, that is a problem for us. It is a problem for Sam Younger. But is that not what we politicians should be about: convincing the electorate that they already put money into political parties, that it is right that they should and that a modest increase—which is all we are talking about—in return for getting rid of large donations must be a sensible way forward. Is it not important that the Electoral Commission, rather than engaging in "followship", should try a bit of leadership? Is it not the job of Sam Younger and the Electoral Commission to take a view? Would it not be helpful if, as a result of this debate, the Electoral Commission had a clear sense that it needs to come back to the issue and give us a stronger steer on that key recommendation?

I rest my case. If we succeed in getting a ban on large donations, I am confident that we can restore a good deal of the trust in political parties that the electorate appears to have shed. If we do not, articles such as that on the front page of The Times will continue, as will the haemorrhaging of public confidence in party activity.

10.2 am

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): First, I congratulate the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) on initiating a particularly timely, as it turns out from today's headlines, debate on an important subject. I also congratulate him on the content of his speech and the way in which he set out the issue. He was ably followed by the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie), who added value to the debate and made it plain that the issue should be addressed. I am a little surprised that all parties are not represented in the Chamber this morning, because the matter quintessentially affects us all and we ought to hear a range of opinions on it.

I agree entirely with the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire. There is no excuse for the delay in responding to the Electoral Commission's proposals. It is an extraordinary lacuna in the Government's response, particularly in the context of the Bill we will be dealing with this afternoon, which, it might be thought, could have been an appropriate vehicle for some of the necessary reforms.

I also agree that it would be wonderful if we could reach consensus. It would make all our lives, including those of Ministers, easier if we had a common view. I fear that that may be a counsel of perfection. It may be that self-interest will get in the way of the interests of the country in providing a proper and effective system that inspires the confidence of the electorate and, at the same time, ensures a vibrant democratic system. There is inevitably a bias in favour of maintaining the huge disparities in funding. If we went before the Competition Commission, the clear view would be that some parties hold monopolistic positions in this country. They do so because they can attract funding, and good luck to them, but that reduces genuine democratic competition in this country significantly.

Both hon. Members who spoke made significant points about large donations. I shall address those points, because the effects or potential effects of extremely large donations to any of the parties colours the public's perception. I say "potential effects" because there is no difference between real and perceived influence in that they both reduce the confidence of the electorate in political parties and the political system.

What are the potential effects of large donations to political parties? There is a perception that they might affect the personnel of parties—people who might be elected in particular constituencies—or, indeed, the party leadership. We need only look at the election of the Conservative party leader—not this one, but the previous one—in which people who donated large amounts made no bones about the fact that they would stop their donations unless the leader of the Conservative party was removed and a new person put in his place. When the new person was put in place—who was equally ineffective in some ways—the large donations resumed. That was a direct influence on the way in which a political party proceeded.

[Mr. David Heath]

Another effect of such donations is one that borders on corrupt practice. It is the perception that if someone gives a large donation to a Government party, or a party that aspires to Government, their business will profit because they will have direct access to contracts or a more benevolent business environment in which to work. The concern was expressed in both the Mittal and Bernie Ecclestone cases that donations were somehow having an effect on Government policy. Whether that is true or not is almost immaterial to my argument.

There is a fear that large donations can affect party policies disproportionately in relation to the mood within the party or the views of ordinary party members. If someone has a strong view on a particular policy area and is prepared to back it up with an awful lot of money, that view may prevail.

There can also be a direct influence on the conduct of elections. We know that a limited number of seats are likely to change hands in an election under our system, so a wholly disproportionate effect can be gained by the application of significant amounts of funding in marginal seats. The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire said that he saw little evidence of that in his constituency. Well, I am not surprised, but I saw considerable evidence of it in my constituency because it is a perennial marginal seat. It might be described as a safe marginal seat, as I always extend my majority, but by nothing so vulgar as to put it into four figures. There is undoubtedly directed funding. I do not say that political parties should not target seats; we all do that, but—we shall explore this when we consider the Electoral Administration Bill—there is a limit to what national parties should be able to put into local campaigns.

Donors can also have an influence by putting money directly into marginal seats to sustain a candidacy during a Parliament, or through third-party advertising or involvement. We saw that with the short-lived Referendum party, which tried to have a direct effect on a number of marginal seats represented not only by Members from my party but by Conservative Members. Those who did not pass the test—those who did not have a true Europhobic attitude—had material distributed in their constituencies, irrespective of whether that party—the word should be in inverted commas—had candidates standing in those constituencies. That, too, had a direct effect on the conduct of elections.

Another matter touches on the activities of the Referendum party, but it is of far greater concern in connection with the more extreme parties. That is the effect that a large donation could have on a fringe party. A millionaire or multimillionaire could buy a small fringe party lock, stock and barrel, funding it out of all proportion to its membership or following for the direct electoral effect that it could have. Essentially, it would be a party of one—one very rich man who could put forward an extreme position in constituencies throughout the country. We should be worried about that.

Last is the link—it is more than perception—between patronage and the expectation of honours. One must assume that The Times has the correct information, but as the hon. Member for Chichester pointed out, today's edition tell us of the new working peers who are to be created. We read that Sir David Garrard and Sir Gulam Noon each made donations of more than £200,000 to the Labour party. Sir David obviously spreads his bets a little; he once donated £70,000 to the Conservative party. He clearly needed to support political parties of one sort of another—no doubt with no expectation of preferment. The new Conservative peer, Mr. Robert Edmiston, gave the party £250,000 last year and happens to find himself on this year's honours list. I note that Mr. Jonathan Marland, whom I defeated in the 2001 election, is to be ennobled; he was generous with his donations in my constituency when he was a candidate, and he has no doubt made significant contributions to the country's good since leaving Somerton and Frome and finding new roles elsewhere.

I do not single out individuals because, as the hon. Member for Chichester said, a series of honours lists have been filled with people who happen to have been generous benefactors to the various political parties. As has been pointed out, we are going back to the days of Lloyd George. Although Lloyd George did many good things, the way in which he dealt with the peerage lists was not one of the most salubrious aspects of his political career. It was wrong.

I am almost tempted to say that I would rather have a peer who was preferred by patronage in the 18th century than one who was preferred last week, because the former would be in a more disinterested position. I do not take that view, however, because I want to see an elected upper House. Indeed, I look forward to the day when we have an elected House, as we will not have any of this patronage nonsense. Some people in high positions want to see the whole of the second Chamber put in place by a rotten system in which one pays a lot of money to a political party and ends up making the law, but that is not defensible in any circumstances.

What is the answer? I agree with those who say that there should be a cap on large donations. That is appropriate, and I make no bones about it. However, doing so could cause a funding gap that prevented the political parties from doing their work effectively. I speak for a party that has never been able to raise large donations in any number, despite recent headlines to the contrary. We have always relied on small donations from our members and from fundraising activities. All the political parties could live on less if they tried. We do not do too badly, despite the fact that we have a disproportionately smaller amount to spend.

There is a very good argument, which we have already heard, for the state to recognise the role of the political parties in the political system. As has already been said, the principle of public funding is not new; it emerged years ago. We have Short money, policy development money, freepost, party political broadcasts and public buildings, so it is nonsense for Conservative Front Benchers to continue to believe firmly—I hope that I shall be proved wrong—that public funding is somehow anathema. They benefit from it enormously. The Conservative Front Bench is paid for out of public funds. I do not argue that it should not be, because the Opposition are part of making our political system work, but it is utter humbug to say that public funding cannot be extended to ensure that the greater political will is done.

I do not believe that large donations from public funds is the answer, either. That would be the wrong way to do it. The public would be rightly suspicious if someone simply put their hand in the Treasury, pulled out a large sum of money and said, "Here you are. Here's some money to spend on your political campaigning." I do believe, however, that linking funding to money raised from members of local parties or through local fundraising is very appropriate, because it directly links the amount that is being dispensed with the activity levels of the local parties. It has been suggested that there are two ways of doing that, one of which is tax relief. I do not buy for a moment the Treasury line that that is too difficult; as the right hon. Gentleman says, how many charities do we have in this country, and how many political parties? It is nonsense to suggest that that cannot be managed.

I believe that match funding is a better way of raising funds, simply because it is simpler, more transparent and more obvious. We have made the modest suggestion that one way of providing the funding for that, without huge damage to the programme of the Government or future Governments, might be a 10 per cent. cut in the Government's £200 million advertising budget. That would pay for match funding; that would deal with it. Problem solved. Would the public recoil at the prospect of 10 per cent. less Government advertising? I suspect that they would not. Would they benefit from the political parties being free of the confines of large donors and perceptions of sleaze? Yes, they would. I believe that that is a sensible way forward, and I hope that the hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) can match the eloquence of his colleagues and their desire to make a real difference. I hope that the Minister will respond positively, or at least respond, to what the Electoral Commission has said.

10.18 am

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): I, too, congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) on securing this debate on a subject that is long overdue for discussion. It is, in some ways, sad that it is being held in this Chamber rather than in the main Chamber of the House of Commons, but at least we have the chance to discuss the matter today. I am also grateful to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) for his challenge. I would be hard put to match the eloquence of my right hon. Friend, but I shall try to deal with some of the issues that he mentioned.

My starting point is that I do not believe there to be a public appetite for a massive extension of the state funding of political parties. People would be extremely angry if we told them we know that they could face tax rises or cuts in public expenditure because of the state of the economy, and that it will be a difficult year for the health service and an extremely difficult year for our local authorities, particularly in the south-east, but that, by the way, we plan to change the rules so that we in the political parties have to do less work and will be funded by the taxpayer.

An important distinction should be drawn between supporting parliamentary work and duties, such as that which Short money enables, and a broader support for parties' political campaigning. The electorate would have greater difficulty accepting that, especially when they dislike much of the modern style of political campaigning.

I take on board what my right hon. Friend said about the disengagement of the electorate, but part of that is down to the style of campaigning, which leaves them cold. We need to inspire them, and to appeal to their hopes and aspirations rather than frighten them. There is an advertising belief that elections are won by being negative. I believe that we win elections by showing that we have policies to which people can relate and which they feel represent a better way of doing things. If that advertising theory came through in campaigning, people would feel that they were paying more money in taxes to subsidise such activity.

In this country, voting is voluntary, whereas in some other countries it is compulsory, but we have chosen not to adopt that approach. Why should every taxpayer, including those who have chosen not to vote, be obliged to contribute towards the campaigning activities of political parties.

My right hon. Friend spoke about the decline in election turnouts. Only 13 years ago there was an historically high turnout, so there has not been an inexorable decline over decades: it comes and goes. A decline in turnout is more likely when people ask themselves whether the election really matters and whether their vote will make a difference. It depends on whether they care or whether they have contempt for the entire political system. They feel disillusioned for many reasons, but no one has ever said to me that they feel disillusioned because of how political parties are funded. As my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) said, it is part of a wider element, but not one of the key issues that affect voting. The problem will certainly not be resolved if we say to people who are already disillusioned that they will have to pay a little more in tax to fund a system that they dislike.

In 1992, when we had that historically high turnout, we had the same funding system as we have now. There was a little difference in the amount of Short money available, but the parties were funded through voluntary principles. Some of the extremely rich made significant contributions. That did not prevent people from voting in the election.

Sir George Young: Has not there been a significant change since then with the introduction of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000, which has made it much more difficult for all political parties to raise money from companies?

Charles Hendry: Yes, that has made a difference. It is part of the answer to the question to which my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester could not find an answer. Pre-1997, many public companies gave money to the Conservative party, because there were not the same rules on declarations and openness, and they were profoundly concerned about the implications of the election of a Labour Government. It was not surprising that many of those business leaders ended up in the House of Lords, because in those days more companies provided support to the Conservative party. My right hon. Friend is undoubtedly right that there has been a significant change because of that. However, the biggest change has been the perception that donors now get much more in return for a small amount of money.

[Charles Hendry]

My right hon. Friend also spoke about the declining membership of parties. A significant element of that has nothing to do with the funding of parties, but with the move towards computerisation in our associations. In my association, membership is highest in branches that have a determined troop of people who go round knocking on doors every year. When someone new moves into the area, the first person who turns up is the chairman of the local Conservative branch, who finds out what they are interested in and whether they want to join the party. We have the most vibrant branches in those areas. Computerisation has significantly contributed to that. There is also a general lack of willingness of younger people to join organisations, be they political parties or charities.

If we go down the route of state funding, we will end up with people paying taxes to support the views of parties that they dislike or even abhor. It is difficult to draw a distinction to prevent the British National party from receiving some state funding. We cannot have a system that makes available state funding but only to those parties whose views we happen to like and believe are acceptable. Under the proposed system, if people wanted to vote for it the BNP it would have to be eligible for funding and it is reprehensible and unacceptable that taxes would be used to fund such racist activity.

State funding would undermine rather than underpin our representative democracy. It is unhealthy for parties to be dependent on the state as it limits their freedom for manoeuvre and their ability to talk about what they really think. To consider it from a different dimension, there is a suggestion that there should be funding from the European Commission to parties that are genuinely pan-European. What is worrying is the expectation that it would also require parties eligible for funding to have commitments to various European ideals: essentially, parties can have access to state funding only if they fit into the pot of what we think a political party should be doing. That fundamentally undermines the principles of representative democracy.

Sir George Young: What has happened to the party to which my hon. Friend and I belong since 1999, when we all voted for a slightly more generous scheme in the House of Commons than that proposed by the Electoral Commission? We knew all the arguments but none the less the Conservative party voted for amendments that would have implemented the scheme that my hon. Friend is now speaking against.

Charles Hendry: As I said earlier, there is a distinction to be drawn between voting for support for parliamentary duties to ensure that those in this building can operate effectively and properly and support for campaigning; there are other aspects of the matter that I shall mention in a moment. There is a fundamental difference.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there are methods of securing the assent of individual electors to a proportion of what would otherwise go in their taxes to support for political parties which would gainsay the idea that one puts money in to support parties that one does not necessarily agree with? Those methods might therefore be the answer to the question that the hon. Gentleman poses.

Charles Hendry: We must either have a system of state funding for all political parties or a system that limits state funding. That route leads down the slippery slope; we cannot pick and choose between parties simply because we do not like them. There must be some consistency, which is lacking.

The voluntary principle is fundamental to how our political parties work and we should encourage it; state funding would undermine it. A typical situation is that each party would receive £2 million in state funding—about 10 per cent. of their election spending. That would undermine their ability to say what they truly believed because to some extent they would be dependent on the state and therefore could not speak as freely as they might wish to.

Mr. Heath: I should be interested to know whether the hon. Gentleman and his Front-Bench colleagues in the Conservative party are constrained in what they are entitled to say or believe by the application of state funding for duties in this House.

Charles Hendry: It comes again to the distinction between support for parliamentary duties to ensure that we can hold the Government to account and operate our organisations within Parliament, and support for campaigning. The public would draw a distinction between them. They want the Government held to account and they want this place to operate efficiently, but there is not a great demand out there for paying extra money in taxes so that we can campaign against each other in elections. Once we started down that slippery slope we would move into a vicious circle whereby people in our constituencies would do a little bit less because more came from the taxpayer. Then they would say, "Come on, give us just a little bit more, because that will enable us to do what we need to do," which would undermine the principle of voluntary activity in the party.

The present system under which the parties have to raise their own funds makes them think very carefully how they spend it. They know that if they have only a limited income and they choose to spend it on advertising on billboards rather than on direct mail, there is less money to spend on other things. It means, therefore, that they must be careful in their choices about how to spend it.

The point made by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome about the targeting of marginal seats is, to some extent, a red herring in this debate. Clearly, parties target their efforts on marginal seats and will continue to do so whether there is state funding or voluntary funding. That is where the election is won. I share the hon. Gentleman's aversion to four-figure majorities and believe that a five-figure majority is much more encouraging. However, as to the way in which election campaigns will always be run, we must recognise that more effort will go into more marginal constituencies.

As my right hon. Friend said, there is already considerable subsidy for political activity, including, for example, free election postage and the use of air time on television. We must be extremely careful before we extend that too broadly into a more general approach to political campaigning subsidies. I have great sympathy for the idea of tax relief on political donations. There are grounds for consistency. If people who give money to a charity can be given tax relief on that, I do not see why a distinction should be drawn so that, uniquely among voluntary organisations, political parties are excluded. I should be grateful for the Minister's response about tax relief, which should be part of the way forward.

My right hon. Friend touched briefly in his opening remarks on policy development grants. The manner in which that funding is allocated is flawed. It is not right that the money should be given equally to the parties. For example, the Government have tremendous additional resources for policy development. A key part of the Government machine is organised towards policy development. To give them the same contribution through the policy development grant is wrong. The allocation should also relate to the level of support for the parties.

There has been some discussion already about whether a cap should be imposed on donations. In a free society people should be able to spend their money as they wish, especially with clear rules on declarations. The argument is a sideshow in the debate.

Mr. Tyrie rose—

Charles Hendry: I shall give way in a moment, but I want to deal first with a point that my hon. Friend made. What is most important is to get rid of the blurred lines from the trails of paperwork, so that the connections between giving funding and receiving Government contracts can be seen, and to deal with issues such as the increasing politicisation of the civil service. Along with that must go a fundamental reform of the House of Lords. As the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome said, until there is a majority elected House of Lords, we will not get the transparency that we need.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chichester raised the suggestion that anything over £1,000 should be capped. Even if we were to take the capping route, that would be ludicrously low. In a typical non-election year the major parties will raise £10 million each, and £1,000 is one ten-thousandth of their spending; it is what they spend in less than an hour each day. During the debate the main parties have spent more than £1,000 on general running costs, never mind what they spend on their campaigning in an election. A cap at such a level suggests that someone would gain favours for contributing a small amount that would pay for a political party's running costs for an hour. That is ludicrous.

Mr. Tyrie: Perhaps we could take a look at a £5,000 cap, if my hon. Friend does not like £1,000.

I just wanted to clarify one point. I heard virtually non-stop argument against all forms of extension of state funding. Indeed, so strongly held were the views expressed that sometimes I thought that my party's Front Bench would voluntarily hand back Short money and the policy funding. Then, a moment later, I heard what I thought was support for the proposal to extend state funding sharply, by offering tax relief to individuals who donate to political parties. Is that my party's policy?

Charles Hendry: It is indeed. It was the policy that my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) advocated when she was party chairman and involved with the Electoral Commission. It was said that we should aim at having tax relief up to a donation limit of about £500.

The difference is that a blanket subsidy does not go to a particular political party. That is wrong. It follows the principle that if, people contribute towards a charity they are entitled to tax relief, so why should a political party as a voluntary organisation uniquely be excluded from that process?

Dr. Whitehead: Is not a short step towards the process of ticking off a small level of support for a political party the use of a tax return? If a person is not well off enough to make a large donation to a party, a small sum, which is under the control of the person making the tax return, can go to the political party of his or her choice. Is that principle in any way different from what the hon. Gentleman suggested when he referred to tax relief in respect of perhaps different donations?

Charles Hendry: Tax relief is a more consistent approach because it is available to anyone when giving money to charity. The organisation can claim tax back on the contribution. That is the most consistent way forward. It ties in directly with the contribution of the individual rather than supporting a blanket contribution from the Exchequer to the individual actions of political parties, which would cause a more fundamental problem for the reasons that I have outlined.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome spoke about problems in respect of caps on contributions when one person funds a political party. We must be careful about such matters. He may have had in mind James Goldsmith and the funding of the Referendum party, which was very much a one-man party. My worry about such an approach is that the party ended up getting well over 1 million votes. It was clearly in touch with what people felt, and which they did not consider was represented by other parties. I absolutely oppose what he stood for, but to say that an individual who passionately believes in something should not be allowed to support or set up a political party to carry forward views that were not advocated by the mainstream parties is a fundamental denial of people's democratic rights.

Even if we disagreed with what James Goldsmith stood for, the fact that more than 1 million people voted for him showed that he was touching an important vein of opinion in society. However, had his party been reliant on state funding or had there been caps on donations, that could not have happened. Such matters represent important issues in our democracy.

All of us in our constituency lives come across a range of voluntary organisations that are struggling for funding. They have to find new projects because they cannot receive funding for older projects. After three years, funding dries up and they become fed up with the form filling. People who work in the voluntary organisations will say, "Will you explain why you consider that it is more important to support political funding through a block grant than it is to support us in our work for the homeless and the elderly in other sections of society?" There will be tremendous anger over block grants. Tax relief is a different approach. It recognises the contributions that people have made and it is tied in to individual decisions rather than block grants.

[Charles Hendry]

We are all keen to know what the Minister has to say, because we have waited a long time for a response to the report. I am sorry to have detained hon. Members for an extra few minutes, while other parties will be spending an extra £1,000 to hear what the Minister has to say in her overdue response.

10.39 am

The Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs (Ms Harriet Harman): I join other hon. Members in congratulating the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) on instituting the debate and on the amount of work that he has done on the issue. He has put in a great deal of thought and approached the matter with consistent principles, which he has brought to the debate. Nearly all of what he said is self-evidently true.

I also congratulate the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) on his speech. He, too, has a long track record of speaking on the issue, and almost all he said was self-evidently true. Just as the right hon. Gentleman wrote the foreword to Matt Cain's important report for the Institute for Public Policy Research report—I pay tribute to. Matt and IPPR for their work on that report—so the hon. Member for Chichester contributed "Our politics is healthy. Our party finances stink" to a New Politics Network discussion paper. The analysis from the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) echoed and endorsed their comments.

I am glad that the Government have yet to produce our response to the Electoral Commission's report, because we now have the opportunity early in a new government term to look at the issue afresh. As a new Minister in the Department for Constitutional Affairs, I can get involved in this important debate.I cannot provide a detailed policy response this morning; indeed, I cannot make any new announcements at all. I hope, however, to respond to some of the principles that hon. Members have raised.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire is absolutely right to place the debate in a discussion about democracy. It is a problem if people feel cynical about democracy, and it is a problem if people do not vote. The hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) said that many things contribute to that happening. He is right but we must look at all the problems and act on those on which we can.

The hon. Gentleman also said that voting is voluntary and, as such, plays against the idea of tax-funded contributions to party activity. Although it is true that voting is voluntary, democracy is not—it is our one and only system. Just as it is right for people, even if they do not go to hospital, to pay for the NHS, because to do so is in the interests of the country, it is helpful to look at what is the best system of governance for the country. How can we sustain confidence in the democratic system? If people do not have confidence in democracy, it does not work.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire talked about the importance of political parties. Once again, I strongly agree. Political parties provide policy platforms and choice. They are the means to deliver those choices and are channels for political discourse. I regret that one can often cross out the words "political party" in newspaper articles or speeches from non-politicians and insert "criminal activity", only for the sentence to flow as easily.

We must re-argue the case for political activity and political parties. We politicians must restrain ourselves from saying, in order to curry favour with a certain audience, "This is not a political point but," as if we will spring free from politics. We all have a responsibility to make the case for politics and political parties. However, the right hon. Gentleman rightly said that parties need infrastructure. There we make the choice. Those who believe in democracy believe in political parties as an essential part of that democracy. Political parties need an infrastructure. Do we let political parties wither away or do we let them increasingly depend on donations from big companies and rich men? Or do we do something more? That is the choice we face.

The hon. Member for Wealden said that he did not see much public appetite for giving taxpayers' money to political parties. It is true that people do not rush up to us in the street to argue for tax funding for political parties. However, we do see public aversion to the idea that the principle of democracy, which is fundamentally about equality—that each individual has the same say and the same right—should be interfered with by rich individuals or rich companies buying into the process.

Perhaps I should declare an interest. I represent a constituency that includes Peckham. We do not have any millionaires in Peckham, and we probably do not have any people who would donate £5,000. The hon. Member for Wealden said that he thought £1,000—even £5,000—was a ludicrously small amount. At one level, I understand what he says. However, one should look at the matter from the point of view of my individual constituents and their estimation of what impact and influence they have on the constituency. I have sat round in Labour party meetings as my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Martin Linton) will have done in his neighbouring constituency in south London—incidentally, I pay tribute to the huge amount of work that he has done over many years on this subject. During those meetings, there may be a raffle of a few tins of food for the party, and people give very small sums of money. That is what it used to be like 20 years ago when I was first elected as a Member of Parliament. Local party members will be deterred from making such contributions and will not feel that they have a role in contributing to the party if they are completely "overfaced". If they think that donations are entirely the remit of millionaires, they will feel that they themselves do not matter. We should step back and think about those matters and their possible effects.

Charles Hendry: That section of the debate focused on whether there should be a cap on donations. The right hon. and learned Lady criticised the £1,000 and £5,000 level for rich people or businesses. She did not mention donations from trades unions, which would also be pretty significant. Is the right hon. and learned Lady for or against a cap?

Ms Harman: As I said when I began, I am generally discoursing on the issues; I am not pronouncing on policy, other than on what we have already said in our manifesto, which the hon. Gentleman kindly read out. I am just agreeing with some of the problems that have been raised. I cannot step forward, snap my fingers and say what I think the answer should be. I am really just empathising and recognising the truth of the problems that have been set out by some hon. Members in the debate.

Sir George Young: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Lady for giving way; we are enjoying the discourse. Do the Government intend to respond formally to the Electoral Commission's report and, if so, by what date?

Ms Harman: We will formally respond when we have had a full debate on the matter, to which this debate has contributed. We will respond in due course, but I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a specific time.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome made an important point about the difference between real and perceived influence and the difficulty of distinguishing between the two. There is also the difficulty of proving a negative. If people give money, the general assumption is that there is no such thing as a free lunch, and it is difficult to prove that there has not been undue influence.

Before the hon. Member for Wealden intervened, I declared an interest as the Member of Parliament for Camberwell and Peckham—an area not populated by millionaires. I intended to declare a further interest, in that I am married to the treasurer of the Labour party, who is also a trade union deputy general secretary. At the Labour party conference earlier this year, the treasurer moved the motion that the cost of individual membership of the Labour party should be increased from £18 to £36 because, unless the members pay up, the party will inevitably become reliant on rich men.

The question whether we have a system that has a large number of small donations or a small number of big donations is important. It is true that big donations raise concerns about legitimacy, and those concerns are felt much more by poor people than by rich people. Our concern in this Government is to protect democracy: that is the responsibility of the Department of Constitutional Affairs, although we go about it in a non-party political way. We are concerned, as a Labour Government, about issues of inequality. The question of people's sense of their equal participation in democracy is very important.

Some work to be published later this year by the IPPR shows that democracy used to be the one thing that cut across the class divide. We all know about the class and socioeconomic divide in health and educational outcomes, but the one thing that was equal across all classes was democracy and participation in voting. The last three elections have seen a change in that: it is no longer the case that people's propensity to turn out is irrespective of their social class. There is a growing gap between the registration and turnout of better-off people in society and those of poorer people. We have an inequality problem in our democracy, and we must consider how political activity is funded, what people in the country make of how parties go about their business and how they are funded. We must look at it in the context not only of the debate about democracy, depending as it does on political parties, but the debate about inequality.

I add my congratulations to Lord Puttnam and his colleagues on the Puttnam report. How we go about our business in the House, making Parliament much more representative, is something that we ought to consider in order to contribute towards public confidence. It is also important that people from individual political parties do not have to rely just on the media. If we cannot afford to communicate directly with our constituents, we must rely on the media. The question is: is there a worse alternative to the current situation? It is important for parties to have sufficient funds to be able to communicate directly with the electorate from which they are seeking votes, instead of having to go through the media. It is also true that turnout is dependent on contact. Apparently the clear evidence is that the more people are contacted individually by parties in a constituency—this is surprising and counter-intuitive, as one would think that people would want to reward us for staying away from their doors—the more likely they are to turn out. I can see the hon. Member for Chichester shaking his head about that.

However, contact costs money. I agree with research done some years ago by my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea which showed that there are some things about party politics that people do not like the idea of paying for and other things that they do not mind so much. We can all agree that people would not like money that they pay in taxes going on negative campaign billboards. Evidence drawn up by my hon. Friend shows that people do not mind supporting research, policy making, and youth activities, and hon. Members have drawn attention to the big problem of non-participation of young people in our democracy. Legitimacy walks away from democracy if people walk away from it. People support youth activities, quite rightly, and councillor training, equipment for offices, and the work of parties in Parliament, including Short money. There is possibly less of a difference between the hon. Member for Wealden and his colleagues than might have first appeared during his comments. The Electoral Commission is doing further work on the matter. We should all agree that there is a problem. In the past, the matter has been placed in the "too difficult" box. It is not an easy matter to resolve, but there has been a broad measure of agreement during the debate. We can work together, drawing on the work of the Neill committee, the Electoral Commission, and the work in which hon. Members have already engaged.

Sir George Young: I sense a peroration coming. Before the right hon. and learned Lady concludes, will she agree to look at the matter with an open mind and accept that what the Government have said about the Neill recommendation is not their last word on the subject?

[Sir George Young]

Ms Harman: The Government's most recent words on the matter are in our manifesto, which states that

> "we will continue to work with the independent Electoral Commission to explore how best to support the vital democratic role of political parties".

That demonstrates that we have work to do. Campaigning activities, of course, such as the printing of posters, must always be funded by parties from their own resources. However, parties do a great deal of other work that we must examine to see how contributions could be made.

Mr. Tyrie: I follow the question from the my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire. Will the Government examine the merits of, and set out the arguments for and against, a cap on large donations from individuals, companies and trade unions?

Ms Harman: If we are concerned about the confidence that people have in the health of our democracy and about ensuring that there is no inequality, we must examine that. Some hon. Members mentioned that, despite increasing transparency, there has been growing cynicism. Of course, if one tells people about what is happening and they do not like it, they become more cynical. I understand that that is the experience of other countries; the more transparency and the more people know about what is happening, the more they think, "Well, we might not like that." If that is the case, it is right to tell people what is happening. If we get those signals, we must not bury our heads in the sand; we must approach the issue intelligently.

We shall draw on all the points expressed so intelligently and forcefully in the debate, and by examining research such as that mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea. When we respond to the Electoral Commission's report, we shall see whether we can make progress. I apologise to hon. Members for not being able to give the date of our response and for not being able to give specific commitments, but I thank the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire for securing the debate.

10.58 am

Sitting suspended.

Cyprus

11 am

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): May I first declare an interest as the Labour vice-chairman of the Friends of Cyprus group? I visited Cyprus from 5 to 9 October. My accommodation and driver for official meetings were provided by the House of Representatives and by the municipality of Morphou. The Conservative vice-chairman of the Friends of Cyprus, the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), would like to be here, but he is attending the memorial service for Sir Edward Heath. I have been asked to convey his apologies to you, Mr. Taylor.

The visit was an opportunity to meet political leaders, business people, academics, and people from civil society from both sides of the green line. There has always been a tendency in Cyprus to look back. I do not want to dwell on the failures of the Annan plan today; we debated those on 6 July last year—the last time that we had a full debate on Cyprus. I would rather focus on where we are now, the way forward and what we and the European Union can perhaps do to help.

We have to start by considering the atmosphere. I felt that there was an air of depression and fatalism about the lack of prospects on the island. There is a lack of trust between the communities, and it is worse than I have experienced for many years. The Turkish Cypriots feel rejected and abandoned by the Greek Cypriots in the aftermath of the no vote. The Greek Cypriots think that the Turkish Cypriots are trying to get the best of both worlds—the benefits of European Union membership and services in the Republic—without making progress towards a settlement, and that they are perhaps looking towards separation.

There is a real feeling of despair among pro-settlement people on the island. People still cross the green line and maintain contact, but young people do so rather less frequently than before, and fewer people are visiting their homes in the north from the south. There is a degree of clutching at straws; some lawyers on both sides are now talking about making the cost of non-settlement prohibitive; to illustrate that point, I have heard talk of a thousand Loizidou cases. We hear people such as Mustafa Akinci of the BDH party in the north talking about reasserting the Turkish Cypriot rights of the 1960 constitution, because they see no other way forward. Turkish Cypriots are moving to the south to work and, increasingly, to live. Shener Levent, editor of Afrika newspaper, is even talking about standing for the 2006 elections in the Republic.

I have to say that there is some hostility towards the United Kingdom; we are roundly blamed for the failures of the Annan plan. Whenever the issue of the sovereign base areas comes up, it is a sign of rising discontent with the United Kingdom. We are not seen as even-handed; we are seen as very pro-Turkish, and as not having accepted the outcome of the democratic referendum of the Greek Cypriots. That can be compared with the situation as regards the United Nations. Sir Kieran Prendergast recently visited Cyprus, and in his report to the Security Council, he made it clear that

> "the highest priority concerns which led Greek Cypriots to vote the way they did would most certainly have to be addressed in any future process based on the UN plan—and the Greek Cypriot electorate must have confidence that this would be borne in mind in a renewed process."

The recent visit of my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister, and the signing of the memorandum of understanding, which asks for a structured dialogue, is an important development. We must build on that and recognise the importance of our joint history of many years. We need to look forward to possibilities for the future outside the diplomatic dance, which is continuing and which has identified a substantial gap between the two communities. As the UN says, we cannot afford another failure after the Annan plan.

The outside international community can help, but in the end a settlement has to come from within the island, with the consent of both communities. The consequences of the lack of progress are pretty clear. I mention just one—the problem of crime across the green line. There are growing problems of smuggling, people-trafficking, drugs and illegal migration. Perhaps the best example of those problems was the murder in January this year, in the south, of a Turkish Cypriot, Mr. Elmas Guzelyurtlu, and his daughter and wife. The suspects fled north. The Greek Cypriot police have the evidence, but are not prepared to hand it over to the Turkish Cypriot authorities because they are not recognised. That sort of problem has to be addressed, otherwise the murderers run free.

Of course, there are some positive signs. I particularly welcome the start of Turkey's accession negotiations. We should very much support the process in which Turkey is involved, although it will be a very long one. I was pleased that both Greece and Cyprus supported the start of the process. However, that brings obligations for Turkey. Although we have a possibility of a fresh start after 3 October, it is important that momentum is maintained, and that Turkey is kept engaged. That was not helped by some of the statements about Cyprus that emanated from Turkey at the time of the decision to commence negotiations.

The EU will evaluate progress at the end of 2006. Without progress on Cyprus, there is the risk of an annual crisis if Turkey does not make progress towards a settlement, as there is the possibility of a veto at the opening and closing of every chapter. If Cyprus is not to be a running obstacle, progress must be made; otherwise that veto will be exercised sooner or later by one country or another.

Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con): Is there concern about the lack of progress in relation to the pre-negotiations to accession? Now that we have moved on to the accession negotiations stage, the matter could just go into the long grass for many years, and may not reach a speedy conclusion. We all want a sustainable settlement for the benefit of the Cypriot people.

Mr. Dismore: I have my own theory about that, which I shall come to in my crescendo at the end. The hon. Gentleman raises a valid point. There are two schools of thought. One is that the EU, Cyprus and the UK presidency should have driven a harder bargain with Turkey. The other is that it is important to get Turkey to sign on the dotted line to maintain the pressure. I, as well as the republic's Government, subscribe to the latter view; ultimately, that is the best way for Turkey to proceed.

May I also say something rather more positive? We now see more crossing points—for example at the Astromeritis-Morphou road—and it was interesting to attend the Morphou rally, where a symbolic barrier had to be put across the road for us to protest at, as the road is now open. A further crossing point is now to open in Nicosia, which will be of great advantage to both communities.

There is a lot of positive movement on the issue of missing persons, with signs of real co-operation between the two communities. I was pleased that Mr. Talat told me that the difficulties that remain would not be politicised or publicised so far as he was concerned. I am also pleased that a UK organisation based in Bournemouth, the Inforce foundation, is doing a lot of good work in that respect. There is a risk, which was highlighted by Emine Erk, a lawyer from the Turkish Cypriot human rights foundation, that there will be a determination to punish the perpetrators. A time may come for that, and there may be a time for peace and reconciliation. However, the risk of that sort of talk in relation to, for example, the Tochni murders is that information will dry up. That is not helpful. Money is needed—two million Cyprus pounds—to complete the work, and I hope that we can help with that.

There are also positive signs from the UN's recognition of the Greek Cypriot concerns to which I referred. The republic is facilitating the position of Turkish Cypriots in relation to the European Union, with 40,000 Turkish Cypriots now holding Republic passports, 60,000 holding identity cards and 100,000 having their birth certificates. All Interior Ministry papers are now translated into Turkish to facilitate that process, and Turkish Cypriots have access to the range of services provided by the republic. The health service, in particular, is of great importance.

On the positive side for Turkish Cypriots, there is quiet acknowledgment that recognition of the so-called Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus is off the agenda. There is now talk of an end to isolation, but I would question whether Turkish Cypriots are ready for the globalisation that would follow from that—there is a degree of naivety there. There is acknowledgement in the north that direct trade is not going to make a difference; it is not going anywhere, as it would probably be worth only about €10 million to the economy. I was pleased to hear that there are plans for a census in the north next year. The economy in the north grew by 12 per cent. last year, and Turkish Cypriot incomes have doubled over two years. The United Kingdom is supporting public sector infrastructure reform and America is supporting financial infrastructure reform in the Turkish Cypriot community.

We should recognise that Mr. Talat, who is now President of the so-called TRNC, is not Denktash the second. He does support a settlement, but is clearly going to drive a hard bargain. However, his language is not well chosen. His threat of civil war if Turkish accession were blocked by the republic was certainly not helpful, and nor were his insults of a personal nature. On 12 October, he said that the Greek Cypriots were "racist, chauvinistic and ultra-nationalistic." That is not the way towards a settlement. Another part of the problem arises from the fact that his party, CTP, is in power. That has relieved the pressure on Turkey in the north, where opposition was organised by CTP and its associates. That pressure has now been diverted towards the Greek Cypriots, and the European Union has become the bogeyman. Clearly, they are not going to organise demonstrations against themselves. I am concerned that the pro-solution parties in the north are divided and not able, as they were before, to unite around a single message. The strains between the CTP and AKEL, the south's largest party, are not constructive.

[Mr. Dismore]

Mrs. Theresa Villiers (Chipping Barnet) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that a very serious problem in northern Cyprus at the moment is the boom in building, much of which must be on land from which Greek Cypriot owners were driven in 1974? That building will make finding a solution much harder.

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Lady presages my next remarks. That is an appalling downside of the Annan failure, which has fuelled the building boom on Greek Cypriot land and is the basis of the growth in the Turkish Cypriot economy. Turkish Cypriots recognise that if there is a settlement as far as property is concerned, it will probably be along the lines of the Annan plan. They have therefore worked out that if they build on the land, they will get to keep it, even though they may have to pay compensation to the Greek Cypriot owners. Had the land not been developed, it would have had to have been restored to the Greek Cypriot owners. That will make it harder to reach a settlement. Property rights will become a much bigger issue in any future negotiations unless a firm stand is taken on the building boom on Greek Cypriot land.

One can draw a comparison with the middle east. Building on the west bank has created facts on the ground that have made it harder to reach a settlement there. Although the international community has gone out of its way to condemn Israel, there has been a blinding absence of any condemnation of that very similar building boom in northern Cyprus, which is, in fact, even worse. At least in the middle east, the homes are for Israeli people to live in. In northern Cyprus, the homes are for holiday makers—generally overseas people, mainly from the UK.

I should like to report what Mr. Anastasiades, the leader of one of the Greek Cypriot parties, DISY, told me. The night before I met him, he had visited Kyrenia for dinner with Mr. Talat. He was virtually in tears as he described the building boom that he had seen and said that in five years' time there would be no land left.

We also need to recognise the continuing role of the Turkish army and the assertion of the rejectionists. There have been dangerous incursions in—

David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion) (Lab/Co-op): I, too, have to declare an interest. I visited Cyprus in early October as a guest of the municipality of Morphou. That is on the register.

My hon. Friend has mentioned the building boom. Does he have a view about the purchase by UK citizens of properties in the north of Cyprus? In particular, what is his view of the advice given by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office website to those contemplating such purchases?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an important point. There is the Orams case, which is a serious issue; I met the lawyer involved in that. One of my concerns is that people may well be risking their properties in the UK if they buy property in northern Cyprus that, frankly, does not belong to the person selling it. I am pleased that the Foreign Office has significantly improved the advice on its website, but there is always room for stronger warnings about the risks.

I was talking about the role of the Turkish army. There have been dangerous incursions, most recently in Lourougina, where the UNFICYP commander was threatened at gunpoint as the Turkish army tried to build a new checkpoint. That led to reciprocal protests by Greek Cypriot nationalists, particularly DIKO MEP Mr. Matsakis, who went to protest and tried to pull down the flag, inevitably heightening tension.

There has been an increase in troop numbers; there are now in the order of 50,000 troops and the Turkish air force continued its incursions on 13 and 14 October. Immediately after the accession process, there were overflights, which put civilian aircraft in danger and potentially jeopardised the safety of a Royal Air Force exercise in the south.

Greek Cypriot enclaves are being oppressed. Most recently, teachers at the Rizokarpasso school have not been approved, Turkish Cypriots are taking the land, and Greek Cypriots have even been forbidden to use cars unless they are TRNC-registered, although Maronites, who are also in the north, are not forbidden from using them.

Of greatest concern in the north are the recent developments in the Turkish Cypriot chamber of commerce, where elements of the CDP, UBP and DP organised a coup against its highly respected president, Ali Arel, after an attack by Mr. Soyer, the so-called prime minister of the TRNC, on television. One needs to ask why. Mr. Arel was very pro-solution in the north, and he was seen to be rocking the boat. He has argued, as I started to do more than a year ago, that free trade is the best way to proceed. He wants the European Union customs union to be implemented and the green line regulations to be applied properly and made to work. The final straw was probably his refusal, which came to light, to sign dodgy certificates to certify Turkish tomatoes as Turkish Cypriot for the purpose of smuggling. He very much agrees with the need to decouple trade and aid.

The fact that Mr. Talat recently accused the EU of being biased against Turkish Cypriots is another example of the rejectionist tendency. There has been a power struggle in the CDP between rejectionist elements trying to assert themselves and Sener Levent, the editor of Afrika, whom I mentioned earlier, who has a court hearing on 28 December in which he faces some 100 charges about things that he has written in his newspaper. Moreover, the property rights lawyer, Mr. Candounas, who is acting in the case to which I referred in my response to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Pavilion (David Lepper), has been harassed, and I am concerned about whether the rule of law is operating effectively in the north.

Trade is key, and is another issue that we must address. The trade from south to north is now worth some 97 million Cyprus pounds, which is 15 to 20 per cent. of the Turkish Cypriot economy, but it is mainly because of people, not goods. Some 5,000 Turkish Cypriot workers work in the south every day and take their wages back to the north. Between 7 and 12 per cent. of tourists from the south go north, and a quarter of them stay overnight. Greek Cypriots spend up to €135 each time they visit the north, apparently in large part on pirated designer clothing.

Turkish Cypriots buy goods in Greek Cypriot supermarkets because of their variety and quality. Electrical goods, for example, are much cheaper. Green line trade remains neglible; I shall discuss the reasons why shortly.

North-south trade is neglible. It is worth only about 1 million Cyprus pounds. Business in the north is not competitive. Clothing manufacture in the north has been heavily hit by the Chinese and Indian clothing trade, as it has elsewhere. Turkish Cypriot business people lack knowledge of the business practices of the south. Turkish Cypriot banks will not lend to Turkish Cypriot businesses because they receive a safer and better return on Turkish Government bonds on the mainland.

The market is very competitive in the south, and is likely to become even tougher when a French supermarket chain enters it. There is also some market resistance among Greek Cypriots to buying their own oranges grown on their own land. Some of that is real, but some of it is perceived and is, in fact, risk aversion on the part of the supermarkets already in the south.

The EU VAT rules are, however, a real problem. The Greek Cypriots are blamed for this, but it is not their fault that the EU rules on VAT are enforced. The subsidies make some of the products in the north uncompetitive, and it is not the fault of Greek Cypriots that the hygiene rules prevent the importation of anything that contains animal products. That is why the direct trade argument is a dead end, because the same EU rules would apply whether or not the imports crossed the green line or entered other EU countries. The same problems of competitiveness would arise, so that is not the way forward.

Progress can be made in trade by making the Turkish Cypriot economy more competitive. We should consider not direct trade but free trade in the eastern Mediterranean generally. We should get the economists to co-operate, with a view to creating a single economy in which trade leads to partnership, to interdependence, to economic integration and ultimately to political integration along the lines of the bi-communal, bi-zonal federation, which has been the elusive goal for many years. That view has been expressed on both sides—by Ali Arel on the one hand and by economists whom I have met in the south on the other. It was floated by the Turkish Cypriot chamber of commerce, and I understand that the Republic is also considering it.

The Turkish Cypriot economy should be developing itself to shadow the acquis communautaire and to move towards complying with it. Given the answers given by my hon. Friend the Minister before the election, I believe that the Government also believe that.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman support the call by some Members of the European Parliament for Turkish Cypriot representation in Brussels to be increased to give a stronger voice to their concerns? They are concerned that the very effective lobbying of the Cypriot Government is not being properly heard in Brussels and they want a greater say for Turkish Cypriots. Would the hon. Gentleman support that?

Mr. Dismore: That has to come as part of an overall political settlement. In theory, there was no reason why Turkish Cypriots should not have stood in the European Parliament elections in the south, although they chose not to do so; indeed, the TRNC authorities put barriers in place to prevent them from doing so. There was talk of people standing for election and, as I said earlier, Shener Levent may stand for the House of Representatives elections in the south next year. However, the way forward must come through the existing channels; there is no way, and no reason, to make new arrangements.

I was talking about the Turkish Cypriot economy shadowing the acquis on issues such as equality and subsidies. It should be making preparations for the implementation of the customs union. If that was done effectively, it would reduce the cost of reunification, which was one of the main problems arising from the Annan plan. The first step in the process was suggested to me by Ali Arel and is very important: the European Union should do research and produce a technical study on liberalising trade on the island, with the goals that I have mentioned in mind.

The key to trade must be the proper implementation by Turkey of the customs union protocol. Turkish ships already call at ports in Cyprus. In the first six months of this year, trade from Turkey to Cyprus was worth 3.1 million Cyprus pounds. Although that is not a lot, trade has been growing rapidly.

The Turkish ban on shipping with Greek Cypriot connections cannot be allowed to continue. It is much broader than most people realise and interferes with EU trade generally. Let me give an example. The tanker, Hans Scholl, was Liberian flagged and had a German beneficial owner. It was managed by a subsidiary of the German company based in Limassol, chartered by a Danish company and sub-chartered to British Petroleum. It was carrying a cargo of petroleum from France to Turkey without going anywhere near Cyprus. On 6 August, however, it was banned by Turkey from entering a Turkish port, so 27,000 tonnes of gasoline had to be trans-shipped in the open sea off Malta. That cannot be right and cannot be allowed to continue; Turkey must be required to meet its obligations.

Although I would, of course, very much prefer Turkey to recognise the Republic, it does not necessarily have to do so. At the very least, however, the protocol must be implemented wholeheartedly. That is a European Union requirement, and the issue has an impact on European Union trade way beyond Cyprus. With the opening of the new pipeline, there will be £4 billion of goods to be shipped. It is difficult to imagine how that can be achieved without Cyprus shipping, bearing in mind that a large part of the world's shipping fleet is Cyprus-flagged.

[Mr. Dismore]

The obligation on Turkey is not only a legal issue: it is the key to unlocking the Cyprus problem. If implemented effectively and wholeheartedly, the customs union could remove the Greek Cypriot arguments that have put up some of the barriers. It could also lead to the opening of the Famagusta port, probably under European Union management; indeed, the Turkish Cypriots are prepared to negotiate on that. It could then lead to the return of Varosha, and wider progress would become possible.

A free trade zone started by Turkey wholeheartedly implementing the customs union is one of the keys to making progress. Again, one could call it "sequential unilateralism"—those, I think, are the new buzzwords in foreign policy. That could well be the way to make some real progress.

We have to be careful, however, in view of the electoral cycle. Elections to the House of Representatives are due in the Republic next May and Turkish parliamentary elections are due in October 2007. There are various municipal elections and by-elections in the TRNC next year and the Republic presidential elections are in February 2008.

However, the Republic is working hard towards meeting a target date of 1 January 2008 for joining the euro, and President Papadopoulos has made great progress in the economy in the south. When people focus on this issue, they fail to recognise the progress that has been made on domestic policy. The Republic economy is being geared towards that target date, and it will be useful to work towards it to see whether a unified Cyprus could join the euro.

What is to be done immediately? Some things are relatively easy. Earlier, I mentioned the need to find finance to deal with the issue of missing persons. Two million Cyprus pounds is not too much for the UK to find, either on its own or with its partners. The census that the Turkish Cypriots have announced is important. They are open to outside monitoring, but no one has asked them so far. We should put it to them that it is important to ensure that the census is credible—that the right questions are asked, and that it is set up properly and monitored. We must ensure that there is international involvement, sooner rather than later, from either the European Union or the Council of Europe. This is also an opportunity to begin talking to the south about whether it is time for a census there too, because there are a lot of foreign residents in the south.

It is important that European Union documentation is translated into Turkish. The EU must find the funds for that. We should also put pressure on Turkey and the Turkish Cypriots to stop the building boom in the north and to ease the pressure on the enclaved in Rizokarpasso.

We must recognise the realities and accept that the trade and aid package has to be decoupled. The Turkish Cypriots accept that; indeed, we may be the only ones who are opposed to it. The aid package of €279 million should be rolled over to next year. We must try to persuade the EU to undergo the study on the liberalisation of trade to which I referred and to consider implementing the green-line rules in that context. We should also talk to Turkish Cypriots about the way in which their checkpoints are used to prevent diplomatic visits by the Greek Cypriot European Union Commissioner and the European Commission delegate to the Republic; because they are both Greek Cypriots, they cannot cross unless they comply with Turkish Cypriot requirements, which they regard as being incompatible with their diplomatic status.

What is needed—this is the hardest issue because it involves Turkey—is action from Turkey. It should reduce troop levels. If that is too far a step to take, we could consider supervising Turkish troops through greater European involvement in security maintenance, for example. That could be done through NATO or Europe. Turkey has to implement the customs protocol, and we should look to the 2007 date for the republic's accession to Europe as a target for a comprehensive settlement, because time is short.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): I am listening carefully to my hon. Friend's argument. There have been several indications in the press that the United Nations is considering an initiative in Cyprus. What does my hon. Friend think the UN should do to smooth the path to negotiations?

Mr. Dismore: The UN should do pretty much what it is doing. It would be premature to launch a major initiative at this stage because we cannot afford the failure of another initiative. It is important that the UN should continue to engage with both communities, try to identify the gaps between them and start to bridge those gaps. At the moment, the differences are quite wide, and progress has to made in bridging them. It is incumbent on the republic to be a little more specific about its reservations, and incumbent on the Turkish Cypriots to be more flexible in their approach to negotiations. It is important that negotiations are conducted in the correct framework, as no progress will be made if they are open-ended. The UN is taking the right steps, but there is still a lot more ground to prepare if we are to progress.

Mr. Love: Many of us are concerned that we seem to be hung up on whether the Annan plan will be central to the process. What does my hon. Friend think?

Mr. Dismore: We debated the Annan plan at length in July 2004, when I was last able to secure an Adjournment debate on this issue, so I do not want to go over old ground and reopen old wounds. We should look forward. Any future framework for a settlement will have to be based on the Annan plan, as there is no point in throwing away work that has been done, but any future settlement must recognise the shortcomings of the Annan plan for both communities, particularly the Greek Cypriot community—the no voters.

Any adjustment must be by consent, and any future plan must be endorsed by the leaders of both communities. We cannot go forward with a referendum on a plan that is condemned by one side or the other. Unless both sets of community leaders can agree, the settlement will not succeed. The international community can help to create the climate and bring the parties together and bridge the gap, but in the end the settlement must come from the people in the island.

Time is short. Despite all that I have said, recent opinion polling and detailed research by Alexandros Lordos and Muharrem Faiz shows that Cypriot public opinion on both sides is relatively close on the terms of settlement, but will start to move apart if the negotiation process does not begin soon. An example of that was the point raised by the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers), which I developed, on the question of property rights. That problem will grow harder as time goes by, as the building boom continues. Property rights were not, as I understand it, a deal breaker in the Annan plan as it was, but they may become one if progress is not made and the problem gets worse. There is a risk that parties' positions will become more entrenched and that rejectionists will come more to the fore, as we saw from the treatment of Mr. Arel. I think, therefore, that although time is short we must recognise the problems.

Perhaps I may conclude with a statistic. A quarter of the Greek Cypriots who were alive in 1974 are now no longer alive and 42 per cent. of the Greek Cypriots who are alive today were not born in 1974. In less than 10 years half the population of Greek Cypriots will have no organic link with the north. I should like to give figures for the Turkish Cypriots but I cannot, because there has been no census. However, the longer things continue the harder they get, as the ground changes.

I come back to my crescendo to make a perhaps rather cheeky point, which is that Turkey has an awful lot to do to join the European Union. It must sort out its economy and its political institutions and carry out a huge programme of internal reform. On the face of it, Cyprus may seem a difficult nut to crack, but of all the things that Turkey must do to join the European Union, dealing with Cyprus is one of the easiest, if the political will is there. Turkey should recognise that.

Turkey must decide whether it really wants to be a member of the European Union—or perhaps it is better to say that the Turkish army must decide whether it wants to be part of a modern, democratic state, and withdraw from politics, allowing the will of the Turkish people, as expressed in the previous general election and their continuing support for the Erdogan Government, to prevail, so that Turkey may look to the west and modernise—as the founder of the modern Turkish state, Kemal Atatürk, with his westernising, modernising approach, would very much have liked. Turkish politics has been ossified for too long. Turkey must look to the west. It is its future. It is the future of Europe to include Turkey in the European Union, but it must solve the Cyprus issue first, and sooner rather than later.

11.32 am

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) on securing this important and timely debate. Like many hon. Members in the Chamber, he has great knowledge of and cares deeply about the Cyprus problem. I pay tribute to President Tassos Papadopoulos for his steadfast and consistent stand, on behalf of the Cypriot people, for a just settlement. He must continue to resist any possibility of a separate legal entity for the illegal regime of occupation in the north of Cyprus.

There have, of course, been diplomatic tensions between the UK and Cypriot Governments since the referendum in April 2004, but, as the hon. Gentleman said, the Annan plan was democratically rejected by an overwhelming majority, and that was right and fair, because it was seriously flawed. Let us clearly understand that every person who believes in democracy must respect the decision of people in referendums, including the decision that the Cypriot people took in April 2004.

Mr. Burrowes: I very much endorse my hon. Friend's comments about the Annan plan and respect for the democratic will of the people of Cyprus. Is not it also important that the US State Department also recognises that? It is perhaps almost isolated now following its recent reiteration that any settlement should be based on that plan, and it needs to realise that it too should respect the will of the people of Cyprus.

Bob Spink: I am grateful for that intervention, which covers a point I was going to make.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): I accept that the plan was rejected by people on one side of the island, but it was accepted by those on the other side. The situation is a little more complicated than the hon. Gentleman portrays it, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) explained.

Bob Spink: The hon. Gentleman shows great wisdom. The key problem was that Annan did not provide for the reunification of the island. The division was perpetuated. Tassos Papadopoulos stated that as recently as last week. The hon. Gentleman is right that the Cypriot problem is complicated. There are two sides to it, and each side must recognise the other with dignity, tolerance and forgiveness. That is the only way to move forward, which is what the Cypriot people want.

I hope that Europe will continue to give Turkey all the help and encouragement possible in the accession process. That would be good for Cyprus, for the Kurds, for human rights and for the whole region. Anything less would betray the Turkish and Greek Cypriots and would show that some countries in Europe have not yet grown up enough to put progress, peace, human rights and stability before pernicious self-interest.

Cypriot public opinion is moving positively towards the terms of a just settlement. The international community, including America, must act quickly to grasp that nettle and to ensure that it takes advantage of that time. As the hon. Member for Hendon said, the Alexandros Lordos and Muharrem Faiz opinion polls showed that movement. That could be used as the basis of an NGO-type constitutional convention, with discussions ahead of or to accompany United Nations talks between the leaders of the two communities.

The Turkish accession process must be supported by Cyprus and Greece. They must not threaten to use or actually use their vetoes. In return, Turkey must try to make faster progress and show more good will towards a just settlement of the Cyprus problem. It is very much in Turkey's interests to agree to a just settlement, because if it does it will have two new and strong allies, Greece and Cyprus, in its EU accession process.

[Bob Spink]

There is a need to move quickly, balanced with a need to get the timing right. The UN must begin the settlement process as soon as possible to avoid further entrenchment of both communities. The hon. Members for Hendon and for Edmonton (Mr. Love) implied that timing is everything in politics. Elections to the House of Representatives in Cyprus will be in May next year, and the Turkish elections will be in November. If Erdogan stands and is elected president of Turkey in April 2007, there could be a window of opportunity for Turkey following that presidential election.

Tassos Papadopoulos's first term runs out in February 2008, which is about the time when election fever will be hotting up in this House. If there is to be a UN big push, it will need to be in May next year and should run up to the end of 2007.

A much tougher message needs to come from London on the thorny issue of delivering back property to each community's rightful, individual, legal owners. The rule of law must prevail, including rights of ownership. Anything less—any other precedent—would be a disaster, not just for the Cypriot people, but for the law-abiding world. It would send out the wrong message to rogue states that possession, not law and human rights, will prevail. That would be detrimental to world stability and peace in the longer run. The UK Government must make stronger statements about the improper sale and development of Greek Cypriot land in occupied areas. A shop opened in my constituency advertising land for sale in the north of Cyprus, and I hit the newspapers big time telling my constituents what I thought about that, and quite right too!

We must make sure that everyone—especially British citizens who are still buying the stolen property—understands that those who bought what amounts to stolen property must take the full loss when the matter is eventually resolved, as it must be. At best, those who buy it are cynical opportunists and at worst they are no better than looters, preying on others' misfortunes. The UK Government have at last woken up to the abuse but are still doing too little, too late. It was wrong to stand by and allow the sale of stolen Cyprus property to be promoted and enacted in the UK. That would not have happened if mere artefacts were involved; the Government prevent that as it is against the law, so why should they allow people's homes to be sold?

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): This is obviously a very sensitive issue. Does the hon. Gentleman think that the use of intemperate language helps the situation?

Bob Spink: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point. There is a balance to be struck, and I took the decision to make it absolutely plain to everyone in this country that what is happening is simply wrong. It is unacceptable to go out and purchase property in the north of the island that belongs to individuals in the south of the island—property that was their family home. That must not and cannot be tolerated, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not excusing that irresponsible and unacceptable action. There are times when intemperate language is fair and right.

Mr. David: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Bob Spink: No, I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman again.

I want to move on to other issues, including the planned census of people and property in the north of Cyprus, which needs international credibility through the involvement of the Council of Europe or a similar body. Free rather than direct trade is needed, as the hon. Member for Hendon said. The port of Famagusta needs to be opened with international involvement and the customs union between Cyprus and Turkey should be implemented.

On humanitarian matters my language may again be slightly intemperate, and I make no apology for that, because it is necessary. We must respect and understand the missing person issue and fund the committee that the hon. Gentleman mentioned so that it can build on recent developments and employ Inforce to do the necessary work. How could Turkey think that it is ready to be considered to take part in Europe or to be respected by the international community if it cannot allow the relatives of the missing persons to have closure? It is an affront to humanity, and it could so easily be resolved. That would be a measure of Turkey's willingness to change and to do what is right. At last, there are some positive moves in that respect, which I welcome.

David Lepper: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Bob Spink: No, the hon. Gentleman has intervened before.

I pay tribute to the Greek Cypriot community for the care it is rightly showing to the Turkish Cypriots who are going south looking for jobs and to those who need medical treatment in the south. That is absolutely right and laudable. Each community must show compassion to the other and that is happening; it must happen more.

In addition, the Turkish Cypriots must prepare for the European Union by complying with the acquis and shadowing its requirements, which will help them to plan for settlement and reunification. Another key development is to improve the crossing points, which will help both communities. Cypriots from both sides responded to the opening of the green line in April 2003. There have been huge numbers of contacts and crossings as people literally vote with their feet and there have been hundreds of thousands of peaceful, constructive exchanges in both directions. Although that has slowed somewhat, more crossing points are needed, particularly in the shopping area of Ledra street, hopefully linking to a similar development north of the green line.

In conclusion, the Foreign Office and Government got it wrong after the referendum. They showed disrespect for democracy and sought to deny the self-determination of the people of Cyprus. Their attitude was unsustainable. They did a great disservice to the people of both the Turkish and Greek Cypriot communities, but it is now time to put that behind us and to set out on a positive road to a just settlement that will stand up to international standards and laws, and respect rather than deny the original UN resolutions. Only a just settlement will work and deliver the better life that both communities deserve.

11.45 am

Mrs. Theresa Villiers (Chipping Barnet) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) for tabling this debate on a crucial issue for many of his constituents as well as mine.

We are gathered to reflect on a grave injustice that was done back in 1974. In my view, 31 years is far too long to wait for a solution to reunify Cyprus. I take this opportunity to urge the Minister and the international community as a whole to redouble their efforts to help Cypriots find the elusive solution that will reunify their island, and to find a just, balanced and lasting settlement. I emphasise, as others have already, that no settlement will work unless it has the whole-hearted consent and support of both communities. No settlement will stick and last without that.

We should seek a solution that balances the interests of the two communities within a federal structure in a single state, so that we can bring the island back together as it was before the disruption of 1974. Like others, I believe that the Annan plan 5 is well and truly dead. There is no point in trying to revive it. As parliamentarians, we need to urge the international community to start fresh negotiations between the two communities to work for a new plan that will address the serious reservations of many Cypriots about Annan 5.

There is no justification for criticism of the result of a democratic referendum. We have to address why so many Cypriots voted no to Annan 5. A particular concern was expressed about security, but there were also serious concerns about long-term restrictions on free movement. The Cypriots would have been deprived of the fundamental rights that one would normally expect to enjoy as a citizen of a European Union member state.

In particular, property will be an issue that it is vital to get right. It is not simply a financial matter; it is a human tragedy that saw thousands of people driven from the homes in which they had grown up, with, in many cases, nothing more than the clothes on their back. I have heard countless poignant and desperately sad stories about Cypriots going back across the line to see their old homes, and perhaps finding some of their furniture or their wedding photographs carefully stored by those who have occupied the premises. It is vital that we recognise the value of returning people to the homes that they lost in 1974, which they still remember.

It is vital that we take action as soon as possible. As we have heard, Annan 5 has encouraged a building boom in the northern part of Cyprus that is steadily making it more difficult to reach a solution and deal with the property issues. More and more land owned by Greek Cypriots, from which they were driven in 1974, is being built on. That must increase the urgency with which we address the issue.

I intend to keep my speech as short as possible, because I know that many others would like to contribute. The Foreign Office must strengthen its warnings to British citizens who consider buying property in northern Cyprus. It is highly irresponsible for anyone to encourage the purchase of property that might have been stolen from its original Greek Cypriot owners. I echo the comments of a number of hon. Members on the matter.

It is vital in the EU negotiation process that Turkey is encouraged to co-operate and make progress on the issue of Cyprus. It should clearly recognise the Government of Cyprus. I cannot see how it can negotiate for EU membership with a range of Governments, including the Cypriot Government, if it does not recognise every one of the Governments with which it is negotiating. The authorities in north Cyprus should stop the discrimination that we have seen against enclaved Greek Cypriots, particularly in Rizakarpasso, with the continuing problems that they have had in accessing education at the high school. We should take a fundamentally optimistic view of the future in Cyprus.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): There is some concern that the gap between two communities is too wide to start negotiations at this stage. That is primarily because, on one side, there is rejection of the Annan plan and, on the other, Mr. Erdogan and Mr. Talat have made it clear that the basis of a solution has to be the Annan plan. How do we bring those two sides closer together to start that process of negotiation?

Mrs. Villiers: I was going to explain why I am fundamentally optimistic. My view is based on looking back at the past, where it was clear that Greek and Turkish Cypriots could live happily side by side. I also view it from the perspective of the present, where I can see the huge cultural overlap between the outlook of Greek and Turkish Cypriots, both in the UK and in Cyprus itself. One of the tasks that we face as British parliamentarians is to rebuild that trust. If the communities are allowed to live together, there is no question of violence erupting. They have a huge amount in common, and I believe that they can live and work together harmoniously.

David Lepper: The hon. Lady mentioned the role of the UK Government in relation to rebuilding that trust. Does she agree that there is a twofold responsibility on the part of the UK Government? First, Cyprus is a member of the EU already, and Turkey is not. That gives the UK a particular role. Secondly, Cyprus is a member of the Commonwealth, which gives an additional responsibility to our Government in relation to the legitimacy of the republic of Cyprus.

Mrs. Villiers: I completely agree. The British Government have always had a pivotal role in Cyprus and should use their influence in the United Nations, in the European Union during their presidency and in the Commonwealth to drive forward the search for a just and peaceful solution of the Cyprus question.

In concluding, I should declare an interest on Cyprus—perhaps I should have done so at the start of my speech. I had the pleasure of visiting Morphou for a rally recently hosted by the municipality of Morphou. I also received support from the Cypriot community in my election campaign.

I urge the Minister to take on board what so many speakers have said today about the urgent need for the British Government to take action. I urge the Minister to visit Cyprus at the earliest opportunity to talk to Cypriots, to learn about the past and to drive forward a solution towards a just and unified Cyprus. As it holds the presidency of the European Union, the UK has a unique opportunity at a vital time. I urge the Minister to make the most of that opportunity so that we can see Cyprus united once more.

[Mrs. Villiers]

11.55 am

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): I speak as Chairman of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, but I shall refer to a report published by that Committee during the previous Parliament, when I was not a member. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) for providing the opportunity for this debate. Almost exactly a year ago, the Foreign Affairs Committee visited Cyprus following the rejection of the Annan plan in a referendum. The Committee produced a report that was published in February, to which the Foreign and Commonwealth Office responded in April. The House has not had an opportunity to debate that report, and I speak today to give hon. Members at least a flavour of it.

Many key points have already been covered, and I am conscious of time so I shall be as brief as possible. The Foreign Affairs Committee has received a written response from the Government to many of our recommendations, and I have written to the Foreign Secretary to further pursue developments under the UK presidency of the European Union. When the Select Committee published its report, Luxembourg held the EU presidency. The six-month period of the UK presidency is significant for the reasons mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Pavilion (David Lepper), but also because the UK is a guarantor power. Turkey and the UK are both members of NATO and therefore have a considerable interest in the complications caused in a number of international organisations by the continuing failure to resolve the situation in Cyprus.

At its last sitting, the Foreign Affairs Committee was critical in some respects of the attitude of the Government of the Republic of Cyprus to the process of negotiations. The Committee was also critical of aspects of the policies of Turkey and the Turkish Cypriot entity. The Committee took a view, however—contrary to what has been said by some earlier contributors—that a modified version of the Annan plan represented the best way forward and that the plan was not dead. It is important to recognise that there may be a need to make changes to that plan.

The Foreign Affairs Committee was disappointed that the Annan plan was rejected, but stated:

> "In the absence of an early overall settlement, we recommend that the Government"— that is, Her Majesty's Government—

> "support practical measures that will enable Turkish Cypriots to trade with the United Kingdom and other countries".

The Committee also pressed for free trade within the island, and supported the view expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon. The Committee further recommended that

> "in any future negotiations on a settlement based on the Annan plan, the parties be invited to consider accelerating the withdrawal of Turkish and Greek forces and the demilitarisation of Cypriot forces".

The Committee welcomed the British Government's offer to halve the size of the sovereign base area territory, but that is only an interim step towards an ultimate solution that deals with the decisions of the Greek Cypriot elected representatives.

It is important that any resumed negotiations take account of significant changes among Turkish Cypriot people, as well as the economic developments that have taken place. The fact that the Turkish Cypriots voted for the Annan plan, despite the position of Mr Denktash, is of fundamental importance and should not be dismissed. We do ourselves no favours if we see this matter with regard simply to the position in 1974. The position in 1974 is important, and the issues raised by the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) and others are fundamental to a long-term solution. However, it must be recognised that the Turkey of the recent past is different from the Turkey of 1974. The decision of 3 October gives the potential for a process of transformation in Turkey. It is not in Turkey's interests to have a continuing problem with other EU states as a result of its presence on the island of Cyprus. If we take intelligent and practical measures over the coming years, we have a real opportunity to take matters forward. That was broadly what the Foreign Affairs Committee argued in its report earlier this year, and I am grateful for the opportunity to refer to it today.

12 noon

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): I start by congratulating the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) on securing this debate. He has a long record of initiating such debates; his interest in the island of Cyprus is well known and recorded, and he spoke with knowledge. We have seen broad cross-party support for the British Government in recent years, and I hope that it will continue. I shall keep my remarks relatively brief so that the Minister has plenty of time to respond to the important points that have been raised.

The hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) made a robust speech in which he showed his knowledge not only of Cyprus but of the wider Mediterranean area. He raised some interesting points. The hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) spoke of balance, something surely needed in a future settlement of the island of Cyprus. It epitomises what we should strive to achieve. The hon. Lady's predecessor, Sir Sydney Chapman, who often spoke in such debates, would have been proud of what she said.

The hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes), the Chairman of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I am delighted to be a humble member, spoke with the great knowledge associated with that important position. In an intervention, the hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (David Lepper) mentioned the Commonwealth. Yes, Cyprus is a member of the Commonwealth, but Britain has a direct responsibility for its sovereign base areas in Cyprus.

Britain very much welcomes and values the importance of our two important sovereign base areas. We also value the close relationship between the British military community and the Cyprus community. There have been problems in the past, but those bases are largely welcomed by the island community. The bases at Akrotiri and Dhekelia remain integral to our defence, and we commend the effort and determination of our troops on the island.

My party believes that Cyprus can succeed as an independent state only with reconciliation and respect for the fundamental rights of the Turkish and the Greek communities. A future settlement of property rights must recognise the legitimate claims of the Greek Cypriot population who were evicted in 1974, but without causing the social injustice that many in the north feel might result. We call for the ending of restrictive Government policies on mobility and property and we call for the settlement of both communities within the islands. The leaders of the two communities must exercise the political will necessary to establish a democratic, bicameral, two-party federal state with a single international identity, its independence being guaranteed by the United Nations.

We broadly support the Foreign Office's and Europe Union's position on Cyprus, and we regret that the UN plan was not adopted. However, it is hoped that some elements of the plan might form the basis of a future settlement.

I mentioned trade in an intervention on the hon. Member for Hendon. Some in the European Parliament have put forward a case for direct trade to be established with northern Cyprus in order to relieve the economic impoverishment of the Turkish Cypriots; and 24 of the 25 EU member state Governments of the Council of Ministers approved the principle. However, it has been blocked by the Government of Cyprus. We regret that. The Council of Ministers pledged to end the isolation of northern Cyprus in the wake of a yes vote for the UN-Annan plan for political settlement, yet despite calls from MEPs there has been no direct trade or financial assistance. We believe that it would have assisted the political settlement and helped to finalise the dispute.

We call for the increase of Turkish Cypriot representation in Brussels in order to counterbalance the Greek Cypriot voice. It is important that its voice be heard.

Many people believe that the solution will be found only through ongoing Turkish negotiations with the EU. Cyprus was one of the 10 new states to join the EU in 2004, but it joined as a divided island. The Turkish Cypriots are in a strange situation. Since 1976, the island has been viewed by the UN as one island, and it joined the EU as one island. However, even though Turkish Cypriots are viewed as EU citizens, the wider world does not recognise their Government, and thus Turkish Cypriots are not represented.

We have always maintained that Turkey should be a full member of the EU in order to maintain good trade links and international relations with the country. Those links must be subject to the accountability of the European Parliament, but Turkish accession must also be subject to the appropriate timing of compatible economic and human rights policies. It may be difficult for Turkey to join the EU if it continues to refuse to acknowledge Cyprus as a member state in its own right. That may cause difficulties, but it is unacceptable to expect Turkey, in order to gain accession to the EU, to make concessions to Cyprus. To do so would deprive Turkish Cypriots of their communal identity. Therefore it is fundamental that the Turkish and Greek Presidents work bilaterally, as well as within the EU, to create a harmonious federal state in Cyprus.

We broadly support what the Government have done. We shall continue to do so, and we look forward to the Minister's response.

12.6 pm

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch). I join him in congratulating the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) on securing what has been a good and constructive debate.

The hon. Member for Hendon began by speaking about the lack of trust and the air of depression that he had encountered on his recent visit to Cyprus. He moved on, however, to talk about the more hopeful signs that we see on the island. I join him in welcoming those encouraging signs and a more optimistic future.

We frequently find ourselves in the House talking about what is wrong with the European Union. I have had many exchanges with the Minister for Europe on the subject. Differences exist among the parties on the various issues. However, we hold a common belief in the capacity of the European Union to help to build and secure freedom, democracy and rule of law, particularly for new member states. If we can contribute to resolving Cyprus's problems, we would all greatly welcome that.

The beginning of the Turkish accession talks promises a time of great opportunity in many ways, one of the most important of which is the openings for movement towards a peaceful resolution of Cyprus's problems. We know that those resolutions will not be easily or quickly achieved. Many hon. Members have referred to the Annan plan and the referendum that followed it. The lesson that must be learned is that a lasting, peaceful reunification of Cyprus cannot be achieved over the heads of its people. As the hon. Member for Hendon said, both communities' consent is required if we are to make progress.

It is unfortunate that more progress could not be made on the Cyprus question before the Turkish accession talks began. We must therefore recognise where we are and start from there. We must look positively at the influence that can be brought to bear, on Turkey in particular, during the accession process. As my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes) said, it is important that Turkey's recognition of Cyprus as a member state is not held off until Turkish accession arrives, whether that be in 10 or 15 years. Recognition of Cyprus is an essential sign of Turkish good will and commitment to joining the European Union.

The accession agreement requires progress on the normalisation of relations. That progress should include measures to tackle the real problems, such as the criminal justice issues to which the hon. Member for Hendon referred.

The hon. Gentleman also made the telling point that, in many ways, the Cyprus question is an easier one for Turkey to resolve than some of the other large challenges that lie ahead on that country's road to accession. I hope that that wise guidance will be heard.

[Mr. Graham Brady]

The United Kingdom's special role and position in its relationship with Cyprus has also been mentioned. I therefore welcome the new, structured dialogue agreed by the Deputy Prime Minister that is due to start in January. Britain should maintain close relations, friendship and dialogue with Cyprus. I hope that the wounds of recent disagreements between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Cyprus can be healed. I echo remarks made about the British Government's response to the referendum, which was unfortunate.

It may be a little surprising that it is the Deputy Prime Minister's diplomatic skills that have been brought to bear in pouring oil on the troubled waters that were caused by the Foreign Secretary's involvement in the issue but, however surprising, it is none the less welcome, because Britain's history and close connections give us a vital role in resolving the problems of Cyprus. Those problems are very real, and we have heard a great deal about them this morning. They include the settlement-building that is taking place in the north—possibly fuelled by the Annan plan, which may make a settlement harder to achieve, as my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) said. There is also a need for proper and full implementation of the EU Customs union. The hon. Member for Hendon was right to say that free and open trade would give considerable impetus for change.

My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) spoke passionately about the need for compassion, tolerance and maturity on both sides if we are to move forward. My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet rightly reminded hon. Members of the very real human tragedies of Cyprus, but also of how much the communities have in common. That was a message of hope for the future.

I want to leave time for the Minister to address all the issues that have been raised, so I shall conclude by saying that anyone who listened to our proceedings this morning could not doubt the complexity of and the difficulty in finding a solution to the problems of Cyprus. However, I believe that this is a time of real hope. The Government were right to press forward with the start of Turkish accession talks. A resolution of the problems of Cyprus will not be the only benefit of Turkish accession, if that can be achieved, but it should be regarded as an important one.

12.11 pm

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): From the Conservative Front Bench, the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) concluded his remarks—not in the same manner as the crescendo that we anticipated and then enjoyed from my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore)—by saying that anyone who listened to our debate today would be aware of the complexity of the issue and the challenge that faces all of us in relation to Cyprus. I would add that anyone listening to the debate that we have enjoyed this morning would reflect on the great credit that it brings to the House of Commons that we can still—sometimes away from the television cameras and the press reporters—enjoy a debate of such quality.

I therefore begin my remarks by congratulating my hon. Friend on securing the debate. Rather elliptically, the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) acknowledged the fact that my hon. Friend has some form on Adjournment debates in the House, and is well known for his expertise in that regard. My hon. Friend more than matched that record today by demonstrating his expertise, long-standing interest and concern for the issues of Cyprus, and I pay due regard to that. I am also aware that this Adjournment debate takes place after my hon. Friend's recent visit to Cyprus between 5 and 7 October. I believe that the House is well served in having individuals with such personal and direct experience, such constituency interest and such expertise as has been manifest in the course of the debate today. I welcome the opportunity to discuss Cyprus and the points raised in today's debate. In the time available to me I shall endeavour to cover most of the specific points that have been put to me in the course of the past hour.

The Government have always worked hard in support of efforts to achieve a comprehensive, just and lasting settlement in Cyprus, brokered under the auspices of the United Nations. I am sure that the House will agree that the search for a settlement must remain an important priority for the Government—that sentiment was echoed in some of the remarks made by hon. Members today. After more than three decades of efforts to find a solution, it is a matter of genuine and great regret that the island remains divided, and that the communities on the island—about which we have heard this morning—and the stability of the region and the international community as a whole, continue to suffer as a result. The Government firmly believe that every effort must be made to achieve a comprehensive settlement. Time is not on our side, for some of the reasons given by my hon. Friend. Many of the points made in today's debate have confirmed my belief that the longer the current division continues, the more intractable the issues become.

My hon. Friend raised, in particular, the concerns of Greek Cypriots about the ongoing situation in the north. I know that the property boom, the presence of Turkish troops and the number of Turkish nationals living in the north are a matter of great concern for many people who take a close interest in Cyprus. All those issues are at the heart of the Cyprus problem and underline the urgent need to achieve a settlement.

On the specific issue of property, which my hon. Friend and other hon. Members mentioned, I can assure the House that we maintain a dialogue with the Turkish Cypriots on all Cyprus settlement issues, including that of property. However, we are not able to prevent property development, and the authorities themselves face powerful economic forces in a perverse political environment. It is a matter of great regret that the island did not reunite on the basis of the Secretary-General's proposals of last year, with the system of property restitution and compensation that was anticipated by the Annan plan. However, we continue to believe that the difficult and complicated issues relating to property in Cyprus can realistically be resolved only as part of the comprehensive Cyprus settlement. That reinforces the importance of achieving a comprehensive settlement on the basis of the Annan plan as soon as possible.

Mr. Love: Two weeks ago, the Saturday edition of the Financial Times featured a large article on purchasing property in northern Cyprus. If one read it very carefully, one found a little mention in one paragraph of the fact that legal difficulties might attend the purchase of such property. Should the Government do more to bring to the attention of those who might read such articles some of the difficulties that might occur?

Mr. Alexander: I am grateful for the question, because it anticipates a point that I was going to make on the efforts that the Government are making, and the steps that we are taking in relation to exactly that kind of issue.

We do not encourage British citizens to buy property in the north of Cyprus; through our travel advice, our website and in response to queries we explain clearly that property issues are closely linked to the political situation on the island, and we mention the risk to purchasers who could face legal proceedings in the courts of the Republic. We also advise potential purchasers of property to seek independent qualified legal advice and explain that the non-recognition of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus and the possibility of a future political settlement in Cyprus could have significant practical financial implications for those considering buying property in the north.

The hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) made clear the efforts that he has made in his community to bring—rather forcefully, I suspect—to the attention of prospective purchasers the risks facing those who would be persuaded by the kind of advertisement of which my hon. Friend spoke. We have a responsibility in Government, and I have sought to explain the steps that we are taking. I urge hon. Members, particularly those whose constituents might be interested in acquiring property in that part of the world, to make their concerns known directly to such people.

In the past year, there have been both encouraging developments on the path towards a resumption of settlement negotiations and some causes for concern, as has been reflected in the debate. Let me address some of the specific questions that have been put to us about the prospects for renewing talks after the result of the referendums.

We believe that new settlement talks in Cyprus can be initiated only with the support of both communities on the island. The recent report by Sir Kieran Prendergast, the UN Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs, following his visit to the island in May, concluded that the gap between the stated positions of the parties appears to be widening, while confidence between them is not high. The point was made earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon that that makes the process of establishing common ground extremely difficult. The United Kingdom Government, however, remain committed to achieving a fair, viable and lasting settlement in Cyprus for the benefit of all Cypriots. We therefore maintain our contact with all parties and encourage all sides to show the necessary political will and readiness to negotiate to achieve that goal.

On a practical level I know that, immediately following the 30 hours of negotiation in which the Foreign Secretary and I participated on 3 October to secure the beginning of accession talks with Turkey, our Foreign Secretary was in direct contact with the Secretary-General of the United Nations in order to explore with him the potential for further action, given the changed context of the opening of accession talks.

The hon. Gentleman raised concerns about whether the attitude of the Foreign Office after the referendum was somehow unacceptable or biased. I refute that charge absolutely. Our objective was and remains, as I have said, the achievement of a comprehensive settlement in the interests of all Cypriots, and in that we maintain a close and constructive dialogue with all parties.

The hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) impressed upon me the importance of respecting the democratic nature of the vote that was exercised in relation to the Annan 5 plan. I assure her that we do respect the outcome of the referendum and the fact that many Greek Cypriots expressed their genuine concerns in their rejection of the referendum proposals. However, I repeat that any future changes to the plan will need to be acceptable to both sides. Notwithstanding the fact that that was perhaps not evident in our discussions this morning, it bears heavily on the importance of trying to find a way forward in light of the rejection of which a number of hon. Members have spoken.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon raised the questions of the Turkish implementation of the protocol and, in particular, access to Turkish ports. Let us be clear: by signing the protocol, Turkey has committed to implementing its terms. To quote the EC directly:

> "The European Community and its Member States expect full, non-discriminatory implementation of the Additional Protocol, and the removal of all obstacles to the free movement of goods, including restrictions on means of transport."

In relation to the broader question of crime and drugs across the green line, the European Union has made clear the need to de-isolate the Turkish Cypriots and bring them closer to the EU, fulfilling the mandate from EU Foreign Ministers last year. Helping Turkish Cypriots to raise standards in the north would, I believe, have a beneficial effect on the flow of drugs and illegal immigrants from northern Cyprus into the Republic of Cyprus and the rest of the EU.

My hon. Friend raised a specific point about the census, which was echoed by other speakers. I assure the House that we would support the census and stand ready to assist in taking forward that idea.

Mr. Brady: The Minister referred to the expectation that the protocol should be fully implemented. Could he enlighten us as to what steps are being taken to ensure that and suggest by which date we expect it to be the case?

Mr. Alexander: I am not able to give a definitive date at the moment, but I can assure the House of my good faith. As recently as the day of the Hampton Court summit, I met Prime Minister Erdogan of Turkey and impressed on him the importance of seeing progress on that as well as on a number of issues. That is reflective of a general desire on the part of the British Government to make the Government of Turkey fully aware of their responsibilities under the protocol as well as the need to maintain the momentum established on 3 October to try to drive forward the process. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we are using the opportunities available.

[Mr. Alexander]

My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon raised the matter of the recent elections to the Turkish Cypriot chamber of commerce. That is not a matter usually discussed on the Floor of the House, but it is important as it tells us about the dynamics in Turkish Cypriot politics. I will not comment in detail on the specifics of who was elected and who was not and on the internal procedures of the chamber, but I can assure the House that our high commissioner has met the chamber of commerce's new president, who has stressed his commitment to recognising its responsibilities and relationships with the EU. It is a matter of which we are aware and on which work is under way.

A number of hon. Members mentioned the importance of finance for missing persons. We strongly support the work of the Committee on Missing Persons in Cyprus. The United Kingdom contributed $50,000 to the work of the committee last year and we are actively considering a further contribution in the light of the important work it undertakes. We are in discussion with other member states about what further steps can be taken at an EU level to encourage that work.

David Lepper: On the question of missing persons, would the Minister agree that the Turkish army has an obligation to make available the full records of those who were arrested at the time of the occupation in 1974 to enable proper investigations to take place?

Mr. Alexander: Clearly, difficulties in access to information have been encountered in the past. I hope that the sentiment I have expressed and our financial contribution speak to the fact that we would not support the committee if we did not support its aims, which are that information should be established about all the missing people related to the terrible and difficult events that took place.

Notwithstanding the many challenges, it is also important to maintain a sense of perspective, despite the considerable challenges that still confront us. I was enormously encouraged by the EU's historic decision on 3 October to open accession negotiations with Turkey. As well as being the right decision on its own grounds, I strongly argue that it is also the right result for the European Union, for Turkey and for Cyprus. Steady progress in Turkey's accession negotiation process will encourage normalisation of relations between Turkey and Cyprus, as the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West acknowledged. That should in turn help to increase trust and interaction between the parties and provide a sure context for a resumption of those negotiations.

I am encouraged by moves such as the opening of additional crossing points on the green line in Cyprus and the progress towards opening a further crossing point in the centre of Nicosia on Ledra street. The work of the Committee on Missing Persons, with the increased contribution and engagement of both communities, is also promising, notwithstanding the continuing challenges that have been mentioned. We are making every effort to work with the Republic of Cyprus to build a broader base of bilateral co-operation.

During his visit to Cyprus in late October, the Deputy Prime Minister signed the memorandum of understanding establishing a structured dialogue on bilateral co-operation, as agreed by the Prime Minister and the President when they met in July. The hon. Gentleman suggested, gently, that there was surprise about the role of the Deputy Prime Minister and the constructive contribution that he is already recognised as having made in that regard. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I personally can testify that not simply internationally but sometimes even domestically my right hon. Friend is able to pour oil on troubled waters. My right hon. Friend was also involved in discussion about the prospects of the resumption of United Nations' negotiations with representatives of both sides of the island during an important and timely visit.

I am concerned that the stated positions of the parties on the elements that will need to be discussed during a resumption of negotiations regrettably remains far apart. The report produced by UN Under-Secretary-General Kieran Prendergast after he visited the island in May underlined how wide that gap remains.

I am also concerned that to date the EU has not been successful in meeting its commitments to end the isolation of the Turkish Cypriots, an issue addressed in the wide-ranging contribution of the hon. Member for Hereford. As the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes) said, the Turkish Cypriots showed their continued support for the settlement and for a reunited Cyprus in the EU at the referendums in 2004 and in subsequent elections. But the more the Turkish Cypriots are left isolated by the international community, the more that elements in the north of Cyprus who oppose a just Cyprus settlement will flourish. We must not allow that to happen, so we will continue to do all we can to ensure that the EU lives up to these commitments.

The Commission has put forward proposals for financial assistance and preferential trade. As hon. Members said, it has proven enormously difficult for member states to agree these measures, but our duty while we have the presidency is to make every effort to do so; we will continue to work to that end with our European Union partners beyond the end of our presidency.

I listened carefully to the contributions from both sides of the House in this wide-ranging debate. I assure hon. Members that we will continue to take forward the work that I discussed when I met the Prime Minister of Turkey and which the Deputy Prime Minister took forward during his recent visit to the island. I assure the House that, not least for all the reasons we have heard—the sovereign bases, the guarantor role, our role in the European Union and in NATO—Cyprus continues to be one of the key areas of priority for the Government.

Aviculture

12.28 pm

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): I am delighted to have the opportunity to raise this subject. I am not entirely sure whether it has been raised in Parliament before, but if so, it was not in a debate. As you know, Mr. Cummings, aviculture is just another name for the keeping of birds which, in its widest sense, means anything from poultry, pheasants, ducks and owls to more familiar birds such as budgies and canaries and also owls.

I will concentrate on the more usual types of bird and speak briefly on the history of keeping birds. It goes back a long way, as we can see from mosaics from Ancient Greece and Rome, in which parrots and other such things were depicted. It is only in the past couple of centuries that bird keeping has become more widespread; before that, it was very much the pastime of the rich, and stately homes would often have large collections. In the 19th and 20th centuries, however, it became much more the pastime of ordinary working men. Latterly, it has been taken up by working women, too, although it is mostly the pastime of working men.

People kept pigeons or canaries before budgerigars became established in this country. In many mining communities in your constituency, Mr. Cummings, and throughout the country, a lot of people who had very hard lives and worked long hours will have derived great pleasure from looking after and nurturing these living creatures. Keeping birds gave people immense pleasure. It is not just that canaries were kept in the mines; keeping birds was a form of escapism for many people.

When people look after living creatures, they have to make a great commitment to ensure that the animals in their care survive. That requires great dedication, and people tend to their birds daily, if not several times a day.

I confess to hon. Members that I have kept birds, although I regard myself primarily as a birdwatcher. If I go back long enough, I can remember a time when I was rather keen on having the usual type of pet, and I pestered mother and father for a cat or a dog. Wisely, they said that that would not be all that easy, so we settled on having an aviary in the garden. I derived great pleasure from keeping birds and found out a lot more about them than I would have done purely by going walking around the countryside watching birds. I found out about breeding cycles and, despite never having been a great scientist, about different mutations; it was good for a young schoolboy to learn about genetics in a simplified form.

Interestingly, two of my friends at school also kept birds. Today, I am here, one of my school friends is a wildlife officer for the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and the other runs one of the largest bird tour companies in Britain. Although the latter two do not keep birds any more, I am sure that our great interest was spurred on by the fact that we were in close proximity to birds and were able to learn more about them.

I am sure that hon. Members are thinking, "That is all very fascinating, but why on earth is the hon. Member for Uxbridge raising this issue today?" The reason is that bird keepers will potentially be affected by several issues and they feel slightly under pressure, although not under threat. One issue is the Government's impending Animal Welfare Bill. By and large, it is welcome, and I shall come to it in a minute.

The other issue, which is connected with many of the points that I have raised, is the threat of avian flu coming to these shores. In the past few weeks, there has been publicity about avian flu, including the case of the infected parrot. There is concern that that will worry the public and that they will think that every budgie in every front room is potentially a harbinger of doom and that the whole family will be wiped out.

I am therefore grateful to the Government for what they have done and particularly to the Minister, who has taken a very responsible attitude to the issue and who has been sending out the right signals. However, I thought that it was possibly the time to raise some of these issues on behalf of bird keepers. The bird-keeping fraternity is divided, although some of its members are very active and able to put their views across, and does not always present a universal front. There is a certain amount of in-fighting and it is difficult to get all of its members together and establish a common view. I thought that this might be the forum in which to get them to understand the problem.

An important aspect of bird keeping that is sometimes forgotten is the potential it brings to learn conservation skills. I sometimes have to fill in forms—I am sure you do too, Mr. Cummings—in which I am asked who my political hero is. On the quiet, I must say that I do not have a political hero. If I were to have a hero, he would probably be Gerald Durrell, who would probably be thought of today as politically incorrect. Like me, he was inclined to be a little overweight, and probably spoke his mind a little too much. In his youth, he went out collecting animals for zoos; a lot of his books are about that. After a while, he considered the conservation side of things and realised that there was a need for captive breeding populations. Many of the skills that he learned—I believe that he worked at Whipsnade and, latterly, London zoo—helped him to start up his Jersey zoo, in which he had animals such as the echo parakeet from Mauritius, the pink pigeon and other birds and animals that bred in captivity.

Birds and animals do not breed in captivity if they are just stuck in a cage; they have to be nurtured and studied. Even today, some successful reintroduction schemes rely heavily on the expertise and skills of the people who look after the birds in captivity before releasing them into the wild. Around the world, conservation methods for some species include captive breeding for future release when the habitat is secure.

A more controversial issue, which came to attention with the focus on avian flu, is that of importing wild caught birds. This is not the time to raise that issue, but it needs to be sorted out. I congratulate the Government again on their stance on what is by and large an EU matter, although the mood is turning towards saying that it is not as necessary to have wild caught birds as it once was. Australia imposed an export ban in the early 1960s, and many species are now bred there in captivity. Indeed, some parrots and parakeets are more common in captivity than in the wild because of captive breeding and the impetus of saying that no more wild stock could come in, which made breeders and interested parties realise that that would be it if they did not get their acts together.

[Mr. John Randall]

I hear arguments about sustainability being important, which it is, but it is also important that we consider whether some communities in developing countries are more likely to preserve habitats if they are harvesting, so to speak, a species of wild bird there, as with butterflies. I am not sure; I see both sides of the argument.

The vast majority of people who are interested in aviculture or keeping other species such as reptiles or fish are concerned about animal welfare. The last thing that they want is to see any living creature in distress. Some of the pictures that we see on the news go back some way. It is almost as though they are library photographs. There is an image of awful crowded importers' cages in which birds' heads stick through gaps, but such cages have largely been got rid of. That must still be looked into, although for some time there has been quarantine and people have ensured that things have been done properly. Sadly, that is not so all over the world, but Britain has a pretty good record.

I mentioned avian flu because this is a good opportunity to reassure people that the real threat is from migratory birds arriving in this country and having contact with domestic poultry or wildfowl. It is unlikely that birds in aviaries or cages will become carriers of avian flu, although we must be careful of that. The Minister has taken a responsible view. His Department has studied the effect of imports and bird shows, and has taken sensible measures. A few weeks ago, the newspapers got themselves into a panic over aviculture, which worried many people. Although avian flu is a serious matter, we must put it in proportion.

Aviculturists justifiably raise the issue of animal welfare legislation and what these days are called pet fairs—when I was younger, I called them bird shows. Breeders and owners show their birds off, rather like the old fur and feather shows that one sees at county shows. They often last only one day. Selling birds worries some of the animal welfare people. These shows are very valuable for breeders, who can swap birds, get new stock and discuss matters. Things have changed since I kept birds. Up to when I was a student, I never went very far; I lived next door to my mum, who has the original aviary, and that is why I still keep birds. What has changed most is security. In the old days, one could put one's name and address in a classified ad and did not have to worry. People would come and purchase stock. Now people are worried about theft. There are presumably one or two fanatics who object to people keeping birds in captivity. Therefore, buying and selling stock is more often done at these forums, which is why they are important.

Recently, a popular parrot show was held in Stafford—I see the Minister's Parliamentary Private Secretary, the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), is present. There has been concern about that show in the past. I believe that someone from the Department attended the show and there was a telling veterinary report, which said:

> "Most of the Parrot Society members stressed the importance of the event as a social event. I also witnessed that much time was spent at the members tables discussing husbandry and feeding methodologies. I was accompanied round the show by a veterinary student who was keen to absorb as much knowledge as possible from the many experienced aviculturists present. They all took time to answer her questions even though she always explained that she was not buying. This exchange of knowledge is in my opinion very important, especially when it concerns the rarer species."

The report goes on:

> "My conclusion from the inspection on the day, and reading the terms and conditions applying to the members, is that the show is run with avian welfare having high priority. Any problems identified were rectified immediately."

The top priority of the people who run these shows is their birds, not just because they like them, but because they are valuable, so it is good common sense. However, it is because they care about them.

What I have said about aviculture is equally true of people who keep reptiles, tropical fish, koi carp, hamsters, guinea pigs, rabbits or ferrets. I have four ferrets; it is admirable for someone in the Whips Office to have a set of ferrets to protect him at all times. It has always struck me—and there are examples from my constituency—that people keep animals or birds in special schools or in prison. The bird man of Alcatraz—Stroud—wrote the definitive work on bird diseases just from sitting in solitary confinement, keeping birds and looking at them.

There is an important social angle. I know of young people who have got involved in keeping birds, not necessarily through a parent. The joy when they see that the birds have laid eggs, and when, 18 days later, the nestlings come out and must be given different foods, and the birds fledge, sets them up pretty well for life. It gives them a sense of responsibility. That is something in today's world. We are always talking about that in the context of young people, and it is not a bad thing to show them.

I do not think that the Minister needs to worry too much. The bird-keeping fraternity believes, as I do, that he is a very good Minister, particularly with regard to the present topic—so much so that he appears in the latest issue of the Parrot Society's magazine. It is an excellent picture, in which he looks particularly dapper. If he would like a copy I am sure that the Parrot Society would be glad to help him.

I know that it is a very busy time for the Minister, with the Animal Welfare Bill, but I should very much like to bring a small delegation of aviculturists to a short meeting, in which they could put across their view in person. They want to be able to assure people that they have made their voice heard in Government.

12.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I congratulate the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) on securing the debate and commend his constructive and informative speech. He is a living example of the lack of contradiction between an interest in observing and enjoying wild birds and an interest in keeping birds. He is right to point out that bird keeping is a legitimate and old human practice, dating back at least as far as the Egyptians, and probably further.

The Government estimate that about 2 million people in this country keep birds, and they get great pleasure from it. As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, bird keeping has therapeutic and social benefits. Many birds thrive in captivity better than they do in the wild. Some live longer, and there can be conservation benefits. Some species that are rare in the wild have become common in captivity, and aviculture, as the hon. Gentleman also pointed out, has pioneered ways of breeding that are now used to boost the numbers of several endangered species. Captive breeding by hobbyists, such as the hon. Gentleman, has reduced the need to import wild caught birds.

The hon. Gentleman alluded to the debate about the whole trade in wild birds, which I am sure will continue and in which I hope he will play a leading role, as the European Union must reach a decision on whether to extend its import ban. It is right to point out that there are two sides to the argument. The point is made in some quarters—including the United Nations convention on international trade in endangered species—that for many of the poorest communities in the world as long as the birds are being harvested sustainably they are an important source of income. The trade in some of those places is an incentive to conserve a valuable resource. However, I am sure that we shall return to the debate and that the hon. Gentleman, with his expertise, will play a leading part in it.

The main job of Government is to ensure that the welfare and conservation of birds will not be jeopardised and to prevent the spread of avian flu between birds or from birds to humans. The Animal Welfare Bill, which was introduced in the House of Commons last month, should help to ensure that the welfare needs of birds kept in captivity in this country are met. As the hon. Gentleman said, the vast majority of owners, who love their birds and care for them diligently, have nothing to fear from the Bill. However, a small number do not come up to scratch, and the Bill will help allay the fears of those animal rights fundamentalists who believe that it is intrinsically cruel to keep birds; we believe that they have nothing to worry about.

I reassure the hon. Gentleman that the Animal Welfare Bill is not about banning anything; it is about increasing welfare. If he is interested, I hope that he will be fortunate enough to secure a place on the Committee that considers the Bill when it eventually comes before the House; his expertise will be a great help to the Committee.

We have no intention of banning the keeping of particular species, either in the Bill or in secondary legislation. The Bill should not ban anything unless an incontrovertible case can be made that an activity is intrinsically cruel, and we have no evidence to suggest that bird keeping or bird showing, as he described it, is cruel. However, the Government are considering whether more protection should be given on conservation grounds to some of the world's most endangered species.

As the hon. Gentleman will know, article 8.2 of the EC regulation that implements CITES provides for member states to prohibit the holding of endangered species, particularly live specimens of the most endangered species. The Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), launched a public consultation in July to seek views on the option to regulate the holding of certain species subject to control under CITES. That concluded on 31 October, and the results are still being considered.

The Animal Welfare Bill should help to clarify some of the controversy surrounding pet and bird fairs to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I was sorry not to be able to attend the parrot show in Staffordshire. It was held on a Sunday, and as a busy Minister and constituency MP, my Sundays are particularly precious, but I hope to attend a similar show in future. However, John Bourne, the head of my animal welfare team who is leading on the Bill, was there, and it may have been his report that the hon. Gentleman cited.

I would be happy to meet a delegation from the Parrot Society UK to discuss some of its fears. The hon. Gentleman is right that there are some well organised and well funded non-governmental organisations; he is right also that those who keep birds tend to be quiet individuals who are not used to coming together to agitate or to organise political activity. It would be useful to hear their views before considering the relevant provisions in Committee.

The Government do not have any evidence that bird and pet fairs are intrinsically incapable of providing for the welfare needs of the animals in question. The hon. Gentleman eloquently outlined some of the potential benefits of fairs. People are nervous about putting small ads in papers, especially for reasons of security given the high value of some birds, and such gatherings allow the exchange of information; indeed, if our proposals go through, they will be able to license birds. Licensing will be welcomed by most of the organisations that run such events; it would help deal with potential welfare problems, especially in organisations that are not so well run.

Naturally, future proposals made under the Animal Welfare Bill will be made through secondary legislation. Such instruments will be subject to full public consultation and approval by both Houses. Again, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will play a leading role in those deliberations.

The hon. Gentleman was also right—I am glad that he welcomed this—to highlight the recent temporary EU ban on gatherings like bird fairs and the import of wild-caught birds on health grounds in the context of avian influenza. I was grateful for his considered response, and I hope that he will continue to be involved in the dialogue on whether a ban is justified and, if so, for how long. It is important when making such decisions that the Government take account of the views of the organisations and hobbyists that he speaks for—I hope that he will continue to do so—as we weigh up the animal and bird risk, and the human health risk associated with avian flu. The ban will be reviewed again next month. However, that does not affect the Government's long-term proposals for the licensing of bird fairs or our long-term policy on the import of wild-caught birds. I suspect that the hon. Member for Uxbridge is absolutely right to say that there is currently a shift of opinion on the import of wild-caught birds. In a way, the avian flu outbreak is a diversion from the issues that he raised on conservation and ethical matters, which have helped to spark a debate that will continue as we reconsider the ban in the weeks ahead.

[Mr. Ben Bradshaw]

The hon. Gentleman will know that another result of the discovery of highly pathogenic avian flu at the quarantine facility in Essex has been an independent review of Britain's quarantine procedures. That was a sensible measure and has raised questions about quarantine procedures, including the practice, for example, of mixing species of birds. Perhaps we should do more to separate species in quarantine. Of course, that is a hypothetical matter at the moment because the import ban is in place, and no birds are being imported. However, were the import ban lifted, we would have to be satisfied that the quarantine procedures are robust and are being correctly implemented and enforced. That investigation is continuing and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has assured the House that she will keep hon. Members updated as and when information comes to light.

I hope that the hon. Member for Uxbridge will take part in future discussions on the ethical, health and conservation considerations of the international trade in wild birds. Mr Cummings, I would be happy to have the coverage of my activities in the Parrot Society's magazine mentioned by the hon. Gentleman for Uxbridge. If you have not already seen it, Mr Cummings, I commend a recent profile of the hon. Member for Uxbridge in Cage and Aviary Birds, which was a charming report of both the hon. Gentleman and his mother. There is a picture of him beside his aviary and a picture, I assume, of one of his birds. That report demonstrates nicely the pleasure and sense of responsibility that is derived from keeping birds. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising the matter, and I hope that I have been able to reassure him about some of the concerns that he expressed about the potential impact of the Animal Welfare Bill, the current debate on the import of wild birds and the in many cases unfounded fears of the public about avian flu.

Artists' Resale Rights

12.58 pm

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): I am delighted to be able to begin the debate rather early. The artist's resale right has barely been discussed in the House over the last few years, but it will radically alter parts of the British art market. It is a great shame that, until now, we have not had a full opportunity to debate the matter. Indeed, when the Government eventually bring forward their measure, it will probably be in the form of a statutory instrument, which will be debated for an hour and a half in a Committee Room, with no opportunity to amend it. That often happens with European legislation as we incorporate it into British law. I hope that, one day, there will be a half-way house—a third way—between primary and secondary legislation so that we do not have to go through the full three readings process for European legislation, but have a fuller means of exploring issues.

I support the concept of an artist's resale right, although I understand that others disagree. It is important to set the artist's resale right within the broader context of the art market in the UK. The Government estimated in 2001 that, as of 1999, the UK art market was worth £3,467 million. In France, for the same year, it was estimated that their total art market was worth about £2,115 million. It is probable that, since those figures were arrived at, the British art market has grown somewhat. Latest estimates put the worth of the market in the region of £4.5 billion. Therefore it makes up a significant part of the British economy. It is also a significant employer. There are about 9,500 art dealers and 750 auction houses. Last year's labour force survey suggested that there are 148,700 artists in the United Kingdom, although that figure probably includes commercial artists and graphic designers. A more conservative estimate is that the UK has 85,000 to 90,000 working artists.

Many of those artists are partly employed and partly self-employed. The art industry drives many other industries, such as the newspaper and magazine industry, the graphic design industry and a whole series of others. The pure artist—the person whom we might identify with an easel and brush—is still instrumental in ensuring the creative innovation of British industry.

It is important that we bear down on some important misconceptions early on in this debate. The first misconception is shared by many people; namely, that artists are wealthy. It is all too easy to see Tracey Emin sell her unmade bed for £150,000 or her slippers for £5,500 and think that artists are doing pretty well.

Incidentally, Sarah Lucas, another artist who sold her unmade bed as a work of art, once viewed my flat in the east end of London. She offered me less for the flat than she would probably have offered for the bed, had I left it unmade before she came to view it.

In February, Lucien Freud's portrait of Kate Moss fetched £3.9 million at Christie's. Damien Hirst's pickled shark fetched £6.5 million. It is therefore easy for the general public to think that British artists are doing pretty well. Those examples are the tip of a formaldehyde iceberg—they represent one tenth of 1 per cent. of UK art sales. The artists who are coining it are a very small minority. In fact, average contemporary art sale prices in 2002—the most recent year for which figures are available—were £382 for a painting or drawing, £198 for a photographic print, £293 for a sculpture and £163 for a limited-edition print. It is good to know that art is accessible to more people in terms of cost than people might think from the figures paid for Damien Hirst pieces. The truth is that half of all drawings and watercolours sold in the UK in 2002 sold for less than £500. Some 43.8 per cent. of all art sales in the UK are for less than €1,000.

During my speech, I shall switch between euros and pounds with rather unnecessary frequency. For that I apologise, Mr. Cummings. The European directive speaks about sale prices in euros, and the Government will end up speaking about sale prices in euros on the matter, so I must sometimes refer to prices in euros, because I have not converted all my figures from pounds to euros. An aspiration may be contained therein for the future of the British economy.

Many artists, even ones who are relatively well known and who may have been established for several years, earn extremely small amounts of money from the sale of their work. Forty per cent. of artists in the United Kingdom earn less than £5,000 per annum. That is below the minimum wage. Many are half employed and half self-employed, so that figure is not regularly in the public domain. None the less, we should bear it in mind.

The second misconception that I wish to abolish is that the artist's resale right will destroy the art market in the United Kingdom. When I was a member of the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport in the previous Parliament, we did a report on the British art market. Some of the outlandish remarks made by both the auction houses and the dealers suggested that the resale right would be the end of the British art market. No, it will not. For a start, the Government have managed to secure a whole series of exemptions, which will mean that the Commission's original proposals for an artist's resale right will not be as onerous as people first thought.

For a start, there will be a cap of €12,500 on the amount of royalty that an artist can earn from a work of art, so there is little likelihood of someone choosing to sell a British work of art in the United States or in Switzerland. That was one of the arguments advanced by the auction houses; that someone wanting to sell a Damien Hirst would decide to sell it in Switzerland or the US, where there is no artist's resale right. I do not believe that to be true, although people sometimes have a nexus of different reasons for believing that a work of art will sell best in a particular country. The owner of a work of art may choose to sell a £6.9 million work in the place where it is likely to achieve its highest price. That may be the US, but the €12,500 cap is unlikely to be the major factor that determines whether an owner sells the work in this country or elsewhere.

The second exemption that the Government have secured is that no royalty will be payable when art galleries buy a work directly from the artist and resell it within three years for less than €10,000. Again, that is because a large part of the British art market is selling works of art for considerably less than €10,000, which is roughly £6,500. That ensures that the impact on the high end of the art market will be pretty minimal. Significantly, the Government secured a derogation, which member states can implement, whereby the right will not apply to deceased artists' estates until 2010.

My concern is for the artists who are arriving on the art scene today, particularly for struggling artists whose income stream is difficult at the best of times, and not primarily for the estates of those who have already died. This row has already gone on in France, Germany and Italy. The derogation, however, gives the Government an opportunity before 2010 to review how the artist's resale right has worked in operation in the UK before going back to the Commission and discussing further possible changes to the resale right in the future.

The most important reason why the artist's resale right will not destroy the art market in the UK is that only about 2 per cent. of the total value of the UK art market—a tiny fraction—relates to the resale of the works of living artists. Even if all the works by deceased artists were included—only another 8 per cent.—that would be only a tenth of the whole art market in the UK, so I suggest that some of the comments of the galleries and the auction houses have been exaggerations.

The third misconception is that a strong UK art market depends primarily on a wholly unregulated market. I shall not talk about the regulation of auction houses because we know all about the problems that the auctions houses have got into over unfair trading in the past few years. More important, the strength of the UK art market relies on the vibrancy, innovation, imaginative quality and strength of the artists' community that underlies it. In other words, it relies on the artists who are making new works of art.

It is not good enough for us to rely simply on selling Eduardo Paolozzis and Francis Bacons—the great British artists of the recent past. We must have a modern, contemporary art culture if we are to have a strong art market. We will have strengthened the whole of the British art market rather than weakened it if we can ensure a stream of income to artists who are alive today.

The artist's resale right is likely to clean up some of the dodgy cash-based transactions of some of the UK art dealers about which witnesses told the Culture, Media and Sport Committee last year. That is because artists, who have a financial interest in the resale of their works and will be following their fate with a keen eye when they appear for resale at dealers and auction houses. Furthermore, dealers will have to produce an audit trail and invoices for works of art by contemporary artists. I suspect, therefore, that some of the less savoury practices in the art market will be cleaned up.

The Government issued a consultation paper earlier in the year, suggesting that derogations would enable them to introduce a threshold of anything up to €3,000. That is the point at which the artist's resale right would kick in and it would be in line with the European directive. However, I believe that we should apply the simple principle of helping as many artists as possible without making the royalty too bureaucratically burdensome to apply. The €3,000 threshold is too high to help the vast majority of artists. The threshold is set at €50 in Germany, €150 in Spain, €200 in France and €1,000 in Italy and Ireland. With the Government suggesting that it should be €3,000, we are sticking out like a sore thumb.

[Chris Bryant]

Lowering the threshold will not drive sales abroad. The honest truth is that the royalty on a work that resells in the UK for €1,000 would come in at the princely sum of £27—far less than the cost of packing, shipping or insuring the work, let alone the cost of the complex legal arrangements that may have to be made for it to be sold in the United States of America or Switzerland. We should therefore lower the threshold from €3,000 to €1,000.

Lowering the threshold to €1,000, as opposed to the German or French levels of €50 or €200, would also be proportionate, because that would not impose too heavy a bureaucratic administrative burden on industry. It is estimated that lowering the threshold will bring an extra 72 per cent. of British artists into the scheme. I simply ask the Minister—I hope that he will reply in what, for me, is an optimistic way—whether it would not be right to support the many, rather than just the few.

A classic instance that springs to mind relates to my constituency. A Conservative Member recently asked me what this debate would be about, and when I told him, he said, "I am sure that they talk of nothing else in the Rhondda but the artist's resale right." Well, the Rhondda group of artists comprised Glyn Morgan from Pontypridd, who was born in 1926 and who is still alive; Charles Burton, from Treherbert, who was born in 1929 and who is also still alive; and, perhaps most notably, Ernest Zobole, who died in 1999 and who was from Ystrad in the Rhondda. The group was very active; indeed, the two remaining members are still active. However, the vast majority of their works of art would not be caught by the €3,000 threshold, but only by the €1,000 threshold.

I want the Government—preferably this afternoon, and certainly soon—to say that the work of artists such as Charles Burton, Glyn Morgan and Ernest Zobole will be subject to royalty rights under the artist's resale right because the threshold will be lowered to €1,000. The Minister might like to know that Charles Burton's work "Rhondda Bridge" is currently for sale for £1,650 at the Martin Tinney Gallery in Cardiff. I am sure that the family will be delighted to have some artist's resale rights if it is sold.

Let me now say a couple of words about the legislative process. The Select Committee made recommendations earlier this year. We thought that the threshold should be lowered to €1,000. The Government responded in the summer, saying that it welcomed

> "the Committee's careful consideration of this issue. Responses to the recent consultation will need to be carefully considered and the views of the Committee will help to inform the Government's assessment."

I hope that the Committee's views will help the Government's assessment in the direction of €1,000.

Legislators tend to do remarkably little for visual artists. The nature of their work as painters, sculptors, potters or photographers means, quite often, that they work alone. Unlike singers, authors, musicians and composers, they have had few organisations to fight their corner. Remarkably little has been done to secure their economic and moral rights as artists since Michelangelo completed first the ceiling and then "The Last Judgment" in the Sistine chapel in 1541. The innovation of droit de suite is perhaps a fait accompli, but it was first introduced in France in only 1920 for auction houses alone. It was a vital step, and I hope that we shall enact it as a fully progressive measure, helping the many and not just the few, as soon as possible.

1.15 pm

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): I am most grateful to the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) for having secured this debate and for allowing me in on it, and to the Minister for agreeing to that.

It is worth making a couple of points. The hon. Gentleman spoke about some of the concessions obtained by the British Government during negotiations. It should be pointed out that one of the principal concessions was when they tried to stop the implementation of a lower threshold. The hon. Gentleman is arguing against everything that the Government have succeeded in doing over a period of five years.

The Design and Artists Copyright Society has mounted an extensive lobbying campaign, and not an unsuccessful one, it would appear. Quite frankly, however, there is nothing to change anyone's mind. Lord Sainsbury of Turville reminded the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport, of which the hon. Gentleman was then a member, that the administrative costs of imposing the limit of below €3,000 become an absurdly high proportion of the actual payments to artists. That is the seminal point, and nothing I have heard this afternoon has led me to change my mind.

The British Art Market Foundation has estimated that the total collection and distribution costs involved if the levy were extended to sales of €1,000, as suggested by the hon. Gentleman, would come to more than twice the amount received by the artist. The Government have made much of their policy of reducing the burden of costs and administration on business, and it would be entirely consistent were the Minister to resist the hon. Gentleman's cause.

Clearly, it would be absurd to involve the thousands of small businesses that make up our successful art market in a bureaucratic paper chase that would produce only tiny amounts of money for a small minority of artists. Interestingly enough, the hon. Gentleman will note that an independent survey commissioned by the Government found that the work of only 189 British artists was sold for more than €1,000 in auctions over a one-year period. That is worth noting.

Secondly, the Government have known the details of the resale right directive for more than five years. However, less than two months before it is due to be brought into effect the Government have not published their legislation. The artists' resale right has never been imposed on an art market the size of the UK's, which accounts for more than half the entire European art market. How can that market, which is so vital in this country for all artists of any sort, make the preparations needed if it does not have the details?

1.19 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Barry Gardiner): It is a great pleasure be here, Mr. Cummings. I think that it is the first time that I have served under your chairmanship.

It is always interesting when we have an artistic debate. We have had colour and texture from my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant), and style and form from the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire). We have been treated to some interesting byways of formaldehyde icebergs and dodgy dealers. However, the substance of our debate is crucial to the development of the art market in the UK, and I am delighted that my hon. Friend has highlighted that important issue. I congratulate him on securing the debate, which is especially significant as we are nearing the end of the process to reach a decision and implement the resale right in the UK.

The UK has a thriving and prosperous art market that makes a major contribution to the economy. In 2001, the UK art and antiques market was worth around £4.4 billion, split roughly 50:50 between auctioneers and dealers. With 25 per cent. of the world market total, the UK market is second only in size to the US and employs 28,000 full-time and 9,000 part-time staff. The Government are determined that it should continue to flourish.

Of course, there would be no art market without the creativity of artists, and the Government recognise the contribution that they make to the UK's cultural identity. Art, in all its forms, improves and enriches our daily lives. Visual art is an increasingly significant part of everything we do; it spans a huge range of activity from painting to photography. Art is one of the creative activities that, according to economic estimates produced in August last year, accounted for a significant 8 per cent. of the UK's gross domestic product in 2002.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda said, the majority of member states have indicated that they will adopt a threshold below €3,000—indeed €1,000 for many. However, other member states do not generally have as successful an art market as we do, which is why we need to consider the issue carefully before reaching a decision.

In implementing the directive on artists' resale rights, we must strike an appropriate balance between artists and those selling their work. We aim to introduce a workable scheme that will benefit artists without damaging the strong position of the UK art market. We are particularly concerned that the framework should minimise any risk that sales might be diverted to countries such as Switzerland and the USA where the right does not exist.

When negotiating the directive, the Government secured a significant number of concessions to reduce the risk of damage to the UK market. The first key concession is the imposition of a cap of €12,500 on the total royalty payable on any transaction. The original proposal contained no cap.

The second concession is the derogation under which the UK is entitled to delay the application of the resale right to works by deceased artists until 2010—that date can be extended to 2012. We intend to make full use of that derogation to allow the art market time to adjust to the introduction of the resale right. The UK will apply resale royalties only to the works of living artists from 2006. From 2010, resale royalties will have to be paid on sales of eligible works by deceased artists. The UK may, at this time, make a case to the Commission for the derogation to be extended to 2012.

The final key concession is an obligation on the European Commission to enter negotiations to make compulsory the relevant article of the Berne convention—an important international convention that sets out the worldwide copyright framework. Such a change would require countries such as the USA and Switzerland to introduce the resale right. To date, such attempts have not succeeded: both countries have said that they do not intend to introduce the right at this time, and the World Intellectual Property Organisation does not consider it a priority. We will continue to press for the international adoption of a resale right, but without any great hope of that happening in the near future.

The concessions dictated by the final form of the directive are crucial. However, other matters about which we have heard today are also critical to the impact of the directive in the UK. To make certain that we maximise the value to artists without undermining the art market, it will be necessary to make the right decisions on two matters on which the directive permits us some flexibility. Today's debate has allowed us to explore those issues in some detail and has given me an opportunity to set out some of the relevant factors that the Government are carefully considering.

The first important decision concerns the collective management of resale royalties. The directive allows members states to provide for collective management of resale royalties and to make such management compulsory. The arguments for collective management are threefold: it will secure greater compliance, it is generally considered to be relatively secure and it is more efficient, particularly through the lowering of administrative costs. Evidence submitted before and during consultation indicates that costs will be significantly reduced if the right is collectively managed. The main argument against compulsory collective management is that it removes the artist's choice to administer the right independently. Independent collection may be preferable for some artists who have strong links with particular galleries that sell their works. Compulsory collective management of rights does not generally apply in UK copyright law. We would therefore also need to be sure that such a requirement for artists' resale rights would not set an unwelcome precedent in any other area.

The second crucial decision is whether the UK should adopt a threshold of €3,000 or lower for the payment of royalties. Setting the threshold lower would considerably increase the number of artists who would benefit from the introduction of resale right. A recent study found that 37 per cent. of artists earn less than £5,000 per year, which means that almost 50 per cent. of all artists and visual creators fail to earn a reasonable living from their art. That percentage is significantly higher among certain groups, for example painters and sculptors. That is part of the background to the decision made in 2003 by the Arts Council of England to give more priority to assisting individuals. That new policy showed a marked shift away from the Arts Council's earlier policy of awarding grant funding to arts institutions.

The position of some artists at the lower end of the income scale is still not secure. That is why many artists are watching very closely to see what decision we make on the threshold. Our decision could make a real difference to their incomes and livelihoods. However, we must be sure that the decision on the threshold does not increase the number of sales at risk of diversion to overseas markets. We have had some very helpful information from stakeholders to help us to determine whether sales of artworks below the €3,000 threshold might be diverted to other countries. Indeed, the consensus is that the lower threshold of €1,000 will not significantly damage the art market by driving sales abroad. We believe that the costs of relocating a sale overseas will generally outweigh any royalty payable under artists' resale rights.

It may be helpful if I give an example. A work of art sold for €1,000—approximately £700—will generate a royalty for the artist of about £28 if the resale right is at a rate of 4 per cent. That figure will generally be far less than the cost of packing, shipping and insuring the work in order to sell it in another country. We must consider the fact that royalty payments on works selling for less than €3,000 would be very small. The £28 on a €1,000 sale may not make an enormous difference to an artist. Against that we must weigh the administrative burden placed on dealers and auctioneers to process the payments. The administration cost to businesses may be significant compared with the benefit to the individual artist. In particular, we must consider the impact on smaller dealers and auction houses.

We have recently received up-to-date information on the number of artists who would benefit and the costs of administration. Those figures are being analysed to assess the balance between the costs and the benefits that have been so ably presented to us by my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda and the hon. Member for East Devon. Both decisions are being made in the light of the helpful responses to the Government's public consultation exercise on draft implementing regulations, which was undertaken earlier this year.

The formal consultation process has been supplemented by a number of informative discussions with the art trade and those representing artists. Today's debate has been a useful additional opportunity to hear some of the views that we know must inform our decisions. We expect the draft regulation setting out our proposed framework for artists' resale rights in the UK to be laid before Parliament in the very near future. As this is an entirely new concept in the UK, and resale right has never before been applied to a market as large as the UK, we will monitor its impact following introduction. We will commission further research to compare with that undertaken before the right is in place. That will provide us with information to feed into the commission's review of the directive, which is scheduled to take place in 2009.

I shall conclude by repeating my earlier assurances—

Mr. John Cummings (in the Chair): Order. We have to move on to the next debate.

Planning System (Local Councillors)

1.30 pm

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): It is good to have the opportunity this afternoon to raise a subject that is prompted by an individual constituency case, but is of much wider interest to all those involved in local government. To put the matter in context, one of my concerns is that many local councillors feel increasingly powerless. Even if they have been on the council for some time, there are various background trends that make individual local councillors feel that they have less power and influence than they once had.

I suspect that there is a general trend among central Governments of all parties to want to take powers from local government and to constrain what local councillors can do. The move to a cabinet system of local government, which we have in south Gloucestershire, is great for those in the cabinet, but many back-bench councillors feel that they have very little say and involvement—that they are lobby fodder and somewhat peripheral to what is going on.

The one thing that councillors can be, and seek to be, and often get elected to be, is a champion for their community. Planning is one area in which they can try to exercise that function. It is important to say at the outset that it is proper and right for a local councillor to try to influence a planning process on behalf of the people he or she represents. As the Nolan Committee's third report says, at paragraph 288:

> "It is essential for the proper operation of the planning system that local concerns are adequately ventilated. The most effective and suitable way that this can be done is via the local elected representatives, the councillors themselves."

I am sure that the Minister agrees with that.

The question then arises whether that is what is happening, or whether the genuine, legitimate concerns to ensure that planning is done properly have been taken too far and constrained the legitimate democratic acts of local councillors in their attempts to represent their own community. The latter is the case in at least one respect—the consequences, which may not have been intended by the drafters, of the Local Government Act 2000 for the way in which councillors are involved in planning decisions.

The example that I want to give—I shall give the details of a particular case in a moment—is of a councillor who is on a planning committee when a planning application is submitted that relates to their ward. The councillor to whom I shall refer later happened to be the chair of the planning committee, although that is not particularly relevant. Under the 2000 Act, in practice councillors have to make a choice. They can be on the planning committee and cast their vote, but can express no real opinion throughout the entire planning application process; they must sit as sober as a judge when the arguments are presented at the meeting, weigh them up, and come to their so-called independent decision. Alternatively, they can say, "To hell with that—I know exactly what I think about this application and I know what my constituents think about it. No way am I going to keep my mouth shut for the next three, six or nine months. I am going to speak out, knowing that I then cannot vote and cannot be part of the discussions on that application." In the jargon that is called fettering discretion.

Immediately, that becomes a problem; I have come across councillors who have been vilified for sitting on the fence. I am sure that the Minister has also come across that. If a councillor is on the planning committee and people in his or her ward say, "This is a terrible application; it would be dreadful for local people", the councillor has to say, "I cannot say anything." Technically, they can say, "Well yes, I have concerns about this, but obviously I am not going to make my decision until the meeting", but if there is any sniff that they have made their mind up beforehand, the applicant can appeal, can go to the Standards Board, or can go to the local government ombudsman. Councillors are therefore incredibly nervous about expressing an opinion. That leads councillors to be vilified—I have seen it happen. Also, bizarrely, it leads constituents to go to the opposition party—whichever party it might be—because its councillors are under no such constraint and will gladly slag off the planning application. It is a strange situation, in which the person whom the people elected to represent them cannot speak, but the person whom they did not elect can speak. That does not seem right.

However, it gets worse. If a councillor lives in the ward affected by the planning application, the rules say that if that councillor has a personal and prejudicial interest, he or she cannot even speak. Not only can they not vote, or be part of the discussion, they cannot even speak. In other words, the councillor has fewer rights to come along and say their piece than a citizen in their ward.

What is a personal and prejudicial interest? Under the local authorities' code of conduct 2001, it is defined as follows

> "a member with a personal interest in a matter also has a prejudicial interest in that matter if the interest is one which a member of the public with knowledge of the relevant facts would reasonably regard as so significant that it is likely to prejudice the member's judgement of the public interest."

Those rules are being applied too tightly; the judgment has to be that the application clouds their judgment so much that they can no longer discern the difference between their interests and the public interest, which may, of course, completely coincide.

It is not just me who says that the pendulum of prohibition has swung too far, so that it is a kind of gagging order on local councillors. Earlier this year, the Committee on Standards in Public Life published a report, in which recommendation 28 stated:

> "In planning decisions the ability of elected members to represent constituents' interests where they have personal and prejudicial interests has been unnecessarily diminished."

The recommendation was spot on. The point that I want the Minister to reflect on is that it continued:

> "This should be changed to give any elected member the right to speak (but not vote) for their constituents at a planning committee meeting . . . provided"— and it then gave three perfectly reasonable conditions. The first is that > "a declaration of personal interest is made", the second is that

> "the representations are made in an open and transparent manner", and the third is that

> "the member making the representations . . . withdraws at the completion of their representations."

At least councillors can say their piece openly. Everybody knows that if they are affected they ought to be able to do that. Technically, there is a discretionary waiver of those rules, which I will come on to. However, that is the problem.

The Standards Board for England consulted on the code of conduct and made recommendations to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister just a couple of months ago. I want to highlight two. Recommending changes in the code of conduct, the Standards Board said first:

> "The Code needs to empower members as community advocates to take the lead on issues where their expertise is greatest and speak out on behalf of their own communities."

I am sure that that must be right. Secondly, the board said:

> "The rules around personal and prejudicial interests should be clearer, especially for members who sit on more than one public body."

The suggestion is that the rules have gone too far and that they are unclear. They certainly need looking at.

I want to highlight one specific case in illustration, which involves a councillor in my constituency, Alan Bracey. We have a unitary authority; no other councillors represent his area. It is a one-member ward. That is significant, because if it was a three-member ward we could largely get round the problem. The one on the planning committee could keep their mouth shut and the other ward councillors could weigh in, making it clear what they thought. In a one-member ward, that cannot be done.

The area is also semi-rural and the ward is, roughly speaking, the village. In other words, if someone is a ward councillor and lives at the heart of the ward, as is preferable, the chances are that they will be affected by a planning application in that ward. If it has broad impact on the ward as a whole, it is quite difficult not to be affected.

I will not go into great detail about the application, but basically Network Rail wanted to cut down huge swathes of trees to make the tracks safe. A lot of local people were unhappy, including Councillor Bracey. For 12 months, he fettered his discretion, stepped out of the chair of the planning committee, did not vote, but spoke out powerfully and gained some significant concessions. However, he has now been told that because he lives 100 yd away from some of the trees, he has a personal and prejudicial interest—if he has, he always did, but he has only now been given the advice—and should not even speak. That feels wrong, and it was not the intention of the legislation.

Councillor Bracey can apply to the standards committee of his local authority for dispensation to speak. However, it will get its legal advice from the same council's legal advisors who have told him that he should not speak: in effect, it will be an appeal to the person who turned him down. The worry is that that does not provide him with the freedom to go along and speak. Obviously, that is a specific case, but there is a wider issue. As I said, the pendulum has swung too far.

I want to draw the contrast between the situation for councillors and that for Members of this House. Issues of personal, prejudicial and pecuniary interest apply to us, but the rules are very different. We are governed by the code of conduct for Members and accompanying guide to the rules, and, to paraphrase section 76(1) of that guide, Members may not initiate proceedings in cases in which they have a relevant interest, but may otherwise speak freely on matters that relate to the affairs and interests of a body from which they receive a pecuniary benefit—so it is possible for them to be paid—provided that the benefit is properly registered. Paragraph 70 of the guide to the rules states:

[Steve Webb]

> "For the purpose of taking part in any division . . . it is sufficient for the relevant interest to be disclosed".

So not only can Members speak; they can vote on matters in which they have a personal, prejudicial, pecuniary interest.

Why is that rule good enough for us and not for councillors? I have a sense that it is because we are hon. Members. We would not bend the rules or lobby inappropriately, whereas I do not know what the assumption is about our councillor colleagues, but somehow they need tight rules. As for us, who pass the laws of the land, as long as things are in the book and everyone knows, we can pretty much do what we like. I exaggerate slightly, but there is a great inconsistency, and I shall be interested to hear the Minister's comments.

Councillors are in an uncertain position. My hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) asked the Deputy Prime Minister in 2003 if he would > "make it his policy to allow councillors on planning committees to make public statements on planning applications."

That is the kind of thing that we are discussing. The Minister's predecessor, the present Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality, set out the legal framework and then said:

> "Ultimately it is for individual members to decide how they conduct themselves in carrying out official duties, including whether to make public statements".—[Official Report, House of Commons, 18 March 2003; Vol. 401, c. 742W.]

In a sense, therefore, it is up to them.

My worry is that councillors are now frightened of tripping over the rules. They are frightened of being taken to the Standards Board for England. There is concern about over-use of the board, maliciously or by people who did not get the outcome that they wanted. I talk to councillors and ask them to speak out, but they say, "I can't say anything before the meeting, because if I do I will not be seen to be unbiased." The public do not understand that. I have come across too many cases in which councillors must either be completely straight with their constituents, explaining that they cannot express an opinion at all, or they give a coded message, along the lines of "I can't really say, but you know me." It should not be like that.

I will not labour the point. My feeling, and the feeling of the Committee on Standards in Public Life—and I think that the Local Government Association has similar concerns—is that a well-meaning attempt to make sure that there is probity in the planning system, as there should be, and that cases are decided on their merit, has resulted in community representatives feeling disempowered, the community feeling that they do not represent them, and local democracy not being properly served.

I do not expect an instant decision from the Minister, but it would be helpful to receive a suggestion of the response that the Department is likely to give to the submission on changes to the code of conduct made to it by the Standards Board for England in September 2005, and, more generally, some indication that the Department is willing to consider again whether things have gone too far and we are unnecessarily shackling the ability of councillors to represent their communities' concerns.

1.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): It is a pleasure to see you in the Chair, Mr. Cummings. I congratulate the hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) on securing the chance to raise the issue, in general and on behalf of his constituents. It is clearly a matter of wide public interest.

I appreciate the strength of feeling aroused by the case that he raised, but he knows that it would be inappropriate for me to comment on the circumstances of an individual case. I do not think that my response will fully satisfy him, but he will, if he waits for my conclusion, hear something about reflecting on the latest assessment of what is happening, which may give him some hope for a pronouncement shortly.

If there are allegations about the behaviour or position of an elected councillor that is, in the first instance, an internal matter for the local authority. Subsequently, as outlined by the hon. Gentleman, such matters ought to be referred to the Standards Board for England. However, if allegations impinge on an individual planning application, it could be referred to the First Secretary of State or one of his inspectors on appeal. In such circumstances, also, I would not wish to say anything that might prejudice the quasi-judicial appeal process. However, I wish to be helpful, so I shall explain some of the rules and guidance on the planning process that apply to elected members, which will reinforce much of what the hon. Gentleman said.

As elected members, councillors may sit on a planning committee; they are responsible for making planning decisions, although a large number of those are delegated to planning officers for determination. Councillors do not act as judges on planning applications; they perform an administrative task. They balance two roles, which are not always harmonious—determining planning applications and representing the public opinion of their communities. The planning committee is normally given background information, applicable policies and a variety of circumstances on an application, with recommendations on the decision to be taken that should guide members in making their decision.

The English planning system involves a considerable amount of discretion. As a result, decisions of councillors on a planning committee may be based on a variety of considerations. However, the law defines that decision-making duty. Failure to act within the confines of the law may render the council open to legal challenge by means of judicial review.

The cornerstone legislation on reaching decisions on planning applications is section 54A of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990, which is incorporated into Section 38(6) of the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004. Section 38(6) states:

> "If regard is to be had to the development plan for the purpose of any determination to be made under the planning Acts the determination must be made in accordance with the plan unless material considerations indicate otherwise."

As I said earlier, elected members on a local authority planning committee have to balance the needs and interests of individual constituents and the community with the need to maintain an ethic of impartial decision-making on what can sometimes be highly controversial proposals. The Nolan Committee acknowledged that that dual role can give rise to great tensions, as is clearly the case in the situation that the hon. Gentleman has brought to the House. In response, the Local Government Association issued a guidance note to authorities in October 1997.

The Local Government Act 2000 introduced a new ethical framework to local government, including a model code of conduct for councillors. The relevant elements of the code are a requirement on each local authority to adopt a local code of conduct for councillors and co-opted members, the establishment in each authority of a standards committee to provide support and guidance to members on the requirements of their local code, and a requirement on the Standards Board for England to arrange for the investigation of allegations of breaches of local codes through its ethical standards officers.

The LGA revised its original guidance in 2002 to reflect the new legislative arrangements. It was further updated in January 2005 in the document entitled "Member Engagement in Planning Matters", which states that if members have both a "personal" and a "prejudicial" interest, they should not participate in discussions. However, a planning committee member can still speak out against applications on behalf of ward constituents. Nothing in our guidance prevents them from doing so. The consequence is that they do not take part in the decision.

Another question is whether councillors should speak out in council meetings and in committees. They should probably not. Chapter 8 of "Probity in Planning" makes it clear that councillors who have openly declared a view on an application should not use their position to lobby other councillors or to organise a caucus to support their position. The decision-making meeting should be planned to give the councillor a say, but one that is similar to that which other stakeholders will get, in order to preserve fairness. Elsewhere in Chapter 8, it is made clear that other political meetings should not be used to organise a decision in advance of the committee that is due to make the decision.

The document published in January 2005 by the LGA, "Member Engagement in Planning Matters" gives similar advice. The purpose of the document is to explain to members how they can become more engaged in discussions without fettering their discretion. However, if they do the guidance is clear:

> "Members who do take an active stand in support or assistance to an application should withdraw from the planning committee deliberations. Responding to lobbying is fully legitimate where a councillor openly admits an interest in the outcome of deliberations and withdraws from the discussions on which they have a particularly strong view and stands down for the period while the item is under discussion."

In the event of a conflict of interests arising in a particular case during its consideration by a local authority, it would be for elected members to seek advice from the authority's own legal staff. They would then provide advice on interpretation of any relevant legislation and on case law. However, as I said, it would be inappropriate for me to comment on such a matter.

One of the Government's aims in reforming the planning system is to make it fairer and more transparent. Accordingly, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister continues to work with partner bodies such as the Local Government Association to produce advice and guidance for elected members on propriety issues in planning. Indeed, the planning advisory service, an arm of the Improvement and Development Agency, is financed by the Government. Its creation was one of the benefits of the £600 million in planning delivery grant allocation made available to improve the system.

I am pleased to say that only last week, a guidance document, "Positive engagement—a guide for planning councillors", was sent to every elected councillor in England. It was produced by the planning advisory service and endorsed by the chairman of the Local Government Association and my noble Friend Baroness Andrews. It too says that councillors should not > "expect to lobby and actively support or resist an application and still vote at committee (or even stay in the room during discussions)".

The code of conduct for local authority members requires that members with a prejudicial interest in an issue should withdraw from the council meeting. We are aware of concerns that some people have raised about the effect of the current rules on members' ability to represent the concerns of their constituents. The Standards Board for England has recently concluded a review of the code of conduct and the board's conclusions from that review include consideration of this issue. The board has proposed amendments to the code of conduct as well as a recent recommendation of the Graham committee on standards in public life and the Select Committee on Office of the Deputy Prime Minister on the conduct regime for local government and the role of the Standards Board for England. We aim to announce our conclusions on proposed amendments to the conduct regime for local government later this autumn.

Steve Webb: Before the Minister sits down, will he provide some clarification? I am encouraged that these matters are being looked at. I read out a couple of general recommendations made by the Standards Board for England. Can he clarify whether the board has made any specific recommendations? I read out one about making the code of conduct clearer. Has the Department received specific recommendations from the board that are, perhaps, in the public domain, or are they at the same level of generality as the one I read out?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I apologise to the hon. Member for Northavon but I cannot share that information with him at the moment, but I will write to him when I have clearance to identify for him the exact nature of the recommendations. As I said, we aim to make an announcement later this autumn, which means within the very near future.

[Jim Fitzpatrick]

I thank the hon. Gentleman again for raising this important issue. It is clearly a matter of concern not just to him and his local authority but to other authorities in the country. I assure him that the Government will continue to work with partner bodies such as the Local Government Association to monitor and improve guidance to local authorities at the earliest opportunity.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at six minutes to Two o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 9 November 2005

[MR. JOE BENTON in the Chair]

Medical Research (Regulation)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Heppell.]

9.30 am

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): It is a pleasure to speak under your chairmanship, Mr. Benton. It is a first and I welcome the opportunity to introduce the debate. It is clear that not many people will show particular interest in the subject. Regulation must be one of the most boring issues in Parliament, yet I hope to prove that many problems are associated with it. Moreover, I am sure that many hon. Members have other things on their minds today that are perhaps more pressing than what we are discussing today and do not regard regulation as being as important as some of us believe it is.

I wondered about the vagueness of the title of the debate because various people telephoned to ask me what I would talk about. The subject is wide ranging and difficult to home in on. I will concentrate on regulation because it crosses various Departments, especially the Department of Health and the Department of Trade and Industry. People are charged with operating the regulations and drawing them up. It is a huge activity throughout many Departments. Although the issue is a quagmire and many people hate regulation, there is no doubt that it is necessary in many circumstances, mainly because the public expect it. It exists for the safety of the public in many cases and we must have good regulation if we are to establish new research, new technologies and new ideas.

I was struck by those who have been lobbying about such matters. Many people are worried about regulation. I mean not only drug companies, but organisations such as Cancer Research UK, which said that the "increase in legislation regulating and inspecting aspects of research has led to concern within the research community."

It went on to say that regulation

"is imposing unnecessary and damaging constraints"

and that European legislation has a great effect in this country. We all remember the big debate about how clinical trials were carried out in Europe, and how the proposals from Brussels were curtailing the innovative work that is undertaken in this country.

I have received letters from organisations such as Kidney Research UK. While welcoming the opportunity to undertake medical research, it must have the freedom to work without unnecessary regulatory burdens. It said that adequate safeguards must be "in place to protect individuals against the misuse of organs and tissues . . . organs and tissues should not be retained after death".

A year or so ago, the Human Tissue Bill was introduced. It provoked much debate and many professionals were upset by the restrictions that were being brought in by regulation. They said that that would make it difficult for them to hold on to tissues and to reclaim them without consent. Matters concerning who obtained consent created a huge debate within the academic community, as well as much activity and lobbying in both Houses. The Parkinson's Disease Society regards stem cells as a potential great way forward to controlling problems. It is worried about the regulations that might be attached. Patient groups as well as the pharmaceutical industry are concerned about regulations and their potential to inhibit progress.

It is clear that medical research has contributed so much not only in this country, but throughout the world. We have learned so much about diseases and we are learning more. There is no doubt that there will be more drugs to treat cancer, Alzheimer's disease and other diseases. There will be a huge explosion of effort in medical research and stimulation, and we do not want that to be inhibited by fearsome regulations that put people off filling in the forms or whatever bureaucracy is associated with such regulations.

The position is becoming interesting and the Government should be examining when regulation is necessary and when it is not. Such questions need to be dealt with at some point not in a piecemeal way, but generally. It is hard to draw up hard-and-fast rules, but that does not mean that we should not attempt to do so. We want to encourage innovation in research. There is great potential for patient benefit and faster success to find cures for many diseases.

I am pleased that a DTI Minister is replying to the debate because such matters have a huge effect on our economy. Research and development, and the young people whom we train to work in our industries, have made a difference in terms of what we can discover. Not only do we employ those people, but we create a knowledge-based economy, which is one of the Government's prime targets. For that we should be grateful. It has taken a long time for it to be acknowledged, but, thankfully, now we are there, with 10-year innovation plans and so on to help things happen. Yet there is still a concern—perhaps not a worry—that some of the regulations associated with the new technology may inhibit the development of our economy. I shall spell that out a little more.

Medical research is not simply Nobel prize-winning research into a new gene, disease, drug or treatment. It also relates to the care of patients. We must recognise that research can be done into the kinds of bed people are in, palliative care and the circumstances in which people live. We want an evidence-based society that treats the patient from the early diagnosis, at which we are getting better with many diseases, through to when we care for them in our communities. That will enable us to realise that many diseases will be associated with people late in life and will be chronic, and that there will be a patient's journey from the early stages to the later ones. Much research is undertaken into that, but it is not highly prized or recognised. People feel that it is not Nobel prize-winning stuff. However, it is still important. Therefore, we need innovative ideas across the board.

Some hon. Members may be confused by the title of the debate. Research is regulated. There are health and safety conditions and laws that must be obeyed. It has sometimes been hard to operate in that environment if people have not been trained properly to understand that the research that they do in their white coats in the laboratories demands care and attention. I refer not only to their own behaviour with others but to the materials that they work with, be they chemicals, gases or anything else. Some of those materials could become available to people who have other plans for them. Therefore, there must be continuing regulation at that level. However, I am concerned about the regulation after that, and today we should try to address the regulation that helps our economy and develops new techniques. I want to give some examples of that.

[Dr. Ian Gibson]

Do we have enough regulation and do we need it at all? I do not have a hard blueprint in relation to those questions, but I can see that people can be over-zealous or under-zealous. I shall speak later about human embryology. The hon. Member for Salisbury (Robert Key) and I were members of the Select Committee on Science and Technology last year when it looked into the regulation of assisted reproduction technology and, gosh, we have the scars on our backs to remind us of those debates, because it is a vehement issue. The body that operates the legislation relating to that, the Human Fertilisation Embryology Authority, was very much in our sights. I shall cite that regulator as an example later.

The Government brought stem cell research into the parliamentary domain and allowed it to go ahead in this country. Now the argument is whether we are developing the technology fast enough and whether we will be ready for it when it happens. Members will know that Christopher Reeves, who played Superman, supported the work going on in this country, as opposed to the work that was not going on in the United States, which was inhibited by religious fervour. A Republican Government, who in many ways were against science, technology and innovation, were making it very difficult. Therefore, this country is ahead of the game.

With Richard Branson, Sir Christopher Evans and others, I sit on the Stem Cell Foundation, which has been considering a mechanism to ensure that, as the discoveries fall off the bench, the peer-reviewed papers and so on do not simply stay at the Royal Society and other such institutions, but are used to cure motor neuron disease, Parkinson's and Alzheimer's. There is tremendous potential, but getting money fast-tracked is a real problem, and one with which we have not yet dealt.

Regulation is not the only consideration. We have laws in place, but we also need to know how to develop the research. Regulation could be part of ensuring that we take the public with us when we start to do experiments, particularly those that involve animals. It is necessary to go through a regulatory process using animals. We all know about animal activists, or terrorists, and the way in which we have had to legislate and to draw up regulations to prevent their activities but to allow an open debate about their beliefs.

This country is doing well on stem cells—for example, in getting legislation and regulations in place and in starting to introduce products that will help people in the marketplace. That is difficult, as those people are not just constituents. They wear other hats as well. They are members of the public, patients and, indeed, citizens, so it is difficult to address such questions.

I sit on various committees for public understanding—the Royal Society and this and that organisation. Everybody means well and wants to get information to the public, but there is still a difficulty in getting scientists and medics to come out of their ivory towers and to talk about things in a language that the public can understand and feed into, thereby creating the feeling that the work is valued. Without that, we will run into more debates such as the ones on the measles, mumps and rubella vaccination—still going strong—genetically modified products and telecommunication masts, where knowledge does not get into the argument. The media and the political activity of other groups take over the debate and determine what happens to many products. These things are all mixed up but necessary: the legislation, the regulations and the interaction with all the different forces from industry to the public. How we make such interaction happen is important, and we still have much to learn.

There is a plethora of regulatory and advisory agencies in this country. Sometimes, I think that there are too many. They cross each other's agendas and have turf wars, almost like Government Departments. The war itself becomes bigger than the actual manifestation of the research in the communities and in the world. A great deal of effort and potential are lost.

Let us consider drugs, for example. People from the pharmaceutical industry—very powerful, emboldened, wanting to get their products to market—always want to talk about regulation. They talk about bureaucracy and too much red tape. Such talk can go too far. We do need some regulation, but perhaps the case can be made now and again that we stretch it too much. However, regulations evolve—they do not last for ever. In five or 10 years, the regulations that we make now may change because of, for example, new information.

There are deep-seated problems with public understanding of what some regulatory agencies are about. I have a quote about the United States Food and Drug Administration, which is known as > "a guardian of the United States public health standards and gatekeeper for regulated products"— that is, food industry products. That is the biggest part of its mission but not the only part. Its other mission is to be > "involved in advancing innovation—stimulating and encouraging new thinking, new means and new strategies for protecting and promoting the health of our nation".

Sometimes regulatory agencies get muddled up by taking on only their major responsibility, perhaps because of limits on time or resources, but I do not know of any agency that does not have to carry out several major activities. As I shall explain later in discussing the HFEA, there is a case for distinguishing between them.

Of course, strengthening the work on the safety of medicines is extremely important. However, innovation, openness, communication and information, which help to embolden and to strengthen, for example, the European Network for Drugs and Drug Addition, which meets occasionally, are also important, so there is a regulator looking at that across the board, as well as looking at the safety of medicines. What would be interesting to know is how much effort, relatively, is put into those particular two activities in the States and here.

The pharmaceutical industry says that the development of a drug is still an art, which is interesting—a matter of intuition, luck and trial and error, instead of what it should be, a mechanical process driven by science-based facts or probabilities. Lack of those insights at the start of the development process exposes novel drugs to unforeseen obstacles. We often glibly say that research and development is all that needs to happen, but the process is much more sophisticated and difficult to operate than that.

Medical research feeds into the process, and we need to make sure that we understand that, although regulated, the use of something may not happen right away. Seeing the benefits may take time, but we might need the regulations in place. For example, penicillin took a long time to get into use, likewise for recombinant DNA technology with therapeutic proteins and monoclonal antibodies, which were discovered at Cambridge but, sadly, developed in the United States. The new stuff coming along—cells, tissues, genes, therapies and stem cells—are at early stages yet, but how do we react to those discoveries?

The example of stem cells is a good one. There was good pressure from the academic community and, particularly, from the patient associations—those for Parkinson's, Alzheimer's and others—to wake the Government up to the fact that we needed regulation, that we needed to talk about it and to expose it to the public.

That was a good example of something being taken up, but quite often we sit back and wait for something to happen. GM technology, for example, had been around a long, long time. Scientists, academics and medics said that we would not need any regulation, the public would love GM, which was going to be good for them. Well, we learned the lesson the hard way. Newspapers took up Frankenstein stories, exposing lies to the community, such as GM technology and plants giving us this and that disease.

As people know, the argument about the MMR vaccine is still raging on. Journalist Melanie Phillips has taken an anti-science view or, rather, has taken some scientists' view against that of others. We have to see things coming and have the regulation in place, or not, depending on the situation. We cannot wait and say that all the research will find its own level. We have to provoke things and know what the problems might be. We do not have to put them in hard order, but we must have some discussion.

If a pharmaceutical company tries to develop things today, it will have to deal with EU legislation, testing directives, paediatric regulation and tissue engineering regulation. It will remember that we have the Human Tissue Act 2004 and a regulator, the Human Tissue Authority, which was set up to handle questions after Alder Hey. That was a reaction to a situation that we should have seen coming, but which happened because of exposure in the media and a national scandal. That is not how we should use the excellence of knowledge, research and what we discover, nor how we should get them into the legislative, regulatory and parliamentary processes.

I want to talk briefly about several of the regulators. For example, we all know about the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence. I am not going to go on about NICE—we are all a bit fed up with NICE and the stories on Herceptin, which just keep going on and on. I am not sure that NICE is the best organisation in the way that it works, but the principle of having evidence-based medicine cannot be argued against.

How NICE operates is up for grabs at the minute. I asked a question the other week on what the value of NICE was. The Minister told me, but she did not say that the NICE organisation was brilliant—she said that the principle was brilliant. I agree, but we have to look around. We do not need to throw brickbats at NICE, which is an evolving organisation. It may be hard to push, shove and kick it but Ministers and Governments can help with legislation and regulation. We are moving towards a fast-track process and I predict that within a year NICE will have sub-committees. One will deal with cancer drugs, another with drugs for mental health and so on. We are going to be invaded by all the new potential coming out of research. There is a huge feeling that we are not really ready for it and that, if we breathe on Herceptin, it will go away. It will not. That organisation has a list of about 30 cancer drugs, and the suspicion is that all of them will be useful in helping people with certain types of cancer. I will not go on too much about that.

What I want to go on about in particular relates to some of the other authorities. The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority has a dual role. It considers several things at the same time. It has two principal functions: it is a regulator and an advisory body. It is charged to keep under review information about embryos and, as the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 states:

"any subsequent development of embryos and . . . the provision of treatment services and activities governed by this Act".

Hon. Members will know that that provision is mainly concerned with the technology of in vitro fertilisation, which changes almost daily in terms of how embryos can be created.

Regarding stem cells, there is a provision concerning the embryo: how long should an embryo be kept before it is killed, and is it a live being after 14 days or not? Now, the process can be carried out without having to destroy an embryo at all. That is true of mice at the moment, but you can bet your bottom boots that they will be able to do it with human eggs as well. We always start such processes with animals, then the process moves on. Nuclear transplantation started off with frogs, ended up in Dolly the sheep and can now be done with human beings. That is an inevitable process, which we should welcome but be ready for and ready to handle.

We are ready in some ways. We have considered human cloning and said that we should not allow it. We have jumped ahead there, but that is because of stem cell research. The technology and science of medicine moves on so fast that we are always lagging behind. We often get caught by media scares, patient groups or other groups making the case.

There is a problem with regulators having a dual function. The regulator's role allows it to work within the Act and to discharge its duties accordingly. Its advisory function challenges it to find fault with the legislation on behalf of the Government. That is an ambiguous position. It is a double-handed position, and one role does not always sit easily with the other. The Select Committee was quite light about it compared with Lord Winston, who would abandon the HFEA overnight. He said that it had no useful function and was a pain, and he is considered to be a world expert in this arena. He suggested that the functions should be separated in two new regulatory bodies. I give that not as an example of something I want to argue, but as an example of how we have to adapt when we consider something in depth in relation to new research and discoveries.

[Dr. Ian Gibson]

There are many more agencies that have been important in the sphere of health. The regulators are amazing; they spring out of the woodwork all the time. The Minister will probably be able to give examples of where that has happened in his field of expertise. I shall just use the one of health because I mentioned the HFEA. Bodies have been set up for clinical standards, medicines, health care products, equipment and the conduct of health care professionals. The current vogue in politics is to merge those bodies. I mentioned, for example, the Human Tissue Authority, which was set up a year or so ago by the Government. The intention is to merge it with the HFEA because there is so much cross-function. Considering the bare bones of their job descriptions, it should be possible to find common territory, so that we do not duplicate things. Turf wars could emerge; even if they do not, the process of getting the product into the market could be delayed.

The Medicines and Healthcare Products Regulatory Agency has been attacked quite savagely by people in this Chamber. It was set up in 2003 and it replaced the Medical Devices Agency and the Medicines Control Agency, one of which was concerned with technologies such as stents for heart disease and the other one of which was concerned with drug products. Within that context, it promotes public health, patient safety and health care products that meet appropriate standards of safety, quality, performance and effectiveness. That is another example of taking two bodies and putting them together so that they function in the same building to tackle the same problems: health and the standards that have to be met.

Another body, the Commission for Healthcare Audit and Inspection, came on the scene about the same time. The HFEA suddenly had to talk to it too, because, again, there was a lot of overlap, although there are differences in function. One body is concerned only with IVF and assisted reproduction. However, the general care and interaction with the public and patients is much the same in both instances. So, again, much more could be done about that.

I am not going to say anything about ethical committees and issues of morality. They often get put at the bottom of the agenda, if there is time to get to them. It is essential that they should be the top one or two items on the agenda. We cannot worry about that because we do not understand ethics. That is true. On our Select Committee, gosh did we argue about ethics. I still do not know what they are and we did not get very far. I do not think that we were going to persuade each other what an ethical position was, but did we argue.

Now, if we are like that, what must it be like on some of those committees? However, there are important, serious questions to be asked and they must be incorporated. Patients can be involved or it can be members of the public, but their view must be taken into consideration. I made that point about the joining together of committees and so on.

Many complaints are emerging in some areas, not just about regulations, but about having the necessary staff. I am not going to talk about radiographers and radiologists and all the boring stuff that we have been through. I want to talk about clinical people who work in universities and who are interested in clinical infection. They find it difficult to get others interested in that. These people are interested in infectious diseases and, gosh, do we know about those. We are hearing about bird flu just now, as well as AIDS, tuberculosis, malaria, antibiotic-resistant infections and so on. The official bodies complain that there are not enough people studying those things and that the people who are teaching do not have time to do proper research into those areas.

There is a point to be made about regulation in that context, too. There must be enough people to know what kind of research is going on and to subject it to critical scrutiny. Microbiologists and virologists in this country think that they are being left behind. That would mean that, if we had an epidemic of some kind, we would have to buy in the expertise and obtain the knowledge. We must consider problems such as that at the same time.

I have talked about several bodies, how they have merged together and how that has been valuable. Remember that the endgame in all this is to reduce the risks to public health. The process must be seen to be transparent. It must be based on scientific and medical evidence to support risk management. Sometimes, people have to know what the risk is and there are ways of handling that. If the public are given the knowledge, they can say, "Well, I'll take the risk," or "I'm not taking the risk." I do not know what makes the public choose one rather than the other, but I know this: if we do not ask them early enough, they will get confused messages from the media and others and the whole thing could go wrong. That is important.

I have already given a few examples of how regulation can tee people off in terms of innovation. The great thing in this country is that young people who work in these fields have superb ideas. That is why I care about people who are doing medical microbiology and virology. They have so much information and dedication, and the hours that they work are almost as long as those of MPs.

Someone who works on AIDS at Oxford worked in my office in Parliament for three days the other week. After she left at six o'clock at night, she said to one of the other interns, "I am going back to the lab tonight to carry on my work." That is the kind of dedication that we have. I do not want to talk about such people's career prospects, but they are making the innovation and product culture very much a part of the British way of life. We do not have to leave the US or Europe to do it all the time, and we do not have to be inhibited by the way in which they carry out research.

I do not want to go on about the HFEA, or others who I have mentioned who are worried about it, such as Lord Winston. There is turmoil, however: on the one hand, there are good messages about what is being done; on the other, there is fear. Can we get rid of the organisation? Do we need to? It may be good that people think that their work will not get on to the market. They do not do it to become millionaires; they get a pride out of doing it, and that is important. We have much to learn not only in the area that I have emphasised, but in others. I have no doubt that the Minister will have something to say about that.

The Select Committee's report about legislation addresses the question of how much regulation we need. I shall not be able to find the quotation I had from the competitive fifth force, the body in the Minister's Department which considers such matters. However, it produced a report on regulation in which it said that there is a time for regulation when public concern requires it; there is a time also when one needs to evolve existing legislation and regulation and join the bodies that take care of it, because knowledge moves on; and there is a time for no regulation at all.

Most of medicine is not regulated. Why should assisted reproduction in vitro fertilisation have a regulator all to itself? What about all the other activities in the health service? That is the reason that Lord Winston does not like the HFEA. One could spend one's whole life analysing the health service and setting up regulators, but it would be inhibitory. Sometimes, one must trust people to set up their own ethics committees. They have concerns, ethics and morality, and they are certainly concerned to ensure that the products we produce are regulated and respected.

Many regulators are respected. It is a good job that they exist, because there are charlatans out there trying to cut corners. There is no doubt about that, and regulation cuts it down.

10.3 am

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) on securing the debate on this important topic. It is dear to my heart, and the hon. Gentleman should not apologise for it being dear to his. I used to work with and for several medical research charities, and this is an important subject for Parliament to debate. It is risky for politicians, as it includes ethics and morality, which lead us to the grey area between party politics and private conscience in which tempers run high and party Whips are strangely unwilling to provide their usual gentle guiding hand.

I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. Gentleman that careful attention to the evidence and a rational argument must guide us through this unfamiliar territory. When strongly held personal and religious beliefs lead people to believe only the evidence that suits them, sensible debate begins to go out the window. The least excitable participants in the debate on regulation are those in the business community. As I am sure that the Minister will shortly tell us, it employs significant numbers of people in medical research in the UK. One managing director of a pharmaceutical company told me yesterday that there is much to be positive about in Britain's commercial position in medical research. He sees Britain as in medical research and says that it scores more highly than most other EU countries. He also said that a positive Government and regulatory environment is essential to that success and spelled out nine areas of concern.

"an effective place to invest"

I will not list them all but will make the Minister aware of a few. They include competition from the US market and, increasingly, from China, India and eastern Europe, as well as the climate of fear that is still being created by violent animal rights campaigners who are now beginning to target small suppliers. Even in a large medical research charity I remember the siege mentality among researchers that was created by the most violent campaigners. Even when we were not commissioning research involving animal models, we would never say that for fear of starting a process by which animal campaigners could narrow down and identify the charities that were. The managing director I talked to was from Eisai UK. He cited a lack of well trained science graduates, the unrealistic expectations of potential academic partners in terms of intellectual property and the slowness of negotiating agreements and clinical study protocols with NHS hospital trusts. Those were all issues for him. Perhaps predictably, he grumbled a little about NICE's role in judging the cost-effectiveness of medicines in addition to all the other regulatory bodies involved in the industry. I cannot agree with him there and I agree with the hon. Gentleman. My experience in the area of Alzheimer's is that NICE's decisions are not always right, but it is right in principle to have a body to direct prescribing in the NHS on evidence-based lines.

The managing director of Eisai warned specifically about one aspect of a recent new proposal from NICE to evaluate new medicines at their launch. He was worried that that might delay the entry of products into the market and lose us one of our competitive advantages over many other EU countries. It affects the nature and quality of evidence available on which to make an assessment if one dives into the process so early because there is none of the grubby market-based learning from the drug in the market.

Charities have similar concerns about the balance between the proper need for regulation and a system that is manageable and proportionate to the risks involved. The hon. Gentleman mentioned what Cancer Research UK had said to the Select Committee and others. It suggested three measures to reduce bureaucracy, simplify processes and increase productivity such as a common system of reporting to reduce duplication and free up time for research. It suggested that application processes should be simplified to address delays and inconsistencies. It suggested simplifying and expediting the ethical review process for clinical research, which would reduce the time taken to start research programmes, making that process as quickly navigable as it believes it is in other countries.

CRUK acknowledges that although the regulatory regime for medical research in this country is not perfect, it is of a higher standard than in other European countries, which is a matter of pride. It is also worried about the EU clinical trials directive and particularly how its UK incarnation, the Medicines for Human Use (Clinical Trials) Regulations 2004, has impacted on the non-commercial sector, pushing up the cost of clinical trials and perhaps damaging recruitment. In theory, that should apply equally in all EU countries and there is a thought that we might be gold-plating the regulations. I am not sure whether that is so, but perhaps the Minister could pay attention to that. I hope that he will bear in mind the concerns of both the charity and the commercial sectors.

[Martin Horwood]

It is a tribute to the 20-year-old legislation that set up the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority that it has largely succeeded in coping with astonishing and often controversial new developments in reproductive medicine. It has combined a willingness to allow effective, important research to proceed and to grow with an understanding of public sensitivities. The novel use of embryonic material is one of the most sensitive areas and the authority is absolutely right to keep that under review. It should remain clearly within the authority's remit, and that should not have to be brought before judges, or even politicians, too often. The way in which the debate in the United States has been debased by politicians influenced by religious fundamentalism should give us all pause for thought. The result is that scientists such as Stephen Minger of King's college, London, and Roger Pederson of Cambridge, have come from the United States to this country, and that is a matter for quiet national pride.

It would be wise to amend the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 to make clear the authority's competence in areas of study that were not really foreseen 20 years ago, such as the creation of embryos for the purpose of treatment using stem cell lines. That, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned, holds enormous promise for potential therapies for diseases such as Alzheimer's, Parkinson's and Huntingdon's disease.

It has been suggested that the authority's remit could be extended to the licensing of clinical trials. It argued that that would have the advantage of encouraging a smooth transition from research to treatment under the same regulator and the same legislation; but, of course, from the point of view of clinical trials, it would be adding yet another regulatory body into the mix. Perhaps it would be wiser if the HFEA were simply asked to issue guidance to the ethics committees already responsible for regulating clinical trials. We are in a new landscape in terms of awareness of issues such as children's welfare, patient safety and personal freedom of information. Those issues may have implications for the wording of legislation and the composition of the authority itself.

Public opinion is, in broad terms, generally on our side; a recent MORI poll conducted for the HFEA earlier this year showed how far we have come since the first test-tube baby was a matter of such huge publicity and controversy. The recent poll showed some public concern about unforeseen consequences, and even about risk to future generations, but more than 70 per cent. of respondents agreed that human embryo research can improve the quality of life of future generations with inherited diseases, and can enable scientists to increase their understanding of how the human body works. Fewer than 10 per cent. disagreed.

The same cannot be said of the use of animals in medical research; on that subject, opinion is much more polarised, and there is significant public and political disquiet. On regulation, opinion varies. Some people would like us to go towards a free-for-all, and would allow very light regulation of animal research, but others want to ban it completely. Opinion is so polarised that each side in the debate has taken to almost cartoon characterisation of the other. I have been at meetings in the medical research community where anyone who had the faintest notion of animal welfare or animal rights was characterised as being in the same camp as violent car bombers. On the other side, it seems that it is sometimes claimed that animal research has contributed absolutely nothing to human welfare, has only harmed and killed people and has impeded medical research. The truth, as ever, is somewhere between the two.

I commend to hon. Members, and to the Minister, the recent report by the Nuffield Council on Bioethics. It is a little bit of light reading at 334 pages. I confess that I have not read every page of it yet, but from what I have read, it seems a thoughtful and impressively thorough examination of just about every nook and cranny of the animal research debate, including the issue of the need for regulation. It gives no comfort to antagonists on either side who are in search of a quick win. For those who ask, "What has animal research ever done for us?", it gives chapter and verse. In basic biological research, it explains: how research with dogs helped to identify the biological basis of narcolepsy; how animal studies revealed the role of autoantibodies in the life-threatening disease myasthenia gravis and contributed directly to better diagnosis and treatment; and how patching the eyes of newborn cats revealed the risk of patching newborn children with one lazy eye. Children with this condition now have each eye patched alternately, saving many of them from blindness in one eye.

In the study of diseases, the most famous example is that of variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease—a rare, fatal and fast-moving form of transmissible spongiform encephalopathy that affects mainly teenagers. Studies with mice proved the transmissibility of scrapie between sheep species through abnormal proteins known as prions. Those led in turn to experiments that showed the transmissibility of the bovine variety of spongiform encephalopathy—BSE—to primates. The process linking BSE to human variant CJD was therefore clear. The rest, as we know, is political history.

The report also explores the use of animals for pharmaceutical research and toxicity studies. It acknowledges that there is controversy, complexity and genuine limitation in both those fields, but in the end it supports their validity as well.

The notorious failure of pharmaceutical research methodology in the case of thalidomide provides a good example of some of the problems involved. Animal trials failed to predict the adverse effects of the drug on the unborn children of pregnant humans. However, the animal models used were not pregnant. Subsequent experiments showed that had they been, the same limb deformities might have been detected in mice, rats and other animals, and the alarm bell would have been sounded.

Is there no case to answer for animal research and no need for tighter regulation or, perhaps, for any regulation? Yes, there is. Showing that some animal experiments work for humans does not necessarily make it the right thing to do and does not even show that most research using animals is necessary or beneficial to humans.

A recent article in the British Medical Journal is pretty damning. Its authors are not animal rights protestors, but professors from the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine, the Centre for Perinatal, Pediatric, and Environmental Epidemiology at the Yale university school of medicine, and the department of clinical neurosciences at Edinburgh university, along with a research fellow from the department of social medicine at Bristol university. They said:

> "Clinicians and the public often consider it axiomatic that animal research has contributed to the treatment of human disease, yet little evidence is available to support this view. Few methods exist for evaluating the clinical relevance or importance of basic animal research, and so its clinical (as distinct from scientific) contribution remains uncertain. . . . Biased or imprecise results from animal experiments may result in the testing of biologically inert or even harmful substances in clinical trials, thus exposing patients to unnecessary risk and wasting scarce research funds. Moreover, if animal experiments fail to inform medical research, or if the quality of the experiments is so poor as to render the findings inconclusive, the research will have been conducted unnecessarily. Investigating the validity of animal experiments is therefore essential for both human health and animals."

Examples were given in the article and work on that investigation is urgently needed.

Even if animal experiments are well designed and prove to be beneficial, it is not always clear that they are really necessary. The Nuffield report quotes a 2003 study, where head restraint devices were implanted in the heads of rhesus macaque monkeys under anaesthetic and metal coils were then surgically implanted into their eyeballs so that their eye movements were recorded. The purpose of the study was to learn more about the way primates perceive other primates' faces. The pressure group Europeans for Medical Progress, with which I have some issues, claims that similar experimental outcomes have been achieved using human volunteers wearing adapted contact lenses. Even if they had not, many of us would instinctively recoil from the use of intelligent creatures, such as monkeys, in that way for research unconnected with any life-threatening disease.

That raises the moral question of whether we have the right to conduct experiments on animals and, if so, on which ones and causing what degrees of harm, distress, discomfort or pain. The Nuffield report bravely ploughs into the moral, philosophical and scientific arguments, quoting Aristotle, Immanuel Kant and others along the way; it is a fantastic read.

My view is that is nearly impossible to draw a categorical moral dividing line between humans and other animals, especially as science reveals more and more characteristics that we have in common with a few of the most intelligent animals, from tool use to altruistic behaviour and the capacity for language. In other words, some animals must have some rights, but it would take the most pious Jain religious belief or the most extreme support for animal rights to place us on the same moral level as a fruit fly. Lines have to be drawn and moral boundaries marked out across what is essentially an evolutionary and biological continuum.

The Nuffield report makes no real stab at that almost impossible task, but it concludes simply, powerfully and perhaps rather surprisingly:

> "A world in which the important benefits of . . . research could be achieved without causing pain, suffering, distress, lasting harm or death to animals involved in research must be the ultimate goal."

The report's authors go on strongly to support the three Rs of reduction, refinement and replacement. They argue for much more promotion of best practice and say:

> "We acknowledge that the UK has the most detailed legislative framework concerning research on animals in the world. But proper attention to the welfare of animals involved in research and the accountability of scientists who conduct research on animals cannot be achieved merely by having detailed regulations. Regulation can act as an emotional screen between the researcher and an animal, possibly encouraging researchers to believe that simply to conform to regulations is to act in a moral way. It is therefore crucial to promote best practice more actively and to improve the culture of care in establishments licensed to conduct experiments on animals."

It encourages the UK to take a leading role in the development of alternatives and recommends that each research application proposing the use of animals should show how the three Rs have been considered and on what grounds any possible alternatives to animal use have been rejected. Interestingly, the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals has tackled the other end of the research process and suggested that all published research papers from studies using animal models should include information on how the three Rs had been complied with and on the fate of the animals involved.

The Nuffield report also suggests public opinion research, which might start to draw the animal research debate into the admittedly rather fragile kind of public consensus enjoyed in the field of embryology, and away from the current, extremely polarised, views. Those and other recommendations on regulation in the report go well beyond the status quo, and I recommend them to the Minister.

10.21 am

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) on securing this debate, which is extremely important. He has done the House a service in raising this important issue. I had the good fortune to serve with him on the Science and Technology Committee during the previous Parliament. It was an exciting experience, to say the least, to do something that this House should do far more—take a lead in the area of science.

Medical research is fundamental to the well-being of all of us in this place, the whole country and, increasingly, the whole world. One of the best reports produced by the hon. Gentleman's Committee was that on science in international development. It showed the significance of the British research effort for worldwide well-being. We had many more, slightly exotic, excursions into the realms of scientific research under his excellent chairmanship.

I am not a scientist. However, I have the honour of representing a lot of scientists; there are more than 1,000 scientists and science researchers in my constituency. Most work near Salisbury, at Porton Down, which has two establishments: the Defence Science and Technology Laboratory and the Health Protection Agency. A lot of very important research is done there that has a huge spin-off into medical research, with everyday applications to extremely complex diseases—and to some simple ones as well.

Science is politically neutral. It is what we do with it that matters. When science, or an issue in science, is overlain by moral or ethical considerations, as in the case of human reproductive technology, for example, the decision on where to draw the line has to be taken by Parliament as a whole, not by the loudest pressure groups—or, for that matter, by Whitehall Ministers. It is often perceived in this country that to be pro-science is to be anti-green, but that is no more true than saying that good greens are anti-science.

[Robert Key]

Often in the United Kingdom, there is an assumption that science is bad, dodgy, difficult and something that we really do not want to know about unless we have to. That is most unfortunate, because it is not true of other nations, where the whole concept of science is often thought of very differently. Perhaps the old days, when scientists in this country were extremely respected because they knew so much more than the rest of the community, have gone. Sadly, that respect is not there as it used to be.

If we go to other countries such as Finland or France, we still find that there is a great deal of respect for scientists—research scientists in particular—specialising in anything from nuclear energy, to GM crops, to medical research. In those countries, the place of the scientist in the community is different from the position that we have arrived at.

What has gone wrong? One of the things that has gone wrong is to do with British politicians. We should take a lead, and not run for cover every time science is mentioned. It is significant that only four Members of Parliament are taking part in this important debate. That does not do us much credit, although it gives those of us who are present a little longer to say what we want to say, which is no bad thing.

When considering medical research, debating policy options, scrutinising legislation or deciding how to vote on difficult issues, we must first understand and properly assess the nature of risk. The hon. Member for Norwich, North mentioned that. That is fundamental. There is now an assumption in the public mind that it is possible to achieve a risk-free status for almost everything, and that things should not be done if politicians or scientists cannot guarantee that. If we try to justify doing something by saying, "Well, there is a risk, but we have assessed it and we have made the decision to go ahead," we immediately have the tabloid press, for example, down on our heads. Anyone who has ever been in a ministerial position knows what can happen if they dare to put their head above the parapet and say that they have assessed the risk of doing something and that they want to take the public with them.

Public opinion can be gullible if the public are not well informed. That is another major problem in our country, because we do not have nearly enough science education. The right attitude towards science is inculcated at an early age in many societies. The teaching profession—I was a teacher for 16 years—tries hard in respect of science education, but it is an uphill task to try to persuade people to take science in schools seriously.

We have heard again today, from the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Martin Horwood), about how British industry complains that there are not enough good science graduates. Why are there not enough good science graduates? Because not enough people study it at school. Why do too few people study it at school? Because science does not have a high enough status, it is too difficult and we do not encourage schools to take it more seriously for pupils at a tender age.

I asked a group of young professional people aged between about 25 and 35 if it was true that Brits cared little about science. They said that most of us, including journalists, were, to use their words, apathetic, ignorant, indifferent, misinformed and gullible when it comes to science. In their opinion, science is taken for granted until something goes wrong, when the media have a field day. There is open season for pressure groups and lobbyists, and then we enter the fantasy world of Frankenstein food, designer babies and grey goo.

Later, I attended a seminar of chief executive officers of blue-chip, science-based companies, a brace of vice-chancellors from science-oriented universities and a few politicians. The subject of the seminar was the state of science education. I expected to get an ear bashing from the industrialists about the paucity of postgraduate science education and so forth. Instead, with one voice, I was told that the most pressing need is for more and better science education for all, from key stage 1 right through life. That is a challenge that we politicians must meet.

One of the areas where we come across that problem is in medical research, in the regulation of that and in the nature of the science budget. The science budget describes a delicate relationship or partnership between the Office of Science and Technology at the Department of Trade and Industry, other Government Departments, business and industry, charities, which have an important role to play, international sources, including the European Union, and, of course, the regional development agencies in the United Kingdom, which also have an important role to play in the delivery of the science budget. They all meet as what is called the Funders' Forum.

One of the problems is that the Government see themselves as the main driver of innovation and research in the UK, simply because they are the biggest customer. That is not unreasonable; 10 per cent. of our gross domestic product is spent on goods and services to do with research. However, the trouble is that, although the Government are a good spender, I am not sure that they are the best judge of research and innovation agendas. Therefore, the relationship between Ministers and science is probably wrong.

For example, when the DTI published its last five-year programme for science, it said that the Cabinet would define the "grand challenges" facing public policy in which scientific research can play a major role in establishing the way forward and that that work would be based on departmental proposals. I wonder whether that introverted and interventionist approach can deliver the global advantage so necessary for UK science and innovation and the economic prosperity so necessary for our nation, particularly where medical research is concerned.

We should follow the good practice of the hugely successful system in the United States, where the federal-funded, fully independent National Science Foundation is responsible for granting research funding, with the exception of medical research funding, which is administered by the independent National Institutes of Health. The foundation gives the private sector and medical research charities a much bigger role in determining where research should go.

In biotechnology and pharmaceuticals, British science is ahead of the game. The spin-out of research through innovation to production is remarkable and much to be encouraged. However, as we heard from the hon. Member for Cheltenham, there is still unfinished business in relation to the use of animals in research. The targeting of scientists and their families by extremists is completely unacceptable, as is the economic damage done to the biotechnology sector by threats to trade suppliers, financiers and insurers. None of that is justified or in the national interest. It is driving global enterprise out of the UK.

I pay tribute where it is due to the Government in taking steps to improve the situation, but we must go further if we are to encourage British scientists to stay in difficult sectors of medical research. We must also challenge and remove burdensome regulation when we can. As the hon. Member for Norwich, North said, there is an enormous burden of regulation. He said that more regulators creep out of the woodwork all the time. Therefore, we face a huge challenge.

To turn to specifics, it is true that the United Kingdom has been at the cutting edge of medical research. Many of the methods used for large-scale clinical trials were developed in the UK, largely because of the nature, size and scale of the national health service. Other countries that do not have a comparable health service cannot get their hands on the numbers—the captive audience—necessary to do the work.

I mentioned the work done at the Health Protection Agency and the DSTL at Porton Down, but there was also the work done until the 1980s by the Common Cold Research Unit in Salisbury. It did not find the cure for the common cold, but it laid the foundation for important virology work, which led to British expertise in coping with AIDS. That was an unexpected roll-out of science, which often happens when scientists, almost by accident, come across something that can change the world.

I also think of the work on the defence side at Porton Down, which has led to the treatment of wounds. It has been of enormous benefit around the world, not only to the British military, which is the prime purpose of the establishment, but to everybody else. The work at the DSTL on the detection of chemical and biological agents has been of enormous significance throughout the world, as has the development of protection against those agents through suits and breathing apparatus. It is significant that not only do the military now train people at the Defence Nuclear Biological and Chemical Centre at Winterbourne Gunner, also in my constituency, but, at the Police Nuclear Biological Chemical and Radiological Centre. Every police force in the UK now receives training in those subjects. Therefore, the basis on which we invest in science in this country can have significant spin-offs throughout medical research and everyday life.

Last year, there was a row between the Medical Research Council and the National Institute for Medical Research. It symbolised so much of what had gone wrong with medical research. I congratulate the hon. Member for Norwich, North on the skill and ruthlessness with which the Science and Technology Committee, of which I was a member, pursued an inquiry. That report did much to heal the wounds and to point the way forward for two world-class institutions. It was a remarkable example of the good work of a Select Committee.

I happened to be strongly opposed to us getting into that murky water, but the hon. Gentleman was right. It helped to resolve a conflict between those two excellent organisations, and the latest reports are most encouraging.

In June 2003, the Department of Health produced an encouraging document, "Our Inheritance, Our Future: Realising the Potential of Genetics in the NHS". It was a remarkable document, and it foresaw some problems facing the national health service's attempt to integrate genetics, which has not worked out as well as we hoped. The Government have failed to secure the necessary funding to develop research within the NHS. The nation cannot afford not to do that work.

The Government pledged that they would spend 1.5 per cent. of the total NHS budget on research. They have delivered just 0.96 per cent. That has meant a lack of training opportunities and poorly defined career structures. The lifetime financial rewards in clinical academia are not attractive, and they are certainly less attractive than private sector opportunities. The result was that the number of clinical academics fell by 12 per cent.

The good news, however, is that the Medical Research Council is working to find a new focus in clinical research, and I congratulate Colin Blakemore on his energy and enthusiasm in steering the MRC down that channel. Getting those scientific bodies moving in the right direction must be like steering a flotilla of large tankers through the English channel.

What can Parliament do? I have already said that Select Committees have a role. It is their duty and that of Parliament as a whole not only to reflect public opinion, but to delve into the real world, to shine a torch into obscure corners of science and technology and to make sensible and practical recommendations. Sometimes they should be for policy changes and at other times for more research, but always for more open debate. The Science and Technology Committee made an important contribution in the previous Parliament when it produced its report on human reproductive technology.

That report was groundbreaking. The hon. Member for Norwich, North said that we bear the scars of that report on our backs, and we certainly do. It was a brave report. It sought to continue the Warnock, gradualist approach to research. Research will always be way ahead of public opinion and knowledge, but we must try to bring the scientists feet out of the clouds and put them firmly on the ground.

The Government's response, published in the middle of August, was encouraging. It set out a number of positive results. I shall not go into them all, but will the Minister consider one significant point about the future of medical research? I know that the report is from the Department of Health, but if he could look into the matter I should not expect an answer today.

[Robert Key]

The Select Committee recommended that there should be

> "a rationalisation of regulatory or advisory bodies where there is a clear overlap".

The Government acknowledged that. They intended that primary legislation would set out the > "policy in relation to human tissue, embryos and assisted reproduction clearly and comprehensibly."

They also believed that they should give

> "Parliament a greater role in keeping the law up to date through means of secondary legislation."

You and I know, Mr. Benton, that secondary legislation will never give Parliament a greater role in anything if we cannot even debate whether we approve the content of a statutory instrument. We still need to challenge the Government on the policy-making role in that case. There is a lot of work to be done.

The Government said that they would create a regulatory authority for tissue and embryos. That would require primary legislation, so they must present to Parliament in due course their proposals for the role, remit, composition and powers of the authority. My question for the Government is: when? We cannot let the matter drag on for many more years. When will we see the primary legislation?

We were encouraged that the Government concluded by saying that they would take the recommendations into account in drawing up the new legislation and that they would expect to include most, if not all, of them. That was a big compliment to the hon. Member for Norwich, North. The Select Committee that he chairs has produced a report and the Government have said that they will include most, if not all, of its recommendations.

It has been a bit of a canter round the course this morning, but it has been an important debate. It is significant that all three of us who have spoken so far have tackled different angles of medical research. I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say.

10.41 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Barry Gardiner): It is a pleasure, Mr. Benton, to speak under your chairmanship. The hon. Member for Salisbury (Robert Key) just said that the debate has been quite a canter. I am afraid that, in the 19 minutes that remain in which to respond to the many questions, it may turn into more of a gallop, but I shall do my best.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) said that this was perhaps one of the most boring subjects to come before Parliament. The speeches that we have heard this morning have eloquently given the lie to that suggestion. I remember arriving in the House several years ago and being advised by an older colleague that if I wanted to be taken seriously by the House, I ought to try to become an expert in something. My hon. Friend certainly is a good exemplar of an expert in something: medical research and the regulation thereof. He has an air of expertise and the House always listens to him carefully and with great respect, sometimes quaking as it does so.

Before I try to respond to many of the important points raised, I want to set out the Government's position on the issue of regulation in general and on the necessary regulation of medical and clinical research in particular. The Government are at the forefront of the drive to improve the European Union regulatory environment, which is a key issue for the current UK presidency. Better regulation plays a key role in improving UK and EU competitiveness. The Government's better regulation agenda involves scrutinising all current legislation for unnecessary bureaucratic burdens and introducing simplification and deregulation, as envisaged by the Hampton review and the Better Regulation Task Force reports.

We are also ensuring that the right stakeholders are appropriately engaged with emerging policy proposals and that our position on key EU measures is best designed to meet UK objectives, including the Lisbon and regulatory reform goals. All regulatory and enforcement proposals will be challenged. I thought that, at one point, my hon. Friend sounded like an Old Testament canonical prophet from Ecclesiastes. He was looking for a quotation, and I thought that this might be the one he was looking for, but I changed my mind: "A time to regulate and a time not to regulate."

Of course, many fear that better regulation is an excuse to deregulate. Let me say this clearly and without hesitation: it is not so. Carefully drawn-up regulation improves the health and quality of people's lives throughout Europe. It guarantees the rights and safety of employees, protects consumers and conserves the environment. Legislation also underpins the markets and can create new business opportunities.

I was struck by the remarks of the hon. Member for Salisbury, who spoke specifically about the need for regulation, the need to look at the effects on business and the fact that this is a matter not simply of science but of important business. That remark was echoed by the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Martin Horwood). Let us be clear: better regulation does not mean sacrificing high standards. However, it must be proportionate, accountable, consistent, transparent and targeted. The DTI works to maintain the best possible business environment for bioscience companies. It is crucial that society and the Government clearly understand the issues and set the regulatory framework within which the industry can innovate, be competitive and develop effectively.

That means influencing many complex and technical EU directives and regulations, and working with our European partners to ensure that those directives and regulations are based on sound science and that the requirements are measurable and enforceable. The UK has the largest biotechnology industry in the EU and is regarded as a pace setter in competitiveness in that sector. The DTI hosted a UK EU presidency biotechnology conference in October this year, which was attended by delegates from almost all member states. A session on regulation considered the way in which the EU clinical trials directive had been implemented by member states and what lessons could be learned for the implementation of future directives. The October conference came up with proposals to be discussed as part of the mid-term review of the EU strategy for life sciences and biotechnology.

Hon. Members spoke about the gold-plating of regulations. It is essential that, in working with our EU partners, we ensure that there is a level playing field throughout the Union and that gold-plating is not going on. That can best be done by carrying out the proper impact assessments and the correct consultation procedures at an early stage, so that we get things right in the first place and roll them out accordingly.

The hon. Member for Salisbury spoke of Government interference in science and, in particular, of prioritisation. I have to confess that I found his comments about what he saw as the centralised approach of this country and the US approach strange. However, he went on to acknowledge, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North, that this country enjoys a research capacity, particularly in human fertility and stem cell research, that far exceeds that of the United States, precisely because of the political interference there. Although the Office of Science and Technology sets the overall strategic objectives and priorities for the science budget in the UK, research councils are independent bodies and prioritise their particular areas. Of course, they are delivering plans that are developed in line with Government strategy, but, on the whole, our system has worked well and stands up against that of the United States.

If the UK is to take full advantage of the opportunities for creating wealth and improving the quality of life offered by scientific discovery and technological development, it is crucial that we develop new approaches to bring scientists and the public together in a constructive dialogue to explore emerging issues. We need to build on the already widespread positive attitudes to science in the UK to ensure that the public, the broad science community and policy makers feel comfortable in handling issues raised by science and technology and that they feel a joint sense of purpose in ensuring that the full benefits of science and technology are realised.

The UK is among the world leaders in both industry and academic medical research. The Government have consistently shown that we have big ambitions for medical research to maintain the UK strengths in pharmaceutical and biotechnological research and development. However, we will not succeed if we do not meet or exceed international regulatory standards for good clinical practice and public expectations of safety, security and privacy. This country's future in medical research depends on making the best use of highly talented people and the unique potential of the NHS as a platform for superb quality clinical research to bring benefits to patients.

We must have high standards and businesslike systems to support doctors, researchers and the industry to allow them to do their jobs properly. We cannot forget the vital part that patients play in medical research by making available their bodies, samples and medical records, which are the basis of all research. If patients have no confidence in medical research, they will simply not volunteer. That is why in the past five years we have overhauled the regulation and management of medical research, clinical trials, human tissue and mental capacity research, and the process will continue as science develops into new areas such as nanotechnology and stem cells.

The Government recognise that the changes are a big challenge for everyone. It is in all our interests that the UK takes the lead and sets an example to others in developing a sensible, robust, risk-based approach to regulation. That goes with our reputation for leadership in this area.

Many changes derive from European measures to harmonise markets. In principle, they should make life more predictable for industry and academics alike. However, it is uncomfortable to adjust to new procedures. Transition brings uncertainty if there is long debate among regulators about the details and, of course, no one welcomes the extra cost of complying with new inspection and quality systems. The regulation of pharmaceutical clinical trials is an example.

The EU issued a directive in 2001, which followed years of effort by the industry to agree on common standards for trials in Europe, the USA and Japan. The principles behind the directive seemed to be well understood and not so different from a regime we have operated under since the Medicines Act 1968. The European Parliament extended the standard protections to academic trials and early phase trials, from which the UK had previously been exempt, but the directive allowed three years for the Commission to work out the subsidiary guidance, and for member states to implement the proposals. Therefore, why are we continuing to hear concerns?

Member states and the Commission took a long time debating the details. The Commission's subsidiary directive on good clinical practice came out after the deadline for member states to implement the parent directive. A number of member states have yet to implement it. We are far from achieving harmonisation across Europe and there are lessons for future legislation. Finally, the EU seemed to take inspection and monitoring standards that were right for new medicines and apply them to other trials with different risk profiles. Why is that important? It is not just because it is a nuisance for researchers.

There is some good news from the experience of regulating clinical trials. The UK took a leading role in arguing for a more flexible, risk-based approach. Officials worked with the Medical Research Council to explore and to respond to researchers' concerns. The EU is now preparing more appropriate guidelines for academic trials and the UK is pressing it to draw lessons from all this. That is important, because there is more harmonising legislation on the way, affecting research on children's medicines, tissue-engineered products, and the use of so-called physical agents such as devices for imaging.

Dr. Gibson: Is it the Minister's understanding that in Europe the precautionary principle is operated much more vehemently than in this country? That can lead to an inhibitory situation.

Barry Gardiner: I understand the point that my hon. Friend is making. That is why I emphasised earlier that the measures that we take in regulation must be proportionate. It is only by ensuring that there is proper consultation and that the appropriate risk-based regulation is put in place that we will get this right.

[Barry Gardiner]

This Government rightly give a high priority to protecting individuals who volunteer to take part in clinical research. We make no secret of the fact that we want to ensure that properly conducted and approved research can go ahead with the minimum of delay and with the maximum respect for the patient's rights and privacy. We all acknowledge that, if the process is disproportionate, there are costs beyond making research expensive. One cost is delayed development of better, safer treatments; another is less evidence about existing treatments, when the public expect more reliable advice on safety and effectiveness.

Those dilemmas are not new. They are at the heart of every debate about medical research. With each change in the law, it is the job of Government and Parliament to take great care not to add complexity when what we want is robust systems that protect people from risk across the whole of medical research.

The overwhelming majority of doctors and researchers place the patient at the centre of all decisions about clinical research. There are well understood checks and balances in the system of research ethics committees, hospital and NHS governance systems and, ultimately, the research funders such as the Medical Research Council.

Unfortunately, there are occasional researchers who seek to circumvent the controls and, as has been mentioned, they receive most publicity in the press. That tarnishes the rest of the research community. Sometimes, as with the recent Human Tissue Act 2004, those events highlight flaws in the legal system, which has been overtaken by progress in research. This Government have taken decisive action to prevent unacceptable practice, but at the same time they have listened to patients and researchers about how to strike the correct balance. We will go on listening.

It is a credit to hon. Members on both sides of the House that the Human Tissue Act enjoyed the broad support of all parties in its final form. The new legislation introduces a coherent framework for regulating the storage and use of human organs and tissue from the living, and the removal, storage and use of tissues and organs from the deceased, for specified health-related purposes and public display. The Act will help to protect the rights and expectations of patients and their families, while allowing vital medical research to flourish. On Second Reading of the Human Tissue Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North, said:

> "We need to restore public confidence in science and medicine. The march of knowledge depends on that; we cannot move forward without the public behind us. The Bill recognises that—it is one of its major features. I believe that the measure will be a landmark Bill, of which we shall all be proud."—[Official Report, 15 January 2004; Vol. 416, c. 1012.]

The Department of Health and the NHS have issued consolidated guidance on research governance in the NHS, and research governance is now one of the core NHS standards. In the past, researchers have had difficulty in obtaining ethical review of proposals for NHS research, but a national system of ethical review is now in place and it is backed by a managed booking system and a common electronic application form. As a result, the time scale for obtaining ethical review has been dramatically reduced. Following the report of a review of NHS ethics set up earlier this year by Lord Warner, we can look to further improvements in the ethical review process as we progress to a smaller number of larger, better-trained research ethics committees.

The Government have also driven initiatives to aid researchers in obtaining approval for research by NHS trusts. In the summer, the Department of Health consulted on a new strategy for research in the NHS. The proposals include a number of bureaucracy-busting measures: national advice structures to provide reliable advice on regulatory measures; better local support for researchers through national networks; much more joint working and standardisation in research governance procedures; and better use of IT to streamline information flows.

Those measures will have a parallel effect to those introduced for ethical review and standards of decision making, and the time scales for clearance by NHS trusts will improve dramatically. To secure the clinical research potential offered by the NHS, the Government announced in 2004 the establishment of the UK Clinical Research Collaboration, with a commitment of a £100 million increase in NHS research and development funding by 2008.

The UKCRC brings together the major stakeholders that influence clinical research in the UK, particularly in the NHS. The ultimate goal underpinning the initiative is to create a clinical research environment that will benefit patients and the public by improving national health, increasing national wealth and enriching world knowledge. The collaboration will achieve that by building up a research work force, streamlining the regulatory and governance processes and co-ordinating future clinical research funding.

The Government were grateful for the report on human reproductive technologies and the law, produced under my hon. Friend's chairmanship. The report was highly detailed, but not without controversy, as such issues touch on the essence of what it is to be human. We made clear in our response, published in August, where we agreed or disagreed with its recommendations and where we felt that consultation with the wider public was necessary.

I am sure that parliamentary time will be made available to debate that report at an appropriate time. Many of its recommendations dealt with detailed aspects of the regulation of in vitro fertility services. The Government are consulting on a range of issues covered by the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 and the closing date for comments is 25 November.

The consultation document includes a section on the regulation of research involving embryos, sperm and eggs, and poses a number of questions on which the Government are seeking the views of the public. Any changes to the 1990 Act as a result of the consultation would require primary legislation and therefore provide Parliament with an opportunity to consider these important matters. My hon. Friend raised the issue of the regulation of embryonic stem cell research, and he has done a sterling job of keeping the Government alert to the prospects and pitfalls of such research—for example, he led a debate on it in March this year.

I am grateful that my hon. Friend pointed to the need for more investment in translational research to move stem cells from the laboratory to the clinic. I am delighted to record his foresight. Shortly afterwards, the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget speech made similar points when he established the UK stem cell initiative, a high-level review, chaired by the former director of research and development at the Department of Health, Sir John Pattison, who is charged with developing a vision and strategy for UK stem cell research over the next decade. The initiative is due to report back to the Government shortly. We eagerly await its report and recommendations on the future of that area of medical research in the UK.

Scottish Parliament (Electoral System)

11 am

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, South) (Lab): It is a privilege to have won the opportunity to speak on this issue, and I am delighted that so many colleagues from all parties are present. This is clearly the most important debate of the day, although I suspect that for most members of the public it might be esoteric, dry and technical. However, I hope that all Members will agree that it is an important issue for the body politic of Scotland.

There can be no doubt that since the Scottish Parliament was established in 1999, it has delivered for the people of Scotland. The blueprint that was painstakingly drawn up by the Scottish Constitutional Convention, and which was enacted by this Government in 1997, was the result of years of well thought-out planning and deliberation. That blueprint will, I hope, be the basis of devolution for the next 100 years.

As I believe that devolution must be an event rather than a process, I am opposed in principle to root-and-branch reforms of the Scotland Act 1998. However, we must be able to amend the Act where necessary, so that we can make small technical changes. We have already done so on one occasion, by accepting that Scottish parliamentary constituencies should remain unaltered when the Westminster seats were reorganised in the run-up to the 2005 general election.

I believe that another technical, but extremely important, change will soon have to be made to the Act. I draw Members' attention to the White Paper "Better Governance for Wales", a document which, despite its title, is extremely relevant to the situation in Scotland. In that document, the Secretary of State for Wales writes:

> "The Government proposes to change the provisions currently in the Government of Wales Act to prevent individuals from simultaneously being candidates in constituency elections and being eligible for election from party lists."

The reasons for that change are given in the subsequent paragraph:

> "The outcome of the Assembly election in the Clwyd West constituency in 2003 illustrates the problem the Government is seeking to address. Five candidates stood for election in that constituency, four of whom ultimately became Assembly Members (one as the successful constituency candidate, and three more as additional members elected from their respective parties' regional lists). In the Government's view, for losing candidates to be able to become Assembly Members regardless of their constituency election results both devalues the integrity of the electoral system in the eyes of the public and acts as a disincentive to vote in constituency elections. We therefore propose that a simple amendment should be made to the provisions currently in section 5 of the Government of Wales Act to prevent this situation occurring in the future."

I look forward to voting for that, and I encourage every Member to do so.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, South-West) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that there are other anomalies that ought to be addressed? In particular, is he aware of the situation in Orkney? The number of votes that the winning candidate there received would not have had him placed first, second or even third if he had stood in East Kilbride, Strathaven and Lesmahagow. Indeed, he would not have been fourth.

[Mr. Ian Davidson]

With the number of votes he won in Orkney, he would have been fifth in the East Kilbride constituency. That is clearly an absurd situation. Do we not need to have constituencies of equal size, so that votes are of equal value?

Mr. Harris: I am always extremely grateful for my hon. Friend's helpful interventions. However, I disagree with him on this matter. Given the geographical nature of Scotland, we must accept that some constituencies will have smaller electorates than others, such as those in Glasgow.

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): Another anomaly is to do with those parties that decide not to fight constituency seats, and which only campaign on the list. That throws up a problem. The list was set up in the first place to deal with under-representation or over-representation in respect of constituencies—particularly for parties such as the Green party, which does not fight constituency seats. Will the hon. Gentleman address that issue?

Mr. Harris: The hon. Gentleman is correct, but I go back to what I said at the beginning of my contribution: we have to respect the terms of the Scottish Constitutional Convention report. That made it clear that the d'Hondt system would be used to calculate the number of additional members. It did not make reference to any obligation on the parties to stand in both lists. I agree that the issue should be addressed, but that is not the purpose of this debate. However, I know that some Labour Members are equally incensed about the situation.

The question has to be asked: if it is good enough for Wales, why is it not good enough for Scotland? The problems caused by list MSPs—or assisted places scheme MSPs, as perhaps we should call them—are absolutely identical to those caused by list Assembly Members in Wales. I am extremely grateful to Leanne Wood, a Plaid Cymru list AM, who has written a memo entitled "What should be the role of a regional AM?". It perfectly illustrates the problem that we face in Scotland and Wales. Ms Wood writes:

> "Each regional AM has an office budget and a staff budget of some considerable size. Consideration should be given to the location of their office—where would it be best for the region? Are there any target seats . . . within the region?"

She goes on:

> "We need to be thinking much more creatively as to how we better use staff budgets for furthering the aims of the party."

She finishes off with a refreshing burst of honesty for a nationalist:

> "Regional AMs are in a unique position. They are paid to work full-time in politics and have considerable budgets at their disposal. They need not be constrained by constituency casework and events, and can be more choosy about their engagements, only attending events which further the party's cause. This can be achieved by following one simple golden rule: On receipt of every invitation, ask 'How can my attendance at this event further the aims of Plaid Cymru?' If the answer is 'very little' or 'not at all', then a pro forma letter of decline should be in order."

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): Hear, hear!

Mr. Harris: I do not know whether you noticed what the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) said to that, Mr. Benton. No one has ever doubted the level of cynicism to which the nationalist parties in Scotland and Wales will stoop, but it is awfully convenient to have it in black and white.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, East) (Lab): What my hon. Friend has just said outlines the exact situation in Glasgow. There, the nine and a bit first-past-the-post MSPs represent only their own constituency, yet the seven additional list Members—none of whom could win a first-past-the-post seat—go around sticking their noses into every constituency in the city, claiming to represent the whole city. They raise not only devolved matters, but reserved matters that have absolutely nothing to do with them. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is high time that UK Government Departments told MSPs to mind their own business and to refer reserved matters to MPs?

Mr. Harris: I agree entirely with what my hon. Friend says, but as he will know, the problem is not so much list MSPs claiming to represent every seat in their region; it is regional MSPs sometimes claiming to represent one specific seat in the region.

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, North) (Lab): I have experience of that in my constituency. In the north-east of Scotland, we elect list MSPs for the whole of the north-east of Scotland region, which covers Aberdeen, Dundee, the whole of the former Grampian region and part of Tayside. In 1999, Richard Lochhead, now a list MSP, fought in my constituency—Aberdeen Central, as it then was—and was soundly defeated by the electorate, and yet he became a MSP. I find that difficult to understand, and I know that my constituents do, too. Notwithstanding the fact that he lost and was then elected, he spent the next four years campaigning in my constituency, holding surgeries, dealing with local issues—

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): Order. That is a rather lengthy intervention.

Mr. Harris: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct. The Government agree with him; they have pledged to do something about that particular problem in Wales.

Ironically, one of the sternest critics of the additional member system as it currently operates is the former Liberal Democrat MSP and MP, and the first Presiding Officer of the Scottish Parliament, Sir David Steel. He said on 18 August 2003 that > "the system as operated . . . has led to a confusing and expensive proliferation of 'parliamentary' offices throughout the country. In at least one town there are four . . . they have become a thinly disguised subsidy from the taxpayer for the local party machines . . . In my view they are a serious waste of public money".

It is not often that I agree with Sir David Steel. In the same lecture, he recalled that the most distasteful and irritating part of his job as Presiding Officer was dealing with complaints against assisted places scheme Members. He said:

> "I could not understand at first why we had such problems, until it dawned on me that what some were determined to do was misuse their position to run a permanent four-year campaign as candidate in a particular constituency."

That was exactly the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Doran). Sir David continued:

> "In most parliaments you do not have Members sitting in the same chamber or in committees who are going to be election opponents, and it does not make for a good working atmosphere."

David Mundell (Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that his arguments would have more credibility if the current Minister for Education and Young People, Mr. Peter Peacock, had not stood in the Moray constituency in the highlands and islands? Labour Members who serve on the Scottish Parliament's corporate body and in most senior offices in the Parliament sought to deal with such issues, but they have not done so. Surely the resolution to the list situation is a job description for list Members, which currently does not exist. As a result, list Members are either carrying out a range of matters, which the hon. Gentleman has described, or doing very little indeed.

Mr. Harris: The hon. Gentleman was a list MSP for the Conservative party, although I am sure that that has played no part in his thinking on the issue. If he had used those four years as an opportunity to organise matters in the seat that he now represents in the House, that would have added strength to my argument. I wish to point out that, although Peter Peacock stood in the Moray seat, such a proposal would affect all parties equally. I do not believe that any party should have candidates in the list and in first-past-the-post seats. Even if that does not give an advantage to my party in a particular seat, in principle it is a worthwhile move.

Mr. Davidson: The hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell) was at least campaigning on behalf of his party consistently. What should be done in respect of Brian Monteith, who was elected on the list as a Conservative, but who then resigned and now presumably represents no one at all. Surely, it is anomalous to have someone elected on a party list, but who then remains as self-employed. Such measures should be precluded from the rules of the system.

Mr. Harris: My hon. Friend makes a valid point.

Pete Wishart: We have already heard that there are manifest deficiencies in the additional Member system, and I doubt whether anyone here would defend it. I was surprised that the hon. Gentleman said that he was interested only in a technical amendment. It would serve no real purpose. It would not deal with some of the deficiencies. Does he not agree that the people who are best qualified to make such decisions about the membership of the Scottish Parliament are the Members of the Scottish Parliament themselves, not hostile, antagonistic Members of Parliament who are based down here?

Mr. Harris: I hope that, when referring to hostile, antagonistic Members of Parliament, the hon. Gentleman was not referring to me. The Scotland Act 1998 makes it absolutely clear that the electoral system in respect of the Scottish Parliament is the domain of this Parliament. If the hon. Gentleman is in favour of elected bodies choosing their own electoral systems, perhaps he will explain why his party and my party voted to impose a single transferable vote system on local councils in Scotland, which did not want it.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): Some of the difficulties with the current system of election to the Scottish Parliament have been described eloquently by the hon. Gentleman. Does he agree that there is a simple solution to the problem? It is to elect for the Scottish Parliament through a single transferable vote in constituencies that maintain the constituency link, while ensuring a degree of proportionality.

Mr. Harris: I saw that point coming from so far off that I passed it in Millbank this morning. I have to disappoint hon. Members of all parties by saying that I do not want a single transferable vote system for the Scottish Parliament. We cannot justifiably go back to a first-past-the-post system in the Scottish Parliament. We must honour the terms of the Scottish Constitutional Convention, otherwise we are saying that the great work that it has done over the years meant nothing—[Interruption.] If hon. Members will forgive me, I want to make a little progress. I see the Minister trying desperately to rise to make his comments.

There are many examples of poaching. My constituency includes part of the Glasgow, Govan Scottish parliamentary seat and in 1999 and 2003 the Scottish National party's deputy leader, Nicola Sturgeon, was defeated by Labour's Gordon Jackson, but in 1999 and 2003 she became an MSP. That is a basic democratic problem. When someone stands for election and is defeated, one would assume that that person would not become a member of that body. When people have made a choice, surely that choice should be respected.

John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that we are talking about politicians with limited ability? If parties do not have enough politicians to fill posts, they must proceed in any way that they can. Does he agree that their time would be better spent doing the work they should be doing instead of interfering and talking about matters that have absolutely nothing to do with them?

Mr. Harris: My hon. Friend feels strongly about the point and I would not want to comment on the ability of politicians in another body, but I agree with the general thrust of his argument.

An important example is the Liberal Democrat MSP, Robert Brown, whose website contains some helpful information and states:

> "My Regional constituency covers both the City of Glasgow itself, and the communities of Rutherglen and Cambuslang."

It is odd that, although he represents a region with 10 parliamentary constituencies, he mentions only one of them on his website, and that one constituency is where he regularly stands as a first-past-the-post candidate. At the last election, he obtained less than 20 per cent. of the vote, but he goes around pretending to be "Your local MSP". Sorry Robert, you are not.

[Mr. Harris]

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Harris: I want to make some progress. I apologise because I know that hon. Members want to speak, but time is of the essence.

Whenever Mr. Brown has stood in Rutherglen, he has been thrashed by the Labour candidate, but after each defeat at the hands of the voters he claims to represent, he has used taxpayers' money to campaign against the incumbent MSP, a colleague in the Scottish Parliament. There are other examples. Bruce McFee in West Renfrewshire is another SNP loser who, after being soundly rejected in 2003, continues to use taxpayers' money to campaign not in his region, but in that seat. The arguments are many and unanswerable.

First, it is undemocratic to allow candidates who have been rejected by voters in a constituency subsequently to be elected anyway. Secondly, it is not justifiable for assisted places scheme MSPs to use office expenses, paid for by the taxpayer, to pursue a four-year-election campaign by targeting a particular seat in a region. Thirdly, the existing system acts as an incentive for such behaviour with MSPs sitting side by side while plotting to unseat one another at the next election. The disgraceful behaviour of poachers such as Nicola Sturgeon, Robert Brown and Bruce McFee has brought the whole system into disrepute and it is up to the House to remedy the situation.

The answer is simple and the path has been mapped out for us by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. A simple amendment must be made to the Scotland Act 1998. Candidates must choose whether to stand on a party's list or to fight a first-past-the-post constituency. They should not have their cake and eat it.

There is a difference between first-past-the-post MSPs and list MSPs. The former represent constituents and the latter represent their party. It is not for this House to decide what their duties are or what their office costs may be, but surely there is an argument that list MSPs do not deserve or need office costs because they do not need an office.

I want to ask my hon. Friend the Minister a number of questions. First, does he agree that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is right to promise to legislate to prevent candidates from standing in both lists and seats? Given the identical nature of the problems created by list AMs and list MSPs, surely it is inconsistent, to say the least, for the same Government to legislate to fix the problem in Wales but not in Scotland. Will a similar amendment be made to the Scotland Act 1998?

I expect that my hon. Friend will tell the House that we must await the outcome of the Arbuthnott inquiry, which was set up my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. I accept that. The commission was set up to look at the various electoral systems inScotland and will conclude at the beginning of next year. Nevertheless, decisions on such matters of policy cannot be devolved to an unelected commission. Whether or not the Arbuthnott commission recommends the change, the Government must, nevertheless, press ahead with the change. Policy is up to the House to decide, while the commission has merely to offer advice and not to legislate.

Will the my hon. Friend confirm whether, in the event of the Arbuthnott commission reporting in early 2006 and a subsequent decision being taken by the Government, any amendment would be tabled in time to take effect before the 2007 Scottish elections?

I appreciate the patience of the House. I apologise to Members whose interventions I have not been able to accept and I am sorry to have taken slightly longer than the Minister would have wished. I am sure that leaving him nine minutes will give him plenty of time to respond to the issues that I have raised this morning.

11.21 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (David Cairns): I begin by welcoming you to the courteous and comradely world of Scottish politics, Mr. Benton. I am sure that you found it a revelation and an eye-opener. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South (Mr. Harris) on securing the debate today, particularly a 30-minute one.

Clearly, from the contribution of other hon. Members, there are strong views—it says in my brief—on various aspects of the current electoral system for the Scottish Parliament. In the time available, I will try to address some of the questions that have come up, both in my hon. Friend's speech and in contributions from others.

First, I shall say something about the process that led us to the current position on examining boundary differences and voting systems in Scotland. On Second Reading of what was then the Scottish Parliament (Constituencies) Bill in February 2004, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland announced that he would set up a commission on boundary differences and voting systems. He took forward a commitment given by his predecessor, Helen Liddell, when the decision was taken to retain the number of MSPs at 129 and not to reduce them proportionately with the revised constituencies for Scottish seats at Westminster.

However, in fairness, an additional factor was on the scene by the time that my right hon. Friend made his announcement last year. That was, of course, the prospect of a single transferable vote for the 2007 local government elections in Scotland. That prospect is now enshrined in Scottish Parliament legislation.

John Robertson: Would the Minister refrain from stalling by reading out a singularly boring pre-prepared statement and address the question of whether or not Brian Monteith should be put down and of what should happen if Margot McDonald stands down?

There is no provision for a by-election for a single person on the list. Seriously, that is another issue that ought to be addressed, as should the fact that all Labour votes in Glasgow in the second ballot are wasted, because we have already won all the first-past-the-post seats. What is he going to do about all those issues in the remaining seven minutes?

David Cairns: I have a list of people that I would like to see put down, which may be of interest to hon. Members. Mr. Brian Monteith, of whom I had never heard, until a few days ago, does not feature on it.

I will come to those points, but am going to make the point about the Arbuthnott commission report, because it is central to much of the debate that we have gone around in the past 23 minutes.

Mr. Reid: The Minister mentioned STV in local government. Would he not agree that introducing STV for the Scottish Parliament would remove the anmaly that the hon. Member for Glasgow, South (Mr. Harris) referred to, that of two classes of MSPs? With STV there would be only one class of MSP and a lot of the problems would be removed.

David Cairns: For reasons that I am about to set out, I am not going to be drawn on that issue.

The commission under Sir John Arbuthnott was appointed last year with the specific remit to look at the different sets of boundaries that we have in Scotland, as between parliamentary constituencies, for Holyrood and Westminster, local government and other relevant public agencies. The commission's remit extends to reviewing the voting system for elections to the Scottish Parliament. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said on Second Reading, we must face the fact that by 2007 in Scotland we will have

"four different voting systems for an electorate of just over 3.8 million".—[Official Report, 9 February 2004; Vol. 417, c. 1150.]

It is a serious commission, carrying forward a serious piece of work on our behalf. It is composed of extremely high-calibre individuals who have made outstanding contributions to public life in Scotland over many years. They are going about the task that we gave them with exemplary thoroughness and integrity. They have held public meetings throughout the country—in Glasgow, Aberdeen, Dundee, Galashiels, Stornoway and Edinburgh—and have consulted MPs, MSPs, political parties and a range of representative organisations concerned with voting or boundary issues.

Throughout the process, the commission has kept the public informed via its website. It published a series of reports and issued papers outlining some of its findings and the representations that have been made to it. Given all that, and the fact that we expect the report within a matter of weeks, it would be wrong of me to pre-empt the findings.

The commission started work in July 2004 with a timetable to report to the Secretary of State and the First Minister by the end of this year or the beginning of next year. I dare say that today's debate will be drawn to its attention as it reaches the concluding stages of its deliberations.

I turn now to some of the specific points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South and others. He began by saying that he was opposed to fundamental root-and-branch reform of the Scotland Act 1998. The Government also oppose such reform, and it is not on the agenda. He asked specifically about the situation in Wales and whether I agreed with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. Of course, I agree with my right hon. Friend, whose statement clearly was made in the context of the Government of Wales Bill and the recommendations of the Richard commission. We should learn the lesson from my right hon. Friend, who waited until the Richard commission reported, examined its findings, consulted on those findings and then brought a statement to Parliament on how he planned to proceed. That is the way to go about such matters.

The Arbuthnott commission is doing a different task, as we have asymmetric devolution in this country, but, on the issue mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South, it is fundamentally similar. It is doing the work that we have tasked it to do. It is doing it in a serious, mature way, and we owe it the right to bring its report forward. Obviously, there will be other debates such as this one. At that stage, we can decide how best to further the recommendations and go about timetabling them, which is the second point made by my hon. Friend.

It is not a question—I have heard this said—of hiding behind the Arbuthnott commission. These are serious matters. We are discussing fundamental issues such as how we have elections in Scotland, how we have elections to the Scottish Parliament and how the Parliament is brought together. It is important that we try, as far as possible, to deal with them on a consensual basis, as the Scottish Constitutional Convention did. I know that the convention was snubbed by some parties, but it followed a proper process. Post-Arbuthnott report, I hope that we will achieve a similar consensus.

I am aware of the concerns raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Glasgow, North-West (John Robertson), for Glasgow, South and for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Doran) and others about interference of MSPs on the list. I appreciate that that is an issue, and that it was raised in the Scottish Parliament. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South mentioned the case of Bruce McFee. However, what that MSP did was even worse than what my hon. Friend outlined. The Scottish National party's western Scotland regional office was in my constituency for four years. When the SNP was drubbed in the elections in Inverclyde in 2003, overnight it closed its office, which had served my constituents, and moved it 17 miles along the road to Paisley because it thought that its electoral prospects were better there. The cynicism with which the SNP has treated my constituents simply knows no bounds.

This has been an interesting and customarily lively debate. When Sir John Arbuthnott reports, as it will in due course, we will have an opportunity to revisit many of these issues. However, when we do, the debate will be informed by what I expect will be a high-calibre report. We will be able to revisit these issues in the context of that report.

11.29 am

Sitting suspended until half-past Two o'clock.

Milk Prices

2.30 pm

Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to open this debate on milk prices and the dairy industry. I am extremely encouraged by the turnout for the debate, considering that so many other important things are happening in the House today.

The fact that this is the first debate for which I have applied and secured since being elected six months ago reflects the seriousness with which I view the challenges facing dairy farmers and the importance of maintaining a healthy domestic dairy industry. I appreciate that this is a complex subject that has generated a huge amount of comment and analysis in recent years, not least the excellent report from the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee published last year.

There are many different angles to the issue, and I shall not attempt to cover all bases. I shall not, for example, mention the impact of common agricultural policy reform on the dairy sector, or bovine tuberculosis, which is having such a harmful effect on dairy farmers in my constituency I will not mention rising energy input costs or even the huge amount of regulation that is hampering so many farmers in the sector. I hope that contributions from other hon. Members will plug the gaps in my speech.

My starting point is a simple one; it is the belief that Britain—Wales—needs a vibrant, healthy dairy farming sector, but that many dairy farmers are currently demoralised and pessimistic about the future and have little faith that the market for their product is working fairly and transparently. Many dairy farmers are producing milk at a loss, with production costs of around 20p a litre set against the farm gate price of around 18p a litre. It sounds rather like a GCSE maths question: "Work out how big the loss is, given any level of milk production." It is not complex.

Here we are in the middle of autumn and with the escalation in costs of producing winter milk, many of the dairy farmers to whom I have spoken in recent days are very gloomy. That farmers were even able to countenance the action that some of them took last week in withholding product from processors is indicative of the frustration and anger in the community. Speaking to local dairy farmers, I do not get much sense of optimism or enthusiasm for the sector in which they do business.

I spent part of my recess attending agricultural shows in my constituency and talking informally to numerous farmers. I could find reasons to be optimistic about beef and arable, and indeed we have had good news in recent weeks about the beef market and the ending of the over-30-month scheme. I pay tribute to the Minister and his colleagues for their efforts in that regard. However, in discussions with my dairy farming friends and representatives of the Pembrokeshire branches of the Farmers Union of Wales and the National Farmers Union, I heard nothing to suggest that the dairy sector is in anything other than a depressed state. The message and feedback that I have received is one of unalloyed pessimism, which is very worrying.

Pembrokeshire lies in the heart of the famous west Wales dairy belt where, thanks to our wonderful rainfall and topography, we have been a major producer of Britain's milk for centuries. If dairy is to have any future in the UK, it should be in a place such as Pembrokeshire. Seen from the air, Pembrokeshire is a beautiful patchwork of family-run farms, holding together around 90 small, rural village and town communities.

The changes that we are seeing in the dairy sector lead me to believe that the nature of some of those communities is under threat. There is no question that farmers are exiting the dairy sector, and farming altogether, at an alarming rate. Farms are being vacated, which is having a serious knock-on effect on the viability and sustainability of our local services and the communities that use them. We know that there has been a drop of more than 30 per cent. in the number of dairy farmers in Wales in the last decade; we have also seen the closure of numerous village schools, post offices and shops during the same period. It is no flight of the imagination to suggest that the two phenomena are closely linked.

Some dairy farmers are leaving the country altogether. I know of two young farming families in my constituency who have left in the last year to pursue their businesses overseas, one in France and one in Canada. I understand that they are not the only examples from my county. They have not given up on the industry that they love; they have given up any prospect of carrying out their business profitably in the UK, which is very sad.

I do not regard this situation with anything like the cool neutrality of the former permanent secretary to the Department, who told a conference in 2003:

> "Government has no particular view on how much milk the UK should produce or on how many producers or companies there should be. . . . it does not have views on the shape of the industry."

I take the view that a diverse supply base is a good thing. I believe that, while the trend towards larger farms cannot be reversed, family-run farm enterprises are a good thing and that the wider rural economy in a place such as west Wales relies on a large and successful network of producers.

No one is arguing that change must not happen, least of all the farmers to whom I have spoken. Indeed, the "Vision for the Dairy Industry" document published recently by the NFU illustrates that; it is forward looking and realistic about the changes facing the sector. However, it is my contention that some of the trends in dairy are being accelerated by imbalances in the supply chain caused by unequal power relationships and a lack of trust and transparency. The problem is one of a fundamental imbalance in the supply chain where farmers, who are the primary producers, are right at the end of the supply chain and the return that they get for their toil is widely regarded as unfair.

Let me state from the outset that I do not accept the simple narrative that supermarkets are the cause of all the woes that face dairy farmers, and they should not be seen as pantomime villains. My understanding is that the picture is a lot more complex than that. Supermarket chains are rational decision makers, whose duty is first and foremost to create value successfully for shareholders, which they do by creating and recreating value propositions for their customers day in and day out. Farmers understand that supermarkets are here to stay. Supermarket chains are the largest customer for British agriculture and some of the younger farmers

I have spoken to, in particular, are remarkably upbeat about the need to work closely with the major retail chains. Only yesterday, I was speaking to one young dairy farmer in my constituency who is closely involved with the group Future Farmers of Wales. She stated clearly that if she has any sort of future in the industry, it would only come about by working successfully with the major retail chains.

That brings me to the efficiency and transparency of the supply chain linking the farmer to the supermarket checkout. I do not believe that the market is working well; a high degree of mistrust, suspicion and confusion characterises the sector. There is no question but that the rise of supermarkets has altered the playing field on which farmers compete. We know from the Milk Development Council report in September that evidence suggests that farmers' returns on milk have fallen at a much greater rate than those of their EU counterparts, but that retailers' margins have been increasing. Dr. Nick Fenwick of the Farmers Union of Wales describes it like this:

> "There is now overwhelming evidence to suggest that the dominance of supermarkets over supply chains represents a wholly new type of market place that is not compatible with traditional notions of free competition, and the economics of 'supply and demand'."

As a Member with a passionate belief in the benefits of free competition, I have to take such a charge very seriously indeed.

The first specific point to which I would like the Minister to respond concerns the extent to which he feels that the current supermarket code of practice is working well. In what ways could it be reformed or changed to ensure that the market functions well and for the benefit of the primary producer? Does the Minister agree that the code should apply to the entire supply chain, thus addressing the relationship between farmers, suppliers and supermarkets, as opposed to those between supplier and supermarket? Last year's Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee report concluded that

> "there remains a fundamental imbalance of negotiating strength between supermarkets and most of their suppliers. The code appears to have been ineffective in redressing this imbalance, at least in respect of the dairy supply chain."

I welcome the Minister's thoughts on that statement, one year on from the publication of the report.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): My hon. Friend articulates very well indeed the severe problems that a lot of us share in our constituencies. These matters are crucial to the rural economy, not only in relation to its diversity but to the vital strategic business of producing dairy raw materials. Has he noted, as I have from talking to farmers in my constituency, that the receipt for farmers for their commoditised product at the farm gate is probably about 18p, while the supermarkets have increasing returns? If we analysed the whole value chain from the farmer through to the shopper, about 18p in that value chain is unaccounted for.

I do not know whether my hon. Friend has carried out any further investigations. If not, does he hope that the Minister is able to account for that 18p because it cannot be accounted for in distribution costs, or in any attempt to suggest that there is a regulated distribution market? If that 18p were available, it would be better shared among farmers at the farm gate rather than used solely to increase returns for the supermarkets under their code of practice.

Mr. Crabb: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. The evidence submitted to the Select Committee last year highlighted the confusion that I mentioned when examining the sector, and the confusion and lack of transparency in the supply chain. I echo the comments of my hon. Friend and I invite the Minister to comment on the missing 18p per litre.

What are the Government doing to ensure that fair play is maintained in respect of consumers and suppliers? If the Office of Fair Trading sees its role as firmly in dealing with consumers, who is protecting the interests of suppliers? I invite the Minister to comment on the concept of a buyer's charter proposed by the NFU, which seeks to ensure that trading terms between suppliers and retailers are not abused.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Rightly, the hon. Gentleman has mentioned the buyer's charter. I wonder whether he has signed my early-day motion, which I urge other MPs to sign, which supports the NFU's stance on the buyer's charter.

Mr. Crabb: Absolutely.

I would welcome a response from the Minister on the question of what role he feels that he and his Department can play in restoring confidence to the sector and, specifically, in bringing farmers much closer to processors and retailers. It is a widely held view that farmers need to get closer to the end customer and to be much more directly involved in value-added processing, which means a greater degree of partnership working and vertical integration down the supply chain.

On partnership working, I was encouraged to learn of two examples of retailers seeking to work constructively with primary producers to ensure that a fairer return reaches the farmer's pocket. In so doing, they are guaranteeing their own supply base. I am told that Marks and Spencer has established long-term price agreements with a network of organic dairy farmers to supply milk to its in-store cafés. That agreement provides added security for the farmers, who have a more stable environment in which to make their investment decisions.

More significant in terms of volume is the partnership involving Asda, Arla and its base of dairy farmers. I understand that the purpose of the partnership was to ensure a much greater level of transparency in the supply chain and to build trust and consensus with the processor and the producers. That involved Asda's agricultural manager sitting down in the homes of many of the individual farmers involved in the partnership. That kind of close involvement obviously builds trust and lays a good foundation, but it still does not fundamentally alter the price scenario for liquid milk.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): Although I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that vertical integration is a good thing overall and probably the way forward for the industry, does he not agree that there is a significant risk that companies such as Asda and some of the other very large retailers and processors may bring unreasonable conditions to bear on smaller dairy farmers in particular, so that only the large, professional, industrial-type dairy farmers will survive because the small farmers—the kind that we represent in many of our constituencies—will be unable to compete?

[Mr. James Gray]

Mr. Crabb: My hon. Friend makes an extremely good point. I have not been able to find out the extent to which the farmers who are involved in that kind of partnership represent the kind of farmers that we both have in our constituencies: those who run small, family farms.

Albert Owen (Ynys Môn) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman think that it is important that when supermarkets such as Asda apply for planning permission, the planning authority considers the local conditions and the effects that he says supermarkets have on pushing the price down in local areas? Should there not be greater input from local farming unions in the planning process so that local sourcing can be considered as a way of helping farmers, particularly those who run family farms?

Mr. Crabb: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. I have to confess that I am unsure of the extent to which the detailed planning guidance that affects decisions that local authorities make can incorporate that kind of thinking about local sourcing, but I have been talking to local supermarkets in my constituency and asking specifically how many local lines of produce they stock, whether they have targets for Welsh produce and whether they are on course to meet them.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): May I assist my hon. Friend on that matter by describing the reaction of the Isle of Wight council's planners to the suggestion that local sourcing should be a condition of an extension to Tesco at Westridge in my constituency? The planners believe that that cannot be done, but the members are determined that it should be done and are determined to push it through and try it. I hope that other planners up and down the country will be persuaded by their members to try it.

Mr. Crabb: My hon. Friend makes a good point.

Without doubt, there is a need for greater rationalisation and consolidation in the processing section of the supply chain. Many farmers feel that that would be one route towards equalising some of the power relationships in the chain, especially if there were much greater farmer-owned processing. However, in that context, we could run into problems with the Office of Fair Trading. It is a view in the farming community that the OFT would seek to call in any further mergers between large UK dairy companies for fear that that would give them a monopolistic position in the domestic market.

Many farmers regarded the OFT's decision to investigate the proposed acquisition of 15 per cent. of shares in Robert Wiseman by First Milk as absurd. I want to ask the Minister why the OFT felt that it was necessary to refer to the Competition Commission the proposed sale of Scottish Milk Dairies, which held only 2 per cent. of the Scottish liquid milk market, to Robert Wiseman. To quote one renowned dairy producer, who I spoke to this morning:

> "it sends out completely the wrong signal to the industry when the OFT is crawling all over initiatives like this".

I invite the Minister to respond to that.

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for generously giving way a second time. I am holding a raft of e-mails from dairy farmer constituents who are incensed about the Scottish Milk Dairies and Robert Wiseman Dairies decision and recommendation. The Minister has an opportunity today to demonstrate that it is within the Government's power to have a beneficial effect on dairy producers in our constituencies. I had something to do with the 1999 Eddisbury by-election, as did my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson). That was the time when the former Secretary of State—I cannot remember his constituency, but it was somewhere in the north-east—reversed the Competition Commission's recommendation and did not allow vertical integration from producers. That has had a continuing and dire effect on the value-added chain to benefit farmers at the farm gate. The Minister has it within his gift to reverse that and we are urging him to do so.

Mr. Crabb: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. We look forward to the Minister's comments on it.

What steps is the Minister taking actively to encourage the growth and development of farmer-controlled co-operatives such as Milk Link? Farmers are not looking to politicians to determine the milk price. Those I speak to consider themselves to be business people and simply want the market to work in a way that guarantees fair outcomes.

I am grateful for the opportunity this afternoon to raise some important issues concerning the dairy sector and look forward to contributions from other hon. Members and to the Minister's comments.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): Order. Before I call the next speaker, I want to draw attention to the fact that I propose to commence the wind-ups at around 3.30. A number of hon. Members have indicated that they wish to speak and I want to call all of them if possible. That is in the hands of hon. Members so I appeal to them to be as brief as possible.

2.47 pm

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb) on raising this matter because we would not otherwise be having this debate today. It is an important debate because the subject seems to be a forgotten one. Farmers seem to be bottom of the pile when recognition of them should be at the top of the pile. Without doubt, farmers—dairy farmers and beef producers through to sugar producers—are under the cosh from day one.

I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on raising the subject and the way in which he articulated every problem and issue along the way. My only slight disagreement—this is my view and opinions change—is that ending the 30-month scheme will not do anything for beef production at this stage. We must try to keep it until we can get the beef price at a sustainable level for beef farming.

The main subject is milk prices and the price that is paid at the farm gate to farmers who work endless hours. MPs may complain about the hours that we work, but they are nothing compared to those worked by farmers. They work seven days a week with their families and they toil to try to ensure that we can be proud of our countryside and, more importantly, that milk is delivered to homes and supermarkets. I shall return to that villain.

An unacceptable price is being paid to dairy farmers. The 2003 study said that milk production costs were about 18.36p per litre and we now know from the NFU's latest paper that they are just over 20p per litre. As was said earlier, one does not need to be a great mathematician to know that farmers cannot stand such losses. Governments come and go, and seem to have their own ideas about farming. One minute we persuade farmers to undertake more intensive farming because that is where the future lies. Then we say that perhaps we should not have large, intensive production but should slow it down. Farmers must keep trying to change the way in which dairy production takes place. Then we come to the big problem. Yes, they can produce quality milk in this country that is second to none, but they need a fair, firm price delivered to the gate. The price is not fair at the moment. The problem is monopolies. No matter how many times we try to break them, it does not help the person who we are representing today, the farmer. Whatever action we take, the price will not be fair.

Mr. Gray: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is not just a matter of the differential between the 20p that it costs the farmers to produce the milk and the 17p that they are receiving, but capital investment? A constituent, Mr. John Tuck, wrote to me to say that his milk parlour is 31 years old. His youngest tractor is 16 years old. How on earth is he supposed to replace that equipment, when he is losing 3p per litre on his milk?

Mr. Hoyle: I was trying to make that point. Farmers are expected to invest in a certain way. They are then told, "Sorry, we have not got it right. We want you to change to this way." How can we expect people to invest? How can we expect to change the way in which farmers are viewed, without their receiving the real price? The hon. Gentleman is correct.

My constituent, Rick Massey, is a big dairy farmer. He has worked hard to make a living for him and his family. He is a tenant farmer. He and the rest of the Brindle farmers have always been up against it. One minute Arla wants to be fair to the farmers; the next minute, it is cutting prices. Both sides sign up to an agreement to say that the price is fair, only to find out that the dairies want to renegotiate the deal within 12 months. That is unacceptable.

We have had the same experience with supermarkets. They continually work in such a way. The great passport of a penny is not acceptable. The matter has been touched on already. Supermarkets must be fair. They can make a difference to farming in this country. The answer to the future of farming is for the supermarkets to pay a fair farm gate price to ensure that farming stays in this country for ever and a day. That can happen because of their monopoly. They dictate and they can make or break a farmer. The time has now come for less talk and more action from the supermarkets.

Let them sign up to a voluntary buyer's charter. They are shying away from matters. A buyer's charter would be a step in the right direction. We and the supermarkets must be serious. People do not realise what is going on when they pay the price in the supermarket. They think that someone is making a lot of money; they might think that it is the farmer. Well, we all know that it is not the farmer who is making the profit, but the supermarkets and the processors. Excuse the pun, but they are creaming off all the capital. When it comes to price, let us have not a fair playing field, but a fair dairy field.

Albert Owen: Does my hon. Friend agree with farmers in my constituency who welcome the OFT holding a review into the dominance of the major supermarkets? He referred to a buyer's charter. Does he also agree that the Minister should be thinking about his Department working with the Department of Trade and Industry to construct a proper regulatory framework? Farmers are asking for that. They have no confidence in the OFT, or in the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Hoyle: I cannot disagree with my hon. Friend. He is correct. Let us have commitment from the supermarkets under a voluntary charter. The Office of Fair Trading must be seen to be doing its job. We have received report after report from the supermarkets, but they always shy away from the real problem, which is their monopoly position. We should be taking on the directors of the supermarkets because, without doubt, the moment that their collar was felt, we might see a fair price.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): It is encouraging to hear a Labour MP speaking with such passion about agriculture. Does he agree that it is important to have a Secretary of State in the Cabinet who is involved solely in agriculture, so that she or he could act as a champion to lobby the supermarkets? I questioned the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs at the DEFRA Select Committee the other day. I referred to her as the Secretary of State for Agriculture, for which she admonished me, to the cheers of Labour MPs. She said, "I am not the Secretary of State for Agriculture. My Department is DEFRA."

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): Order. That was quite a lengthy intervention.

Mr. Hoyle: We recognise that the Department is now called DEFRA and has slightly different rules. However, I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the farming industry needs champions. There are a lot of champions in the Chamber today who will ensure that its voice is heard.

I am sure that the Minister is taking that on board. I know that he is a champion of the industry. He has not been in the job for long, but at least he is going around the shows, seeing the farmers, and beginning to talk to people. I am pleased that that is happening, but we must of course firm up the position on the future of farming.

[Mr. Hoyle]

Legislation has been mentioned, and that is necessary. There is also a need for the input of a Government, and of the Departments that have been mentioned. The Department of Trade and Industry and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, along with the National Farmers Union—and even Farmers For Action—have all got voices that must be heard. We must all stand together and say to the supermarkets, "We need you to be fair." That is the commitment that is needed. Perhaps we ought not to be using legislation; perhaps we ought to be allowing common sense to prevail, by telling the supermarkets that if they really do want a future in this country, they must recognise this point. That is important.

It is also important to touch on the subject of young farmers and the future of farming. There is no future for young farmers, because of the high cost of buying or renting a farm. The prices are unfair, and that puts people off; they ask. "Why do it?"

If anybody picks up and reads the Farmers Guardian these days, they will know that farms from the south of England to Scotland are up for sale for one reason; people have had enough. They might not be walking away from farming altogether—they might be going to Nigeria or other parts of Africa, or to France, or to Canada—but our farmers are saying, "Enough is enough," and they are going elsewhere in the world to try to enjoy what they enjoy most, which is farming.

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that although the consumer might benefit to some extent from lower supermarket prices, the loss of our dairy farming would create great disbenefits for the consumer, because there would be lack of controls on quality, in addition to us losing our farmland? Tough action and tough speaking are needed now; there is no alternative. We have had a real wake-up call, and I hope that we have got it in time.

Mr. Hoyle: I cannot disagree. In fact, I totally agree, except on one point. I do not think that people who shop at supermarkets are getting the best deal. I do not believe that any of the gains that are being made by screwing the farmer into the ground is being passed on to them; the evidence shows that that is not what happens. The profits are creamed off for shareholders. Companies such as Tesco and Asda hold up their balance sheet; that comes first, and it does so at the expense of farming. That is unacceptable, because it is not sustainable.

We must also talk about the Government in this respect. They have a major role to play. We must get people around the table, and get them to recognise that there is a future in farming only if a fair price is paid for what farmers produce.

Another big issue for farmers is that they want to be farmers. They did not want to be form-fillers, but, unfortunately, that is what they have become. More and more of their time is spent form-filling. I understand that there is a need for forms. I understand the problems caused by foot and mouth and so forth, and I acknowledge the difficulties that arise from such events, so I recognise that forms can be important, but there is an issue to do with the number of forms. They are repetitive. Often, a single form could cover a lot of the relevant issues, and if that form were shared between different Departments, that could further reduce the burden on farming.

That is what farmers would like to happen. Let them do what they do best; let them get out into the fields and get on with farming. They did not take up farming to do so much form-filling. However, I recognise that this problem is not entirely to do with DEFRA; forms come from all Departments.

The amount of paperwork is crucial for the future of farming. We ought to be saying that one form will fit all, if the information is shared. That can be done. We need to take a serious look at this matter, because it is important. I am sure that, like me, all Members regularly meet the farmers in their constituencies; when we do, the one thing we can be sure that they will say is, "Have you seen these forms that I now have to fill in?"

It is a tragic shame that dairy farmers with new-born calves have no market for those calves. There is no future for calves. They are having to shoot the calves; they are having to be put down. That is a tragedy.

There are a number of major problems that we must deal with. All Members present are united on one thing; farmers must get a fair deal. Let us talk to the people who matter. That is not just the Government, but the supermarkets, which can do more for the future of farming than any of us here by giving that fair price.

3 pm

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): Like others, I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb) for securing the debate. If there is one message that must come from it, it is that there is a united front, as has been said by the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle). I join him and other hon. Members in drawing the Minister's attention to the huge gulf between retail milk prices and farmers' production costs. Many of us receive that message in the farmyard and at the marts when we talk to farmers in our constituencies. We have also heard about the disastrous effect that that has had, and is having, on dairy farming.

The hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire was right to draw attention to the much more far-reaching implications of the collapse of the dairy sector for local schools and services, and for the wider rural community. I share a constituency border with him. All the concerns in Preseli Pembrokeshire that he expressed are replicated in my constituency.

Historically, a third of the total farm output of Wales was generated by the dairy sector. Yet, by the end of 2004, 60 per cent. of Welsh dairy farmers were failing to cover their production costs, and dairy farmers in Wales have been exiting the industry at a rate of three a week, a frightening statistic. In Ceredigion, some 1,300 jobs have been lost in the agriculture, forestry and farming sector since 1998. The number of holdings and the average herd sizes have fallen dramatically. We cannot overstate the feeling of the farming community. In the same week as Tesco's profits topped £1 billion, nearly two thirds of farmers could not cover their production costs. There is real despondency and anxiety about the future of their farms.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): I want to reinforce the point that the hon. Gentleman is making so well about the strategic nature of the industry. For the public health reasons that have been mentioned, there is concern that if farmers leave the dairy industry in the way he has described—it is also happening in my constituency—this country will, at a certain point, lose the capacity to produce milk. That is not too far off. I urge the Minister to take that message away from this debate.

Mark Williams: I thank the hon. Gentleman; I can only concur with those comments. This is a UK-wide problem, although constituency interests are obviously dear to our hearts.

A combination of factors has brought us to this situation. The legacy of the break-up of the milk marketing boards has left the large retailers and their suppliers in an increasingly powerful position in the supply chain. That has been compounded by significant rises in farm prices since the 1990s, motor fuel prices increasing by 22 per cent. last year, feed prices increasing by between 9 and 20 per cent. and the price of fertilisers rising by 30 per cent. in two years.

Again like the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire, I will not be tempted to discuss CAP reform, but that issue has had a profound effect on dairy farmers. When questioned on the issue, Ministers have stated that market forces should be allowed to operate. It would seem that farmers are still losing out in what is an increasingly favourable market for some dairy products.

Mr. Michael Moore (Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk) (LD): My hon. Friend talks about the picture in Wales. In Scotland, we have lost 500 diary farms in the past five or six years, and thousands over the past 20 years.

Market forces have been mentioned. Surely for as long as the big supermarkets are allowed to unleash their forces on the market there will be only one set of winners. Is it not about time that the Office of Fair Trading was given a proper remit to regulate this market for everybody?

Mark Williams: My hon. Friend pre-empts me slightly. Of course that is the case. Free markets with protection for the vulnerable must surely be the course.

The Rural Payments Agency figures have shown that milk production is about 233 million litres behind quota. The economics of supply and demand would suggest that farm gate prices should therefore be rising, yet they remain low—that is the problem. I will now discuss possible solutions, and I look forward to the Minister's comments on them.

As was articulated well by the hon. Members for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) and for Preseli Pembrokeshire, the National Farmers Union is concerned at the decision made by the Office of Fair Trading to refer the proposed merger of two Scottish milk processing companies to the Competition Commission. The NFU thinks that further rationalisation in the processing industry is essential if the UK is to compete effectively at EU and international level. I would be interested to hear the Minister's views on the principles of rationalisation. Does he agree with the NFU that it should be encouraged? If so, what can he do to aid that process?

Farmers have told me that suppliers often cite increasing fuel prices and transport distances as a reason for reducing the price that they will pay for milk. Does the Minister agree that we should have a renewed push to process milk as locally as possible? The closure of local creameries is a key factor in driving down farm gate milk costs. The Government, the Scottish Parliament and the National Assembly for Wales should address that.

Action on those points would be welcome, but that would only begin to address the main issue. I return to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk (Mr. Moore): the Government must do something to tackle the overwhelming power of the supermarkets. The voluntary supermarket code of practice applies only to the relationship between farmers and their suppliers, and people have no confidence whatever in that system. The code should apply to the whole supply chain. That would acknowledge that the behaviour of supermarkets impacts directly on farm gate prices; the figures that we are hearing today prove the facts.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): My hon. Friend makes important points about the unfairness in the marketplace. Does he agree that one of the problems with the supermarket code of practice is that, if suppliers complain, it has to become a matter of public record? Naturally, some suppliers are anxious about that, in case they are then victimised by the supermarkets. Does he agree that we need an independent watchdog to help reintroduce transparency and trust into the industry? Such a watchdog could be proactive and need not rely on suppliers to make a public complaint, with all the risks that that involves.

Mark Williams: My hon. Friend is right. In a survey in the February 2004 OFT report on the supermarkets code of practice, 73 per cent. of respondents reported a fear of complaining about the conduct of suppliers. Three years after it was introduced in 2001, not a single farmer had used the code, fearing lack of anonymity and loss of business.

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): Does my hon. Friend accept that farmers and agricultural producers are not looking for special favours? They do not want to be permanently reliant on subsidies, and that is not the route we should seek to take. What they want is a fair market—I am in favour of free market economics—but one can only have such a market if there are no abusive or restrictive practices and if there are enough players in the supply chain to mean that there is genuine competition. That way, the price of milk will find a natural level, which means that farming can be sustainable without being reliant on subsidy. The problem is not that the Government necessarily need to give more largesse—

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): Order. That intervention is far too lengthy.

Mark Williams: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. His essential point was about the level playing field. That relates directly to what my hon. Friend the Member for Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk said about the need for a food trade inspector based in the OFT to monitor the whole supply chain and prevent unscrupulous action.

I also wonder—this point has not yet been touched on—about the feasibility of the introduction of a brand of fairly traded milk, a specially labelled product that would guarantee consumers that the farmer was receiving a fair price for his milk. Would the Minister be willing to assist such a scheme?

I hope that the Minister will take on board the comments of hon. Members today. There is a great deal of consensus among all parties present that action must be taken to halt the erosion of our dairy industry. I go back to what the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire and I have said: this issue is about livelihoods and about sustainable rural communities, because once the farms and farming families have gone, there will be a critical threat to the vibrancy of a rural economy. We have seen that in Wales and, from the contributions in the Chamber, throughout the United Kingdom.

3.10 pm

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mark Williams), who spoke clearly and with great interest in the subject. May I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb) on securing this debate? Any time the Minister wishes to look at the limited but large farms and the burgeoning, affluent supermarkets that I have, he is welcome to return to his old stamping grounds. I shall show him around with the greatest of pleasure; I am sure that my constituents will be very pleased to see him.

North-east Nottinghamshire is not noted for its dairy or beef farmers. During the past 50 years, we have moved quickly from a mixed agricultural society to a limited one of almost completely arable farmers. Unlike the rich pastures of Preseli, where I spend many of my holidays, the whole area in between the power stations that proliferate up in Nottinghamshire is taking on much more the mien of the county of Cambridgeshire.

Our farming is getting much less interesting, demanding and diverse, and the farming communities, and their mixture, are suffering. Several Members present have already made the point that the vibrancy of the agricultural community depends not only on profit margins, but on variety and on there being a fair deal for those to whom they sell their produce.

Time is limited, so I shall not bang on more than I normally do, but I should like briefly to consider one case study in my constituency. A little under a year ago when this problem started to generate heat in the east midlands and in north-east Nottinghamshire, I was asked to visit several of the diminishing number of dairy farms in my area. Most of them were absolutely model farms. They understood the necessity to make milk production as efficient as possible, and the diversity was impressive. Every single one of them had thought about the environment; many had tried to diversify so that they could sustain all sorts of farm products other than merely dairy products, and I was impressed by the way they were making a go of difficult circumstances.

In one particular case, the farmer of a larger than normal herd of 110 beasts told me that he was producing in profit less than £1,000 a month. He and his wife worked more than a 60-hour week, and they had had to pay off the man who worked part-time essentially, as far as they were concerned, to fill in the forms about which we heard from the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle). Their workload was increasing and their profit margin decreasing by the day. I do not need to tell the Minister that on 1 October the price of milk fell by another 0.3p, making life even more difficult for the characters whom I have just described. That is a relatively large milk producer on my patch; there are others in more difficult circumstances.

Although electricity, diesel, contracting, oil-based fertiliser and all other costs that the farmer must absorb continue to rise, there is nowhere for the farmer to go. I know that the Minister understands. With my limited grasp of mathematics, I should have thought that the rules of supply and demand suggest that as supply diminishes, so prices should rise. That is not the case. Although prices may be rising, they certainly are not doing so at the farm gate. The losers in this deal are the farmers who are trying to put in those 60-hour weeks not only to produce the goods that we want, but to maintain the farms, the diversity and the rural aspect.

Those points have been made already. However, the dairy farmers pointed out to me that it is not easy to change from dairy farming, unlike other forms of farming. It takes about four years to go from conception to producing a milkable animal, if that is the right technical term, and such a business cannot just be turned round or changed overnight. Already, we have heard that if we are not careful, given where competition is going, we will end up with large farms, and the sort of small herds that I have been discussing will completely disappear. I do not want that, and it is clear that nobody in this Chamber—no matter what their political stripe—wants that either.

I iterate the points already made. Will the Minister please allow us, and therefore our farmers, to know what the Office of Fair Trading is going to do about this? How will a supermarket code of practice be made to work, both in theory and—to use the same word again—in practice? What can the buyers charter be made to do for the farmer, rather than the processor? Lastly, how can farmer-controlled co-operatives be encouraged by the Government, not just in theory, but in fact?

The time for talking about this subject is long past. The Minister understands that, unless the supermarkets and other market factors are gripped and controlled, we shall lose our dairy production capacity completely, and I, for one, will be extremely sorry and many of my constituents will be extremely poor.

3.17 pm

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb) on securing this debate. This is not the first time that we have debated this issue, and we seem to be making a distinct lack of progress.

From the dairy farming point of view, the issues are about not just the price of milk, but BSE and the lack of export opportunities. The fact that dairy farmers cannot send their calves to the best market also impinges on the profitability of dairy farms.

However, the price of milk is obviously a key issue. I am surprised to see the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight) in his place; I should have thought that the Minister for Competitiveness would have responded to this debate. In a sense, this issue is not about farming, but competition. Farming is all right: people produce milk—there is no problem with that. The key issues are selling it and the state of the market.

I shall be very quick. We have to make up our minds about a point of principle and of policy. The question is about whether we want a fair market or a free market for milk. I do not think that we can have a free and a fair market; we will find that the free market is not fair—it does not reflect the effort and investment that goes in from farming families—and that the fair market is not free.

This country, and in some ways the Government, have benefited very much from food prices having been kept down. Inflation in this country has been kept very low, and we congratulate the Government on that, but across the economy the prices charged by some service industries seem to have gone up fairly substantially—I certainly think that when I pay my accountant or solicitor. To some extent, manufacturing has also seen price hikes. Food prices, however, have been kept very low indeed. Supermarkets do not compete on quality or variety—all of them have those—but on price. It is hard to explain to a farmer that supermarkets make more money by charging less than anybody else, but that is what they do because they want market share.

Mr. Gray: The hon. Gentleman seems to be making a different point from that of his colleagues. A moment ago, we were saying that, given that milk was sold at 54p a litre at supermarkets, somebody somewhere was making a fat profit. The hon. Gentleman seems to be saying that the supermarkets are competing with each other and keeping the price unreasonably low, and that that is why farmers are so badly paid. In that case, presumably he is proposing that supermarket milk prices should go up.

Mr. Williams: If the hon. Gentleman hangs on a minute, I shall come on to what I am and what I am not proposing.

That is my analysis of the market. In classical economic terms, a market—a free market, which is acting properly and in the interest of all who participate—must have many buyers and many sellers. Everybody must have a shared knowledge of that market—the amount, the demand, the amount provided and the manner provided. That is obviously not the case in this country. Tesco and other supermarkets have a huge proportion of buying clout. That point has been well made.

One of the questions that I would like to ask the Minister is about the OFT—I am not quite sure whether it is the Office of Fair Trading or the office of free trading. The OFT is meant to be at arm's length from the Government, but there must be some indication as to when it should or should not intervene. The time is well past for intervening in the food chain market. Examples have been given, and we could put out a lot. What are the instructions, the guidance, for the Office of Fair Trading?

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Norman Baker), who leads for us on these matters, will put forward the case for a fair trade inspector. That is important. In Wales, few farmers sell directly to the supermarkets. They sell through intermediaries, whether the dairies, the slaughterhouses or the meat-processing plants. Often the happy supermarket—I cannot remember which hon. Member mentioned this—will go and sit in the farmer's kitchen and chat, moaning and groaning about the margins and that sort of thing, when the dairy is driving down the price.

Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): The hon. Gentleman mentioned that farmers in Wales sell primarily to dairies. Does he not share my concern at the increasing number of dairy closures, including Longslow dairy in my constituency only last month? Farmers are left with additional transport costs, reducing their profitability.

Mr. Williams: I agree. The problem of consolidating the industry stands as a problem.

I will close. The Minister needs to address the competition issues. No Government should leave the country lacking in food. British dairy farmers cannot produce at the price at the moment and, in the end, they will not produce.

3.22 pm

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I have the pleasure and privilege of representing the Kettering constituency, which is situated in the heart of England and represents the best that England has to offer in every respect, including agriculture.

The Minister has connections with Kettering. He will know the area well, but he may not be aware that in north and east Northamptonshire the number of dairy herds has fallen from 42 to just 13 since 1986. Several more are on the brink of closure, taking the number of dairy farms down to single figures. At the current rate, I would not be surprised if dairy farming ceased to exist in the Kettering constituency during my parliamentary career, should that last for more than one term.

Local dairy farmers tell me that the process of closure has accelerated in the last five years. Dairy farming requires substantial investment, not only in financial terms but also in time. Dairy farming consumes far more of a farmer's time than crop production, because of milking and animal-welfare issues. The request that local dairy farmers asked me to make is that the Government look seriously at the transparency of the supermarket price of milk.

With another hat on, I have the privilege of sitting on the all-party parliamentary small shops group. We are considering the state of the retail sector. Evidence given shows that a supermarket having an 8 per cent. share of the retail market starts to distort competitive pressures. Tesco has a 30 per cent. share of the grocery market and a dominant share of the milk market. As my hon. Friends said, the farmer gets only 16p to 20p per litre, but the supermarket sells milk at 54p per litre. The Government urgently need to examine the difference between the two prices.

[Mr. Philip Hollobone]

Of course, there is an Office of Fair Trading. The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) made an extremely good point that the Government need to send a signal to the OFT and the Competition Commission that all is not well, not only in the retail industry but in the supply chain, particularly in respect of dairy farming. On behalf of all the dairy farmers and related rural communities in the Kettering constituency, I urge the Government to take the issue extremely seriously. I do not want to be the Member of Parliament for a constituency that no longer has any dairy farms.

3.26 pm

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): I congratulate the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb) on securing this important debate. It is timely, as the industry is in crisis—I do not use the word lightly. Milk prices are a particular issue in Wales and in my constituency and the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price), who would contribute to this debate if he had the time.

Many producers have gone out of business, not because they are unwilling to put in the long hours or do the work, and certainly not because they are not enterprising. In rural areas in Wales and elsewhere, people are very enterprising. They run small businesses successfully—much of the time, against the elements—but they are under extreme pressure.

I would like to use my time to draw Members' attention to the effect on some processors. I refer specifically to a farmer-run co-op in my constituency—the South Caernarfon Creameries, or Hufenfa De Arfon. It is a unique enterprise, with members as far south as Aberystwyth and as far east as Denbigh. It produces an excellent range of products, including organic products and milk from cows that are fed on non-GM feed—it is labelled as such, which is the good practice that we hope for from other producers. The creamery produces a cheese called Monterey Jack, which is based on an American recipe, and exports it to America. The people who run the co-op are enterprising. The prices that it pays its owners—it is farmer owned—are always in the higher echelons, and it does everything that it should, yet it is under pressure because of the current situation, which, unfortunately, is a case of the bad driving out the good.

At the recent annual general meeting of the Farmers Union of Wales, Carwyn Jones, the Minister for Environment, Planning and Countryside in the Assembly, said that the supermarkets were in danger of killing the goose that lays the golden egg. A Minister from Cardiff has told us who is holding the smoking gun. I do not need to go into that argument, as the Milk Development Council's report is clear enough.

I shall make one further point that is specific to my part of the world. It is to do with the knock-on effect on rural life and, particularly in my constituency, on the Welsh language. The agricultural community is the backbone of the Welsh language.

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) made an excellent point about goods inflation in the UK, which is currently running at 0 per cent. for milk. All the cost increases are being passed to the suppliers—they are not being borne by the consumers—and that is one of the problems.

Hywel Williams: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention, which brings me to my final points. Will the Minister ensure greater transparency in the supply chain? We need to be able to see where the money is going. It certainly is not going into the pockets of farmers in my constituency or in my hon. Friend's constituency. Finally, I refer, as other Members have, to the virtue of a buyer's charter as requested by the National Farmers Union and the FUW.

3.30 pm

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): This has been a useful debate. I congratulate the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb) on introducing it. The debate has been attended by a large number of Members from all parties—more from the Liberal Democrat and Conservative parties, it has to be said. Nevertheless, Members from all parties are here today, despite the fact that a significant debate is taking place in the main Chamber.

The debate is also significant for the fact that hon. Members who have spoken have shown unanimity about the seriousness of the problem, the role of the supermarkets and the urgent desire to do something to ensure that the British dairy industry continues in existence. I am sure that the Minister will have taken those points on board and I look forward to hearing his contribution shortly.

This is a serious issue. It is extraordinary that this country has an almost unique combination of skills, structure, climate and geography to provide a secure and financially sound dairy industry, yet farmers are leaving the industry week after week, as we have heard, from all parts of the country, be it Wales, Scotland, the south-west or indeed my constituency of Lewes. Undoubtedly one of the reasons is the operation of the market. My hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) is right to draw attention to the importance of the competition process, which is at the root of our debate this afternoon.

Mr. Andrew Turner: The hon. Gentleman acknowledged that geography is a significant factor. Would he be surprised to know that school milk, which is subsidised and sold in my constituency, is sold at 18p for a one-third-of-a-pint carton? It is brought from Chadwell Heath in Essex to the Isle of Wight; yet it is possible to buy milk at 30p a pint from suppliers on the Isle of Wight. For some reason, even the Government's subsidised scheme for milk creates far more food miles and far more expensive milk.

Norman Baker: It does indeed. If I were to be distracted down a different road, the same could be said of the fruit scheme in schools. Huge numbers of pears and apples are imported into the country, when it would be better if they were supplied by our own suppliers, for environmental reasons as well as to support the British farming industry.

I want to draw the Minister's attention to the answer to a parliamentary question that I put, which spells out the relationship between the price that farmers have received for milk in recent years and the price at which the supermarkets are selling it to consumers. In 1995 the average price paid at the farm gate across England and Wales was 24.94p a litre. By 2004 that had dropped to 18.46p a litre. We also heard of all the extra costs—genuine and significant costs—that are falling on the farming industry, whether it is for fertilisers or the infrastructure. When suppliers have lost about 25 per cent. of their price over that period of time, it is impossible for them to continue indefinitely, if over the same time the supermarket price has stayed roughly the same and the supermarket profit has increased from 1.3p a litre to 13p.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the significant costs that have been borne by many dairy farmers is that resulting from TB and its spread in certain areas? Does he agree that the Government need to take action over that and to see how it is being caused, which in many cases is by badgers?

Norman Baker: I agree that TB is a serious issue, particularly in the south-west, but also in Sussex in my constituency. The hon. Gentleman will be interested to know that the Lib Dems recently published a proposal to deal with the problem, which included dealing with the badger issue.

The relationship of farm gate prices to retail prices is absurd, and shows what the NFU correctly calls a dysfunctional supply chain. The supermarkets are making increased profits, while the process to compete for supermarket tenders is driving down prices to farmers. As a result, the dairy industry is threatened and we will end up sucking in more and more imports. That is in the interests of no one, except those who are abroad. It is a clear market failure. The market is not delivering the level playing field that we have a right to expect. That is why so many of us are so angry at the OFT's failure to take action on this matter.

My hon. Friend suggested that it was the office of free trading rather than the Office of Fair Trading. I might suggest that it is the office of fixed trading, fixed in the sense that it does not move and also that it seems to be beneficial to supermarkets and not to those supplying milk. I understand why we have got there, but it is not satisfactory simply to leave the matter with the OFT, which is not only not helping with a clearly malfunctioning market in which it ought to intervene, but is making matters worse, as we have heard, in respect of the referral of the proposed acquisition of Scottish Milk Dairies Ltd. by Robert Wiseman Dairies plc to the Competition Commission, despite the fact that the business represents a mere 2 per cent. of the Scottish liquid milk market. It is extraordinary that when the OFT intervenes, it does so in the wrong direction. We cannot allow that to carry on.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: Having had some involvement in this for many years, does the hon. Gentleman agree that the real problem that the OFT has, and that the Government can influence, is that it should not keep on looking at the producer definition as the short circuit and the easy way out for defining a market, which is the much harder process of defining where the sales took place? That is how we could help get to the supermarkets rather than always to the farm producers.

Norman Baker: I have some sympathy with that point. The OFT also seems to fail to recognise that we are now in the European market. When it considers the ownership of different aspects of the market it needs to do so on a European basis rather than on a UK one.

The Minister who is present is from DEFRA. He doubtless has some sympathy with the plight of farmers; I have heard him on previous occasions express such a view. What influence does he have with his colleagues at the Department of Trade and Industry, who should be the ones taking action on this matter? How can he take that message back? What will he ask them to do? What is DEFRA's position on those issues, which the DTI, the OFT and the Competition Commission ought to investigate more fully? They do not seem to be investigating them fully at the moment.

As has been said by my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion (Mark Williams), there is an urgent need for a fair trade inspector or a food trade inspector in the OFT. It is clearly not satisfactory to rely on the code of practice, which has simply delivered nothing. Nobody will complain if they feel that they will be victimised or will lose business as a consequence, and we cannot expect them to do so. There has to be a genuine mechanism to allow farmers to make what they believe to be genuine complaints, to have such complaints properly investigated and to feel secure that they will not lose out as a consequence. Clearly, they do not have that confidence at the moment, but they want to make complaints.

The absence of complaints made does not mean that people do not want to complain. There are plenty of complaints to make. I am sure that other hon. Members present will have met local farmers, as I have; I joined a great many from the south-east outside the Arla processing plant in my constituency, which is at Sheffield park, near Chailey. Farmers have plenty of complaints, many of which are entirely justified, and they are very angry. Some farmers are now being driven to pouring their milk down the drain to try to draw attention to this serious issue. Plenty of complaints could be made. The fact that they are not being made through the code of practice suggest that it is flawed. That has to be changed.

We need an intermediary, such as a food trade inspector, who could analyse the complaints and drive some sense into the OFT. Will the Minister support that sort of mechanism to allow the regulation of the market to be properly addressed in a way that has not taken place so far? His colleague in the Lords and the DEFRA team have expressed some sympathy with this issue. Will the Minister tell me what he is going to do by way of an inquiry into the power of the supermarkets, which is generally of concern not only to us in this House and to the farming industry, but to consumers, who are writing to me in increasing numbers? What will he do to ensure that the whole issue of supermarket power is addressed? A complex monopoly of four big chains now controls a huge amount of the food market and distorts it as a consequence. That must be addressed as a general issue and I do not see it being addressed.

[Norman Baker]

Farmers are going out of business every week. In Wales alone, 32 per cent. of the farmers have left the diary industry in the past 10 years. There are now only 15,000 dairy farmers in England and Wales, according to the National Farmers Union. This is a serious matter and I hope that, given today's high attendance and the strong views expressed by Members of all parties, the Minister will accept that we now need action from his Department and, most of all, from the DTI and the OFT.

3.39 pm

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): May I begin by drawing attention to my declaration in the Register of Members' Interests that relates to income from agricultural rents, which, happily in this case, mainly comes from dairy farming? This has been a splendid debate, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb). I have never seen this Chamber so full; there are Tory MPs sitting right around the corner, so that they almost touch the lonely and lone Labour Member.

Mr. Hoyle: I think it ought to be put on the record that more than one Labour Member is present. This subject is too important for us to score political points.

Mr. Paterson: The hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Albert Owen) left the Chamber, although I see that he has now returned.

My point is that although a big debate on terrorism is taking place in the main Chamber, this issue has attracted great attention. It is right that it has done so; we have the climate, the livestock and the husbandry and yet, although this industry should be prospering, it is in dire trouble, with prices well below the break-even price of approximately 20p.

The reason for that is partly a historical problem, caused by the old Milk Marketing Board, and the incentives given to farmers to produce a commodity—liquid milk—which they were told would then be taken away. I can remember that in respect of my own family in the 1960s; there was never a worry about where the milk might go. However, the problem is that during that period our competitors in Ireland and on the continent—in particular France—were forging ahead with farmers' co-operatives, and were focusing on added value.

We must differentiate between milk, which is a commodity, and products that the consumer wants to buy. We have become efficient producers of a commodity, but our farmers are detached from the end market. That problem is compounded by a strong and well organised retail sector, which has driven prices down, so that farmers are being driven out of business. The solution is to add value. We must get our farmers near to the end consumer; they must get into brands and finished products that consumers want to buy.

Let me offer a couple of examples from my constituency, which, along with that of my constituency neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien), is part of the largest milk field in western Europe. Processing is about four times more efficient in France than it is here. We produce 11 per cent. of the EU's milk, but only 4 per cent. of its cheese. France produces 18 per cent. of the EU's milk, and 22.5 per cent. of the cheese. We are suffering from a ghastly hangover going back to the years of the MMB, when we did not invest in efficient processing plant.

However, there are exceptions. Müller, a private German company, has, from zero to 12 years, gone from producing nothing to producing nearly 2 billion pots of yoghurt in a state-of-the-art, world-class plant near Market Drayton in my constituency. I talked to Mr. Robert Cope of Adderley yesterday; he is going to increase the size of his herd of cows from 300 to 600 to supply Müller. Another nearby family business is going in the opposite direction. Justin Beckett has stopped milking cows, and has gone into specialised cheese production. He is supplying the multiples and all the supermarkets, and he is buying from a large number of small processors. He wants fat in his milk, 4 per cent. fat, so he is encouraging the use of Jersey and Shorthorn cows. That is just the sort of thing that my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) was touching on.

There are solutions to this problem; they are to add value, to get near the customer, and to use the supermarkets. When I went to see Herr Müller in Germany, he said he could never have grown his business at the speed that he has done without the extraordinary efficiency of the UK distribution sector. We need to get products into that sector.

Albert Owen: I apologise for leaving the debate. I had to take an important telephone call. The hon. Gentleman should not make party political points about attendance, and the high attendance by Members of all parties who represent Welsh constituencies is to be applauded. He talked about added value. As the hon. Member for North Wiltshire mentioned, the problem in that regard is that the margins are so small that nobody can invest and diversify in the way that is being outlined. The options for farmers to do that are limited. It helps when they get opportunities from larger companies, but it is impossible for small family farms to reinvest in the new machinery that is needed to make the added-value products.

Mr. Paterson: The hon. Gentleman is right. The Government make it difficult to get into that. However, I cited the example of a small, family business which has prospered by adding value and getting near the consumer. The hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) talked about the supermarkets. The problem in that respect is that the Chancellor will do nothing about them, because, as the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) said, taking action will create inflation, and the Chancellor will not want supermarket prices to go up.

Mr. Hoyle: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Paterson: I am sorry, but I have given way once, and I must now press on.

In respect of liquid milk, we can add value by way of a variety of additions, such as omega 3 fish oil. We could also have vending machines in schools, as my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) said. There are new probiotic products, too. Treating milk as a commodity is a complete loser; we have to get into adding value, because the situation will get worse. Polish production has increased by 11 per cent. this year, pushing EU production up by 1 per cent. Poland is coming along with western efficiency, and Hungary will follow. We must add value and get near the consumer, and the Government have to get out of the industry's hair in terms of farm regulation, putting up new units and factory regulation. Leon Downey fought a wonderful battle down in Pembrokeshire, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire, to stop being put out of business by Government regulations.

Mr. Hoyle: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Paterson: I do apologise, but I have only a short time left.

There are further problems with regulations on, for instance, farm shops—they are another way of getting near the consumer—and getting planning for retail outlets. There was an interesting case this week in which the European Commission ruled on feta. I would like the Government's line on that. The Government must stand up for the ability to make named cheeses in other geographical areas. Take our area; the majority of Cheshire cheese used to be made in Shropshire. It would be a real problem if there were pressure from the Commission on named cheese.

The Government could do a lot more on cross-compliance. EU directives such as the nitrate vulnerable zones directive and the water framework directive all mean costs on top of the other rising costs that hon. Members present have mentioned, one of which was fuel. There is a lot that the Government could do to make life easier for those who need to branch out and expand. I agree that it is extremely difficult to get into those added-value activities.

Above all is the issue of the OFT. It was an absolute disgrace that the right hon. Member for North Tyneside (Mr. Byers)—the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—overruled and went against the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report. At the time, Milk Marque had 38 per cent. of the domestic market, and Arla was allowed in with 98 per cent. of its market. It is ludicrous to treat the markets that we are talking about as little, isolated national markets; they are not. The case last week, in which Robert Wiseman Dairies was not allowed to buy a business that had only 2 per cent. of the Scottish liquid milk market, was ludicrous.

I was talking to a very successful executive of a big milk co-op this morning. He said, "You can't breathe without the risk of OFT intervention." All Members in this Chamber have talked about that. We have to allow larger groupings, and we need larger farmers' co-operatives, processors and distributors. With them, we will get research into the products that I mentioned, efficiencies of production to get us up to continental levels and, above all, the clout to stand up to the supermarkets.

I simply do not understand the extraordinary, narrow definition that the OFT seems to put on the market in the country. My hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury is right; the OFT looks only at supply. It does not look at sales—I do not think that it has a way of getting at them. We have a massive problem here. We are talking about a product that is not just European—I have mentioned Poland, and huge imports come from Ireland, too—but global. Milk powder can come from New Zealand or the west coast of America. It is absolutely incorrect that the OFT and Government direction should be allowed to interfere in such a prejudiced manner with the suppliers of milk.

Also, as numerous hon. Members have said, the OFT is not attacking the problem of the buyers. Those buyers are in an extraordinarily privileged position, because there is an oversupply of a commodity and a small number of buyers, who have massive power. If there is time, I would like the Minister to give the Government's position on that, and to say what the Government are going to do about it, because there is unanimity on the issue across this Chamber.

Quotas have collapsed in value. We are under quota in this country, but there are massive payments of super-levies in Italy. What is the Government's line on sale of quota across borders? On by-products, it is frankly disgusting that black-and-white calves are being shot the moment that they are born. At a rough calculation, if we achieved the same price for black-and-white bull calves that one can get in France this afternoon, that would add £100 million to dairy farmers' incomes. What will the Government do about that?

Finally, I come to TB. I do not have time to go through the 600-plus parliamentary questions that I have tabled on TB. This disease is out of control; it is an epidemic, according to one of the replies that I received. Its not being cured will cost this country £2 billion over the next 10 years. When will the Government take action?

3.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight): I welcome the debate. It has been useful and I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb) for raising the issue, which is important to my constituency of South Dorset. We probably would not have a railway line if it were not for the need back in the days of Thomas Hardy to have a way in which to get the milk from Dorset to London to serve the market. When I was on holiday earlier in the year, I visited the hon. Gentleman's constituency and enjoyed the perilous pursuit of coasteering with my family. I might not repeat that activity, but it might have been a less perilous occupation than answering today's debate.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the serious challenges that are faced by the dairy industry. When visiting agricultural shows over the summer, I, too, heard the frustration and sometimes anger that has been expressed on behalf of dairy farmers in my constituency. I must qualify my statement by saying that I firmly believe that there is a bright future for a modern, profitable and efficient United Kingdom dairy sector in the long term. We have a climatic advantage, a flexible milk quota regime, some first-rate producers and processors, and affluent customers.

[Jim Knight]

Our farm size, efficiency and costs of production relative to our European partners are good. We are further ahead in preparing for the lower prices and trade liberalisation than most other European Union countries. We heard about value-added production from the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson). That and branded products are increasing, and specific or niche markets are being developed all the time. We can have a successful dairy sector in the UK and we are in a good position to ensure that we do.

That said, I am not complacent. I appreciate that the short to mid-term is challenging for the sector. It is clear that the problems facing the dairy industry are complex and that there is no simple solution to them. The Government's response has been to obtain more transparency and clarity in respect of such issues by establishing the dairy supply chain forum, chaired by my noble Friend Lord Bach, so that we can play our part in helping industry to help itself. I wholeheartedly agree with what the hon. Member for North Shropshire said about value-added production. We are aware of the problems in the UK dairy industry. We export low-value commodity products and we import high-value products. The industry needs to move away from that. The forum is funding a major study into barriers to innovation.

Mr. Hoyle: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Jim Knight: I say to all hon. Members that I have a series of points to make, but limited time in which to do so. If a Member wants to make a genuinely new point, I am willing to hear it. However, that will mean that I shall have less time in which to deal with the issues that have already been made.

Mr. Hoyle: I thank the Minister for giving way. He is a little more generous than members of the Opposition. An important part of the issue concerns import. Imports can come into this country under easier rules. We expect high welfare standards from our farmers, but the same welfare standards are not placed on farm imports into this country. Can there be a level playing field in respect of welfare standards?

Jim Knight: We need a level playing field. Compliance is the responsibility of the Commission and it must ensure that we achieve it.

The hon. Member for North Shropshire referred to named cheeses. It is a difficult matter. We are making an effort to encourage the creation of brands that are protected by the EU, such as the Cumberland sausage or the Melton Mowbray pork pie, to add value to our industry. However, by saying that we want to be able to protect our brands and products, but we shall not allow others in Europe to protect theirs, we will be in a difficult position. A balance must be struck.

Mr. Geoffrey Cox (Torridge and West Devon) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Jim Knight: Is it a new point?

Mr. Cox: Yes. I am extremely impressed by the Minister's bright vision of a long-term future. However, it is the little things that depress the farmers at present. Devon has the largest permanent milk quota in the country. In my constituency, we are 30 vets short in the state veterinary service. TB testing is now grinding to a halt because private vets are withdrawing and there are no private vets available to carry out the testing. It is that sort of thing that tells dairy farmers that the Government are not interested, and long-term bright visions of jam tomorrow are not going to sustain an industry that is dying now.

Jim Knight: I want to dwell on the points that are crucial to the matter, such as those relating to supermarkets and so on, but the Department is very focused on the issue of bovine TB. We are exploring various options in order to address that. We shall be making announcements before too long in order to address this particular problem.

The forum has brought together all sectors of the dairy industry to find collaborative solutions to common problems. The forum has played a pivotal role by providing a framework for constructive debate and giving leadership for the dairy sector through this challenging time; I have referred to some of the things that it has commissioned. In response to the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone), it is certainly building more transparency. There is still further to go to properly identify the 18p per litre that the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) talked about, but the forum is doing some very important work in that area.

We recognise that farm gate prices, although broadly similar this year to last and higher than they have been recently, are too low for many to be able to sustain their businesses. In response to the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire, I am concerned about the number of farmers leaving the industry. There was a report by Professor Coleman on the changes in dairy farming in England and Wales since 2002–03, which suggests that there might have been a more significant downturn in production than previously projected as a result. Although milk production is low this year, it is too early to tell whether there is a definite trend, but we are watching that carefully and we are concerned about it. UK production at the moment is roughly at the same level as it was in 1998–99.

We also recognise that costs have increased for all in the supply chain, putting a squeeze on profitability for some. However, in terms of profitability, farm gate prices are only one part of the story. Producers have to play their part too by reducing costs and becoming more efficient. As the NFU has noted in its impressive document, "A Vision for the Dairy Industry", profit comes from a combination of cutting costs and achieving a fair return from the market. The 25 per cent. of farmers with the lowest production costs were producing milk for, on average, 12p per litre less than the 25 per cent. with the highest costs. That difference is not sustainable. In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Albert Owen), that is one of the reasons why it is very difficult for us to introduce a regulator. How can a fair price be set when there is such a difference in cost?

Mr. Gray: Will the Minister give way?

Jim Knight: I really must use these last two minutes to deal with the points made. There are many points I would like to make, but I should move on to the central issue of supermarkets and their code of practice, which was spoken about with such passion by my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) and many other Members during the debate.

Recently the Competition Appeal Tribunal has instructed the Office of Fair Trading to review its decision not to refer the grocery market to the Competition Commission for a market investigation. Competition issues are regularly cited as having a detrimental impact on the dairy sector. I have discussed my concerns and those of my constituents, and those concerns to which I referred at the beginning of my comments, about the operation of the supermarket code of practice with the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe), and my noble friend Lord Bach and I will continue those discussions. We have meetings scheduled and I will certainly pass on to my hon. Friend the views that have been expressed with such passion in this debate.

I am pleased that the Office of Fair Trading announced that it will be more proactive in monitoring supermarkets' code compliance procedures. It also confirmed that trade associations could take—[Interruption.] I note from the sedentary comment of the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) that he is unwilling to listen to a word I am saying.

Mr. Gray: Will the Minister give way?

Jim Knight: I will not give way because I have only one minute.

Mr. Gray: On a point of order, Mr. Benton. The Minister is making the worst ministerial reply I have ever heard. He named me as making a sedentary comment and now he will not take my intervention. The point is that he is not replying adequately to an impassioned, one-and-a-half hour debate—

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): Order. That is not a point of order. The Minister has a few seconds left.

Jim Knight: We have had a good debate. The OFT confirmed that trade associations could take group action—

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): Order. Time is up.

Mr. Hoyle: On a point of order, Mr. Benton. I do not believe that it was deliberate, but the hon. Member for North Shropshire suggested that Conservatives were sitting all round the Chamber, but there were also Members from other political parties here. He went on to suggest that I believed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should increase the price to people who shop in supermarkets. Far from it; I suggested that the profit should come from the supermarkets and go to farmers.

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): With respect to the hon. Gentleman, that is not a point of order.

Costa Rica/Nicaragua

4.1 pm

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): I shall make a swift change from the dairy sector to the different subject of Costa Rica and Nicaragua. I am delighted to have secured this Adjournment debate, having been on an Inter-Parliamentary Union visit there in September. It was a well organised visit and there was a good deal of unanimity of views across all three parties represented. Had it not been for the important debate in the House, the hon. Members for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) and for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) and others would have been here to add their views and I hope that my comments will represent their views as well as mine.

It was interesting to be there with both countries having elections next year. I want to put on the record that, having not been to central America previously, I found them attractive and welcoming countries. Costa Rica seems to be particularly well organised and developed environmentally—that is close to my heart—with huge reliance on hydropower, which was pleasing to see. Its National Biodiversity Institute—INBio—promotes and safeguards the country's unique environment. I am pleased that it has had some British funding to help it to do so. Nicaragua is an extremely attractive country and wears its heart on its sleeve. Both countries are preparing for elections next year: Costa Rica in February 2006 and Nicaragua in November 2006.

In Costa Rica the front runner is the former president and Nobel peace prize winner, Oscar Arias. It was an interesting time to be there because two former presidents are under house arrest awaiting charges for alleged corruption during their time in office. What is interesting is that there is obviously an issue of possible corruption, but the country seems to be able to deal with that and is not frightened of taking forward issues relating to high-profile individuals. That is welcome.

Costa Rica has a diversified economy and a good stable regime for investment, although it would be welcome if it ratified the Central America Free Trade Agreement sooner rather than later.

In this debate I want to discuss what we are doing to maximise UK influence in those countries, to help Costa Rica and Nicaragua as countries, and to ensure that we engage with them productively for our own country. Having spent some time there and having done some reading, I have discovered that relations between our countries have always been good and that is useful. However, it is clear that our resources over there are stretched, to say the least.

I want to put on record that we have an exceedingly effective ambassador in Georgina Butler who now covers both countries. I found it extremely refreshing to see the way in which she was able to undertake her duties in both countries. She was refreshingly unstuffy compared with some in the Foreign Office—I am not referring to the Minister—and the more ambassadors we have like her, the better. She does a great deal to enhance Britain's reputation in those countries.

However, Georgina Butler is now covering both countries and we recently closed the embassy in Nicaragua. She has only two diplomatic staff to help her and 13 people who are native to Costa Rica or Nicaragua. We have now got to the stage at which the engine is running so slowly that it is in danger of stalling. A little more investment from the UK would repay itself many times over in terms of the benefits to the UK that would flow from it. The people I met in Costa Rica felt a good deal of good will towards the UK. Many have been here, some have studied here and they are very well disposed towards us. Frankly, we are not maximising our opportunity to put across our values, nor are we maximising trade opportunities.

UK Trade and Investment operating in Costa Rica has now been downgraded to a response service only. We met the UK Trade and Investment people. They were quite clearly capable of actively going out there, identifying markets for UK businesses and securing them with little difficulty, given the stable nature of Costa Rica and the fact that the country is growing successfully and is well disposed towards the UK. However, only a response service is in operation and I understand that that was almost withdrawn and was saved at the last minute only after a huge fuss was kicked up.

Why are we neglecting trade opportunities in the country? The Minister will probably say that there is a finite budget for these matters, priorities have to be allocated as the new countries enter the European Union, and we have had had to reconsider our role across the globe. I understand all that. However, has a cost-benefit analysis been carried out to find out whether, if we had more personnel there—whether from the Foreign Office or UK Trade and Investment—they might pay for themselves in terms of the money that we would recoup from their presence?

We met business people from UK companies in Costa Rica. The Minister will know that many UK companies operate there. Frankly, some of us were embarrassed by the lack of support that we appear to be giving to those companies, which want to expand, to the benefit of both Costa Rica and Britain. There is no British Council presence in the country any more. There have been two annual Chevening scholarships, but there was some suggestion that they might be withdrawn. Perhaps the Minister can confirm whether that is the case. In general, we are underperforming. Investment would more than repay itself. Thanks to the ambassador and her staff, who are excellent, we are punching above our weight, but there is only so much that can be done with the resources available.

When we went on to visit Nicaragua, the story was similar. The visit was interesting. There are elections coming up and there is a real possibility that Daniel Ortega, whom we met, will return. It was an interesting experience meeting him. We learned that one has to interrupt him in order to get a word in. He sort of expected that. If we did not interrupt him, he carried on indefinitely, like some throwback to the 1970s. He is very much influencing what is going on. There is a difficult constitutional situation, as the Minister will doubtless be aware. There is some sort of unusual pact—I would not quite say devil's pact—between the Sandinistas and the supporters of former President Alemán, who, of course, has been charged with money laundering and embezzlement. The situation is far from stable at present.

The power of the Executive has also been increasingly curtailed by the legislative branch in a way that is not entirely helpful in the sense that there now appears to be an unfortunate degree of political involvement in, for example, the nomination of Supreme Court judges and the members of the electoral tribunal. However, we might not be in a position to exert as much influence as we would like, given the paucity of our resources in the sense that, from our point of view, Nicaragua is now essentially administered from Costa Rica.

I should say that the Department for International Development is clearly doing some good work in Nicaragua. We went to see a couple of the projects that it has been supporting, including the association for people living with AIDS. DFID is doing some good, cutting-edge stuff there, but I am concerned that, to some degree, it is operating as a kind of surrogate embassy and almost undertaking Foreign Office functions because of the lack of an embassy in the country. Again, sadly the position that we saw was, to some degree, one of retrenchment and withdrawal from the country on the part of the UK, rather than of taking the opportunities that exist to boost the UK's position.

It is also important from the EU perspective that the EU's voice is heard. The American voice is certainly heard in Nicaragua, and the louder the US voice, the less its influence. America may wish to reflect on how it undertakes its foreign policy. I am sure that the Minister will not comment on that observation.

DFID's programmes undoubtedly seek to improve the economic opportunities for poor people and strengthen the effect of planning and policy making. The programmes go some way towards doing that. I welcome the fact that the UK cancelled its multilateral debt with Nicaragua in 2004. It is a welcome and sensible move, which has gone down well in that country.

We have good trade opportunities. Companies such as GlaxoSmithKline, Shell, Securicor and Land Rover are well established in the country, but they do not get the support that they ought to from the Government as an entity. The issue is more for the Department of Trade and Industry than the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, but it is relevant to the debate.

We have historical ties to the Atlantic coast of Nicaragua as a consequence of British landings in the 17th and 18th centuries. There is a large English-speaking population who still feel close ties to this country. We met some of them, and they had attractive and warm personalities. We all wanted to return from that country in order to help. I know that the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton has organised a meeting with the Minister at DFID, and we are grateful for that and we shall attend on a cross-party basis.

What is happening on the Atlantic coast is sad. There is little investment stretching from Managua to the Atlantic coast. There is no road to the town of Bluefields, which has a population of 60,000. The road stops some way west of the town. When we raised that with the people from the Atlantic coast, their view was that the horse always set off from Managua and always died half way across the field, never quite reaching Bluefields nor the eastern seaboard. It is a pity for Nicaragua that it cannot or has not developed the Atlantic coast. Its geographical position is useful in terms of trade, with openings to the Pacific and the Atlantic. It seems that the Atlantic coast is entirely ignored.

I raised the question of funding via a written question to DFID. It is clear that DFID takes an interest in how the funds are allocated, although it seems to be adopting a funding policy in common with other countries' general programmes. Although that may make some sense, it has lessened the ability to determine how the money is spent. There is an issue about how well our money is being spent.

It is true that there are budget headings in the Nicaraguan Government account to show that money is being spent on the Atlantic coast. However, the Atlantic coast people to whom we spoke said that it is simply not spent. The money stays in the budget or is redirected. We cannot unfortunately rely on the budget heads and the published accounts from the Government to see what is happening. We must do something else to ensure that money is spent in those areas.

DFID's spending ought to be dependent on a proven assurance that money is spent on those areas of the country that need it most. The Atlantic coast is one of those. It is to the benefit of Nicaragua to have the money spent in that area.

My other point is about the San Juan river dispute, which was of concern to both countries when we were in Nicaragua. It is an unfortunate dispute about who can do what on the river. Everyone accepts that the river belongs to Nicaragua, which possesses sovereignty over it, and everyone accepts also that Costa Rica has rights of passage on the river. That curious debate has reached epic proportions about whether Costa Rican police carrying arms can operate on the river. Costa Rica does not even have an army; it spends its money on the health service, education and other matters. I do not say that we should adopt that policy ourselves, but money spent on health and education is probably more warmly welcomed by the population than that spent on some of our overseas jaunts. However, I digress.

I am concerned that the stability of both countries should not end up compromised by what appears to be a very small dispute, and that valuable resources that ought to be spent on improving the lot of the population at large should not be spent on military matters. If the Government could help in any way—perhaps they can, having been involved historically in the region—that would be very welcome.

4.15 pm

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): I am most grateful to the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) for securing this debate. His contribution is eloquent testimony to the importance of Inter-Parliamentary Union groups visiting and seeing for themselves the kind of initiatives that he was able to describe in such detail following his recent trip to Nicaragua and Costa Rica. I also place on record my personal gratitude for his generous words about Ambassador Georgina Butler, whom he described as "unstuffy". I shall ensure that his kind and generous remarks are relayed directly.

The hon. Gentleman made comments about Daniel Ortega's style of conducting meetings; propriety and diplomatic convention oblige me to resist commenting on that. Suffice it to say that my own limited experience of diplomacy—first as Minister for Trade and then as Minister for Europe—convinces me that Mr. Ortega is not alone in approaching meetings in that style. I have faced similar challenges on how to ensure that the British Government's point of view is communicated in various meetings during the past couple of years.

[Mr. Douglas Alexander]

The hon. Gentleman asked a number of questions about Foreign and Commonwealth Office policy towards Costa Rica and Nicaragua, and I shall direct myself to some of those concerns. The background was set out in the December 2003 White Paper "UK International Priorities: a Strategy for the FCO". That set out the Government's international priorities for the next 10 years and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's strategy for delivering them.

It was clear that we needed to evaluate our network of overseas representation to respond to inevitably changing priorities. We have, in the past seven years or so, opened 28 new posts, including major new missions in Baghdad, Basra, Kabul and Pyongyang. Twenty-six posts have been closed over the same period, and Managua in Nicaragua is one of those. None of those decisions has been taken lightly, but it is essential that we align our resources to our overall priorities and have the ability to respond to change.

I assure the House and the hon. Gentleman that we are not—categorically not—abandoning countries. As he knows, and recognised before our deliberations today, our ambassador to Costa Rica is now also accredited to Nicaragua and is responsible for taking forward the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's strategic priorities for both those countries. The Department for International Development's central America office is in Managua, as was acknowledged in the hon. Gentleman's contribution. The head of the Department for International Development office, whom I know the hon. Gentleman met on his visit, is also accredited to the British embassy in Costa Rica. We also have an excellent honorary consul in Managua.

A key priority for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in both Costa Rica and Nicaragua is to promote the rule of law and sustainable development, underpinned by democracy, good governance and human rights. We continue to seek opportunities to develop our cultural relations with the region, including through the Chevening programme. The hon. Gentleman said that he had heard rumours that the Chevening programme would be withdrawn from Nicaragua and Costa Rica; I assure him that that is not the case. Two of the presidential and one of the vice-presidential candidates in the forthcoming election in Costa Rica are former Chevening scholars. By any measure, that shows the importance of the Chevening scholars programme and its effectiveness in identifying those who will be figures of influence in Costa Rica and the region in the future.

The Department for International Development's work in Latin America is based on a regional approach to help the multilateral agencies. The hon. Gentleman raised that point in talking about the effectiveness and efficacy of using our money as part of a multilateral effort, rather than the Department for International Development determining priorities in isolation. That is notably the case in relation to the World Bank and the Inter-American Development Bank. The general policy context in which such individual decisions are made has received detailed Government consideration and is based on a judgment that, in many circumstances, pooling money across multilateral agencies is a more effective means of securing value for money and effectiveness of output than when each international development agency from a range of different countries chooses to set up its own mechanisms and deploy its resources unilaterally. In addition, the Department for International Development provides bilateral assistance to Latin America through United Kingdom non-governmental organisations. DFID maintains a bilateral programme of support for Nicaragua, the only remaining low-income country in the region other than Haiti, and has increased its annual budget for Nicaragua from £3.7 million to £4 million for 2006–07.

This is the first year that DFID will provide budget support to Nicaragua. Given our concerns about the party polarisation of central state powers and the fact that donor support to the Government's fight against corruption is hampered by political control of state powers, including the judiciary, the audit authority and the electoral circumstances, DFID Ministers decided, this year, to provide budget support direct to local municipal governments. DFID is also providing £1.5 million of additional technical assistance over three years to help strengthen the transparent auditing of municipal institutions. I hope that that commitment to transparency in audit goes some way to addressing the concerns about the public accounts.

DFID, the FCO and the Ministry of Defence have worked closely on emergency preparedness action in the region. As a result, HMS Cumberland stood ready to provide humanitarian relief in the wake of hurricane Beta, which hit the Atlantic coast of Nicaragua on 30 October. President Bolanos of Nicaragua and the United Nations were grateful to the Government for this offer. I understand that HMS Cumberland went on to seize two tonnes of cocaine in international waters about 100 miles off Nicaragua, for which we should all feel rightly proud.

The hon. Gentleman also raised specific concerns about the Atlantic coast region of Nicaragua. Since taking over responsibility for Nicaragua, the ambassador in San Jose has paid four visits to the Atlantic coast region and has made a point of raising a number of the concerns with the Nicaraguan authorities in Managua, reinforcing the message of the Under-Secretary of State for International Development, my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas), who visited that region in March 2004. DFID's work to improve the auditing mechanisms of Nicaragua's central and local government expenditure should enable it to identify better in future the extent to which the national budget has benefited the Atlantic coast. DFID is also funding a countrywide programme to help local government and NGOs to provide basic care for people living with HIV/AIDS, again including those on the Atlantic coast. I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's generous acknowledgment of the work that DFID is doing in that regard.

DFID has also been supporting the United Nations Development Programme's 2005 national census in the coastal region. The census now covers a wider area and takes better account of local ethnic sensitivities. It has also helped the Government to identify more clearly the areas of poverty on that coast, it has increased their awareness of communities not previously registered and it has highlighted weaknesses in the electoral register in the coastal region.

Two weeks ago, with the assistance of La Prensa, the biggest Nicaraguan daily newspaper, the embassy launched a book of short stories about life on the Atlantic coast, written by children from Bluefields and Pearl Lagoon. It is hoped that this initiative will help raise awareness of the region and boost pride and self-esteem in the community.

The hon. Gentleman also touched on and expressed concern about the level of our commercial resources in Nicaragua and Costa Rica. UK Trade and Investment offers support both to companies in the UK trading internationally and to overseas companies seeking to locate in the UK. As some hon. Members will be aware, UKTI's 2004 spending review settlement included a £20 million cost reduction in its global overseas network. Following that decision, a fundamental review of the network was carried out to identify and prioritise business needs. Although it can no longer offer the full range of market services in Costa Rica and Nicaragua, UKTI is focusing its commercial resources on responding to the needs of UK businesses. The level of commercial staffing at the British embassy in Costa Rica reflects this demand, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that we will continue to monitor it carefully.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the internal political situation in Costa Rica and Nicaragua.

Norman Baker: I, for one, very much regret the cuts that have been made, because I believe they are self-defeating. Does the Minister agree that it would be sensible to have a cost-benefit analysis carried out to discover whether any increase in posts in these countries, and perhaps more widely, might pay for itself in terms of benefit to the British economy?

Mr. Alexander: I assure the hon. Gentleman that, as part of the spending review process, careful consideration was given to the relative return, on the basis of the commitment of resource to UKTI, and to a need for UKTI to be a customer-led organisation.

An important dialogue is not simply a dialogue with the country post where historically, on the basis of legacy, there has been representation, but a candid and clear conversation with organisations such as the CBI as to where they wish resources to be deployed. Frankly, given the changing nature of the international business environment, a measure of the effectiveness of the UKTI, albeit inevitably involving difficult decisions, is that periodically there are reviews of the relative resource allocations. I assure the hon. Gentleman that, within UKTI and in UKTI's discussions with the Treasury, careful consideration is given to the impact that UKTI staff in post can have both in securing inward investment into the United Kingdom and in promoting British exports within those markets. We will keep that matter under review, not just in terms of our own judgments in these situations, but also by careful and sustained dialogue with organisations such as the CBI.

In the time available, let me return to the internal political situation in Costa Rica and Nicaragua. President Pacheco is committed to the fight against corruption and is working to reduce poverty in Costa Rica. We support Costa Rica's commitment to arms control and non-proliferation. We will work with the Costa Rican Government and other supportive countries in the region to establish an arms trade treaty.

We encourage the Costa Rican Government to continue its proactive environmental policies, protection of biodiversity and the innovative ways of combating and even reversing deforestation within its borders. The provision of over 90 per cent. of Costa Rica's energy needs from renewable, often hydroelectric, sources, as the hon. Gentleman identified, is also admirable. I hope that there will be opportunities for other countries to learn from the experience garnered from the initiatives being taken within Costa Rica.

We hope to continue to enjoy the good relationship that the hon. Gentleman was kind enough to acknowledge with whatever Government the people of Costa Rica choose next year.

In Nicaragua, political stability is a prerequisite for the economic development and greater social cohesion needed to combat the poverty and inequality that have afflicted that country for too long. We welcome the recent developments that have helped reduce tension between the executive and legislative branches of government in Nicaragua, and also the progress on financial and other reforms, which are essential to unlock the IMF programme and release funds from international donors.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's resources are inevitably stretched in many areas. He generously recognised that reality at the outset of his remarks. We cannot, therefore, answer every demand placed upon us. The Government need to be ready to shift resources where they best meet our international priorities. I hope that, on the basis of my remarks, the hon. Gentleman is convinced that the important process of prioritisation categorically does not mean the abandonment of central America or any individual country therein. Careful prioritisation and hard decisions are required. On that basis we continue to make policy.

Regeneration (North Staffordshire)

4.28 pm

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): I welcome my hon. Friend the Minister—he is a friend—for taking the time to come, listen and respond to the short debate about regeneration in north Staffordshire.

Despite the title, I do not want to be parochial. I hope that the issues raised have relevance elsewhere. The reason for requesting the debate now is that the next phase of the revision process of the regional spatial strategy by the West Midlands regional assembly was launched on Monday.

One would be forgiven for nodding off at this point, because most people have no idea that regional assemblies exist, let alone do anything. The tiny few in my area who have even heard of the assembly think of it as yet another committee, inconveniently situated in Birmingham and remote in more senses than one. That overlooks one point of great significance, namely the assembly's role in producing the regional development plan and in holding the regional development agency, Advantage West Midlands, to account for our region's economic development strategy. These documents are crucial. If we do not influence them, in planning terms they can simply override every policy that we strive to produce locally, as the Minister well knows.

The regional development agencies were set up in 1999. I became an MP not long afterwards, in 2001. In my area, it is fair to say that regeneration has proceeded in fits and starts, and—more often than not—false starts. The history of regeneration in north Staffordshire can be told through the sheaves of consultants' reports that are stacked in our offices. We have certainly been good at regenerating the consultancy industry although, sadly, none of that is indigenous to north Staffordshire. As my borough's latest draft development plan points out politely, north Staffordshire has seen many strategies come and go over the past several years.

The difference now, is that, because of the Government's commitment, we finally have serious money to spend in north Staffordshire. Our regeneration zone is up and running, and the housing market renewal pathfinder is already starting to make a real difference to the future of our area. Two very good people have been recruited to drive the process forward locally—Aktar Choudhury, the director of the regeneration zone, and Hardial Boghul, the head of Renew, the housing market pathfinder. Our job as Members of Parliament is not only to support them and to make sure that the money is spent, but to make sure that public money is well spent for the future of north Staffordshire.

My area has been hit hard by the triple whammy of massive job losses in the coal, steel and pottery industries. It has cried out for investment to create jobs. Above all, however, to break out of the vicious circle of low aspirations, poor educational achievement, low skills and low pay, we require people with a vision, imagination and a commitment to bring in a mix of jobs and skills to our area. Sadly, during the summer, after what seemed ages of privately urging officials to consider the quality of jobs as well as quantity, I had to criticise publicly the direction that much of the economic regeneration has taken to date. If the Minister were to drive through Stoke-on-Trent and my constituency, Newcastle-under-Lyme, one thing might strike him most of all: the proliferation of huge warehouses and massive distribution sheds in garish green and grey. They have certainly brought many jobs to the area, but many of them are low-skilled, low-paid, picking and packing, humping and heaving so-called logistics jobs.

Of course, we have had great successes, one of which is the development of Keele university science park in Newcastle-under-Lyme. I hope that, together with English Partnerships, the development at Silverdale colliery, the last mine to close in our area, will be another. So it is certainly not all doom and gloom, and I want to set the right tone. My criticism is that north Staffordshire is becoming dominated by sheds and warehouses. The failure of imagination simply replicates the same old formula of targeting distribution companies. Public money is used to prepare the sites and therefore subsidises what many people consider to be a blight.

In a nutshell, my criticism is of the approach to regeneration by regional and county agencies. All too often, that seems to be a box-ticking exercise, which involves the number of jobs that are created, the number of hectares of brownfield land that are regenerated, the number of unsophisticated targets that are met and the number of crude outputs that are fulfilled, never mind the quality. I stress that it is not my intention to criticise individuals. Everyone in regeneration in my area works extremely hard. However, if we are not careful, the system can lead to lowest common denominator outcomes.

I might be accused fairly of being the loudest, but I am certainly not the only person in north Staffordshire to voice such concerns. During the summer, the planning committee in Newcastle-under-Lyme also decided to say, "Enough is enough". It turned down the latest warehouse to be foisted on the borough, which was another 280,000 sq ft monstrosity. For the committee, it was a shed too far. Elsewhere at Trentham lakes in Stoke-on-Trent, the site of another former colliery, InStaffs (UK) Ltd., the county's inward investment agency, and the North Staffordshire chamber of commerce joined MPs and councillors to voice concerns over yet another 400,000 sq ft warehouse. All that is happening on precious, developable land—a scarce resource and one that will rapidly run out.

This year, the regeneration zone commissioned a new integrated economic development strategy for the north Staffordshire conurbation. It explicitly recognised such concerns and stated:

> "There is a need to move beyond the low density, low value nature of current logistics operations if the economy in North Staffordshire is to develop."

That work was funded, through the regeneration zone, by the regional development agency and Renew. It has been adopted by Newcastle-under-Lyme, Stoke-on-Trent and the other local partners. Yet, it is not being followed through in practice, as plans proceed for shed after shed after shed at Trentham lakes in Stoke and at Chatterley valley to the north of my constituency, in particular. It seems that we are being used—in the words of a highly respected figure at the North Staffordshire chamber of commerce—as a "dumping ground" for distribution in the west midlands.

With regard to the shed that we refused in Newcastle, Staffordshire county council is the public sector partner. At Chatterley valley, it is the county again and Advantage West Midlands. At Trentham lakes, it is AWM and English Partnerships who are pursuing separate coalfields projects outwith the regeneration zone programme. There we have it: the regeneration zone sets the strategy, the regional development agency funds it, then all the outside agencies simply ignore it. I hope that the Minister agrees that that is hardly joined-up thinking; it certainly is not joined-up regeneration. I shall certainly raise these issues at a meeting with English Partnerships. I have already done so with AWM.

This is where the regional spatial strategy comes in. In the last plan, which was adopted in June last year, north Staffordshire is cited as a possible site for a regional logistics site. People scratch their heads and think, "Yet more of these sheds." I stress, however, the word used was "possible". Now, with the revision, we have the chance to stand our ground. That process, which was launched on Monday, seeks among other things to > "re-examine regional and sub-regional employment land needs and requirements".

We have until 31 December to give our views. I understand that local authorities in north Staffordshire have already told consultants who are preparing a logistics survey that we do not wish to be singled out for a regional logistics site, thank you very much.

The response from our RDA has hardly been sympathetic. In a recent letter to me, it said:

> "Advantage West Midlands . . . does believe it is necessary to adhere to the aspirations of the sub-region, but also to align that with the regional strategy".

It goes on to say:

> "The Regional Spatial Strategy for the West Midlands is still being progressed but current work suggests that North Staffs will be identified as a Regional Logistics location".

All that is before the consultation has even started. One can hear the hackles being raised. As so often with our RDA, we simply do not know, locally, whether we are dealing with friend or foe.

Will the Minister join me in calling for joined-up thinking? Is it not time that the regional strategy was updated to align with the local strategies that the RDA paid a small fortune to produce? Will the Minister ensure, through the Government office for the west midlands, that meaningful consultation will take place on the revision of the spatial strategy, and that voices throughout the region will be listened to, not just a few decision makers based in Birmingham?

Before I conclude, I shall raise another often-neglected issue that is key to regeneration, be it economic or social: the importance of good design. I have the privilege of being the patron of Urban Vision North Staffordshire, the architecture and urban design centre that grew, three years ago, out of a small group of committed people's determination that our area and the core of Stoke-on-Trent should enjoy a renaissance like that in cities such as Birmingham, Manchester and Liverpool. The project was generously supported from the start by the Commission for Architecture and the Built Environment and, crucially, has also been funded by our regeneration zone.

Urban Vision is charged with promoting good urban design in our area and has established a design review panel that advises on major planning applications, which is chaired by an architect of national renown. It is adding to regeneration capacity by acting as a source of expertise, which is often sadly lacking these days in local authorities. We are often criticised by our RDA for our lack of capacity on the ground.

The story, or even struggle, of Urban Vision, is an example in microcosm of how difficult organisations find it to deal with the regeneration process. On 23 December 2003, Advantage West Midlands offered Urban Vision funding through the regeneration zone for three years, for which we were, of course, very grateful. Sadly, it was 11 months later, on 11 November 2004, that AWM finally delivered the signed contract, which allowed money to be drawn down to pay Urban Vision's staff. That slowness off the blocks meant that all of the money for 2003–04—

4.39 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.57 pm

On resuming—

Three Members not being present, THE CHAIRMAN adjourned the sitting, without Question put.

Adjourned accordingly at three minutes to Five o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 10 November 2005

[SIR JOHN BUTTERFILL in the Chair]

Maximising Women's Skills (UK Economy)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

2.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Meg Munn): I am delighted to discuss the very important issue of maximising women's skills in the economy.

The Government have put productivity at the centre of the economic agenda, and the No. 1 public service agreement target of the Department of Trade and Industry is to narrow the productivity gap between us and our key competitors.

Using the preferred measure of gross domestic product per hours worked, the productivity gap between us and each of our peers remains substantial. The gap between us and Germany is 12 per cent. It is also 14 per cent. between us and the United States, and 29 per cent. between us and France. Improving productivity will allow us to produce greater output, which will allow us to support higher wages and profits, and to have better public services and a higher standard of living.

Today is a good day on which to hold the debate, as the up-to-date pay gap statistics have just been released and show that the pay gap is now 13.2 per cent.—its lowest level for 30 years—as measured by the median, and 17.2 per cent. as measured by the mean. Hon. Members have discussed the question of measuring the pay gap by the median, but we are following the advice of the Office for National Statistics in excluding the highest earning people, as including them distorts the overall picture relating to most people. That is why we use the median.

The pay gap also shows, however, that we need to go further and faster to reach the stage at which gender does not determine how much someone receives an hour. Closing those gaps would raise levels of prosperity in the United Kingdom, and reducing skills shortages would be a key driver of that. Significant occupational segregation is one of the main reasons for the current pay gap. Women are over-represented in certain types of low-paid jobs, and under-represented in other sectors, such as science and information technology. If there was no segregation between men and women in certain occupations, GDP could increase by between £2 billion and £9 billion a year, assuming that workers from higher-skilled occupations were not displaced.

Greater equality of treatment could attract more women into the labour force, and could encourage some part-time workers to work full-time.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): The Minister's second point was interesting; will she repeat it? The difference between the previous statistic and the current statistic is striking.

Meg Munn: Is the hon. Lady asking about GDP or the pay gap?

Mrs. Laing: GDP.

Meg Munn: I am very happy to repeat what I said, because I want to highlight these issues today. If there was no segregation of men and women in certain occupations, GDP could increase by between £2 billion and £9 billion, assuming that there was no displacement of workers. Obviously much of this information is worked out according to hypothesis, but it is very important for us to recognise the cost of not paying women better.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I recruited graduates into the ICT sector for 20 years before I entered this place in 1997. Early on, there was little difference between the proportion of graduates wanting to work in IT who were female and the proportion who were male. Over the years, that picture has become skewed in favour of men, and the proportion of men has remained high since then. Will the Minister say what steps the Government should be taking to encourage more young females not to abandon areas of education that are likely to lead them into the hugely important area of ICT later in their lives?

Meg Munn: I thank my hon. Friend for making that point. That is certainly an important issue, and I shall discuss it in a little more detail when I talk about information technology. Although I may not cover all my hon. Friend's points in my opening speech, I can tell him that the Government have considered the subject. I recently visited the Intellect board, which involves leading people in the IT world. What is not in my speech is in the many documents on the Table, and I can return to relevant matters in my closing remarks if I do not satisfy my hon. Friend's curiosity before then.

In relation to segregation, greater equality of treatment could attract more women to the labour force, and encourage some part-time workers to work full-time. That is based on research showing that 25 per cent. of women who work part-time would be prepared to work full-time if better pay and more flexible working conditions were on offer. There would be additional GDP benefits of between £14 billion and £20 billion and those figures added together could amount to 3 per cent. of GDP. That is a significant figure and it is important to understand the work situation that means that we miss out on such a benefit to the economy.

Girls do well in education today and more young women than young men are likely to gain degrees. However, that level of attainment is not carried through into work. Instead, many women continue to work in lower-skilled, lower-paid jobs, and the economy continues to operate below its productivity potential. Encouraging women into higher-skilled, higher-paid jobs would help us to reduce the current skill shortages and ensure that women had the opportunity to reach their potential.

[Meg Munn]

Research by the university of Manchester found that women returning to work from caring or maternity leave experience, on average, a 16 per cent. drop in wages, owing to being over-qualified for the part-time job that they then take. We commissioned research with the London School of Economics that showed that in the context of qualifications higher skills raise productivity and lead to higher wages for individuals. Also, organisations with a greater proportion of female and part-time workers had lower productivity and wages, partly because part-time workers were being paid less than their contribution merited.

Further recent research by the Equal Opportunities Commission and Sheffield Hallam university found that more than 50 per cent. of women in part-time work are working below their skill level. That is a shocking statistic. Many of their managers are unaware that that is so. A further 30 per cent. of women in part-time work felt that, given training, they could increase their skill levels.

Skill shortages are higher in sectors with gender dominance. There is currently an annual estimated shortfall of 29,000 plumbers, with an extra 10,000 needed for engineering apprenticeships. Flexibility at all levels of the career ladder is important if women are to retain skills, particularly since those at the higher end of the scale are the greatest contributors to the productivity gains for companies and the economy. The Work and Families Bill, which the Government published on 19 October 2005, will extend the scope of flexible working law to carers of adults.

The women and work commission will issue its report on the gender pay gap in January and, from my regular discussions with Baroness Prosser, the chair of the commission, I know that it is considering practical ways to make a difference to women's working lives. The commission's key task is to consider closing the pay gap within a generation, but I hope that we shall see significant progress sooner.

Information technology is at the heart of the UK economy and is a key source of business competitiveness. It currently accounts for almost 5 per cent. of the UK economy and is set to increase. Employment in the IT industry, too, is set to grow at five to eight times the UK average in the next decade. What my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) was saying earlier is, indeed, correct.

David Taylor: Of course, it goes wider than employment in the narrowly defined IT industry of software development and allied areas. So many of our economy's highly paid, highly skilled and higher-status jobs depend heavily on IT skills, experience and qualifications, even though they may not be IT jobs in the narrowly defined sense.

Does the Minister recognise that the main area for advancement lies there? I hope that she will respond with something positive, even though I am the only male MP of the eight MPs present. I am perhaps an honorary member of the group because I have a large family of daughters.

Meg Munn: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention and for the extremely important points that he makes. I was about to say that the IT sector is at a disadvantage when only 20 per cent. of its work force are women, compared with just under half of the UK's national work force.

My hon. Friend is right to say that it is not only in the IT industry that we need IT skills. There are very few occupations now where some IT skills are not an important part of the job. It is predicted that women will make up the majority of the working population by 2018, so to get more women into the IT sector is "a must" for the work force, business profitability and growth, and the economy.

BlackBerry and the women's networking group Aurora hosted the women and technology awards in October. I was pleased to be invited to present one of the prizes and to speak about the event's importance. Award ceremonies such as those—organised by industry—recognise and celebrate women's achievements. They raise awareness that women have talents to offer. The overall winner at the women and technology awards was Jackie Edwards from De Montfort university. She has helped women who have been out of the workplace for several years to learn IT by talking to them and showing them how things work. She has done a great deal to build their confidence not only to re-enter the workplace but to re-enter the information technology sector using the skills that they have learned. I was delighted that BlackBerry recognised her contribution to making a real difference at grass-roots level.

I shall move on now to talk about women with science, engineering and technology qualifications. We need more women with those skills. It is a concern that 70 per cent. who have science, engineering and technology qualifications are not working in sectors that use those skills.

Last year the Government set up the UK resource centre for women in science, engineering and technology. I visited it in early September—it is just up the road from me, in Bradford—to see the work that is done there. I met women there whom the centre had supported. They had learned how to use their knowledge of and skills in science and technology in their work. Through talking to women who were looking to return from a career break, it was clear that the work that they were doing at the centre was enabling them to return to the areas in which they were qualified. It had previously been difficult for those women to do that.

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): My hon. Friend will know that I have also visited the women's resource centre in Bradford. I take this opportunity to congratulate the Government on establishing the resource centre, which had been desperately needed for years.

The centre has within its grasp a collection of outstanding women who have been working in the field of science, engineering and technology for decades but who have done so poles apart. That facility brings those women together. Can the Minister reassure me that the Government will continue to support the centre to deliver its objectives, which are commendable and desperately needed?

Meg Munn: The Government have invested in that area because we must act to prevent a loss of skills to our economy in an area that is important to future growth. The UK resource centre is developing, not just in science, engineering and technology, but more widely in its links to universities and the construction industry. The centre performs a vital role in attempting to reverse the current situation.

At the centre, I met employers from the region, some of whom were from the construction industry. We know that too few women go into construction and, too often, those who do face prejudice and discrimination. As I am from Yorkshire, I can say that one employer, in true, blunt Yorkshire style, told me that, in his experience, women in construction jobs were often more capable than men, but were often assumed to be less so. He had had conversations with others in the construction industry who had shared that experience. As a result of that experience, they were beginning to change employers' minds.

Fortunately, we also have significant allies in the business world who take occupational segregation seriously. In July, cosmetics firm L'Oréal and the UK resource centre announced a programme to address some of the issues faced by female scientists when returning to work after a career break.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: It would be pertinent at this moment to make my hon. Friend aware of a conversation that I had with the chief executive of one of the leading house builders in this country. He told me that he did not think that the construction industry was a place for women because he would never advocate that his wife worked in it. I consider that an incredible statement in today's society, but that was his position. That is why it was essential for the Government to introduce requirements for construction companies to recruit people from the workplace. I hope that we shall see stringent enforcement on that matter. While that chief executive might not wish to employ his wife in his own business, there are women around the country who would relish the opportunity of working in construction, and who need the assistance of the Government to do so.

Meg Munn: I thank my hon. Friend for her contribution on the experience of talking to people in the construction industry. As I said, my conversations were beneficial in highlighting that the experience of employing women was changing minds. We cannot do too much to share positive experiences and good practice. That is why the work of L'Oréal and the UK resource centre is important. Their programme provides three cash bursaries of £10,000 each, which are jointly funded by the partners, and granted to women scientists each year. They are putting money and investment into this area, as, indeed, are the Government. For those who are not familiar with the UK resource centre, I invite them to visit its website to see the range of its activities.

I am sure that hon. Members were delighted that London secured the 2012 Olympics. Hon. Members will wish to see the games act as a springboard for women in science, engineering and technology. It is an excellent time for women to get involved not only as athletes, but in senior roles and in all aspects of making the games happen, not least in the construction industry, which will play a vital part in developing the facilities. It is striking that, while female entrepreneurship in the US stands at 89 per cent. of the level of male entrepreneurship, in this country that figure is only 46 per cent. If we had the same rate of female-owned start-ups as that of the US, we would have 750,000 more businesses. The case for doing all that we can to boost women's enterprise in the UK is, therefore, clear. It is not a matter only of equality of opportunity, but an economic imperative if we are to capitalise on the potential that women have to offer. The Small Business Service and Ministers are consistently working to raise the profile of women's enterprise, following a dedicated women's enterprise public relations campaign. That arises from the recommendations of the strategic framework for women's enterprise and the women's enterprise content of the innovation report.

In June, we successfully held the women's enterprise online summit, to which more than 5,000 people logged on. The internet does not tell us whether they were men or women, but all are welcome. The summit was designed to motivate more women to start their own businesses and to tap into an exciting community of networking, support, useful resources and targeted services. It was a worthwhile opportunity for women to obtain answers to such questions as, "How can I speak to like-minded women?" "Who can I speak to about my business idea?" "Who can help me to start and grow my business?" and "What resources are available to support me on that journey?" As many hon. Members will appreciate, being able to get such advice and information from someone who is already running their own business is invaluable, particularly when it is another woman who is acting as a positive role model.

The campaign is additional to the range of activities in the women's enterprise programme throughout 2005. I am sure that hon. Members are aware that next week is enterprise week. We have a dedicated day for women in enterprise, which is next Wednesday.

The next few months will see the roll-out of phase two of the case for women's enterprise. That initiative will be principally aimed at mainstream business support providers. They may have limited experience of providing targeted services for women and may not previously have considered segmenting their client needs using a gender perspective. The Government have a strong commitment to increasing the number of women starting and growing businesses and to ensuring that Government-funded business support services are accessible and appropriate to their needs. The Government are committed to maximising the skills of women in the economy and we shall continue to work to improve the chances of women in the labour market.

I could say a great deal more about the position of women in the economy and what the Government are doing, but I know that many hon. Members want to speak. I hope that I can provide the information that they want when I sum up the debate later.

2.52 pm

Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): Many of our key industries face skill shortages, yet too many women do not see themselves as part of the solution, in part because for centuries women have been actively discouraged from moving into certain fields of work.

[Alison Seabeck]

Shortages exist in construction and engineering and, as my hon. Friend the Minister emphasised, in science and information technology. Those industries are vital not only to our country's future success but, more specifically, to Plymouth's success. We need apprentices to work in the dockyard on everything from joinery to electronics. We need skilled workers to support our planned growth in housing and in the commercial sector, as part of the Plymouth vision, and to support our thriving scientific and medical research fields, which are burgeoning in the local economy but in which there are shortages.

We must tackle the relatively low skills base across both genders in Plymouth. There are issues not only about skill shortages but about the level of skill. Some excellent organisations are working in my constituency to address that deficit and to upskill our population. I recently attended an event run by Plymouth college of further education designed to encourage women into construction. My local chamber of commerce is working hard in that respect, too.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I know the Plymouth dockyard incredibly well because I did some of my apprenticeship there, and it is a marvellous place, full of huge opportunities for women. However, I have always been concerned about the Ministry of Defence—defence in more ways than one. Does my hon. Friend know whether the MOD is doing anything to attract women into the dockyard and into defence-related roles that involve the science, engineering and technology sectors?

Alison Seabeck: I welcome my hon. Friend's intervention on that point. The Ministry of Defence could be doing more, but there are genuine signs that it is looking at improving the gender balance, particularly in relation to entrants at the lower levels and apprentices. I recently attended an awards ceremony at DML—the management company that runs the dockyard—at which most of the apprentices were young men, but which included two young women who had done extraordinarily well. That is encouraging, because in previous years there had been no young women at all. It is slow progress, but it is some progress. The MOD could do better, and I am sure that my hon. Friend and I will stay on its case.

To return to the event at the Plymouth further education college, those who had been invited to attend were mainly young women who were about to leave school. Interestingly, in the group that I first spoke to, there were two or three who had interests in construction. One was very keen to become a bricklayer and could not wait to get her hands in the cement. Having done that as a young woman myself—my grandfather was a builder, so I laid a few bricks in my summer holidays—I can understand why she should want to do that. There was also an interesting young woman who wanted to be a motor engineer, but who thought she would come along to see what construction had to offer, and there were a few who were interested in decorating—painting and plastering.

However, after I had talked to those young women for a while I asked, "Do you actually see yourself developing this as a career?" and most of them said, "Oh no, my Mum or Dad do not think it is a very good idea." That is part of the problem that we face. One goes to events at schools and listens to parents, and they all say, "We are in favour of our daughter breaking down some of the gender barriers", but if one asks them, "Do you see your daughter going into construction?" they respond rather like the chief executive that my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) mentioned earlier, who did not see his wife working in construction.

There are interesting barriers to break down. We need to keep raising the positive aspects. There are real positives about women going into construction. A lot of single mothers in Plymouth run their own homes, and do the electrics, the plumbing and the decorating. They have a lot of the basic skills, but they do not see themselves as earning a living in that field. Yet there is a lot of flexibility to be found in such jobs as plumbing or being an electrician—they could combine a successful career with managing their child care.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I am delighted to hear my hon. Friend referring to the activities of young mothers in her area. However, does she not agree with me that we are missing a trick at present with the apprenticeship programme because it is age limited? Many young women leave school and then have young children early in life, so they may be in their 30s before they turn to themselves and their own development. We ought to give those women the right to join such apprenticeship schemes if they wish. That is good for us and good for them.

Alison Seabeck: I am again grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention, partly because she has just told me something of which I was not aware. I had not realised that the scheme had an age limit as low as 26. That would be an issue for some of the mums in my area. I know that a lot of them are accessing other courses, but an option to do an apprenticeship would make a significant difference. Perhaps that is something that I can look into at a later date.

I have talked about some of the positive aspects as well as some of the barriers. I welcomed the comments made by my hon. Friend the Minister, in which she set out some of the measures that have already been taken by the Government—as well as those that are in the pipeline—to address some of the difficulties faced by women in accessing and seeking to access certain industries in the UK.

In closing, I should like to ask the Minister to comment, in her closing remarks, on issues related to gender segregation in the modern apprenticeship scheme. The EOC research suggests that

> "the gender breakdown for MA participation in key sectors where one sex greatly outnumbers the other shows that segregation is currently equal to or greater than segregation in the workforce."

For example, in engineering, 6 per cent. of those taking foundation modern apprenticeships were women, while 8 per cent. of those working in engineering jobs were women. I would welcome the Minister's comments on that.

I should like to know what the Government are doing to encourage wider participation by women in modern apprenticeships. As I implied at the start, those skills are vital to the development not only of the south-west, but of Plymouth.

3 pm

Sarah McCarthy-Fry (Portsmouth, North) (Lab): I am a member of the all-party group on women in science, engineering and design, so I have an interest in maximising women's skills in those fields and, in particular, in manufacturing.

I worked in the manufacturing industry for 20 years, and employers, economists and the Government all acknowledge the importance to the British economy of manufacturing, which accounts for a fifth of the UK's total output and 60 per cent. of its exports. The Department of Trade and Industry-commissioned Porter report "UK Competitiveness: moving to the next stage" argues that the UK needs to make the transition from competing on the relatively low cost of doing business to competing on unique value and innovation. We are not going to compete with China, India and the Pacific Rim countries on cost, and Porter makes it clear that we can go no further along the road of deregulation and cost-cutting. Management strategies will therefore have to change and focus on innovation, high skills and high value.

I recently visited a Ministry of Defence research establishment in my constituency and I was told that there is no shortage of science graduates who want to work there. However, they are not from the UK, but from places such as China and India, and they stay a couple of years before taking the skills that they have acquired home with them.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: Does my hon. Friend agree that although it is perfectly commendable for us to invite people from abroad to help us with our skill deficiencies, it is a far better longer-term plan to recruit more people from this country, particularly women? In that regard, is she pleased about what the Government have done through their apprenticeship programme to address the shortages in the manufacturing sector?

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: I thank my hon. Friend for her intervention and I am particularly pleased with the work that the Government have done on the modern apprenticeship scheme. In my previous employment, I was grateful to the Government for giving my company a grant, which enabled it to increase its research and to restart its apprenticeship programme, which had stopped a few years before.

Let me return to the point about science graduates. When we consider that China is churning out 4 million graduates a year to 250,000 in the UK, 125,000 computer science graduates to 18,000 in the UK and 270,000 engineering science graduates to 100,000 in the UK, we see the scale of the problem facing us. If we are to raise the skills level so that we have a competitive edge in the high-skills, high-tech market, we will have to persuade young people to choose the science, maths and engineering route. That means improving the image of manufacturing occupations by giving school leavers better advice and, most importantly, by ensuring that we tap into the talents of women, who are, I might add, not a minority group, but 52 per cent. of the population.

Many young people are choosing careers that are popular with their peers or that appear on television, but such careers might not be suited to their skills and talents. Girls in particular often look for careers in a caring profession and are drawn to nursing or social work, for example, but many professions in the fields of science and engineering are immensely caring. Of course, nurses save lives, but what about opening up to young people the possibility of saving lives in other ways? What about developing baby incubators, researching new medicines or developing computer systems to make surgery safer?

Many young people want to improve our world. We have seen the success of the Make Poverty History campaign and the fair trade movement, but how many young people have thought of helping people in the developing world by building machinery to help them to grow food or to rebuild vital bridges and transport systems?

Careers in the media sound really exciting to young people, but have they thought about designing, developing and manufacturing the DVD players and televisions on which we listen to music and watch films and TV?

Last year, when he was Secretary of State for Education and Skills, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, my right hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke), said:

> "In particular, it is essential that girls do not miss out on the varied and well-paid career paths that become available to them when they pursue study options . . . or vocational courses" in science, engineering and technology. Failing to encourage girls into science, engineering and technology means that the UK is missing out on that skills potential. Baroness Greenfield, director at the Royal Institution, said:

> "We are now beyond the token woman scientist or engineer; it is far more important that we have a balanced workforce in science engineering and technology. The essential first step is to attract women as the norm, rather than as the exception."

An approach by a major employer in my constituency, EADS Astrium, has been to sponsor the City of Portsmouth girls' school in its bid to become a specialist school—specialising in science and maths. EADS Astrium is the UK's biggest space company, employing about 1,000 people in my constituency in highly skilled jobs, but at its three sites in the UK, only about 15 per cent. of the work force are women, although they are predominantly involved in engineering and/or science, including project management, design, manufacturing and integration.

EADS acknowledges that 15 per cent. is insufficient and its support to the City of Portsmouth girls' school is one way it has identified to address that problem. Its support consists of the girls making visits to its manufacturing facility; it has graduates in the role of science engineering ambassadors who mentor the girls to help them to achieve higher grades in maths and science. They are given presentations by staff at EADS Astrium and work experience visits, and there are extended work placements for older students. For EADS, that support is a key element of its corporate responsibility policy, showing its commitment to promoting science in the future, and a conscious effort to shift the traditional image of scientists as predominantly male.

As an employer, EADS recognises that it needs to look beyond the existing range of students opting for science and engineering and to reach out to new groups, including women. It sees that support as helping to create the right kind of highly skilled, high-quality, home-grown work force who my constituency will need in the future.

[Sarah McCarthy-Fry]

The head teacher of the school is very enthusiastic about the project; she said that attaining specialist status in science will give the girls in her school a unique opportunity to acquire the technical, transferable skills that they need to thrive in the 21st century. However, that raises a fundamental issue: the City of Portsmouth girls' school is just that—an all-girls school. Are girls more likely to choose science and engineering as a career option if they are taught in single-sex classes?

I do not advocate the wholesale segregation of the sexes, but is there a case for science and maths to be taught in single-sex classes? From the early 1990s onwards, girls have been increasingly successful in subjects that many of them previously found difficult or which they disliked, such as maths, science, design and technology. Girls need additional support if they are to achieve their full potential and be in a position to choose science and engineering as a career. There is a danger that the needs of girls could be sidelined as the under-achievement of boys gains increasing attention.

Some co-educational schools recognise that problem and have introduced science teaching in single-sex classes, with some positive outcomes. In 2002, the Wise Campaign—Women into Science and Engineering—commissioned a report called "Singularly Successful", which investigated whether teaching science in single-sex classes could enhance the achievement of girls without disadvantaging boys and improve the female take-up of post-16 science, design and technology courses.

The conclusions of the report, which looked at several case studies, were very interesting: girls developed confidence and competence, and displayed a more positive attitude to science, technology, engineering and maths. It was noticed that in mixed-sex classes boys monopolised equipment, dominated hands-on activities and tended to show off. Many girls and quite a lot of the boys preferred being taught in single-sex classes, and parents, particularly those of girls, were generally in favour of single-sex teaching.

The report also focused on how science could be taught in a more girl-friendly way—for example, using everyday situations as starting points; emphasising the human application of science, including stories about male and female scientists; providing opportunities to explain and discuss opinions on science and technology related to social issues; and ensuring that there is no gender bias in resources and illustrations, although it was noted that that became much improved in later years.

A couple of issues were raised during the study that could be explored through further research, and I will be grateful if the Minister and her colleagues in the Department for Education and Skills take note of that. We should examine the different learning styles of girls and boys, specifically with regard to science, design, technology and maths. We should also examine whether the science and maths curriculum content is right for girls—for example, does it also meet the demands of the world of work and the needs of employers?

If the UK is to retain its manufacturing base and competitive edge in the global economy, we need to ensure that employers have access to a labour market in which people have the right skills to support their business objectives, and that our young people are encouraged, in their education, on to the right pathways to get the groundwork qualifications in science and maths that they need to get those skills. We cannot leave it all to the boys; we need to ensure that the girls get to play with the boys' toys too.

3.10 pm

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): We can get an angle on what is happening in the work force, and on their gender nature, if we consider some figures from Tees valley, where my constituency is. The work force are about 50:50 male to female, but socio-economic statistics show that, for people aged 16 to 74, about 23 per cent. of men are in the professional and managerial classes, compared with about 4.3 per cent. of women. In comparison, lower supervisory and technical jobs are occupied by 13.3 per cent. of men and 4.1 per cent of women, and semi-routine occupations—shock horror, what a surprise—are held by 9.5 per cent. of men and almost 17 per cent. of women.

The average pay levels in Tees valley are as follows: for males, £466.70 a week, and for females £247.60 a week. In my constituency, in which there is a steel industry, which is well paid and wholly male-dominated, and a chemical industry—ditto—the situation is even worse. There, the average male wage is £513 a week and the average female wage is £250 or less—half as much. If one takes a closer look one sees that in the Tees valley 48.5 per cent. of men are employed full-time and 3.5 per cent. part-time, but of women, 23.9 per cent. are employed full-time and 22.4 per cent. part-time. So, it is pretty much half and half for women regarding full-time and part-time employment, while men are overwhelmingly in full-time employment. Of course, that is highly relevant, not only to pay, but—the Minister touched on this—to the quality of jobs available.

It may be obvious, but there is no shortage of women's skills in the Tees valley; there is no shortage of damn good women. Almost all the activities in the community in my constituency are run by women: all the volunteering is spearheaded by women; good mothers are involved in many of the sports activities, particularly for girls; and, closer to home, the Redcar Labour women's forum is streets ahead of the Redcar constituency Labour perty—it is not so preoccupied with standing orders, has very interesting meetings, and is pretty big in number. I make that point lest anyone should think that women in Tees valley get poor jobs and pay because they have no skills. That is not the case.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: Yesterday, I attended a fantastic function held by Siemens in which it rewards young people who have done outstandingly well in engineering. I glanced, on the internet, at the composition of the board before I went, and I asked the chairman, "Was the woman on your board on holiday when the photograph was taken?" Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that the absence of women at senior level has a profound effect on whether women achieve their potential in society? Does she agree that we are in a pretty lamentable state 30 years after the Equal Pay Act 1970 came into force? Has she any ideas about how we can spread the good will of the Labour women's movement in Redcar to infiltrate the male bastions that still exist there?

Vera Baird: Those were three sharp questions, to which I shall give three short answers as I do not want to occupy the whole afternoon.—[Interruption.] Does the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) want to intervene?

Mrs. Laing: I did not intend to interrupt the hon. and learned Lady, but I fear that my whisper was too loud. I was simply saying that she was making a very interesting speech, and developing good points, and we have plenty of time this afternoon so I hope that she will not be too brief.

Vera Baird: Well, what an invitation, Sir John! How can a barrister by training resist? [Interruption.] Just settle down and go to sleep, girls; I shall be on for a while now. My hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) is right that role models are very important. I shall talk in a while about my own legal profession and the shortage of role models at the top of that. The shortage of role models in the judiciary is a major feature that deters young women from sticking at the job long enough to be able to get into it.

The Redcar women's forum could tell the world at large that we work really well together, but the real point is that it is a good organisation because it is mutually supportive, and encourages people to go on and do such things as little training courses to become a chair or a secretary. Then people feel that they have the self-confidence to make moves forward. That is the strength of communal groups, and why volunteering is often dominated by women, because they are prepared to be that mutual and to press each other on.

There was a middle question, but I have completely forgotten it. Oh yes, why are we in such a terrible state 30 years after the Equal Pay Act and the founding of the Equal Opportunities Commission? That is a deep question and I do not have an answer for my hon. Friend, but clearly we are making a bit of progress, as the Minister said.

May I come back to part-time work and the questions of pay and wasted skills? We are talking about skills here, and women's skills in the community. The Minister mentioned a figure of around 5.6 million part-time workers, which is four out of five of Britain's 7 million part-time workers, the bulk of whom are women. The statistics in the Tees valley are pretty well replicated nationwide. So four out of five of our 7 million part-time workers are working in jobs that do not use their full potential. According to the results of a year-long investigation by the EOC, to which I am indebted, 3.5 million of those had higher qualifications and skills, and used them, and did more supervision of management of staff in previous full-time jobs, and a further 2 million were satisfied that they could easily work at a higher level, even though they had not done so before. That is a major problem.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: It is interesting that my hon. and learned Friend is talking about women working part-time. Very often, women work part-time after they have brought up their families.

Vera Baird indicated assent.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: Picking up the point about the women of the Redcar women's forum working well together, does my hon. and learned Friend feel that there could be a way in which we could get women who have given up work or who are in part-time work to focus on getting back into full-time employment? When my children were young, I used to go to mother and toddler clubs. It is about giving people the confidence; women often lose their confidence when they are out of the workplace. Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that that is something that we could take forward?

Vera Baird: I very much agree with that. It is quite possible that as children's centres develop on the model of Sure Start, there ought to be more co-operation with employment, recruitment and training. I am sure that the intention is to educate and support children and their parents. That must be a way forward.

The report to which I am referring is called "Britain's hidden brain drain", published by the EOC. It highlights the nonsense of old-fashioned thinking about work, which leads to men, who mostly work full-time, working among the longest hours in Europe, and women, over two-fifths of whom work part-time, ending up in low-paid jobs with no prospects. Women part-time workers earn about 40 per cent. less per hour than men working full-time, which is about the same pay gap as 30 years ago. Let me turn to that, because the Minister rightly mentioned that it has improved, but it has improved only a little. Some material published on 10 November—today—by the Fawcett Society, of which I am pleased to be an active member, says:

> "Figures released by the Office for National Statistics today show that the mean hourly pay gender gap for full-time work has narrowed by just 0.6 per cent. over the last 12 months to 17.2 per cent."—

the figure given by the Minister. That is the mean hourly pay gender gap. The mean gender part-time pay gap—female hourly part-time pay compared with male hourly full-time pay—has closed by 1.1 per cent. during the past 12 months. It now stands at 38.5 per cent.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: Will my hon. and learned Friend give way?

Vera Baird: I shall finish the statistics first, as I am prone to muddle them.

The figure to which the Minister referred means that the pay gap for full-time work, which at the time of the Equal Pay Act was 29 per cent., is now 17.2 per cent.—a somewhat significant improvement—but the gap for part-time work was 42 per cent. 30 years ago and is now 38.5 per cent., which is not much of an improvement.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I am sure that my hon. and learned Friend will take comfort from the fact that there is a positive differential pay gap in the engineering community. Women in senior engineering positions are paid 19 per cent. more than their male equivalents. The sad fact is that there are only five such women; however, it is an important development. I have spoken to most of those women, and in order to achieve that preferential pay position they have had to move. They have not been promoted within their companies because they experienced a glass ceiling. To avoid that, they had to go elsewhere, to wherever their skills were needed. That is a sad reflection on the company structures that we have today.

[Mrs. Curtis-Thomas]

Vera Baird: I agree with my hon. Friend. I am impressed by what she says about her industry, but if women have to be flexible and move from job to job, which often means uprooting the family, it will obviously limit the potential for them to achieve those higher pay rates.

Although that exception must be included in the average figures, the general rate of reduction in the pay gap means that it will take 80 years at the current rate of progress to close the hourly full-time pay gap, and it will take more than a century to close the part-time pay gap. Whenever I visit Bydales school, Redcar community college, Eston Park, St. Peter's and the other schools in my constituency, I have to tell the girls not only that they will have lower pay than men but that so will their daughters, granddaughters and great-granddaughters. And their great-great-granddaughters will be lucky to have achieved the same levels of pay as men by 2085 or 2105; not until then will they be able to save, invest and enjoy life, and have the same independence as men have had for the past 30 years—or at least since the Equal Pay Act.

Tonight, as I am sure many Members are aware, the EOC and the Fawcett Society are celebrating 30 years of the Equal Pay Act with a reception. That is good, and I shall be there—I hope everyone else will be there, too—but there is plenty of partying still to go because, at the present rate of progress, we will clearly need the Equal Pay Act for another 100 years.

We have overwork and high levels of stress among full-timers and men—the DTI estimates that stress at work costs £3.7 billion a year—but I suggest that stress is building up among women who are under-employed and under-satisfied, which is just as stressful. I know of a number of examples, but I was struck by one in the EOC survey. A women named Joanna said:

> "I was a divisional manager in an education institution before having a baby . . . I had to undergo a whole day of interviewing in order to return to my old job, only for it to be given to a junior colleague because I had expressed a preference for reduced hours. The only flexible option offered was for me to become a PA, even though I had a good degree".

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: Very often, it is simply a question of changing attitudes and making people think about things in different ways. I mentioned before that I worked in manufacturing. I was asked to arbitrate in a situation in which a young woman had returned to work and had asked for part-time hours—she wanted to work three days a week. She worked in the stores, but no one had ever worked part-time in the entire history of the stores, so they said no without even considering it.

When we sat down and talked about it, the stores manager said that he was very concerned about losing her skills. He said that she was a superb worker and he did not want to train anyone else. We said, "Hang on; we are a large company. If we cannot be flexible, how do we expect smaller companies to be?" We then suggested five mornings, instead of three days a week, which the young women said she could do. Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that we can secure job satisfaction for the employee and ensure that the employer does not lose the skills if we start to consider more flexible ways of working and stop being rigid?

Vera Baird: Absolutely. Such flexibility and interaction between employer and employee builds up a very strong and good relationship, which means that the employer derives more benefit from the skills of their employee because of commitment that he or she has shown, which the employee shows in return. That is clearly a way forward, not only for equality but for productivity. Joanna, the young woman for whom the only available job with flexible hours was that of PA, had a good degree and 10 years' management experience, and had handled million-pound budgets, but all they could offer her was the job of PA.

There are some quite interesting things about part-time work that are highly relevant to the way in which we progress into better pay and higher calibre jobs. Hon. Members will not be surprised to hear that 25 per cent. of women part-time workers are shop assistants, carers, assistants or cleaners, and that only 4 per cent. are managers or senior officials. Nor will they be surprised to hear that even short periods of part-time work can be damaging. Women who have worked for 15 years and who move to full-time employment after only one year in part-time employment tend to earn 10 per cent. less an hour than those who have worked full-time for the total 15 years, so even a short period in part-time employment has a great impact.

There are a couple of interesting pointers to progress. First, in the past 20 years men have accounted for almost half the increase in part-time working. There are now an extra 1 million male part-timers. My guess is that that is a significant pointer towards the working conditions and pay rates of part-timers emerging as a more important item on the national agenda.

Secondly, we are frequently told that we are an ageing population. Again, the Equal Opportunities Commission makes it clear that many older workers would like more choice in their working patterns in the run-up to state pension age, and the option to carry on working after then. The experience of those over 55 is not being tapped. The EOC's report says that about 1.25 million of those over 55 are working at below their potential in part-time jobs. That is exactly the strand of people whom we want to make a more major contribution than they do now, so that we can deal with the demographic problem of there being more pensioners and fewer workers, and particularly with the band of people over 55 who are not working to capacity. The demand for part-time work has increased.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: There is a class war in access to education. If I had not been to university but I was a woman with A-levels and I wanted to go—I believe that I am still young enough—I could do a degree in medicine, become a qualified doctor in seven years and reap a good reward. If, however, I was a woman with significant skills and a desire to use my hands and develop a career in trade, I could not do so because the apprenticeship that would legitimise my position would be closed to me. It seems that people with brains can go to university and benefit as a result, but that the wonderful people in this country who are immensely creative and vocational get barred, do not receive financial assistance and are not assisted in the workplace. Does my hon. and learned Friend believe that we should not tolerate that situation in the longer term, as it denies women the opportunity to achieve their potential?

Vera Baird: I could not fail to agree. The argument was put extremely cogently and my hon. Friend is right about class imbalance, although that does not affect the whole proposition. What one can take from the EOC's report, "Britain's hidden brain drain", is the understanding that there is an increasing demand for part-time work, and the hope that that should result in improved quality in such jobs.

Let us consider women specifically. Many women's lives are characterised by part-time work for much of the time. People may well train and work full-time for a while, and then stop to have children. They may look after their children full-time and later, as has been said, do part-time work—a little at first, because of the need to take children to school and fetch them home, and perhaps more as they are better able to cope.

Those women may still, however, want a job that allows them to be in the home in the morning and afternoon. Often, transitional periods for children, between infants and junior schools, and junior and secondary schools, are difficult. Women often either stop work or reduce their hours to cope with that. The children then reach the examination stage, when they need support at home while they are put to the test. Mothers often cut their hours, or continue to work just part-time through that stage.

Finally, the women in question get their children off to work. They may then be able to work full-time, but whether or not they can move to full-time work, many return to part-time work because they begin caring for elders. The burden of doing that still falls predominantly on women. A pattern exists by which, if part-time work remains poorly paid and of low quality, women's lives will be significantly less than men's, and we shall not bring women, whose life patterns still tend to favour part-time work, into the skills arena in a significant way. Caring brings little reward and so does part-time work.

Part-time work is currently abysmally dealt with. Part-time workers are expected to have no career advancement and no ambition. They are rarely offered self-development or training opportunities. They are not regarded as a full part of a team and tend to be seen as a little replaceable cog that fits into a machine. That means that part-time workers live in poverty and do not get life satisfaction or the independence that they are entitled to.

Fawcett, which published figures on pay today, has some strong recommendations on dealing with the pay gap. Those include compulsory pay audits—we are all familiar with the need for those—for all organisations; well-enforced laws to ensure fair treatment of part-time work; full sign-up to the working time directive; and better quality flexible working, to allow men and women better to share responsibility. The Government have made huge steps in that direction, but it is plain from the figures that much still needs to be done.

What is the problem with most jobs being available part-time? Is our thinking on the subject fresh enough? I was in conversation with the eminent journalist Polly Toynbee, who suggested that there should be a rule to make all jobs available part-time unless there was a sound reason against that. If we started to think in that way we might, as my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby said, arrive at a fresh approach that could break the problem down. Trying to break it down from the ghettos that women now occupy as part-time workers, where they are rarely unionised, have little economic clout and are replaceable is not the way to go about things. Fresh thinking from a different angle is needed.

Why should we not examine the assumption that all jobs are full-time unless they are subordinate? Why should we not assume that they can all be part-time? That seems to me an important thought. I have important thoughts only about once every six years, so I hope that hon. Members will value it.

I want to consider the skills gap in the criminal justice system, in which I spent my life. I should declare an interest because I am a criminal Queen's counsel by training. I also have the pleasure and privilege of chairing the Fawcett commission on women and the criminal justice system. During the two years that we spent on our original report—we are now into our third, follow-up year—we looked at women as defendants, victims and witnesses, and workers in the criminal justice system to see how they fared. We have an excellent body of commissioners, who are drawn from across the criminal justice system, including men, women, ethnic minority representatives and others at senior levels.

Our opening session was on workers, and the Equal Opportunities Commission, the Commission for Judicial Appointments and the British Association for Women in Policing all came. We looked at issues right across the board, including the appointing of judges, sexual harassment, and protective clothing for female police officers. We distributed a lot of questionnaires and we got feedback from the Prison Service, where there is huge discrimination, the police service, where there is a plan to overcome discrimination, and the probation service, where there is somewhat less of a problem, but a problem none the less. We also looked at the legal profession.

I shall not go through every year, but we started at 1922—the year that first saw women admitted to the legal profession after the rules against their joining it were removed by statute. Women now make up 40 per cent. of our 90,000 solicitors and 30 per cent. of our 11,000 barristers, and more women than men now study law as a first degree. None the less, the Law Society, which is the solicitors' professional group, has found that women leaving university and starting a training contract at a law firm—the training contract is their apprenticeship, as it were—are paid 7 per cent. less on average than men at the same stage. As of 2004, when the commission looked at the issue, the gap was widening.

That trend continues throughout women's careers, and female assistant solicitors earn £12,500 less on average than men. That is quite probably because of the size of firm where they work and the law that they practise, because, as in other sectors of the economy, women dominate in the specialisms that are presumed to be most appropriate to their caring nature, such as family law, but are unrepresented in highly paid areas such as patent law and intellectual property law.

[Vera Baird]

Women lawyers still find it hard to get through the glass ceiling. Of solicitors with between 10 and 19 years' experience, more than 80 per cent. of men are partners but only 55 per cent. of women are, so women are staying at lower levels for longer. Not surprisingly, there is concern that women solicitors with that profile are leaving the profession in their 30s, and their skills are being lost to the legal economy just at the time when those women would, if they were men, become partners. There is a similar exodus at the Bar.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: In the engineering community, we have a marvellous scheme called the Daphne Jackson award. Daphne was one of the founders of Women into Science and Engineering, to which some of my hon. Friends have referred. The programme is aimed at highly educated, highly qualified women returners, who have done what they need to do in terms of their caring duties, but who want to go back to work, regain the position that they occupied before and make a contribution. Does my hon. and learned Friend know of any legal equivalent? If there is none, why does one not exist? Why have the institutions and organisations representing the law industry not recognised that the profession loses an enormous amount of quality and experience when it loses women?

Vera Baird: I am not aware of any similar plans in the legal profession. Of course, the situation there has a knock-on effect on the judiciary, and the imbalance is important more broadly. There is a similar exodus at the Bar of women in their 30s who are looking to start families. There are particular problems for women barristers because they are self-employed and do not receive maternity pay. Sometimes, if someone wishes to retain their tenancy during maternity leave, they must continue to pay rent to keep their place open, despite being off work. The Bar Council is working on that matter, but it moves at a snail's pace. If it took 100 years to secure equal pay, I have no idea how long it will take to sort that out.

Some 1,100 barristers, including me, have taken silk as a QC. That means that one can take on larger and more complex cases, and charge higher fees. It is an extraordinary system because, as a junior person, one may be doing the same work as a QC. I was leading on serious cases, which is what QCs do, for 12 years before I took silk. As soon as I received a small envelope, put on a new jacket with finely embroidered sleeves and strolled into the Old Bailey as a QC, I got paid 25 per cent. more, which was wonderful but inexplicable. I was doing more or less the same job, albeit with a slight hangover as a consequence of the celebration we held the previous night. That is the only time I have been hungover. I wish to place that on the record for the benefit of my constituents in Redcar.

Only 8 per cent. of QCs are women, and the process for their appointment has historically represented something of a prize. The process has changed, but one had to apply to the Lord Chancellor's Department, which operated a system of consultees whereby the applicant would submit a couple of references, as one would expect, when applying for promotion. The consultees would then ask for the opinion of everyone in the judiciary who might know the applicant. The Commission for Judicial Appointments does not make appointments, but it has scrutinised how the Lord Chancellor's Department has done so. It is made up predominantly of male, upper middle-class, public school educated men. In its first report in 2003, in what I regard as a moderate tone, it stated that

> "some consultees' comments appeared to be influenced by a perception of a "Silk mould" i.e. that applicants needed to conform to expectations as to appearance, dress, educational or social background and other irrelevant factors".

I can tell hon. Members that that view is accurate. Since that report, the CJA has examined the case of a woman, whom I know well, who was refused silk. One consultee described her professional performance in moderate but adequate language, but condemned her for having poor dress sense and for not being a "leader of the profession". Heaven only knows what that means; presumably she does not go to the right cocktail parties. Another person, whom I know well, found that one consultee had expressed his disapproval of an affair that she allegedly had 20 years previously, which was a source of scandal at the time, but did not stop the man in question getting silk.

Another unfair comment was made about a woman's performance in the Court of Appeal. However, she should have been given silk for her skill in cross-examining the feedback interviewer, from whom she extracted information that should not be disclosed—namely, the name of the judge who made the comment. She wrote to that judge, who backed off as fast as a train going through a tunnel, and said how highly he had always regarded her ability. He accepted that the problem he mentioned had been put in language that was rather too strong. Those are examples of problems that the Government's own institution, the CJA, found to be occurring and has reported on. There have been a number of allegations of sex discrimination; almost all of them were upheld.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): Is the hon. and learned Lady aware of a recent case of a woman who claimed to have been unlawfully dismissed because she was pregnant? She made the point that there was no deterrent to the law firm getting rid of her because the amount it would have to pay in compensation was so low that it represented only a fraction of her salary. Is the hon. and learned Lady aware of any other examples of such discrimination?

Vera Baird: No, but I accept that that appears to be the case. The EOC has done a good deal of work recently on pregnancy discrimination. The legislative framework that has been in place for quite a long time does not appear to have tackled that discrimination adequately.

As well as the discrimination implicit in what I have said, judges are drawn from silks, by and large. Therefore, discrimination that stops women becoming silks stops them joining the judiciary, as I shall explain. A woman's chance of becoming a judge is hugely cut as a result of keeping her out of silk.

The judiciary performs a key function in any legal system. Some 96 per cent. of criminal cases are heard in the magistrates court, but district judges, recorders, circuit judges, Crown court judges and High Court judges hear the rest of what are increasingly serious cases. There are the two layers of appellate court on top: the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords, which is soon to be called the supreme court.

If one starts at the top—instead of at the bottom, as I did—and works down, one finds that, out of 12 Law Lords, 8 per cent. are women. The keen mathematicians among us—I suspect that my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby is one—will immediately work out that there is only one woman among 12 judges in the highest court.

There are 37 lord justices of appeal, of whom 8 per cent. are women. That means that there are three female lord justices of appeal. Of 107 High Court judges, 7 per cent. are women, which means that about seven women are High Court judges. Women make up 11 per cent. of circuit judges and 12 per cent. of recorders, which is a slightly lower rank. Down at the bottom, 28 per cent. of district judges are women.

Not surprisingly, as one moves from top to bottom, the proportion of women rises strongly. Of 11,000 barristers, 30 per cent. are women, and of 90,000 solicitors, 40 per cent. are women. Judges are drawn from a mixture of those two professions, so should not women make up 35 per cent. all the way through the judiciary?

Those figures indicate exactly how strong the discrimination is. The legal profession often argues that there are not sufficient women at senior level, so there is a need for trickle-up. We have been admitted to the Bar and been solicitors since 1922. How old do we have to be before we have equal access to the higher echelons of the profession?

This is just a snapshot. The Government have taken action because they are aware of the problem in the profession. The profession will now determine who becomes a QC. It is yet to be decided whether those who became QCs under the old system will have to reapply for their jobs—I shall wait and see. My fees might go down, if I ever work as a QC again.

People will fill out a self-assessment form, so that they can put themselves forward. That is fine, but it is fairly well known that women tend to understate their abilities, skills and qualifications in self-assessment forms. There is a famous story that if a job is advertised in the press and a woman thinks that she has five out of the six qualifications for it, she will hesitate before applying, whereas a man with two of the qualifications will apply straight away. One worries that there may be an imbalance in the self-assessment process. However, the process is being undertaken by people with enormous human resources experience, which can only mean progress.

What will present a difficulty is the fact that the new panel for the appointment of QCs is entitled only to interview applicants. They are very good people, but they can only appraise self-assessment forms and conduct the interviews that follow. The panel will not be able to do anything about the structure of the profession, which is where the imbalance lies. Women do not receive sufficient support when they are in their 30s and having their families, yet that will not be dealt with to broaden the range of applicants.

That continues to be a worry, but we must see how the new system fares. As everyone knows, there is to be a judicial appointments commission, which will have stronger powers to run the appointments system properly. It must attempt to widen the range of applicants for silk, as the interviewing panel cannot. The judiciary is dependent on silks, so the panel will have to include academics, solicitors and so on. It must take advantage of the Act that set it up, which states that it should "have regard to diversity". It should reach deep into the profession and advise it—indeed, drive it—to deal with the high drop-out rate among women, their lower pay and all the other factors that stand in their way. Frankly, it will have to consider such things as not appointing men from a set of chambers that self-evidently has discriminatory practices—perhaps because of its outcomes in terms of women's advancement—unless it puts its house in order and ensures that there is a fair and flat playing field for everyone.

It is a great delight to me that Baroness Prashar has been appointed to head the judicial appointments commission. She was first civil service commissioner and I had the privilege of serving with her on the Joint Committee on Human Rights; she is just the person for the job. Apart from changing the silks system indirectly, which I think the group will have to do, it could follow the experience of the police, who found it hard to recruit women and people from ethnic minority backgrounds because they did not have the confidence to think they could be police officers.

However, those people can be recruited as community support officers because they think they can do that job, and once they are on the first tier they realise that the job of policing would not be so much more difficult. That strategy has worked very well in the police force and has increased the number of black and women recruits to officer level. The judges probably will not like the analogy, but it follows that the recruitment we are discussing should start from tribunal chairs and the lowest level of district judge and continue to the higher levels of the profession.

In my beloved Redcar, and in my criminal justice profession, there are clearly difficulties in losing women's skills to the economy. I compliment the Government on the steps that they have taken, especially in my profession, to drive things forward. I look forward to the enactment of the Equality Bill, which will place a duty on public authorities to promote gender equality, although I do not know how it will play out and whether people really appreciate what a driver it can be in terms of contract compliance in the private sector. Bearing in mind the time scales that I quoted, we will have to work these new tools well, and speedily, otherwise we will not get access to equal pay and equal access to good work while any of the people in this Chamber are alive.

3.53 pm

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): I enjoyed the speeches of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) and my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Sarah McCarthy-Fry). I am so indoctrinated in the world of science, engineering and design that I hardly get time to put my head over the parapet, but having heard what my hon.

[Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas]

and learned Friend said, it seems that the situation for women in the legal profession is far more difficult than that for women in science, engineering and design, because our world is changing.

Before I continue, I should declare some interests: I sit as a member of the Engineering Technology Board, which governs and regulates the engineering profession throughout the UK. We cover more than 232,000 people—by and large chartered engineers. I have been president of the Institution of Engineering Designers for the last two years. I was its first female fellow, and I remain the only one, which is sad, given that we have a membership of 5,000. I am a fellow of the Institution of Mechanical Engineers and I sit on the board of that institution. I am also a fellow of the Institution of Electrical Engineers.

I am also chair of the all-party group on women in science, engineering and design, and it is great that some members of that group are present. I also chair the all-party group on construction skills and training. I am a construction industry adviser and I also advise any of my engineering colleagues who seek advice on the retention and recruitment of women in science, engineering and technology.

My history in engineering goes back a long way. I started my career in engineering as an apprentice fitter on the docks in Portsmouth, so I have a great love of ships and also of Portsmouth docks, because that is where I started my involvement in the most wonderful profession that one could hope to be in.

I regard my current profession as interim—politicians are elected by others and we can be quick in and quick out—whereas I think that I was born an engineer, and I am grateful to say that I shall die one. No one can take that away from me. I suspect that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar feels the same about her profession. Sometimes we are genetically pre-programmed to be one thing, and I was genetically pre-programmed to be an engineer. The engineering world is extraordinary, but it is acutely short of women, and we greatly miss the contribution that they can make.

It caused me great sorrow recently to read another Equal Opportunities Commission report—a fantastic report that fed my worst prejudices. It gives an up-to-date platform from which to assess the progress we are making and lays down challenges for us in the future. As my hon. and learned Friend asked, what is 100 years in the development of women on this planet? It is a short time, and if we did not think so, we should be depressed. However, it is a salutary fact that our great great great-grandchildren might know some degree of equal opportunities in their lives. Oh, that we were so rich that we could tolerate that gap, but that is how it is.

The Equal Opportunities Commission report to which I refer is called "Plugging the Skills Gap: Challenging Gender Segregation in Training and Work". Colleagues have referred to it; I shall refer to some of its key points. First, there is a clear link between skills-shortage sectors such as plumbing, construction and engineering and the under-representation of women. Secondly, sectors experiencing some of the most severe skills shortages are also among those in which men make up the majority of the work force. Thirdly, widening recruitment pools to include more women most certainly offers a solution to this acute skills shortage. There are acute shortages in plumbing, construction and engineering.

Earlier, I forgot to refer to my work with women plumbers. The Institute of Plumbing and Heating Engineering is a marvellous organisation—chock full of men at the top, of course, but women drive the administration like mad. One part of that administration is a great woman called Carol Cannavan, who several years ago decided that the institute would offer a facility for women plumbers. There were not many at the time, and there are not many now, but the institute has provided a home for women in plumbing—there are quite a number now in London—and somewhere they can meet and support each other while they undertake training and work experience before going on to work on their own. I commend the institute, although it represents a small token.

I have not yet met anyone who has had a woman plumber attend their home, because the industry is by and large still dominated by men—99 per cent. The same is true of all other construction sectors. Unfortunately, the proportion of women working in trades and in the construction industry is still only 1 per cent. That is lamentably small, but the Construction Industry Training Board, which is a skills sector in its own right and which funds a huge amount of training for apprenticeships, is making special efforts with women and with people from ethnic communities.

How do we get women into apprenticeships? It is exceptionally difficult. When I started my apprenticeship, it was not by design but completely by accident. I went along to a jobcentre with some O-levels—GCSEs now—and somebody said to me, "What is it that you would like to do?" I said that I liked mathematics and working with my hands, and the man said, "Perhaps you would like to pop along to this place this afternoon and do a bit of a test." I did not like to ask him where I was going; it seemed rude, given that he was giving me a work opportunity. When I got there, it seemed even more rude to ask, "Why am I here, and what is it that you do?" However, I sat the test and at the end of the afternoon I was told that I had done exceptionally well and beaten all the boys. I was then asked whether I would like to come along on Monday. I went home that evening having passed the test, but not sure about what I was to do on Monday. I turned up, and the money was £19 a week. I was issued with a boiler suit, a pair of Totectors, a hard hat and goggles. Most of my male colleagues immediately abandoned the hard hat and goggles—safety has never been pre-eminent in the industry—but I hung on to mine. Four years later, I walked away with my deeds as a mechanical fitter. I was one woman among 3,000 men.

From forays that I have made into training schools recently, some of which I shall tell hon. Members about, I know that the situation has not changed. The four years of my apprenticeship were incredibly difficult. Half the men thought that I should not be there and should be at home. I did not have a family at the time, but they did not think that that was any reason to keep me in the workplace. The other half were delighted that I was there, but unfortunately for the wrong reasons. They wanted to go out with me, and that included most of the married men who worked at the dock.

Pursuing and enduring an apprenticeship in so isolated a position is incredibly difficult. Two young women came after me, but unfortunately they did not have the capacity to cope. There was no mentoring and no organisation to which I could look to support me in that environment. I just had to get on with it. That is immensely unfortunate: unless we change the environment that young women have to work in when they are significantly outnumbered by men, the attrition rate will be huge.

My route into an apprenticeship was ad hoc. Things seem to have been similarly ad hoc for the young women I spoke to today, but there is significant hope. Under this Government, we have seen the introduction of specialist schools. We do not have many single-sex schools left, so the specialist schools—particularly those with specialisms in engineering, mathematics and computing—are mixed, and plenty of effort is going into developing young people in those areas. That is leading to a larger number of women considering careers relating to science and engineering-based subjects. That is fantastic, because it gets rid of some problems in other schools, where the careers teachers, God bless them, do not have much experience of the engineering community: sexual stereotyping of such roles still predominates in the advice they offer to the young women and men in their care. If that was not the case, far more young women would have involved themselves in science, engineering and technology in the past 30, 40 or 50 years.

School specialism is making a difference, both because it focuses the school on a particular area and because it involves employers. Employers are crucial for women seeking apprenticeships, because being able to pick up the document that can mean a fantastic livelihood and financial independence for a woman means having work experience. Apprenticeships have changed. People can do college-based training, but that must be supplemented by work in the workplace with an employer. More women are entering apprenticeships, because schools have awakened their ambitions and provided them with steers. In addition, employers are interested in what schools are doing, because their businesses have skill shortages.

Women who are going into apprenticeships might have an opportunity to work with those employers. If they do not get such an opportunity, the discrimination that they, as opposed to their male counterparts, will face in trying to get work-based training remains significant. It may be possible to place a young man in work-based training, but a young woman, unless there is a family relationship or she has been sold positively by facilitators, will have a far greater problem finishing her apprenticeship. It does not really matter how good she is at the job. According to many of the companies that I have visited, a young woman is likely to get pregnant and go off to have children. Small companies in particular will go for the racing certainty of a young male over a young female, fearing that any investment in time and energy they make in a young woman will be lost when she leaves the workplace.

However, legions of companies in the construction sector are equally reluctant to take on a male apprentice because the industry—particularly small to medium-sized enterprises—absolutely refuses to put its hand in its pocket to train young people. It does not do that and tells me that it will not. Why should it, when the trained person will leave a company and go and work for somebody else?

Companies will not train people if they feel that they are going to lose that investment to another company, which is why we have a chronic shortage of suitably trained people in the construction industry. The industry wants images of perfection to fetch up on its doorstep every Monday, rather than put its hand in its pocket and train them itself.

Apprenticeships are a difficult field for young women to enter. I have recently been to one great training school, which I really liked. In fact, I would have liked to stay there rather than come here. It was wonderfully equipped, and was launched on the back of the Learning and Skills Council, working in conjunction with sector skills councils, which are both innovations of this Government.

I shall digress briefly. Sector skills councils are made up of representatives from industry, working with the further education sector through the learning and skills councils. They are directing those councils where money must be delivered in college-based training to satisfy the needs of industry. That is something that we desperately wanted in this country, and we now have it. The LSC is consequently funding thousands and thousands of places in construction to satisfy the demand of the sector, because—I say this on a party political basis—since 1997 there has been massive investment in construction. The previous 20 or 30 years saw nothing to compare with that huge investment. However, we are 88,000 people short of delivering the potential capital investment in the construction programme year on year. How we shall achieve the Olympics I shall never know.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: That is a point I want to make. We have the building better schools for the future initiative and building better homes; now we have the Olympics. I am sure my hon. Friend agrees that if we are to get enough construction workers, we need to start now so as to ensure that they have the skills. We must put more emphasis on vocational skills and on encouraging people to take up such professions.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: We must—that is absolutely right. Jobs for life was something that our parents had, but we have been told that we could never expect it. We expect six or 18 months here and maybe two years there, but that is not true in engineering. Nor is it true for British Gas, which is saying, "Because of the contract we have to re-lay all the pipework in this country, we can offer you a job for life." That is fantastic. The starting salary is about £23,000, which is great money for people in disadvantaged communities. It will enable us to utilise a repository of individuals who were marginalised prior to this huge investment in public sector and utility infrastructure.

I agree with my hon. Friend: we have an enormous deficit of trained and well-equipped people in the construction sector, and we must start to address that now. We are making the investment that is needed to provide money for academic training. However, to repeat the point that I made earlier, academic training is fine, but it means nothing to the industry without being complemented by experience on the job.

[Mrs. Curtis-Thomas]

Women have great difficulties getting experience on the job for the reasons I have cited, but the Government can do something about that. We already have section 106s for public sector contracts. I doubt whether many people here will know anything about section 106s, but I, unfortunately, know everything—I am a bit of a 106 anorak, because I see their use as a pathway to a better door. They are a fantastic facility.

Local authorities attach section 106s to public sector contracts so that contractors who win work are obliged to employ local people on those projects. That sounds great; it is just what we need. I could say to all the women I see—or rather the few women I see—in apprenticeship workshops, "There is your route to a working opportunity: a section 106," but very few are enforced.

Mrs. Laing: I thank the hon. Lady for giving way. I, too, know quite a bit about section 106, having worked in the construction industry as a lawyer. I entirely agree with her. I have noticed time and again that local authorities and other public bodies that award contracts do not derive sufficient benefit from the opportunities provided by section 106. It can mean not only that local people are employed, but that local amenities such as extra roads, playgrounds and village halls are provided if that fits in with the purpose for which the contract was awarded. I rise merely to emphasise the hon. Lady's point. She is absolutely right, and I hope that somebody, somewhere, pays attention to what we say this afternoon.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: It is excellent that two of us have that knowledge. That is reassuring is it not? It is a pity that we do not represent all the chief executive officers of local authorities in the UK.

Section 106 is a fantastic vehicle. There is already a requirement for local authorities to engage local people. It is only a small jump to say, "By the way, of the proportion of local people who you involve, we must see a concerted effort to recruit women and people from black and ethnic minorities." That is absolutely crucial. Where else are women who are disadvantaged in terms of going into small companies going to get that vital work experience? I go into many schools to encourage young girls to undertake apprenticeships, because that is one of the best things that they can do in life, as it means that they would be able to be self-employed—for ever, in today's world—with hours to suit them. But I cannot do that knowing that they will not get the work experience that they need to complete an apprenticeship. It is a false hope.

The Learning and Skills Council desperately wants to ensure that its courses present that positive employment opportunity, but more often than not colleges completely fail to provide that opportunity. I do not know whether hon. Members read Construction News—my bedtime reading—but there is an excellent article in it this week about a training company in London, funded by the LSC, that has been recruiting so-called apprentices for the past 18 months. The LSC announced in today's Construction News that it is pulling out its funding immediately, and City and Guilds has also withdrawn its endorsement programmes, because the company, which is an unfortunate blot on the training landscape, has offered training contracts knowing full well that it cannot deliver the training element. Hundreds of the young people whom we desperately need in construction have started those apprenticeships and been badly let down. That is a source of great frustration to me, and to organisations such as the Construction Industry Training Board that are desperately trying to address the skills gap.

I have talked about women doing apprenticeships and the barriers that they face, and about the training centres that I have been to, including the one that I visited recently at which there were no women. I was told by the chief executive there that one was coming in a fortnight—the only one in the 300 trainees that would be on the programme this year. I felt really sorry for her—a young girl of 17 who would be on that programme with 150 17-year-old blokes. It may sound like paradise, but it would be really awful. It would be really difficult for her if she was just a normal, regular girl. She would be a subject of great interest, and that degree of interest is not helpful.

Such young women need access to other young women in their position. It is not that women lack the skills, nor that young girls do not want to be involved in that world, but when they are there, they need to reach out and be in contact with other young girls in the same position, not old women like me—I have a different cohort of colleagues to support. They need to know other young women of the same age doing the same thing. Organisations such as Wise—Women into Science and Engineering—and the Women's Engineering Society and now, importantly, the UK Resource Centre in Bradford, can play a role in providing that mentoring service.

There are not many women doing apprenticeships in the UK, but the numbers are growing, and there is a network of women and other people in similar positions whom they can turn to. The Government should be supportive of that; they have a significant role to play. I have already referred to that role in terms of offering work opportunities through public sector contracts, which is something that we must do. However, the Government should continue to support Government-backed women's organisations and require those organisations to bear in mind the fact that there are young women working in the UK who need their support, and that they should play a role in bringing them together. If they do not, women leave. The attrition rate for women is far greater than it is for young men. They leave because they do not have the wherewithal and the confidence to sustain a position on an apprenticeship.

What about women going on to higher education? They have a far better chance. Some people today have talked about science, engineering and technology, and about starting at the bottom and working one's way up. I loathe that expression. I am a chartered engineer—a professional engineer—but the thing that I am most proud of is that I am an apprenticed fitter. I am a fitter by trade. If I were asked whether I had made my greatest contribution as a chartered engineer or as a fitter, I would reply that it was as a fitter. As a society we need to recognise, as we are doing in part, that the contribution made by craftspeople in the UK to our economy and quality of life is equal to anything that professional individuals have made. Historically, in the engineering community, we have had the devil's own job recruiting young people into trades. That is because of people's perception of the value of a trade in our society.

Things are changing. We have seen that in relation to plumbing. Thank goodness that it became publicly known that plumbers earn—or could earn—£70,000 a year. Suddenly there was a mass rush to further education colleges for plumbing certificates. The bad news is that we will be totally overrun with plumbers in about five years' time, so their cost per hour will plummet. That is a good thing for the rest of us, but a bad thing for the plumbing sector, because there will not be adequately trained plumbers. The type of training that plumbers are getting now is not what traditional plumbers, or I, would consider adequate.

Some stereotypical views of tradespeople have changed, and that can only be of benefit to women. As I mentioned earlier, there is an organisation for women plumbers although unfortunately, there is nothing comparable for women electricians. That is because there have been no "Newsnight" items on television to say that electricians can earn £70,000 a year—although a competent electrician could probably earn more than £70,000 a year. By the way, there are no significant training courses in electrical systems, which means that there will be an acute shortage of electricians; anyone with a wiring problem at home needs to get an electrician soon, because in about five years we will not be able to get them for gold dust.

I am digressing slightly, and I shall return to the subject of women in higher education. It is fairly straightforward to go to university; one needs a good suite of A levels or GNVQs of a certain level. Absolutely super—no problem. We know that women invariably achieve better GCSE results than their male counterparts. That is proven year on year, particularly in mathematics and engineering. Indeed, I attended an award celebration yesterday, when Ellin Barklund was presented with the Sir William Siemens medal. That young woman is described as outstanding, and she is working in the field of renewable energy. However, she is not exceptional. I sat my degree in engineering with five other women, and two of them gained first-class engineering degrees; we were among a cohort of 35 men. It is not unusual for us to do well.

Unfortunately, we do not translate that achievement into our careers. We get good degrees and are offered good jobs, but we eventually reach a glass ceiling. We reach that ceiling for many reasons. Those of us who choose to have children once we have entered our professional careers invariably suffer. I do not want to dwell too much on that, as my hon. and learned Friend said a great deal on the subject. The problems associated with child care and the frustration of career development seem to be as problematic in the legal profession as they are in the science, engineering and technology professions.

We may have spent years obtaining qualifications and professional experience, but all that can be lost to British industry as and when a woman chooses to have children. It is a great shame, because we cost an absolute fortune. Engineers cost almost as much to train as doctors, but that national investment is entirely lost. I commend the Government for changing the law, making it easier for women to return to work and protecting their rights, but that is only a start. More needs to be done.

Shortage has always driven changes in company practice, but the acute shortage of staff in some areas of science, engineering and technology will force companies to take a far more tolerant attitude with regard to employing women.

Some sectors to which I referred earlier, including the construction sector, find it difficult to recruit even professional women. Some companies in the electronic sector find it incredibly difficult to recruit women, not because they do not exist but because those companies simply do not accommodate women—or they do not have an infrastructure or a history of working that promotes the advancement of women. The space industry, however, is an exception. Representation of women there is exceptionally good, and women do exceptionally well there. It attracts and retains women for an extraordinary time. Some jobs are for life, and jobs in the space industry are such jobs. It is an immensely attractive proposition.

Careers in science, engineering and technology are immensely attractive propositions for women, because whether one achieves employment in those sectors through an apprenticeship or through professional qualification, one can expect many of the benefits that are not to be found in other industries. The pay is higher relative to other groups or to other forms of work. Those with an apprenticeship who work on their own also have flexibility.

Flexibility is an equally valued attribute for the phalanx of men. Many of my male colleagues who work in the plumbing or electrical businesses fit their entire week around golf. Should you receive a call from a plumber who says, "I can't come to you this morning," please look out of the window. If the skies are blue, he is probably off to the golf links. People stand a much better chance of getting somebody to come and see them if it is raining, because then it is not possible to go to the golf links. Things are rather different with women working in those sectors, who will see customers between 9 and 3, but who then have to hop home for the kids. Moreover, they always carry with them a nice vacuum cleaner and a pair of Handy Andy Marigold gloves.

Mrs. Laing: I cannot allow the hon. Lady to give the impression that women do not play golf, too, because we do.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: Fantastic. That is very encouraging, is it not? Let us hope that more women scientists, engineers and technologists fill up those golf links.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: While we are extolling the virtues of female plumbers, does my hon. Friend agree that elderly people might be frightened of having someone in their house these days, and that single elderly women, in particular, might feel much better and safer if they had a fellow woman in the house?

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: That is a good point, and the women plumbers whom I mentioned are never short of work, for that very reason. When women living on their own hear that they could call a woman plumber to their homes, they will do so; they do not feel so threatened and intimidated. In some religious orders, of course, it is not possible to have men on the premises without a chaperone, so women plumbers are just the thing.

[Mrs. Curtis-Thomas]

Personally, I prefer to have women working in my property. That is because of some of the sexist stuff that I just mentioned, such as the fact that women happen to be much cleaner, which matters a lot. They bring with them a suite of characteristics that some of my male counterparts do not have. On the face of it, they are far more efficient and administer their work far more effectively. Those who have dealings, as I do, with women who work in traditional trades know that they will get a quote in writing when they ask for one, as well as the follow-up documentation and certificates. Although I have not worked with that many women, I know that that behaviour is absolutely characteristic. I have worked with a great many men, however, and I am still waiting for the quotes even now.

I have discussed in some detail the difficulties that women experience getting apprenticeships, and what the Government should do to help them. I have commended the Government on the work that they have done so far, and I thank God for it. I have also discussed the role of women in the professional structures and the barriers that they face, although those are significantly fewer than the barriers faced by young women in apprenticeships.

I shall finish by returning to the EOC report. The commission was helped by some outstanding people, one of whom is here today, and I simply want to mention their names. It is important for us to know that the commission's work was substantiated by people who were conversant with the subject matter on which they were deliberating. Pat Langford is the director of the unit responsible for promoting women in science and technology at the DTI's Office of Science and Technology, and I am delighted that Pat was part of the team. In addition, we had Jeremy Crook, the chief executive of the Black Training and Enterprise Group, and Peter Lobban, the chief executive of the Construction Industry Training Board. Another, very important individual was Rob MacPherson, the Connexions 14–19 policy plus team leader. That is a very broad spectrum of individuals, which was complemented by people from the private sector, including Centrica, and by Rosamund McNeil, the principal officer on gender segregation for the National Union of Teachers. So there was a good mix of private and public policy developers working on the report.

Vera Baird: I hope that my hon. Friend will not overlook the fact that the chair was EOC commissioner Jeannie Drake, who is also on the Turner commission on pensions. She is principally responsible for the fact that there will be a chapter on women and pensions in the report when it comes out, and she well understands how the limits on women's work and on women receiving good pay, particularly for part-time work, continue to play on, so that women who have been poor in their earlier lives are also poor when they are pensioners.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: That is so true. I do not know a great deal about fiscal policy, but the changes in pension rules next year, which I have just read about, will favour people on the 40 per cent. income tax rate. That will automatically favour people in highly paid jobs, the vast majority of whom are men. Again, the disadvantage to women will be very evident, and I hope that together we can do something about that.

I return to what the EOC is calling on the Government to do. As I said, members of the panel, who are civil servants and represent the Government, want a national strategy to be developed to tackle gender segregation in training and work, which I applaud. The strategy should > "incorporate targets to make change happen and provide incentives and information for young people and employers in skill shortage areas to make it easier for them to make non-traditional choices."

I have referred today to many of the Government's outstanding initiatives, but I have not dwelt, as I should, on the contributions that the various institutions have made, because they are all doing their bit. I know intimately all 38 engineering institutions in the UK, and they are all trying desperately to reach out to women and young people, but some are succeeding better than others. I shall single out the Construction Industry Training Board, which has been doing a great deal in this area because it is the area of greatest need. Along with the Government, however, it has not made a huge impact—I suspect because there is no joined-up thinking that brings all the players together.

Careers information is changing, but we need to do far more. We have portals for careers information—indeed, they are ubiquitous—but the industry does not agree on who will do what. If we search, we will probably find a million references to careers for women, but that does not help the person who is seeking advice. I know that Lord Sainsbury, the Minister with responsibility for science and technology, is keen for careers advice to be contracted for and developed to give young people a better opportunity to find the job that they want.

The report also recommends:

> "an overhaul of the Modern Apprenticeships programme plans to remove the barriers faced by young people who want to train in a job usually done by the opposite sex."

That goes back to what I said earlier—that specialist schools are getting more women into apprenticeships, but that the number is still tiny. The recommendation draws attention to the existence of the modern apprenticeships programme and to the fact that it is fantastic, it will be there for years and years, and it is a Government-backed initiative. Why, therefore, cannot we do more with it to realise the potential of women in engineering, science and technology?

I am not remotely depressed, but I wish that there were more women mechanical engineers, because they could have done much for society and for the quality of people's lives. I have been able to achieve very little. Some of the women with whom I went to school had such big brains, but they have ended up working in, say, a cake shop. There is nothing wrong with working in a cake shop, but we as a society have lost that potential, and we cannot afford to do so.

We cannot, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar said, pay the bills associated with people being stressed out of their minds, not because they are working themselves to death but because they have never realised their potential. That applies to so many women who reach 50 and say, "Oh—if only." This Government have tried to eradicate that mentality. They have removed so many barriers and provided so much support, and given that we have made that commitment to women, I want us to do more with the resources available to us so that we can continue to get more women into the professions about which I care dearly.

4.35 pm

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I welcome the chance to debate this subject today. It is a shame that more hon. Members have not taken part, but I found the comments of those who did attend very interesting. It is a sad reflection on our society that although more women than ever work, as has been pointed out, a huge number of them do not work in jobs that make full use of their skills.

I identified with the comments of the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) about part-time work. She outlined a situation that many women, of our generation in particular, can identify with—the pattern of part-time work. She did not say, but I hope that she would agree, that many couples or families tend to make the decision that one partner will be the major wage-earner, and that is usually the male, because he is usually earning a higher wage, so it is often an easier arrangement. The woman will often decide to work part-time for a while and will often compromise in what she wants to do, because of that.

However, I meet quite a few men these days who would love to work four days a week, or some other shorter working week, but feel that to do so would give their employers a signal that they were not interested in career progression. Part of the solution seems to me to be closer working with industry to get rid of the attitude that a person is interested in their career, and can do a good job, only if they work full-time—or even more. Many professions today have a very macho work-heavy culture, whereby a person is not seen to be doing their job unless they put in so many hours overtime. There is also networking. Perhaps the employees go off to the golf club, or the pub, and that can be a back way up the career ladder.

It would be useful to persuade employers that encouraging part-time work for all people will improve the skills mix in the long term. Some employers have realised it—perhaps those with a more proportionate mix of men and women in the workplace—and have introduced the relevant policies. However, there is more to be done. I am against forcing employers to act, but more remains to be done to persuade them in the right direction.

Women appear to find it much more difficult to obtain financial and practical support when they set up a new business, and that is the aspect of women's working that I want to begin with. The statistics are not very good in this area of women's work. In 2004–05 only 26.1 per cent. of self-employed people were female. As has already been pointed out by the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas), there are numerous opportunities—particularly in some skills areas—for women to develop their own businesses. More disappointingly, the figure of 26.1 per cent. represents a decrease since 2002–03.

Figures for 2003 show that only 12.3 per cent. of small businesses are managed by women or have women as a majority of directors, although the figure increased to 14 per cent. in the past year. According to the London Business School report, "Global Entrepreneurship Monitor UK", only 7 per cent. of women own their own business, compared with 16 per cent. of men. It has been pointed out in various quarters that if women started businesses at the same rate as men, the economy would benefit from 150,000 extra new firms each year.

Some might say that all is well simply because we have some targets. In May 2003, the Government launched their strategic framework for women's enterprise, which announced four areas for action: improving business support services; access to finance; caring and child care; and the management of transition from benefits to self-employment. I cannot argue with any of those.

That is all very well-meaning, but the Government have also set targets for 2006. The first was that women should account for 40 per cent. of customers using Government-sponsored business support services, or business link networks. That is quite a difficult statistic to monitor, because a number of different agencies are involved and increasingly some of that work is being taken over by regional development agencies. A national advocacy network called Prowess did some work to try to find out what the percentage might be. It surveyed various bodies that would give such support and concluded that only 20 per cent. of Government-sponsored business support services users were female. That is some way off the 40 per cent. target.

It would be helpful if the Minister would enlighten us on how the figures are being monitored. That is increasingly important, because we are moving towards involving regional development agencies and many of them do not disaggregate their statistics by gender—there is no compulsion for them to do so—so it is difficult to get a clear picture of what is going on and what support is being given. I gather that only five regional development agencies have appointed an officer specifically to deal with this policy aspect. It is possible that more of those officers will soon be on the way; I do not know. I would be interested in receiving an update.

The second target is for 20 per cent. of UK businesses to be women-owned; a longer-term objective is to try to match the USA figure of about 30 per cent. I would love the Government to succeed in that—and I am happy to say so, even as someone from an Opposition party. Currently, it is difficult to see how the target will be met, because, as has been mentioned, only 15 per cent. of small firms are owned by women. According to the Association of Chartered Certified Accountants, that figure has not changed much during the past 13 years.

The situation in the United States is rather better, and it is worth examining some of the things that have been done there. Since 1979, the number of women who own businesses has quadrupled. The US ensured that gender was added to the business census in 1977. That might sound like a bit of a token effort, but the data from that, and the statistics that were produced, provided an evidence base, so that the progress could be closely monitored. The Office of Women's Business Ownership in the United States Small Business Administration was established in 1978. Then the Women's Business Ownership Act of 1988 put in place long-term infrastructure to support women's enterprise development. Various other Acts were also introduced.

[Sandra Gidley]

What attention has been paid to the success story in the United States? What are we doing to emulate it? One thing that has worked well is a women's enterprise commission, which has real teeth. I will discuss that point a little later.

I have talked about women who are trying to set up their own businesses. It strikes me that we could do a lot more in schools and colleges to provide skills for men and women so that they had the self-confidence to set up their own businesses. Such things are not often learned routinely, and trying to find the help can be a bit of a maze.

The big concern, raised by a number of hon. Members today, is occupational segregation. As has been said, the Equal Opportunities Commission has done a lot of work on that subject. Seven out of 10 employers in the survey agreed that recruiting more young people of the "non-traditional" sex, to use the jargon, would improve their business as a whole. We have seen the statistics: only 8 per cent. of engineers are female, and the situation in the construction industry is appalling.

However, that also works the other way round: only 2 per cent. of workers in the child care industry are male. I pay tribute to the Sure Start website, which is obviously a Government website. It is amazing; every male carer in the country must be on there, because in depicting carers it shows a good picture of ethnic and gender diversity. If engineering firms could take it as an example, that might be helpful. As I was looking at many of the engineering and recruitment bodies' websites, I realised that there were very few pictures. I was half expecting lots of men in hard hats, and there were a few of those, but those websites were very boring and unsexy, and would not encourage anybody, male or female, into the sector unless they were already committed.

Unfortunately, most women work in occupations referred to as the five Cs: cleaning, catering, caring, cashiering and clerical work. Clearly we know our place, girls! Such jobs are traditionally badly paid, and our concern about that is shared by the Government. The Secretary of State for Education spoke at the launch event and pointed out that > "Occupations with a high number of vacancies very often have gender imbalances. For example, six per cent of all skill shortage vacancies are in skilled construction occupations—where 99 per cent. of the workforce is male. Conversely, seven per cent. of skill shortage vacancies are in personal service occupations within health and social work—where 90 per cent. of the workforce is female."

Clearly, it is in employers' interests to widen the pool from which they recruit.

The "14–19 Education and Skills" White Paper contained proposals to improve the quality and range of information, advice and guidance available to teenagers. However, I have to ask whether that is a bit too late, and whether it is happening on the ground. Gender stereotyping starts early, and can affect young people's work placements. There is a lot of evidence to show that girls would quite like to try a job in a non-traditional area—to taste it, as it were—but they are not encouraged to do so. A lot of schools find work placements a bit of a drag anyway, and that seems a very negative attitude.

I was interested in the comments made by the hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Sarah McCarthy-Fry) about single-sex education and science. It was slightly different for me in my day. I insisted on doing physics because that meant that I could go to the boys school; a slightly different motivation was involved, and perhaps that is another way of looking at the problem. I thought that I would be with a few nice sixth form boys, but had not appreciated that I would have to run the gauntlet of every pre-pubescent boy in the school. That was a daunting experience for a shy 16-year-old, but I stuck with it.

The lack of role models does not help. Where are the sexy female scientists? I concede that we could also ask, "Where are the sexy male scientists?" A lot of young people are attracted to the softer, slightly trendy aspects of work, and we do not do enough to make them realise the contribution that they could make in other areas. There are some very good role models, whom we should promote a lot more.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I should say to the hon. Lady that the Institute of Physics—under the guidance of Julia King, who is now doing something important at Imperial college, London—has done a huge amount to recruit mentors from the world of physics, particularly women mentors, to go out into schools. That programme is complemented by the Government-funded science and engineering ambassador scheme programme, which is run under the auspices of the science, engineering, technology and mathematics network, SETNET, and the Engineering and Technology Board. Some 10,000 young people—I emphasise the fact that they are young—working in science, engineering and technology belong to the programme and are available if teachers need to know about a particular area. They are just a telephone call away, via their local government office.

Sandra Gidley: I am aware that there are a huge number of worthy and worthwhile initiatives. Where are the scientists in the media? We live in a media-oriented society, and they could make young people say, "Yes, that's what I want to do." The hon. Lady is involved with the organisation Wise—Women into Science and Engineering. Unfortunately, my daughter did not become a scientist. Probably the fact that she has two scientific parents put her completely off that sector. She had experience of Wise, and one sad aspect was that the school chose the brighter pupils to go on the Wise bus—a reflection more on the school than on Wise. The earlier point about encouraging technologists and people to take up trades that involve using their hands was well made. We need to make sure that we reach all young girls in school, rather than just those who are regarded as high flyers.

Many girls do not know what problems are involved. They do not realise that they will be earning much less than others when they choose to enter a female-oriented profession. The equation is simple: the more men in a sector, the higher the wages. The message is not that difficult to get across. Had they been aware of the pay levels, 67 per cent. of young women would have considered a wider range of career options. A lot of good company initiatives are taken up by schools. IBM holds a week-long event to which it encourages schools to send groups of teenage girls. It does not concentrate on pure science. It encourages women into that industry in a range of roles. Such initiatives are worthy. Other firms could be encouraged to consider the examples that have been cited already today.

The EOC highlighted the fact that many mothers and carers work part-time for low pay. Reference has been made to the pay gap. Those women cannot find high-productivity work that can be combined with family responsibilities, and many are working below their potential. That may be a pragmatic decision in many cases for such women, but the fact that they are paid less is a problem, as is the fact that they are not trained. They fall further behind, and when they want to re-adapt to full-time work, they often have lost confidence. We need to find ways of improving things for those with softer skills.

Let us consider the acute problem in the information technology and electronic communication sectors. Throughout the industry, 23 per cent. of employees are women, of which 9 per cent. are at the higher level. It is a fast-growing area, but in 10 years' time there will be a big increase in job vacancies not only in that industry, but in related industries that need such skills. Women are well placed to fill the positions, but the number of them in the sector has decreased over recent years, which is a real problem. The drain of women over a certain age is a particular problem. The more we can do to reverse the trend, the better.

I want to draw attention to an initiative called Equalitec, sponsored by the European Union and the Department of Trade and Industry. It works with the university of Bath and engineering organisations to help women overcome the barriers to re-entry into employment after a career break by creating opportunities for professional and job-based training. The number of women involved is small, but we should encourage that initiative. If the Minister can outline further developments in that direction, it would be useful.

All the evidence shows that girls perform much better at schools and universities, but as soon as they start work—even a couple of years after graduating—they face a pay gap of about 4 per cent. We are clearly not making the most of women's skills. I sincerely wish the Government every success in trying to reverse that trend. Thirty years ago, the Equal Pay Act 1970 came into force, and I did not think then that my daughter would be facing some of the same problems as I faced years ago. Sadly, she is—but we need to make sure that our granddaughters, at least, do not face the same problems too.

4.55 pm

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): Hon. Members present in the Chamber today all take it for granted that maximising women's skills in the UK economy is important—indeed, essential. Sadly, it is not taken for granted in the business world and the economic world generally, nor, entirely, within the political world. Today we have had an opportunity to prove that it is necessary to maximise women's skills in the UK economy, and the excellent speeches made by various speakers have done that. Not only is it right in altruistic terms that women should have equal opportunities, equal job satisfaction, equal pay and lifestyles equal in interest to men's—I could add to that list—but, more importantly, there is an economic imperative to maximise women's skills in the economy. I am therefore glad to have this opportunity to highlight some of the problems—and the solutions—in this area of our national life.

Soon, we shall debate the Equality Bill, which passed all its stages in the House of Lords yesterday and which will go some way to creating the correct climate and legislative framework for equal employment practices. There has been much emphasis today on encouraging women to become involved in traditional male jobs and professions. It was particularly interesting to hear what the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) said about construction and engineering. All her remarks were valid and I entirely agree with her, having had some experience myself of the construction industry. I have also had experience of the legal profession—I am a lapsed solicitor—and perhaps it was my time as a solicitor in the construction industry that finally finished me off so that I ended up here, but it is probably not right to extrapolate from the personal to the general.

Although it has been interesting to explore one particular aspect of the topic—women being excluded for one reason or another from traditionally male jobs and professions—there is a far more general point to be considered. We need women in the economy, because without women using their skills to the limit of their potential our economy does not function as it should. The Minister illustrated that well in her opening remarks with certain stunning statistics, particularly the ones relating to GDP.

As legislators we must take three essential elements into account. First, it is necessary to provide equality of opportunity in education and training for women and girls. Secondly, it is necessary to provide incentives to work, as opposed to incentives not to work. Thirdly, it is essential to remove the barriers that prevent or restrict women's participation in economic activity. The Government have taken some good measures—again, we have consensus. In debates such as this I try to bring in a little political disagreement because that is the spice of life in Parliament, but increasingly I find myself in agreement with the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) and with the Minister, because we are all doing our best to get a good end result in legislation and the legislative framework. However, as I always do, I warn the Government that if they go too far in introducing conditions and restrictions on employment, employers will not employ women in the first place—they will find some reason not to employ them. If there are three good candidates for a job and one is a woman who might have a child, the woman will not get the job if the employer feels that they cannot cope with increased conditions of employment around, for example, maternity leave.

I am not saying that we should not have the sort of conditions that we have been discussing recently and those that currently apply—of course we must. There must be protection of the employee, as well as incentives for employers to employ women and for women to work, but we must be careful not to let the pendulum swing too far. I think in particular of the recent much publicised cases of women who worked for large, wealthy corporations in the financial services sector in the City and who earned considerable amounts of money. Their unfair dismissal cases were clearly valid: large compensation payments have been awarded and if the court said that such payments were right in those cases, they were right. However, the result of those cases may well be that other women find it more difficult to get the opportunity to take on jobs at that level. I can think of relevant anecdotes but shall not repeat them, because anecdotes do not make good statistics and are not reliable, but we all know of promotion boards or employers that will not take on a woman in case they become involved in an expensive sex discrimination case. I am not saying that we should not go on fighting the battle. I am merely saying that we must be careful that the benefits, support, encouragement and legal rights that we give to women in the work force do not go so far that opportunities for women in the work force are diminished.

[Mrs. Eleanor Laing]

The first of my essential elements is education and training. The hon. Members for Plymouth, Devonport (Alison Seabeck), for Portsmouth, North (Sarah McCarthy-Fry) and for Crosby discussed the subject extremely well, particularly the hon. Member for Portsmouth, North, who spoke about single-sex teaching and the hon. Member for Crosby, who spoke about specialist schools. Much can be done and in recent years a great deal of progress has been made toward achieving equality of opportunity in education for young men and women, but we all know that when they get into their early 20s and go past training into mainstream employment, the equality that they might have experienced until then diminishes considerably.

The second essential element is an incentive to work. The greatest incentive to work is a proper rate of pay for the job that is being done, and that of course means equal pay. We are indebted to the Fawcett Society and the Equal Opportunities Commission for the work that they have done on this subject. Some of the figures that have come out recently are shocking. We have become a bit complacent—we assumed that the Equal Pay Act has worked and is working, but as the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) said, we will need an Equal Pay Act for many years to come to safeguard the position of women in employment. Her examples from the legal profession were absolutely fascinating. I found it difficult to believe what the hon. and learned Lady was saying about the pay gap between male and female solicitors until I realised that the statistics reflect the fact that far more men work in the so-called prestigious, high-powered jobs, notably in large City law firms where salaries are far higher than, for example, in firms of solicitors practising family law, conveyancing or probate law in the provinces. There is a considerable earnings gap, and it deserves to be taken into account.

I cannot leave the subject without mentioning the Minister's pay, or lack thereof. I mean that in the most positive way possible—I am not criticising the hon. Lady. However, it makes me angry that the Prime Minister has decided that the one job in Government on which a Minister must work so hard in such a difficult role and in such a hard-working Department without receiving a salary is that of Minister for Women and Equality. It is so hypocritical it hardly bears repeating. I had better not praise the hon. Lady too much, because it might be counter-productive. I know how hard she works as a Minister because I am usually there to challenge her on what she does. Hon. Members on the Government Benches will not criticise their Prime Minister, so I shall do it for them. They cannot possibly think it right that all other Ministers are paid a salary but the Minister for Women and Equality is not. I hope that the Prime Minister will change that one day, but I realise that if I say much more about it, it will be an incentive for him not to do so.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I for one shall not be reticent. It is quite appalling, but I thank God that the Labour party has professed to be a body never of perfection but of work in progress. I hope that it will progress to the point where it acknowledges the right of this fantastic woman to be paid for the job that she does.

Mrs. Laing: The hon. Lady makes a good point. I hope that the Prime Minister is listening, although I very much doubt that he is.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I shall send him a copy of Hansard.

Mrs. Laing: To return to my speech, the second important incentive is pensions. The pensions system is an utter scandal, as even the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions has admitted, and successive Governments have failed to deal with women's pensions. It is a scandal that one in four women pensioners in Britain live in poverty. They do so because the system simply does not work. It could be made to work, but does not because it does not take into consideration the different work patterns of women and men. Women have to build into their lives the bearing of children, whereas men do not. I do not see why we do not keep emphasising that fact. The production of the next generation is just as important a job as any other undertaken by any person in our society, yet it has been given scant consideration. Women of my mother's generation, who gave up work to look after their homes and families and who were dependent on their husbands, can find themselves with almost no income at all when they are widowed or divorced. It is utterly scandalous. I give the Government credit for considering that issue and I hope that the Turner commission will produce sensible proposals that we can put into action as soon as possible.

The third of my essential elements is the removal of barriers to employment and to promotion for women in the work force. Employees need flexibility. Flexibility in employment and accounting for the work-life balance must apply not only to women, but throughout the work force. A large proportion of people have caring responsibilities. It is not only babies and children who have to be cared for, but elderly and sick relatives and non-relatives—people's caring duties are not confined to caring for members of their own family. A lot of people have caring duties that we as a society require them to undertake. It is essential that employers sometimes be required and always be encouraged to take that into account, not only because that is right in altruistic terms in a decent, caring society, but because the work force require it. If an employer has taken someone on and trained them to do a job to the upper limit of their skills and that person has responsibilities outside the workplace that we, as a decent society, want them to undertake because it is the right thing to do, the employer must be encouraged to take that into consideration, whether the employee is a man or woman, a mother, father, child, daughter or carer of another kind. Otherwise, they will lose the employee's services and that is bad for the economy. The Minister said that the economy is operating below its productivity potential simply because women are not contributing to their full potential. It is not rocket science—the hon. Member for Crosby might tell me that it is rocket science or some other kind of science—to work out that if all employers were encouraged to do what good employers already do, good employees would be able to give more back.

That brings me to the appalling discrimination regarding part-time workers' pay, which shows that we as a society do not value people who work part-time and that we think that they are not committed. There is this macho thing about commitment to the job, but commitment is not always about the number of hours put in; it can be about the amount of work done within the hours of work.

Alison Seabeck: Does the hon. Lady agree that women who work part-time often struggle to make it to work in circumstances in which their full-time colleagues might say, "I'm not feeling very well; I'll take a day off," because they feel obliged to be there?

Mrs. Laing: Yes I do. The hon. Lady is absolutely correct. Although the difficulties related to part-time work such as the need for flexibility affect all workers, they affect women disproportionately, so that issue is wholly relevant to our debate.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: Picking up on the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Alison Seabeck), does the hon. Lady agree that many women who work part-time are doing full-time jobs in part-time hours?

Mrs. Laing: I certainly do. That is a point well made.

The time has passed in which the economy was satisfied by women either having a child or going out to work. That was the norm 50 years ago, in the post-war years when our economy was not strong and did not develop as it should and when it was accepted that women who worked would stop working if they had children. We see a hangover from that in the present attitudes of society and some employers. Having a child is not an add-on luxury for women, it is necessary for the future of our society and economy. To return to the pensions issue, we have a demographic time bomb waiting to go off. By the time that most of the people who are in the Room this afternoon are of pensionable age, there will not be enough young people working to provide pensions. At the moment, the balance is correct, but by then it will not be. Women today have to produce the next generation, have proper jobs and have the chance to work to their full potential.

I am pleased that we will soon be considering the Equality Bill. I am sure that during the consideration of that Bill we will revisit some of the issues that we have discussed today. I have not mentioned child care—strangely, it has not been much talked about in this afternoon's debate—but removing barriers to employment and advancement in employment requires the establishment of a structure of affordable child care at all levels of employment. Efficient health care, too, is essential. All those structures are necessary to ensure that we have a work force who achieve their full potential.

Yesterday, the Conservative party held a women's conference in which we discussed serious issues, such as those that we have discussed this afternoon and drugs. We had extremely good speakers from the Equal Opportunities Commission, the Fawcett Society and even from the England cricket team—an excellent lady called Clare Connor who was captain of the successful women's cricket team that brought back the Ashes. Did you, Sir John, read about any of that discussion in the newspapers this morning? No. The media chose to report that Conservative women discussed the underwear of the two leadership candidates. That, I assure the Chamber, was not the case—it was a 10-second jokey throwaway on Radio 4. When we discuss important issues relating to women in the economy, in the work force and in our society, we have a right to be taken seriously.

5.17 pm

Meg Munn: This has been an excellent, illuminating and interesting debate. I hope that hon. Members will forgive me for indicating that I will not take interventions because I have a great number of notes from which I want to respond to the extremely interesting and wide range of points that have been made. I shall already have to go at something of a gallop to get through them all.

The hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) should not apologise for so much consensus, because women can make common cause across political parties on these enormously important issues.

The issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Alison Seabeck) about training and education are enormously important. Barriers that women face must be broken down, and one way in which that can be done is by ensuring that young girls have access to the right skills, such as those who I have seen at the Turves Green girls school and technology college in Birmingham, which I first visited three years ago when I was on the Select Committee on Education and Skills. That college actively seeks to encourage its pupils to engage with technology, design and the science curriculum and also to take their designs on into enterprise. I was so impressed—it is probably the best work that I have seen in a school anywhere—that when we held our EU gender conference in Birmingham earlier this week, I had no hesitation in making that college one of the projects to which we took the EU Ministers to see what can be done and how girls can be inspired.

[Meg Munn]

My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Sarah McCarthy-Fry) asked whether we should teach girls in single-sex classes in those subjects. I think that the best approach is to make the teaching of science, engineering and technology much more relevant to all pupils. The new science curriculum, which will come in from 2006, aims to do just that.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), who has since had to leave the Chamber, raised IT issues. We know that in many traditional areas the culture can be oppressively male, but I hope he did not leave because he felt that the culture in the Room was oppressively female. However, I am assured by his note that that was not the reason. For his benefit, I can put it on record that the e-skills Sector Skills Council for IT has recently rolled out nationally it pilots of computer clubs for girls, which offer fun and educational activities. The council has been successful in getting girls aged 10 to 14 interested in IT. Initial research suggests that 66 per cent. of participants are now considering careers in IT.

My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North rightly identified the global competition that we face. As a result of competitive pressures, new entrants into IT must become more productive more quickly than in the past. The DTI is aware of the issues facing the IT industry and has published reports about women in IT, which have discussed the importance of the business case for diversity and how to retain women in that sphere.

On the crucial issue of skills and qualifications, up to a fifth of the productivity gap between the United Kingdom and its main competitors can be explained by the UK having a lower stock of human capital, especially at NVQ level. We are having some success attracting women on to foundation degree courses. The skills White Paper was also aimed at allowing women to acquire level 2 qualifications, because we know that 45 per cent. of women who are not working do not have a level 2 qualification. We are also giving priority support to level 3.

The Government have taken steps in response to the EOC's recommendations on apprenticeships. The Learning and Skills Council publishes annual data on apprenticeships by sector, gender, race and disability. An apprenticeship marketing campaign has been set up to promote non-traditional sectors of work. The Government are giving further thought to how we can provide a challenge on this issue, rather than replicate occupational segregation, as the EOC rightly identified.

Much of the debate focused on non-traditional work for women. My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North referred to the image of manufacturing. The DTI has established a body as part of the Engineering Forum to consider the image of manufacturing to make it more attractive to all young people, especially to girls and young women.

Last week, the Government announced the establishment of a manufacturing academy, where the industry will determine how it trains the people needed to fill the current 48,000 vacancies in manufacturing. There is a good business and economic case for the arguments that have been put forward today.

Role models are important in all jobs. I pay tribute to all the women present, as I am sure they have been role models in their previous careers. That is of great interest and pertinent to the debate. Role models are particularly important in non-traditional jobs. I am pleased that many companies are interested in what they can do and how they can use women to plug their skills gap. I have learned that a major civil engineering company, Ove Arup, is keen to recruit women and to increase the number of its women graduate employees. It has just produced its new 2006 calendar, with images of women in highly skilled roles, all of whom are fully clothed. British Gas is training female gas fitters, because that is often what their female customers want.

There is some good news on higher technical qualifications. The NHS employs 55,000 scientists—I am not talking about doctors and nurses—33,000 of whom are women. They work in highly skilled jobs, such as medical physics and the design of sophisticated equipment to help disabled people.

There are also some positive trends in some professions, even if not in that of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird). Graduates in medicine and allied subjects, such as bioscience and veterinary science, are now 60 to 70 per cent. female. That is positive, but engineering and physical science remain harder nuts to crack.

Science, engineering and technology are very important, but we know that the overwhelming majority of people with high-level degrees in those subjects are male, especially those who have high-level degrees in subjects such as physics and IT, to which I have already referred. The picture is improving as more girls choose to study those subjects at university, but problems remain in subjects such as physics where progress has been slow, although I am not sure whether we should replicate the motivation of the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley), who wanted to do physics in order to go to a boys' school.

The Government are promoting science, engineering and technology for women in schools, universities and after, through the UK Resource Centre and through schemes such as the science and engineering ambassadors programme, in which female participation is now about 35 per cent.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) rightly wanted to know about our funding of the excellent UK Resource Centre. The original contract would have ended in April 2007. Its total funding was £4.1 million, but it has been extended to the end of March 2008 and its total funding will now be £6.9 million.

My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North talked about the problems of women losing confidence outside the workplace. The UK Resource Centre has a programme of £1.5 million, ring-fenced for women returning to work, which includes the full funding of an Open university course to provide advice and information to women returners.

The Daphne Jackson Trust and its excellent work in getting well qualified women back into professional jobs were also mentioned. I am delighted to confirm that the DTI directly supports it and will continue to do so, certainly for the time being.

Hon. Members rightly spoke about the pay gap and the shocking statistics that show the difficulties of closing it. I pay tribute to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar whose illustrations and stories went beyond what I can do in the short time left to me.

The DTI has considered part-time working and has commissioned research called "The Part-Time Pay Penalty". The pay differential between women working full-time and women working part-time in occupations is very small. The occupation segregation of women working part-time and women working full-time explains most of the part-time pay penalty: that is, part-time jobs are in low-skill areas.

The hon. Member for Romsey highlighted the important issue of culture and how we can change it.Women in enterprise is an enormously important area, and the Government view the development of women's enterprise in the UK as an economic imperative. Women are hugely under-represented in enterprise and often offer a massive and largely untapped resource.

We talked about the regional development agencies and their role. They are key players, and I am delighted that some RDAs are taking the issue more seriously. The East Midlands Development Agency has appointed a women's champion, and Yorkshire Forward, which is in my own neck of the woods, has included diversity as a key priority in its recently revised regional economic strategy, on which I commented. Skills form an essential part of the approach, and RDAs will take action, such as encouraging more women into technology or craft-based careers, to promote qualifications and careers in key areas to non-traditional entrants.

The hon. Member for Epping Forest rightly expressed concern about restrictions and costs that might prevent employers from employing people. My argument is that protecting the investment in women employees makes sense, and that some companies, such as BT and Ford, already get many returners into employment by doing that.

Tackling occupational segregation and the gender pay gap is the right thing to do, not only because it is fair, but because it makes economic sense. Maximising women's skills in the economy could bring economic benefits worth up to 3 per cent. of GDP, which equates to the total value of UK exports to Germany. I leave that thought in Members' minds as we finish the debate.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Five o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Tuesday 15 November 2005

[SIR NICHOLAS WINTERTON in the Chair]

Secondary Education Reform

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Coaker.]

9.30 am

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): I welcome the opportunity to have this debate. No doubt there will be several debates over coming months on secondary education. I start by saying that the White Paper, "Higher Standards, Better Schools For All", is not a panacea for all the problems in secondary education, but it is an important tool that will create opportunities to tackle them. We must recognise that all communities are different and therefore all schools will be different. To treat them all the same would be to ignore the reality on the ground. I hope that the Government do not want all schools to be the same, because such an approach would simply fail, but they should aim for high standards in all our schools.

This morning, I shall explore how secondary education can be reformed using the tools available now and tools in the White Paper. I shall consider more closely the curriculum, the quality of teaching, leadership, parental involvement, the choice agenda and admissions policy, and the role of local education authorities.

One aspect that demands close attention is the curriculum in our schools. There is plenty of evidence that there is a dip in performance in the early years of secondary education. The difficulty faced by teachers is the wide range of pupil maturity at that age. That calls for specialist key stage 3 teachers, and perhaps a change in emphasis on how pupils learn in order to maintain their interest at that early stage. Any review that takes place should bear in mind the developing 14-to-19 agenda. Given that 75 per cent. of pupils achieve key stage 2 level 4 or above, but only 50 per cent. achieve the desired level at key stage 4, something is clearly going wrong.

Many educationists were disturbed by the dismissal of Mike Tomlinson's report. Many believe that the rot sets in here: the great British disease is the artificial distinction between academic and vocational qualifications. Generally, bright pupils study for the former and the less able for the latter. As a result, our whole post-16 qualifications system reflects our society's prejudice against vocational skills and crafts in favour of more academic routes of learning. Our society is crying out for more skilled tradespeople, but we do not want that career for our children; we want it for someone else's. Reform of the post-14 curriculum could help to solve that very British problem.

I am a firm believer in supporting members of the teaching profession. The Minister knows my background. I want to put it firmly on the record that no teacher ever goes into a classroom to deliver a bad lesson or deliberately not to control the class and create a healthy learning environment. Sometimes, however, lessons are not as good as they should be and teachers do not control the class so that every child can learn. It is the duty of the school to ensure that teachers are well prepared and operate effectively. Every teacher should undertake self-evaluation and review after every lesson. That is what we are trained to do, but school managers need to make it a reality.

To give parents confidence in a school, there should be regular visits by head teachers and heads of department to observe classroom teaching. That should not be the job of Ofsted. Ofsted should spend its time considering the management of the school, including how quality is maintained through self-evaluation. Its visits should be unannounced, so that it can see how schools really work day in, day out. Educational outcomes, not inspections, should be the measure of success. If schools adopted continuous improvement, got their processes right and worried less about external assessment, they would be following the more successful models of businesses that know that the consumer is ultimately the one in command.

The success of a school is more often than not determined by the quality of the head teacher and other school leaders. The Government are right to support heads through the training college. If there were a magic wand to improve secondary schools, it would lie with better heads and top-performing managers of our schools. They command parental support and pupil respect and create a culture in which learning takes place and they can set a direction to make a difference for every single child.

I am encouraged by the view taken in the White Paper that federated schools can help change those that are currently underperforming. However, I am also aware of how that might stretch even the very best of head teachers. I would also like the Minister to explore how the Government's plans for greater independence of secondary schools fit with a model of federation and co-operation.

School leadership is not just the remit of the head teacher. Senior managers also make a huge difference to schools. I accept that they have their own areas of interest, such as curriculum planning, discipline or quality evaluation, and it is vital that the Government provide resources for top-level training opportunities for those staff, because not only do they have an important role to play now, but they are the next generation of head teachers.

If, as a result of the White Paper, schools are to have even greater independence, specialist management support will be needed, such as the greater use of bursars or business managers. The Government should look at the private sector to learn lessons in that area—few private schools do not have their own bursars. Head teachers do not go into their career with the aim of managing a school's finances, so let us encourage the employment of bursars, provide extra training through the National College for School Leadership, and enable heads to spend more of their time on the quality and effectiveness of teaching. I know that that is not an issue that was raised in the White Paper, but it is one that can help to reform schools, without the need for fresh legislation.

[Mr. Michael Foster]

Parental involvement in schools offers real opportunities but I know that to some it poses real threats. I have heard many people say that we cannot have parents telling teachers what to do or how to run a school. At the same time, I have heard the view that parents typically cannot be bothered to get involved.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The White Paper anticipates a requirement that trust schools will appoint parent councils and hopes that non-trust schools will do something similar. My experience of 20 years as a school governor in two local secondary schools shows that it is immensely difficult to get parents involved in annual general meetings, annual report meetings and other types of administration if their own child is not directly involved. Does my hon. Friend agree?

Mr. Foster: I accept that, but I think that it varies from school to school. In my experience as a school governor, at times one was co-opting people on to the governing body, and at other times elections had to be held. That goes back to the point that I made earlier about every community and every school being different, and the need for the Government to recognise that in relation to the ideas that are put forward in the White Paper.

I do not accept the argument that parents do not want to get involved, nor do I accept the argument that they want to take over schools. As a parent, I have had the frustration of seeing something wrong in the running of a school but not having the right forum in which to express my concerns. However, I have also spent quite a lot of time as a teacher at parents evenings waiting to see the parents whom I really wanted to see about their child's progress.

I think that parent councils will work, although I would like to see a few of them in action to make a proper assessment. As my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) said, the White Paper implies that they will be used for independent school trusts, but I would like to see them in all schools. They should not have the formality of a governors meeting, but nor should they be like a parent-teacher association. I am convinced of the need for clear protocols on the relationship between parent councils, governing bodies and head teachers. Perhaps those protocols should be set out in legislation.

I welcome the plan to hold termly parents evenings, with proper reporting on pupils' achievements. I know how valuable those meetings can be in helping teachers to learn more about particular pupils—my own teaching was greatly improved as a result of spending time talking to parents. I also accept that, if done properly, that plan will result in the imposition of extra burdens on teaching staff—particularly part-time teaching staff. I therefore have no hesitation in supporting the equivalent of Baker days—we could call them Kelly days—whereby extra days' holiday were given, at the discretion of the head teacher, for attendance at a far greater number of parents' evenings.

I now turn to the choice agenda and the real political debate that is going on. Some say that all parents want is a good local school for their children; if only it were that simple. As Will Hutton pointed out in an excellent article in The Observer last week, some parents will go to extraordinary lengths to distinguish between schools to try to give their child the best possible chance to succeed. I know from my own experience that some parents choose the private route and pay thousands each year for the advantage that it brings their child. Others move house, incurring huge costs to get into the catchment area that maximises the chance of their child getting into a particular school. Some are known to lie about where they live; others find religion.

Choice is a reality and we should not pretend otherwise. Let us have an honest debate about this but let us also accept the brutally harsh fact that it is the better-off who exercise choice. Why? They do so simply because they can. Low incomes eliminate the private solution and living in social housing does not allow for the luxury of the marketplace in order to buy and sell property. A lack of transport and family-unfriendly working hours do not allow for school runs outside local catchment areas.

One high school in Worcester serves two diametrically opposed communities, one of which is the most wealthy community in Worcestershire where 16 per cent. of primary school pupils and 9 per cent. of secondary school pupils opt out of mainstream schools in the Worcester city pyramid. In the neighbouring ward, which is one of the most deprived in Worcestershire, only 1.5 per cent. of pupils opt out of the Worcester city pyramid of schools. That proves that the status quo is condemning less affluent families to schools that are underperforming.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): The hon. Gentleman has indicated that a lot of people exercise choice in a variety of ways and that some people will go to great lengths to exercise their choices. Is he suggesting that the state should facilitate every conceivable choice—for example, the provision of grammar schools if people want them—or does he put a limit on that choice?

Mr. Foster: The hon. Gentleman poses an interesting question. Choice should be made available to parents. Clearly, it will be limited by the capacity of a school to deliver the options that parents want for their child. The system may not have the capacity to deliver a choice for a child with a specialism in a particular field. On the grammar school issue, I do not want to see a return to the unfairness of the selection process at age 11, which determined some pupils' success because they went to a fast-track grammar school, while many others were destined not to succeed because they went to the equivalent of a secondary modern.

Dr. Pugh: The hon. Gentleman has answered my question, "How much choice?" by saying that choice will always be limited by capacity—but the state can decide that capacity, so it has to make a prior decision as to how much choice it will offer. He has not really addressed that issue.

Mr. Foster: Clearly, if we take the most extreme example of one child with a particular specialism, there is no way that the state can cope with providing the perfect education for that child. There will clearly be a compromise, but it is a matter of what is in the best interests of the local community, and of giving parents a semblance of choice. We will have to accept that compromise.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the White Paper would stop parents, acting together, making a new school into a community school? Does the removal of the community school choice extend or narrow parental choice?

Mr. Foster: That is an intriguing question, in that it relates to one controversial aspect of the White Paper. If a new school is to be set up, the White Paper envisages it as being of an independent trust nature; it cannot be a community school. It will be a foundation as opposed to a community school. The Government need to examine that matter closely, but we must accept that not all local education authorities deliver perfect standards for the child through the community system. However, the hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point.

I want more detail on how the White Paper will support less affluent parents in making informed choices about secondary schools. If transport is a problem, bussing is, without doubt, a solution. I know that it conjures up fears about the 1960s racial divide in the United States, but bussing is a fact of life in rural and semi-rural areas. Pupils are bussed to my children's secondary school daily. If buses are used to transport the better-off as well, any social stigma attached to bussing will fail.

Local education authorities as commissioners, not providers, can deliver parental advice, but the choice issue is about more than just social class divides. Central to the whole debate is the question of whether choice helps deliver higher standards. I asked the Library for information on parental choice in the magnet school system in the United States, and it provided an excellent response. An academic review makes it clear that there are greater opportunities to involve parents in monitoring and driving up standards when they can choose secondary schools for academic reasons than would occur if only convenience or location of the school were their motivating factor. That is an obvious but important conclusion.

David Taylor: Does my hon. Friend think that the White Paper is right in marginalising the influence of county hall but strengthening the influence of Whitehall on education?

Mr. Foster: I am not certain that that is what the White Paper does. I know from discussions with my hon. Friend that he rates his LEA highly, but my experience with my LEA is not the same. We come at this from slightly different directions.

I said earlier that no teacher goes into a class to do a bad job.

David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD) rose—

Mr. Foster: I did not think that what I said was that controversial.

David Lepper: My hon. Friend indicated that it is clear that some LEAs are better than others. Does he agree that an underlying problem with the White Paper is the stigmatisation of all LEAs as failing to provide incentives for parental involvement, innovation, success and so on, which many of us witness every day in schools in our own communities?

Mr. Foster: I do not think that the White Paper stigmatises all LEAs. There are examples of good practice in LEAs. Some are delivering many of the items contained in the White Paper. Such models encourage us to believe that some aspects of the White Paper can be achieved, as they are already being delivered by LEAs.

Paul Rowen: Can the hon. Gentleman explain how a choice-based system will improve inner-city schools? He mentions the magnet schools. I worked in an inner city for 15 years and saw the effects of a city technology college. CTCs weakened the surrounding schools, particularly when, as happened in the past, they were given extravagant funds that were not available to other schools.

Mr. Foster: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the advantages that were given to some schools in the early 1990s worked to the detriment of many inner-city schools and areas of deprivation. I shall come to the very point that he raises in a minute or two, if he will be patient.

Parental interest and involvement in a school can encourage teachers and managers to improve what they do. I firmly believe that the basic catchment area admission policy serves merely to trap the poor and to liberate the better-off to move away from bad schools to good ones. Frankly, there is nothing socialist about such a policy. Indeed, it is the very antithesis of what the Labour party should support.

If choice is encouraged, that must be backed up by fair, simple and transparent admissions policies. We should not countenance any system that gives an in-built advantage to the middle classes. They know how to work the system now. Nor should we support types of school that favour only the middle classes. So, as the hon. Gentleman pointed out, any academy created should only be for schools that are significantly underperforming—not the coasting schools, but the ones that are failing the majority of their pupils. I want to make the new schools so good that they will act as a magnet for the middle classes to aspire to get their children into, but with positive admissions policies that will ensure that the less well-off are the ones that benefit the most.

Having worked in both the private and the public sector, I would urge caution on those who think along the lines of some character from Animal Farm, that all private is good and all public is bad. Simply, there are good managers, some in the private sector and some in the public. If we are going to get support and partners, the trick is just to pick the good partners. To reduce the fears of the public being short-changed in the long run, it would be prudent for an academy or trust to be run on a fixed-term contract. The contract might be for five years, obviously with a chance to renew, subject to the meeting of targets that were set for that trust or academy at the start.

We need to be vigilant in securing the best for all our pupils. The US, hardly a socialist utopia, has countless examples of admissions policies that protect the less well-off and deter the creaming off of pupils, such as the quota or banding system that has been described in the White Paper. If middle-class or any other parents get involved in the running of schools, to drive up standards of achievement or just to improve behaviour, not just some but all the pupils benefit.

[Mr. Foster]

I am concerned about the way that admissions will be managed in a system of more independently run schools. The LEA has a key role to play. The White Paper, however, refers to a code of conduct of which schools should be mindful. I am not sure that that is strong enough language or would give the LEA the power to intervene if the system was not working or was being abused. Will the Government support having schools abide by, not just consider, local admissions policies? That would provide firm ground for those who have at heart the best interests of those parents who do not know how best to play the admissions system. If colleagues accept choice as a reality, equal opportunity for that choice to be exercised is essential.

The reality of the situation tells me that LEA-wide admissions policies may not always be most appropriate either, given the variety of local situations. In my county of Worcestershire, we have two-tier and three-tier systems for secondary education. Clearly, those systems are not wholly compatible within the county, and admissions policies are not wholly compatible. Perhaps there should be a district-wide or school-family-wide admissions policy, such as with Worcester city and Martley.

The local education authority is more likely to operate a fair admissions policy as a commissioner rather than a provider of schooling. Some colleagues are fiercely protective of the LEA role in education and see no need to change. Some fear the loss of democratic accountability, but bluntly, if the current role is working, why do the lowest socio-economic groups still suffer from the poorest outcomes? Why are the schools most likely to be underperforming more likely to be based in areas of the most deprivation? If LEAs had cracked this nut, I would be defending the status quo. They have not, and I will not. Indeed, some LEAs make the situation worse.

In Worcestershire, under a Labour-Liberal coalition, under a Tory minority-run administration and now under Tory majority rule, small schools received over-generous financial payments, at the expense of those schools with deprivation needs. Deprivation is a real issue in urban constituencies like mine. I quote Ted Wragg—from a new Labour MP, that must be a first for him—who said that > "poverty kills educational chances by grinding the soul . . . a few thrive, despite the adversity, but most are submerged under the sheer weight of their deprivation".

My LEA singularly fails to respond, having other priorities. There is an argument for supporting small, rural schools, but not any small school. The LEA argues that head teachers support such a local funding formula, but four head teachers of 150-pupil primary schools, receiving a generous subsidy, will always out-vote one head teacher with a 600-pupil primary school.

With the widely welcomed initiative to fund personalised learning, I beg the Minister to break the armlock that local education authorities have on funding. Schools should be funded also by Government according to the school's local needs, not just those of their authority. Small pockets of urban deprivation are masked by relatively prosperous shires, and children in my constituency and those like it suffer. Not all schools in Birmingham are in poor areas, and not all schools in Worcestershire educate the relatively well-off. It is vital to scrap the outdated funding method for core funding and top-ups based on an LEA-level assessment.

In my research for the debate, I considered the magnet school situation and a report by an academic called B.R. Clark from the United States. He came out with an interesting quotation, and I beg to ask leave of the Chamber to read it:

> "When so much depends upon where you live, as in America, equal access is out, made impossible by the neighbourhood monopoly of each comprehensive public high school. To have students choose among distinctive schools, especially under broad district guidelines on student body composition, would certainly promote more genuine equality of opportunity, even as schools become dissimilar and ranked. Hence, charges of elitism made in the current debate against essential schools, magnet schools, charter schools, and other kinds of educational specialty shops have it all wrong. It is in the current structure that elitism runs rampant. Behind the bureaucratic pretense that comprehensive schools are equal schools lies the unquestionable fact that millions of students from poor and minority families living in poor neighbourhoods are held captive in schools that are nowhere near as good as those found in well-off neighbourhoods."

Unfortunately, that was written in 1989. It could have been written today.

Several hon. Members rose—

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): Order. A long list of Members have written in, and clearly the Minister must have time to respond. May I make a very strong plea to Opposition spokesmen to speak at rather less length than they would normally be entitled to, to ensure that as many Back Benchers as possible can get into this very important debate?

9.57 am

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): On the face of it, the White Paper talks the talk. Unfortunately, it does not live up to its promises, and on close scrutiny it does not take long to find some of its flaws. It talks about trust schools being created with new freedoms and powers; however, that provision is already available—for foundation schools.

It is hard to see the difference between the existing provision for foundation schools and the proposals for trust schools. Will the Minister enlighten us and provide us with a list of perhaps five differences, so that when teachers and head teachers say, "We haven't chosen to go down the foundation school road, so why are trust schools different?" we can provide them with some practical differences? That would be helpful.

There are several major flaws in the White Paper. It pledges to reduce bureaucracy on the one hand, but proposes to provide guidance and assistance to schools on the other—in effect, to tell them how they should use their new-found freedoms. That will be done via the Training and Development Agency for Schools.

The White Paper talks about creating a new legal right to enable schools to provide discipline. That is much welcomed, but it is hard to see how that right will comply with the introduction of the national behaviour charter. Surely one contradicts the other.

The White Paper talks about giving parents new powers via parent councils, but as the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) said, funding is firmly in the armlock of the LEA. There will be no real reduction in bureaucracy, and the White Paper in fact provides for increased centralisation.

Another major flaw is the fact that, as the White Paper says:

> "The National Curriculum, the assessment regime and the usual provisions on teachers' pay" will remain the same. They will still apply, and what our children are taught, how and by whom will stay exactly the same. That is particularly disappointing. One would have hoped that the Government would use the opportunity of the White Paper to tackle some major issues facing secondary education.

One of the main problems facing education is that the global economic axis is tilting towards China, India and Brazil. Those countries produce engineers and scientists by the thousand every year. I do not know anyone who doubts that if this country is to compete nationally in a rapidly changing global marketplace we must educate our young people to the highest standards. We must be able to compete in highly knowledge-based and highly skilled industries. Can we do that? Does the education White Paper grasp the challenge?

One challenge is to look at the way in which science is taught in schools. In the majority of state schools science is taught as a dual science subject. In the independent system it is taught as a single science subject. Privately educated people can equip themselves with the skills needed to go to university to study biochemical engineering, medicine, drug research, engineering or a whole host of other courses to position themselves well in the skills marketplace and ensure that they become high earners. Those who go to state schools do not have the same options. Anyone who attends a state school anywhere in the United Kingdom will probably have the chance to study science only at dual level, which does not provide the depth of knowledge required to move on to university.

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): Many, many state school pupils go on to have successful university careers and many students who start off by doing dual science end up doing separate science at A-level. The hon. Lady's blanket criticism is unnecessary.

Mrs. Dorries: Unfortunately, the figures do not back up the hon. Lady's statement. The overwhelming majority of children who go on to university to study science come from the independent sector, not the state sector. To bear that out, only two of the 27 new academies offer science as a single subject.

If children from the state system want to go on to study important subjects that we will need, such as medical innovation and research, they cannot. Why did the Government in their White Paper not grasp that challenge and offer heads the opportunity to change the curriculum in their schools or to adapt the curriculum so that they could offer those subjects? Why did the Government not use their most relevant and important White Paper to tackle some of the real issues of inequality in our education system today? Instead, the White Paper is full of politically correct words such as "pivotal reforms" and "removing barriers", which mean nothing. There are no real reforms behind the glossy words to back up the rhetoric and, unfortunately, it is largely a testament to spin. If the Government really believe that market-based reform is the way to improve schools, surely they would empower head teachers to prepare children to compete in the changing labour marketplace and allow them to change the curriculum. The nation needs those skills if it is to remain competitive.

The hon. Member for Worcester said that all schools were different and he was right, but all children are the same. Our young people are the message we send to the future. They are all aspirational. The message that the White Paper sends is that the Government got it wrong for eight years and when they tried to put it right they got it wrong again. They missed the best opportunity they had to make the necessary change in how our schools operate and they thought that media studies, not science, was the essential economy-enhancing subject of the future. One must ask what has been happening for eight years.

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): Will the hon. Lady acknowledge that the creative industries are a growth sector and that they are the fastest growing sector for employment? Subjects other than science are important.

Mrs. Dorries: I acknowledge that they are a growth sector, but they will not enable us to challenge China, India and Brazil, which are dominating the growth market at the moment. The creative industries may be a growth sector in the UK, but I doubt whether they are in the world economy.

The White Paper would not be on the table today if it had the teeth needed to meet our challenges for the future. I wish that the Government had embraced the needs of tomorrow and enabled schools to meet the challenges that they sometimes fail to meet. I wish that there was some real promise for children in schools who are aspirational and want to work in highly paid industries. I wish that it had offered them those challenges; I am afraid that it does not.

Several hon. Members rose—

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): Order. If hon. Members restrict their comments to five minutes, all those who want to speak will be called.

10.5 am

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): I will be brief, Sir Nicholas. I simply want to make three main points. In spite of the difficulties with the presentation of the White Paper to many Labour Members and many of our colleagues in the country—Labour councillors, school governors and members of our party—we must draw a distinction between the political management of the White Paper and its content. First and foremost, it is important to say that 75, 80, or 85 per cent. of the content of the White Paper will be widely welcomed by parents, members of our party and the wider public. The sections that deal with freeing up the curriculum, school discipline, reform and improvements to the work force and parental involvement—although there are some problems there—are eminently sensible. My only regret is that we did not have a White Paper like this eight years ago so that we could have made even more improvements to our system in the time that we have been in office.

[Mr. David Chaytor]

The White Paper contains an enormous amount that is good, welcome and long overdue. However, there is the question of structural change. I welcome the fact that the Government finally recognise that structures and standards are related. The issues involved in the structural change are hugely controversial. My fear is that, as the White Paper is written—with the new system of trusts—we could easily be led down a road that would mean that Britain had the most stratified and segregated system of secondary education in Europe. If schools are to be given greater autonomy and greater powers, if we are to have a greater range of providers in the system, and if competition is to be injected to a greater degree than before, it is critical that there are counterbalancing measures to ensure that the energy and innovation that are released are used and developed for the public good, for the good of the local community and in the national interest.

It is critical that there is clarity about what new powers are being given to local education authorities and particularly about how the schools commissioner is going to do his or her work. I want to dwell on that for a moment. There seems to be a big gap in the description of the trusts and how they might work. How do we prevent some schools—the most dynamic schools, the schools that happen to have energetic head teachers and supportive governing bodies—from simply acquiring the best and most influential trusts and therefore moving forward in a way that will simply widen the gap between schools that are already strong and schools that are less strong?

The White Paper makes some reference to the role of the schools commissioner and says that he will work, in particular, with schools in underprivileged and disadvantaged areas. However, it does not say that the trusts idea will be targeted specifically to give strength to the schools that need it most. We must include in the forthcoming education Bill something that makes it clear that we are about helping, supporting and building up the strength and status of schools that are currently in the weakest position.

It follows that the key to the success of a more autonomous school system is the admissions policy. The White Paper is clear about the need for a fair admissions policy. I welcome the fact that our election manifesto earlier this year also gave great prominence to the concept of fair admissions. Sadly, as things stand, we have not yet quite defined what a fair admissions policy is. I endorse the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) about the need for the national code of practice on school admissions to be made mandatory—that is to say, for schools to have to comply with it rather than just have regard to it. However, that will work only if the content of the code is worth complying with and will lead to greater equality of opportunity.

Nia Griffith: Is my hon. Friend, like me, puzzled by the three-year limit on the admissions policy? It seems that the idea of having an admissions policy is washed away if, after three years, schools can do what they like. If some schools are scrabbling for the brightest pupils, that may leave other schools out in the cold. That would completely distort the balanced picture that the admissions policy is supposed to support.

Mr. Chaytor: I agree completely. The three-year limit is a recipe for further instability in the system, and it must go.

I am not sure whether I have earned an additional minute, Sir Nicholas, as a result of the intervention or whether the same rules apply in Westminster Hall as in the House. I shall bring my remarks to a close, however, because I know that other hon. Members wish to speak.

The White Paper refers to the use of banding. I am not sure that that is a panacea, as banding brings its own difficulties. However, if we genuinely believe in fair admissions and balanced intakes, the new code of practice must be clearer and more specific. Given that the Government have recently completed a consultation on the new draft code of practice, it would be absolutely inconsistent for the revised code to be published before the proposed education Bill goes through the House. I hope that the Minister will assure us that the revision of the code of practice on admissions will not be published until the House has fully scrutinised the Bill.

10.11 am

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): I thank the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) for initiating the debate. The publication of the White Paper means that this is a timely opportunity to debate the reform of secondary education.

How will the White Paper raise standards in inner-city schools, which has been the key issue in my career so far? I ask that as someone who has been a teacher for 28 years, 25 of which have been spent at inner-city schools. I was a deputy headmaster at a large secondary school for 15 years.

The White Paper, by concentrating on structures, misses the point. The Government did much good work in their early years, when they concentrated on what was going on in the classroom, on the processes and on what they could do to improve what pupils are taught. I mention the early years strategy, the literacy hour, the numeracy hour, key stage 3, specialist schools and the leadership incentive grant, which was beneficial where I was working.

The Government have now moved away from that good work. The White Paper, in contrast, talks about self-governing schools, trusts and weakening the role of the LEAs. How will those measures improve what is happening in the classroom?

I worked for 15 years in Bradford. Choice is available for the few in the inner cities. It is okay for the rich, the middle class and those in the know, but the Government are offering choice as a panacea without doing anything to improve standards, and that is totally fallacious. I worked in south Bradford, where there are six secondary schools, of which one was a city technology college. Under a Conservative Government, we had to put up with the fact that that school was given exorbitant resources and a preferential admissions policy. The effect of that policy was to weaken the other five secondary schools in south Bradford. That is not the situation now. Those six schools have been working together for the past few years. Indeed, last year I was the improvement grant co-ordinator for those schools.

However, one of those six schools is a former CTC and three were in serious weakness or special measures last year. The problems that they faced—they faced them together because they were working as a federation—are common: the inability to recruit and retain the right staff, problems with the condition of the buildings, and so on. I read the White Paper and say, "What are you doing to improve standards?" I am afraid that I see precious little being done.

The role of the LEA is crucial in improving standards. The Government have an obsession with the private sector; I compare Bradford LEA, which is privatised, with the LEA in my constituency of Rochdale, both of which were put on special measures at the same time. Last year, Rochdale, which is still a genuine LEA, had the fastest-improving rate of key stage 4 results and this year its key stage 2 results had the fastest improvement in the country. There are no secondary schools in Rochdale in special measures and it is introducing the "Every Child Matters" agenda by bringing social services and education departments together in one body.

I compare Rochdale with Bradford LEA. It has academies, takes part in every experiment that the Government want and has made only modest progress. Last year, 11 secondary schools in Bradford had serious weaknesses or were in special measures. In terms of its progress, which is shown in the results table, it is in the middle of the league. The progress in Bradford is nowhere near that in Rochdale.

What worries me about the White Paper is that it does not address the fundamental problems that areas in inner cities such as Bradford need to address: the need for sustained investment and co-operation, not competition. We had 18 years of competition under the Tories and it did absolutely nothing for secondary education in Bradford.

I want the Government to look closely at what choice means. If it is choice for the few at the expense of the majority, or if it means even one of the six schools being left languishing and the children in it not getting the benefits of the education that they deserve, and which others receive, that is completely unacceptable. The Government should be talking about schools working together to improve results, with weaker schools being supported by the stronger ones. That will not happen under these proposals for choice. We had 18 years of that, and I do not want to return to it.

10.18 am

Jon Cruddas (Dagenham) (Lab): I want to emphasise a couple of points that my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) made on the White Paper's agenda. I acknowledge his good work in securing the debate.

I shall take up the argument advanced by the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) about the links between class and attainment but from a slightly different standpoint—not by taking a dogmatic approach in terms of public or private sector but by showing the empirical evidence of the work done by schools in my constituency in providing change in life opportunities for local kids.

The statistics relating to the borough are relevant. London-wide, on average, about 18.5 per cent. of adult residents have a higher education qualification. In the borough of Barking and Dagenham, the average is about 3.5 per cent., and the rate of adult numeracy and literacy is the second and fourth worst nationally. The borough's track record on secondary schools is not good: in 1992, only 15.5 per cent. of pupils achieved five or more GCSEs at A* to C grades. Overall, the historic picture is of persistent low levels of attainment and educational aspiration. However, in the last 10 years there has been an extraordinary transformation in the performance of secondary schools; six of the eight or nine in the borough of Barking and Dagenham are in my constituency.

In 1996, 27 per cent. of the pupils obtained five or more GCSEs—18 points behind the national average, which was then 45 per cent. Last year, more than 50 per cent. secured five A* to C grades, just 3 per cent. behind the national average. That is an extraordinary rate of change in the performance of the LEA. In the space of 10 years, that was the most improved local education authority in the country as to school attainment for secondary school kids. That cannot be ignored, not least because the GCSE results are reinforced by improvements across key stages 1, 2 and 3.

We are witnessing a transformation of attainment and life opportunities for working-class kids in our borough. That radical change has, fundamentally, been built on the strategic leadership of the LEA and strong leadership from the schools. The hard groundwork has been established for durable change in school attainment. That has been based on a comprehensive strategy involving local schools. The cornerstone of that strategy is the principle of the local community school at the heart of each neighbourhood. I do not quite understand how this pragmatic, durable, incremental and comprehensive strategy dovetails with the strategy contained in the White Paper.

In 1997, the Prime Minister said:

"what works is what counts".

He also spoke of standards, not structures. However, we are seeing further local advancement for our kids put at risk because of a preoccupation with structures, forms and governance. The White Paper states that the only structure for the future is "a system of independent non-fee paying state schools. It will be for schools to decide whether they wish to acquire a Trust . . . or become a self-governing foundation school."

The White Paper removes the right of local authorities to publish their own proposals for the establishment of new community schools. It states that "no more community schools (primary or secondary) will be established".

Our local strategy has been based on the notion of the community school. It is ironic that, a few weeks ago, it was proposed that the White Paper be launched at a local community school that we had just opened—the Jo Richardson school at Castle Green in Dagenham. That did not happen, but it is a fantastic school, which has a revolving door in terms of people, including international visitors, coming in to look at the new building and the performance that it promises. That is a fantastic illustration of the strategy being systematically developed by the LEA. That strategy is at risk.

[Jon Cruddas]

Arguably, this matter is more important in our community than any other, because our population is anticipated to grow by some 35,000 over the next 10 to 15 years. Therefore, we are not talking about closing schools; we are talking about building more. Arguably, we shall be building schools outside the system that has delivered the fastest rate of improvement in school attainment for working-class kids in the country. We have some of the most difficult terrain in terms of the long legacy of underperformance of public services and poverty of attainment and aspiration among the working class. I do not see where that fits within the strategy outlined in the White Paper.

A benign view of the White Paper is that it will allow for local conditions and may have a much more flexible introduction than we assume. Moreover, in contrast to the earlier grant-maintained schools, there will be no financial inducements. However, I am not too sure about that because I have heard that those schools that become trusts will have their deficits removed at a stroke, which, I infer, will be a financial inducement to move outside the present regime. That is in direct contrast to our local successful model. The objective is greater fragmentation at local level, not least because the White Paper gives all foundation, voluntary-aided and trust schools the freedom when considering admissions.

> "to use the approach . . . that they think will best meet their local circumstances"

My borough is interested only in increasing equity and building excellence. We have a strategy that is systematically delivering for local people in very challenging circumstances. At the moment, I cannot see how the White Paper will aid our local pragmatic strategy, I cannot see how the admissions system will deliver and I cannot see how the trusts will positively transform the picture. It will take some strong empirical evidence to convince me that the laudable aims of the Government to provide a better education for every child can be achieved by the measures outlined so far in the White Paper.

10.24 am

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): I shall address the White Paper, but I feel that it would be useful to outline some of the challenges faced in my constituency by staff and pupils in the borough of Hackney. Hackney has a high turnover of population of around 20 to 25 per cent. a year. When I visited a primary school during the summer, the head teacher told me that, in year 6, fewer than 20 per cent. of pupils had been there since reception. That highlights some of the challenges faced throughout the school system. Over 80 per cent. of pupils are from black and ethnic minority backgrounds. Half of all secondary school pupils have English as an additional language, which, compared with a national average of 10 per cent, underlines the challenges. The percentage of pupils eligible for free school meals is almost three times the national average.

However, Hackney's secondary schools are among the fastest improving in the country in terms of GCSE results. Provisional results from the Learning Trust suggest that performance improved at more than three times the national rate. Six out of eight secondary schools now have over 50 per cent. of pupils gaining five A* to C grades, although in 2002, only one of the then nine schools could boast that. We are seeing a step change. Given that baseline in 2002, it is hardly surprising that Hackney's mayor, who was elected that year, the Learning Trust and the MPs have been supporters of the city academy's programme and the London Challenge, which have already made such a difference to Hackney's schools.

We already have the oversubscribed Mossbourne academy, in a top-quality, brand new building, designed by Richard Rogers with guidance from the head teacher. It was designed to suit the pupils. Mossbourne is, along with the planned Bridge academy and Petchey academy, which are yet to be built, a mixed non-denominational, non-selective school. That is in response to a local need, and we look forward to seeing its impact as those pupils reach GCSE level. Hackney is also one of only a few boroughs where all secondary schools have specialist status, and we have seen the difference that that makes to GCSE attainment. However, despite all those achievements, we all know that there is still a long way to go. The challenges of population turnover, multilingual home environments and poverty contribute to that challenge. One thing is clear to me, as a relatively new Member of Parliament: there is no poverty of ambition in Hackney. Many constituents whom I meet are working and studying and, at the same time, supporting their children and encouraging them to do well at school.

Some people have criticised the White Paper for suggesting the abolition of the LEA. I am a Labour and Co-operative Member of Parliament and I firmly believe in decentralisation, and in devolving power to the most appropriate local level. For most people who are directly involved in education—the pupils—their connection is with their school. Hackney's schools already have a great deal of autonomy and the LEA no longer exists in a traditional form, having been replaced by the Learning Trust. When that happened, the sky did not fall in. In fact, as I outlined, we have seen significant improvement in school achievement. It also placed councillors in a challenging role in taking on the strategic vision for the future of our schools; that is something that the elected mayor of Hackney, Jules Piper, has risen to, along with his council colleagues. However, it means that we need across-the-board support for councillors to take on that role. It is easy to get lost in the daily detail of running schools, and we must take that up a level.

I want to touch on the issue of extending autonomy to head teachers. Although I favour it, I urge my right hon. Friend the Minister to consider two things. First, heads and governing bodies must be held firmly to account if they are to have such a level of responsibility and control. Secondly, where an LEA is doing a good job and there is no appetite from local schools to take on more, we should allow for some central support. However, that should be coupled with a pressure to devolve and appropriate responsibility for heads. It should not be an opt-out.

Parental involvement is another issue, but I do not have time to go into it now. I simply want to indicate to my right hon. Friend the Minister the importance of including all parents, not just those who are in the know. There should not be carte blanche for those who can work the system. Many parents in my constituency, who do not have English as a first language and do not understand the system, feel shut out at present. If the White Paper helps them to get involved, that is a good step, but we have some way to go before that becomes a reality. I am keen to hear the Minister mention that.

I have just a moment to mention a report that was published yesterday by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, which I commend to hon. Members. I shall not go into the detail, but it highlighted the difference in achievement among certain ethnic minority groups. It concludes that they can succeed and have high aspirations. The Government have launched "Every Child Matters" and the youth Green Paper, and we must see a continuum from one to the other. "Every Child Matters" focused on children in care—the hard end of the spectrum of children. We must see a much wider agenda. If, in the White Paper, we are saying bye-bye to the LEA and hello to a children's authority, that can only be good. However, that authority must champion the needs of those who are most in need, commission successfully, and challenge to create the widest range of provision, youth work and other support for children, to make a real difference to every child. If the White Paper is proposing a personalised education agenda focused on the pupil and not the institution, we welcome it, with some of the caveats that I have outlined.

10.30 am

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): I invite my right hon. Friend the Minister to visit Sheffield to look at the issues there. With other Sheffield MPs, last night I met 65 colleagues, many of them councillors and school governors, who expressed concern that much of the White Paper addresses perceived problems in parts of London and has little to do with the issues faced in Sheffield. I welcome many elements of the White Paper, but I want to express the concerns raised at that meeting.

First, there was a feeling that the choice agenda is being developed too far: if any secondary school that is successful and full—there are some in my constituency—can expand at will, without being part of a co-ordinated approach to the city's overall capacity, that will cause problems. Not only will it not provide a solution for at least three years, but it will happen at a time when there is over-capacity in secondary schools, as numbers fall. If we allow successful schools to expand, will that mean spare capacity in other schools—perhaps struggling schools in more deprived communities? Will the solution therefore be to bus more of the academically able kids from those schools to the more successful ones, leaving behind those that are unviable? That is contrary to the Government's sustainable communities approach, as those schools are buildings not merely for educating kids, but for adult learning, for youth and for the community. There does not seem to be much joined-up government in that approach.

There is a need for somebody to oversee expansion in the area. Sheffield college in my constituency, which is looking to develop post-16 vocational provision, is worried about going ahead because it is not sure whether the local schools will develop a similar capacity at the same time, with nobody having the oversight to control the process, get the bodies together and say, "We will do one thing rather than another". The idea that the building programme can simply be a free-for-all will not work.

We are successful in getting about 95 per cent. of first choices for parents and children in Sheffield. We have a joint admissions policy, which we work with Rotherham and Derbyshire on a joint arrangement basis. We are worried about the idea that every school will have its own individual admissions approach and that none will ultimately have to conform to the fair admissions code. We do not believe that a series of separate, fragmented admissions policies with a different form for every school will help parents to make a decent choice.

We are worried about trusts coming in and a different form of ownership, when at present in Sheffield families of schools work together under the LEA. We believe that that is the way forward—through co-operation rather than competition. We do not believe that LEAs will micro-manage schools; they do not do so in Sheffield now. Their role is to be a locally elected, democratically accountable body, with the right to plan capacity, oversee admissions, ensure co-operation and take strategic decisions. That is what we want to retain, and we are worried that the White Paper challenges some of those important rights.

10.34 am

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): I became an education adviser when the national curriculum was introduced in the late '80s, at a time when schools were encouraged to apply for grant-maintained status. I remember the way in which that undermined the whole system, with unfair admissions and unfair funding. It is therefore crucial that, in their reorganisation and reform of secondary education, the Government ensure that there is fair funding for all schools and a tough admissions policy to which they all adhere, including a fair way of sharing pupils with behavioural problems. I recall the words from the 2005 Labour manifesto:

> "We will encourage more dedicated provision for disruptive and excluded pupils . . . and no school will become a dumping ground for such pupils."

Those words are particularly relevant in my constituency, where full schools can refuse disruptive pupils, thus creating a two-tier secondary system. Although I hear what my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Jon Cruddas) says about his constituency and community schools, I know that in my constituency there is a clear split between community schools and foundation schools—where grant-maintained schools have become foundation schools. There is still a difference between the pupils going to those schools: pupils from more deprived areas go to community schools.

As an education adviser, I saw the Tories' failure to invest fairly in education in all schools, which created the two-tier system. I taught a few lessons in the '80s and '90s, but I learned two important truths. We cannot reform the whole system without both the investment to back it up and the structures that will create a level playing field for every school. That is why I welcome the White Paper and look forward to those fair structures being introduced for schools in Swindon and throughout the country.

[Anne Snelgrove]

10.36 am

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) on the way in which he introduced the debate, and particularly his initial remarks on the curriculum. They may have been outside the scope of the White Paper but he made some very important points, particularly on the importance of Tomlinson—we need to revive that process and get it back on the Government's agenda—and on vocational education, which he expressed extremely eloquently. Obviously, the Foster report has some things to say about that, but we also need to ensure that those lessons are taken into our secondary sector.

The debate is useful because we can try to get a clear indication from the Minister of what the White Paper means. As other hon. Members have said, there is some confusion about, and contradiction within, the White Paper on the future of local authorities. Will local authorities have more powers, or fewer? Where does the balance lie in their new role? What are the real differences between the new types of schools proposed? Do the words on parental choice mean much? Is it not just a matter of giving out some red meat to newspapers and parents but not delivering anything meaningful in the way of parental choice?

I want to focus my remarks on two issues: trust schools and admissions policies. Trust schools could be an interesting idea, which might help promote diversity in the secondary and primary system. However, as I said in an intervention on the hon. Member for Worcester, the idea of excluding community schools is nonsensical if we want diversity. Diversity should include a future for community schools. Trust schools may be a vehicle to extend the diversity that we have at the moment, but how will they work? Will they enable collaboration between schools, which is a key test, and how will they be structured? If the Minister cannot answer my specific questions on trust schools in the time that she has today, I hope that she will do me the courtesy of writing to me.

What are the carrots or sticks for a school to move to trust status? Reading the White Paper, one finds words such as "encourage". A new nationalised quango is being set up under the schools commissioner and it looks as though he or she may be pushing and cajoling schools to become trust schools. However, the framework is not clear and I would like the Minister to say a little more about that. Where would the freedoms and status of trust schools differ from foundation schools? Again, that is unclear. They might have a different relationship with outside sponsors, but how is that different from the status of specialist foundation schools?

How will the powers of existing school governors change if they vote for their school to join or become a trust? Will those governors be voting themselves out of a job? How will their relationship work with a trust that may be running 10 to 15 schools? Could a local authority be part of a trust? Could a series of schools come together with a local authority to form a community trust of schools? That is an interesting idea that could be developed if aspects of collaboration can be taken on.

The White Paper says that if a trust school wants freedom in relation to the curriculum, the school can apply for it. How will that process work? Does the school have to go to the Department or the schools commissioner? Who will confer that freedom on a trust school and what will be the rationale and criteria used for conferring that freedom? Can the Minister confirm that the Government have given a categorical assurance to the National Association of Schoolmasters Union of Women Teachers that trust schools will have to apply national pay scales and conditions? If so, how does that square with what the White Paper says? What will be the relationship between trust schools and a local authority? Will the new powers for local authorities in chapter 9—for example, to serve an improvement notice on a failing school—apply simply to community schools or will they also apply to city academies and trust schools? The Minister seems to assent from a sedentary position. I hope that she will confirm that for the record. Finally, on trust schools, do the Government have a timetable target for the number of trust schools that they want to be set up, say by 2009 or 2010? They have established a target for city academies. Do they have a similar target for trust schools?

On admissions, the Government seem to make four key proposals in the White Paper. They propose that every primary and secondary school could become its own admissions authority, that there will be a new duty on local authorities relating to fair access and that there will be more free school transport for disadvantaged children, and they make a rather undeveloped reference to banding. They are interesting ideas, but they have caused real alarm on the Liberal Democrat Benches and on the Labour Benches. If more schools—and potentially every primary and secondary school—could become their own admissions authority, that could be a serious threat to equality of opportunity. As another Member said, equality of opportunity is not necessarily guaranteed and certainly has not been produced in practice by the local education authority being the controller of admissions, but it is not clear that having 24,000 separate admissions authorities will guarantee equality of opportunity either.

Let us try to test the Government's model with some questions. If the Government are so keen on the model, why, as other Members have said, will they not make the code of practice on admissions legally binding? If they are not that keen and if the code is not made legally binding, how will the idea that the Secretary of State put forward—that there will be a statutory instrument making looked-after children the top admissions criterion for every school—work? It is a good idea to ensure that looked-after children are the top priority. What about special needs children as well? That is really important. How will that proposal work overall, in a legal context, within the codes framework?

How will the new duty for local authorities work? Will the local authorities have any teeth in pushing the duty? Will they be able to tell a school, "You are not promoting fair access. You've got to change your admissions arrangements, or the way you administer them"? Have the Government considered that that idea might fit within their own model? Schools could be allowed to set their own admissions criteria, but the administration of that admissions policy could be handed over to the local authority. The parents would apply to the local authority to go to a particular school, the school having set its own criteria. That would be a more transparent system. It would prevent schools from choosing parents and might mean that parents chose schools. Handing the administration arrangements over to the local authority might be the safeguard that some of us want—or one of the many safeguards that some of us want.

There are many other questions that I would like to ask, but I shall finish with three broader ones, although I want to focus on trusts and admissions. First, how will the White Paper help to address falling rolls in most parts of the country? I accept that in areas of the Thames Gateway, in Milton Keynes and in a few London boroughs, there are expanding populations, which means that there is a need for schools to expand and for new schools to be created, but that is not the case in the vast majority of areas. The White Paper mentions falling rolls only once. That is a dereliction of duty, given that falling rolls are the key challenge facing schools over the next 10 years.

Why does the White Paper keep so much power in Whitehall? As another Member said, many aspects of the White Paper read as though it is proposing a further nationalisation of education. Why is that and how does that square with the rhetoric about more freedoms?

Finally, how does the White Paper help the "Every Child Matters" agenda? It is talked about in some of the later chapters, which are among the better parts of the White Paper, but there are no proposals anywhere for a duty on schools to co-operate with other schools and the local authority to deliver "Every Child Matters". Frankly, without that, the White Paper is failing that agenda. The Minister must address that point.

10.45 am

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): I shall try to restrict my remarks to give the Minister the opportunity to respond to the points that hon. Members have raised. I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) on securing the debate and on the way in which he opened it. There was much that he said that I could agree with. In particular, he was right to highlight the fact that every school and every child is different, and that a system is needed that is built round the needs of the children rather than those of the school, the council or the Government.

I shall focus on three key issues that arise from the White Paper—choice, the expansion of capacity, and autonomy for schools. We in the Opposition welcome the emphasis in the White Paper on increasing school choice. Choice is a good thing in itself, but it is also an important driver to raise standards in our schools. The hon. Member for Worcester came up with some research evidence from magnet schools from the United States.

In his foreword to the White Paper, the Prime Minister highlighted the fact that > "there is increasing international evidence that school choice systems can maintain high levels of equity and improve standards. Swedish parents can choose an alternative school to their local one, including a diverse range of state-funded independent schools. Studies have found that schools in areas where there is more choice have improved most rapidly."

That is an important message for the Government. They must ensure that choice becomes effective.

I shall be critical of the Government for the moment. Although, over the past three or four years, they have talked a great deal about improving capacity in our schools, and about ensuring that there are more school places for parents to choose from, the reality behind that rhetoric is that only seven schools have received funding from the Government to expand the number of places that are on offer and create additional choice in their areas. Looking at the number of schools that put forward applications to expand their numbers over the past year, two were rejected by school organisation committees and have already been referred to the adjudicator—that is two out of the five that school organisation committees have had the chance to look at.

We need more capacity in schools. Admissions policies have become so central to the argument because there is a shortage of good schools and a shortage of places in good schools. The Prime Minister was right when he said in a speech in Downing street, before the White Paper was published:

> "Where parents are dissatisfied, they need a range of good schools to choose from; or where there is no such choice, able to take the remedy into their own hands."

The point about equity is also important in relation to that matter, as the hon. Member for Worcester pointed out. Again, in his foreword, the Prime Minister said:

> "While parents can express a choice of school, there are not enough good schools in urban areas; such restrictions are greatest for poor and middle class families who cannot afford to opt for private education or to live next to a good school, if they are dissatisfied with what the state offers."

Choice and capacity therefore go hand in hand in this debate.

It is not clear from the White Paper that the Government have clearly identified what drivers they will use to improve capacity in the system. Reference is made to the funding for new schools coming through the "Building schools for the future" programme, and there is a suggestion that there might be a fund set aside for backing new schools. We need a concrete indication from the Government of how they will work to increase capacity in the school system.

It is also important, in tackling the issues related to attainment, to give schools greater autonomy. On Friday, I visited an excellent school in Portsmouth in which the head teacher has used the flexibility available to her to change the curriculum, to ensure that it meets the needs of children. In the past six years, that school has seen a 20-fold increase in the proportion of children getting five A* to C grades. The head teacher has been able to achieve that as a result of being given autonomy.

Academies have been set up with incredible autonomy in staffing, curriculum and governance. If those freedoms are seen as vital in raising standards in areas served by academies, it is important that those same freedoms are made available to trust schools and foundation schools. I was concerned that the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) made reference to an assurance that the Government had given to the NASUWT about trust schools not being able to have those freedoms, because that certainly runs counter to the answer that the Minister gave me earlier this month.

[Mr. Mark Hoban]

The pivotal issue is the role of local authorities. We have seen examples of the ambiguity underpinning the White Paper, and the Government must be much clearer on that issue. Will the balance of power sit with Whitehall or with county hall? My concern is that those who are not fully signed up to the ethos and strategy set out by the Prime Minister in his foreword to the White Paper will use some of the checks and balances in the legislation to frustrate the aims of increasing school choice, creating more equity, raising standards and providing schools with autonomy.

The Government need to be much clearer, both to their own Back Benchers and to other parties in the House, about the direction of policy, so that we can understand whether or not the White Paper will live up to its political presentation or, as the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) said, live up to its substance.

10.50 am

The Minister for Schools (Jacqui Smith): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) on initiating and introducing the debate. He drew on his considerable experience as an educationist, in business and as a committed constituency MP. He set a useful and important context for the debate, which was followed by some important and helpful contributions.

Although everybody has given me as much time as possible to respond in the debate, I will not be able to cover every single issue. However, I suspect that this debate is the first of many, so I am sure that, as well as responding to some specific questions, we will have ample opportunity to return to the issues.

The challenge of secondary education reform is one we set ourselves in the context of building on the significant successes of the past eight years. We have the best ever set of results for our young people at 11, 14, 16 and 18. We have a work force who have grown in size and quality—as evidenced by Ofsted. We have significantly reduced the number of failing schools and are able to turn around quickly those that go into special measures. However, as hon. Members have identified today, there are still challenges in the system.

"the best ever generation of teachers",

Despite the fact that schools in disadvantaged areas have improved faster than others, we have more work to do to narrow the attainment gap between individuals. We have to do more to improve our staying-on rates post-16. Hon. Members rightly raised the important issue of reforms at 14 to 19. In the near future, we will bring forward the implementation plan that spells out how we will take the next stages for ensuring the right place for vocational education, for focusing on basic skills and for other important issues raised. We need to do more to improve discipline and behaviour, so that teachers can teach and pupils can learn. The White Paper is about meeting those challenges and raising our aspirations, both for individual children and for schools.

Some hon. Members have said that the White Paper does not focus on what is happening in the classrooms, but at the heart of the White Paper is the challenge of how we personalise and tailor education for every single child and ensure that progress is being made. We spell out and will give more detail about our support through new resources; through further reforms to the work force; through developing our information and communications technology; through the opportunity—particularly in those early years of secondary education, as my hon. Friend identified—for young people to catch up, where they have not got the basic skills necessary, and to have extra tuition and support through extended schools; and through expanding the gifted and talented programme. That will reach into every secondary classroom.

Likewise, as my hon. Friend identified, there will be the new challenges to performance-manage teachers in a way that focuses on their teaching and learning. The new Ofsted framework and the nature of the inspections raises the bar on school improvement. We will support school leadership, through the National College for School Leadership and, particularly, through the support for those leaders increasingly leading complex schools and working in collaboration with other schools to drive improvement through the system. Many such issues are covered in the White Paper.

Ensuring that we maintain the improvement in standards and make that reach every child is a big and important job. Arguably, that should not and could not be left to schools and educationists alone. That is why we argue in the White Paper for new opportunities for schools to draft in the support that they need. Our vision is of a system open to the influence and support of communities, of civic and faith bodies, of employers and of wider education institutions. The independent sector and the most successful state schools have always benefited from that type of support network. Our task is to bring its benefits to schools that have previously had to battle through alone. That is the starting point for the trust school model and why we will intervene explicitly—my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) made important points on this subject—to ensure that there is redistribution of the broader support to those in the most challenging circumstances.

I cannot answer all the detailed questions, but trust schools, while benefiting from the drive and success culture of external partners, will remain firmly part of the local authority family of schools, subject to fair admissions, fair funding and full accountability. We expect trusts to be developed by community organisations, binding the local school into its community.

There has been comment on the proposal that as local authorities move to a commissioner role, they should not be promoting and producing new community schools. Let me be clear. The term "community school" refers only to the legal entity of that school. It is clear, as we take forward this policy, that schools are a fundamental part of their community, linked into extended services and delivering on the broader children's agenda. That is what schools, whether or not they are self-governing or continuing as community schools, should be about. In building trusts around other successful schools, universities and community organisations, we can ensure that that is embedded more clearly in the way in which our schools are run.

All trusts will be required to have charitable objects, which we will set down in regulations. We shall proscribe certain individuals from being members of school trusts and ensure that no trust can be established without local consultation. I take seriously the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North about how we focus the efforts of the schools commissioner to ensure that the external support is drafted into the schools in which it is most needed.

There was considerable discussion of choice and admissions in the debate. As my hon. Friends outlined, parents value the right to choose a school for their child and that choice cannot be driven by the ability to go into the private sector or to move house. We need to create more good school places. Although I do not have time to go into it, there is a strong emphasis in the White Paper on how we focus on school improvement and tackle school failure. As we create those places, we need to ensure that we redistribute choice. We shall achieve that by ensuring that we provide advice to those parents who need it most, not least to counter the problem of self-deselection, whereby parents are put off applying to good schools. We shall also extend the offer of free transport for the most disadvantaged pupils.

We will ensure fair admissions for all schools. Several of my hon. Friends raised that issue, and I listened carefully to what they said. We have a clear objective of ensuring that we develop the system described within a fair admissions system. It is not about returning to the divisive selection that several hon. Members identified as part of the previous grant-maintained regime. The school admissions code of practice is a device to which all admissions authorities must have regard in setting their admissions arrangements. It requires arrangements to be fair, clear and objective. We shall issue a new code in the new year, which will contain advice on reducing social segregation. The code is backed up by the schools adjudicator. However, I listened to and will reflect carefully on the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester about how we need to strengthen that process to ensure that we deliver on the objective of fair admissions.

Several hon. Members mentioned local authorities. At the heart of the school system will be the local authority. It will play a new role, standing up for the interests of pupils and parents, rather than protecting the providers, but it will be a significant role, ensuring sufficiency and planning of school places, including through strategic capital plans. The role will also involve ensuring that the admissions code is adhered to, integrating schools into the "Every Child Matters" work and the broader work on children's services, engaging parents, setting the terms for new school competitions, playing an important part in 14-to-19 provision and having new powers to intervene swiftly where schools are underperforming. I hope that I have given some reassurance that this debate will continue.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): We are grateful to the Minister for seeking to get in as much as possible in the time allocated. I regret to say that the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne), who has secured the next debate, is not present and, as there is no debate at 12.30, I therefore have no alternative but to suspend the sitting until 1 o'clock.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): On a point of order, Sir Nicholas.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): I regret to say that there cannot be a point of order on the matter. The hon. Gentleman who succeeded in securing the debate is not present at the appropriate time, so I have no alternative but to suspend the sitting.

11.1 am

Sitting suspended.

Worcestershire Acute Hospitals Trust

1 pm

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): It is my privilege to have secured the debate. I am delighted that the Under-Secretary of State for Health and two other Members who represent Worcestershire constituencies, are in the Chamber, because I have become used to these debates being pretty nearly one to one, without many other Members present.

This subject is extremely topical for my constituents, and it will be very relevant to the Opposition day debate later today. I shall try to show that this is not only a local issue, but an example of problems that are increasingly widespread throughout the country. I shall, however, try to show that there are answers, too. My points come under four headings: the need for a review; the selection of options; the consultation process; and answers and solutions, which I really believe there to be.

First, why is a review necessary? In the words of the trust, it is necessary to achieve financial balance and to secure sustainable, high-quality clinical services. We know that for the first year ever, the national health service as a whole has not achieved financial balance. Various sources disagree about the amount, but the NHS as a whole is in the red, which has led the Department of Health to instruct primary care trusts and acute trusts to fulfil their statutory duty to balance their books.

The Worcestershire acute hospitals NHS trust tells us that it can break even in the year 2005–06 only with a cost-improvement programme of £15 million and with the support of the strategic health authority of £6.7 million. There is therefore a gap of £20 million to £30 million in the trust's finances. That does not include the PCTs, which also have deficits.

The problem is intense because of the unknown effects of payment by results and practice-based commissioning, because of the consultant contract, which is working out to be far more expensive than anyone predicted, and because of out-of-hours care, which is also more expensive than people predicted.

The trust brought in an external, independent management consultant to work out options for the review. The first thing that it discovered was that the trust is a high-cost provider compared with its peers, that the use of beds and theatres is inefficient, and that there are different deficits on different sites and among different specialties.

The first actions on the list are absolutely obvious: improve productivity, reduce bed occupancy, reduce length of stay, increase theatre productivity, and review the skill mix. No one argues with that. The aim and the figures that the consultant quotes depend on reaching the upper quartile for the length of stay in the peer group for all specialties.

I do not expect an absolute answer today; instead, I shall submit a parliamentary question. Will the Minister say whether the aim is feasible? Is any trust in the country in the upper quartile for length of stay in its peer group for all specialties? That is what the trust is aiming for.

The trust must reduce bed occupancy to 90 per cent. That should be possible if the trust ensures that there are no unnecessary admissions and that the entire process is speeded up. It is essential to reduce bed occupancy because the people who worked out the contract with the private finance initiative hospital in Worcester allowed there to be a surcharge for occupancy above 90 per cent. It is well known that 85 per cent. is the ideal for bed occupancy in an acute general hospital. The trust worked on a figure of 90 per cent., which was unrealistic given that people now agree that there has been a reduction in the number of acute beds. The trust is therefore paying some £2 million a year more simply because it exceeded 90 per cent. occupancy. Unfortunately, those who were involved in the negotiations have long since left, so we cannot hold them to account.

The second option in the list is about reconfiguring and rationalising sites, particularly focusing on sites and specialties with big deficits or staffing difficulties, but they include some of the bread-and-butter things that are most important to people: obstetrics, paediatrics, accident and emergency, and cancer services. Obviously, reduction or loss of such services will be violently opposed by everybody. I shall return to that issue.

Another option is to increase trading—again, absolutely obvious. Bring back the work that is going out of the county. However, that will be harder with choose and book, and with competition from the private sector, particularly if it is allowed to compete on advantageous terms. Another option is to improve income recovery—again, obvious. Get back every bit of money. That should be done.

An ominous option is to cease trading in unprofitable activity. Thank goodness, that is not being followed up immediately. Based on the trust's own figures, unprofitable activity involves obstetrics, A and E, and cancer. Even in a health market, one cannot reduce such services. The only other option that I shall mention is refinancing the PFI contract. If, as I presume, that means lengthening the mortgage, I would be very sorry if that were to happen.

On consultation, I welcome the trust's promise that the process will be open and that decisions will not be made beforehand. At present, we are in a period of pre-consultation. I refer to the splendid document, "Keeping the NHS Local—A New Direction of Travel", which was published by the Department of Health in 2003. It states that consultation > "with patients and the public, and with staff, needs to begin right at the outset—before minds have been made up about how services could or should change."

One of the document's core patient principles is:

> "developing options for change with people, not for them".

It appears that the trust is taking those points on board in its pre-consultation, but there are huge problems for the managers in charge of the consultation. It must be seen to be fair to all people. I refer to a decision in Wyre Forest in 1997–98 that was, patently, not fair. It involved robbery of one area's services to attempt to solve problems elsewhere in the county's NHS, and was brought about at the end of the consultation by a pseudo-statistical option appraisal and a vote by 80 per cent. of the county against the other 20 per cent. The result was inevitable, and, as has been shown, did not lead to improved quality of care. That is why we cannot have any more drastic downgrading. It has not saved money but has cost local people a great deal of their own money and has led to many problems.

I have quoted this before but shall quote it again. Andy Black, the well-known health service consultant, stated in the British Medical Journal last year:

> "If the price of moving the complex emergency to an appropriate centre of expertise is that this patient is accompanied by another nine or 10 patients who are not complex acute cases then another set of problems is launched."

There certainly are problems when a patient is taken out of their own area. Sometimes it is easier to admit them than to let them go home in the middle of the night, particularly as a taxi from Worcester to Kidderminster can cost £40 in the evening. What elderly person has £40 in their pocket for an unexpected need?

I shall spend a few moments on answers and solutions, because I strongly believe that they exist, and again I shall refer to "Keeping the NHS Local". In the valuable summary of consultation responses that came out in July 2004 we find this sentence under the heading "What next?":

> "Keeping the NHS Local is now the core guidance to be followed by all health services planning change."

It is reconfigurations that always cause the problems. As I have said, they must be fair. They must also make economies where the major deficits are and must be viewed from a county-wide perspective to ensure that what is developed is best for the county as a whole and all the people.

No one is saying that we must keep everything at every site. We know that such complex procedures as cardiology and neurosurgery, transplantation, some cancer treatment and major vascular surgery are better carried out in major units. That is borne out again in "Keeping the NHS Local", which says:

> "Evidence from UK and US does demonstrate a close correlation between hospital volume and outcome in major surgery such as cardiology, neurosurgery, liver transplantation", and so on. However, it also says:

> "Evidence from research does not support any general presumption that large hospitals benefit from economies of scale or that service concentration leads to improved outcomes for patients."

That is a reference to the bread-and-butter services to which everybody should have easy access and which must be retained locally.

That can be done by sharing and partnerships. Why have we not heard of trouble from Hexham and Bishop Auckland? It is because they have partnerships and degrees of downgrading that have worked, without causing a vast amount of strife. They have lost their A and E departments, but, in return, they have 24-hour urgent-care centres, where a doctor is always present. They can fulfil the requirement of "Keeping the NHS Local" to provide a minimum first port of call to assess, treat and, if necessary, transfer. They have kept medical admissions. What was so unacceptable at Kidderminster was the loss of the A and E and all acute admissions. That happened in the days when it was believed that hospitals had to have surgery if they were to keep medicine. Thank goodness that view has now been overruled, and acute medical admissions can be retained without keeping all of surgery

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): The hon. Gentleman and I clearly share a great interest in this subject. Is he saying that the Alexandra hospital could become a centre such as the one at Hexham? Is he aware that at present about 48,000 cases go to the Alex every year and 52,000 to Worcester? Does he believe that it is remotely feasible that that could or should happen?

Dr. Taylor: I am being careful not to stray on to the hon. Lady's patch. I shall continue to plug my own patch unashamedly for a few moments more.

We lost so much in 2000 and we have borne the pain. We now have a modern treatment centre, which is not yet fully used, on which about £19 million was spent, not only for us but for the whole county, to separate elective from emergency treatment. That facility cannot be lost and must be used more. The annual audit letter for 2003–04 said:

> "The trust sees an increased case load at Kidderminster as the solution to many of its resource configuration and financial problems, but progress will be hampered if arrangements for medical cover in the evening and at night are not quickly agreed upon and implemented".

We lost our A and E, and that certainly has not worked. We have only a nurse-led minor injuries unit and patients still unnecessarily travel to Worcester. To support the point made by the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride), I know that many people in Redditch depend on that A and E department. Moreover, the journey from Redditch to Worcester is far more difficult than the journey from Kidderminster to Worcester. A nurse-led minor injuries unit at Kidderminster hospital is not adequate. We also may lose our chemotherapy suite, which £400,000 of the local people's money initially provided.

The review across the county must be realistic and fair. Pain, if necessary, must be shared. We hope against hope that history will not be repeated in Worcestershire, or in other parts of the country where fairer and more easily implemented solutions are available. I remind the Minister of the 2001 Nuffield trust publication, "Local medical emergency units: learning set interim report", which details partnerships between neighbouring hospitals that really can work.

1.16 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): I congratulate the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) on securing the debate. I also acknowledge the presence of the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) and of the Minister for Schools, my right hon. Friend the Member for Redditch (Jacqui Smith), who has written to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about her concerns for the hospitals in her area. Like the hon. Member for Wyre Forest, she has been in touch with Michael O'Riordan, as far as I am aware, about concerns over the proposals. The hon. Member for Bromsgrove may also have written to him, but that has not been brought to my attention.

These are complex issues. My primary responsibility as a Minister is public health, so I am always considering ways in which we can prevent people from ending up in hospital in the first place, as far as that is possible. I also examine the scope for providing the type of services that people in the 21st century want and that meet their needs, whether in hospitals or in local community services, which I would describe as "closer to home" rather than "primary care" services. Those outside the profession do not really know what that term means.

[Caroline Flint]

Before I deal with particular issues that the hon. Gentleman raised, I shall spend a few moments talking about some improvements that the Government have made through our programme of investment and reform, because the two go side by side.

I was pleased to attend a debate in Westminster Hall on 2 November during which my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) talked about an orthopaedic surgeon at his local hospital who performs operations back to back. That surgeon performs more operations than two other consultants in his hospital. It is interesting to hear, for a change, about a different method of working that produces significant results.

We have significantly increased funding to the three Worcestershire primary care trusts of Wyre Forest, Redditch and Bromsgrove, and South Worcestershire. Hon. Members may be aware that, for the current financial year, these three PCTs have been allocated a total of £509.7 million, which is a cash increase of £43.1 million— a 9.2 per cent. increase. In the next two years, these PCTs will receive a further increase of £113.4 million—a 20 per cent. increase.

These record levels of investment will help to improve the standard of health care for the people of Worcestershire, but that money must be used well. The money is provided for both the short and the medium term, but it also needs to be used to underpin necessary reform of the clinical service. That is very much linked to what the community wants and to the shape of the community and its different needs.

In March 2001, more than 1,200 patients at the Worcestershire acute hospitals NHS trust waited for between six and eight months for in-patient treatment. Almost 1,000 patients waited for more than nine months. However, by September 2005, only 154 were waiting for between six and eight months. Since March 2004, no patient has been waiting longer than nine months for treatment. So, congratulations to the planners and the staff for their role in that. Out-patient times have also been reduced. In March 2002, nearly 1,000 patients had to wait 13 weeks or more for an out-patient appointment. By September of this year, that figure had been reduced to 130. Again, good work is being done locally.

There are more staff working at the trust now compared with April 2000, when it was first established. There are more consultants, doctors, nurses, midwives, therapists and scientists, and 134 more health care assistants. I am pleased to say that, alongside that, money has been invested in better facilities for staff, because that is important in terms of recruitment and retention. That includes £87 million for the new Worcestershire Royal hospital and £14 million for the new treatment centre at Kidderminster. New MRI and CT scanners have been delivered to the Alexandra hospital, as well as a new cardiac catheter laboratory. That is progress.

I note the comments that have been made about the financial situation at the trust. Those are important matters. I do not think that the issue is necessarily something new that those locally have just become aware of. We know that with funding—I have outlined the substantial increase in funding—comes financial responsibility. It is important that all NHS organisations aim to achieve financial balance. I am aware that there have been calls for the Department of Health to intervene in cases where the local NHS is struggling to achieve a financial balance. That has happened in a number of areas throughout the country. However, the problem is that intervening would penalise those organisations that do achieve a balance year on year. In such situations, the NHS organisations concerned must work with their strategic health authorities and primary care trusts to develop financial recovery plans that will help them to achieve a sound financial footing.

Comments have been made—the matter has also been raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Redditch in letters to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and to the trust—about the private finance initiative and payments to the contractor arising from the building of the Worcestershire Royal hospital. Of course, PFIs have enabled us to progress to have the largest hospital-building programme in the history of the NHS. I do not think that anybody in the areas served by the hospital would say, "No, no. Have the money back. We wish that we hadn't gone down this route." However, some issues have developed with the initiative as it has grown over time. One hundred and twenty-seven new hospitals have been, or are in the process of being, delivered through this method.

I understand what the hon. Member for Wyre Forest said with regard to the current financial pressures in the trust, which he and others feel are not being helped by having to make increased payments to the contractor concerned. However, my understanding is that some of the problems are created or exacerbated by the bed occupancy rates and the length of time that people are staying in hospital. The threshold is hit and suddenly the extra payments come into place. I hope that these issues will be considered closely during the pre-consultation period and also during the statutory consultation period due to begin in December. That particular aspect needs to be considered as a first requirement—in relation to links to improvements in the service, both in terms of what is provided in the community and the high occupancy rates—before moving on to any other areas.

I know that there have been discussions with the Department of Health on the PFI and that questions have been raised about whether there is a possibility of changing it. All that I would say at this stage is that people should not be looking to that—I am not suggesting that the hon. Gentleman is doing so—as a solution to the problem in the first instance. Part of the solution lies in the way in which beds are used in the hospital, how long they are used for and how they link to other services in the community that could meet needs better and either stem the flow or get people out more quickly into better social care settings. That is an important matter that has been raised.

Issues have been raised about the finances on which the current proposals are being based and the options that the consultants arrived at. I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Redditch and other hon. Members are in close discussion about how the figures were arrived at. They are scrutinising them, which is entirely right; it is a proper way to engage in the process. I am sure that other hon. Members, like my right hon. Friend, are meeting their constituents to ensure that they understand what is going on so that they can ask questions of those who have to be held to account in relation to the proposals that they will put forward.

However, there are clearly some financial problems at the Worcestershire acute hospitals NHS trust that have to be overcome in partnership with PCTs and the West Midlands South strategic health authority, but also as part of the public engagement, which we hope will be understood and supported by the wider community and those served by the trust.

The hon. Gentleman has already mentioned that there was an accumulated financial deficit of £23.8 million that arose over a three-year period between 2001 and 2004. I should point out that the strategic health authority anticipates that the trusts will be in a break-even financial position in 2005–06, but there is an underlying deficit of about £20 million. That is why a major service and financial review is being undertaken by the trust. Its objectives are to examine how that £20 million will be recovered so that the trust can be restored to financial balance from 2006–07, and to have a better look at what services are working and how services currently provided might be better provided in future. I am certainly not an expert in that area; it is down to those closest to the local communities, including parliamentary representatives, to make such representations and, I hope, engage in the discussion of ideas.

The aim of the review was to identify the future size and shape of safe, affordable, high-quality secondary care services. The review is redefining where boundaries lie between primary and secondary care and how community hospital and services should integrate with the proposed future configuration of secondary care services. That is important, considering that the Department held a big consultation during the summer on what people want from health services in their community. This work concerns the provision of services that are fit for purpose and the needs of communities in the years ahead, but it also needs to be linked to sustainable financial balance.

I appreciate the concerns of hon. Members, who will no doubt be worried about particular specialties that I understand are now subject to further discussions and about the potential impact on their local hospitals arising from this work. The initial work was presented to the trust board on 6 October and those options are now being discussed as part of the pre-consultation stage. I shall get back to the hon. Gentleman on his question about trusts that are in the upper quartile in relation to length of stay, and I shall follow that up with a written reply.

The hon. Gentleman also made a point about those who are chronically ill and how they might be affected by the proposals. Any trust or strategic health authority engaged in this discussion has to take into account how it will deliver a health service for those most in need. Alongside that will be the Government's support and direction from the targets that we have set on those issues that are of most concern, such as cancer, chronic heart disease and so forth.

The pre-consultation work started in early October and will continue until December. The formal public consultation document is expected to be launched in December or January. I hope and trust that everyone concerned will feel that they have an ample and transparent opportunity to have a real say in that process and that hon. Members will be kept informed, rather than having to ask to be kept informed. I have talked to representatives from the local area and asked them to assure me that that will be the case. If any objections emerge, the local overview and scrutiny committee will consider those and the matter could be referred to Ministers for a final decision. I hope that there will be a full and detailed debate on those matters, which I know are of huge concern to right hon. and hon. Members.

Transport (Pudsey)

1.30 pm

Mr. Paul Truswell (Pudsey) (Lab): My hon. Friend the Minister will be aware that I secured an Adjournment debate on this matter just 18 months ago. However, it is time to revisit the issues that I raised then. I have given my hon. Friend clear indications of the issues that I wish to raise and I hope that her response will spare me some of the ballast that occasionally works its way into ministerial responses.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport recently announced his rejection of the Leeds supertram bid. I do not wish to revisit that decision, but rather what flows from it. If my hon. Friend's response contains a lengthy discourse on the supertram, I ask that she omit it for the purposes of the debate. The supertram was never a one-club solution to the city's transport problems. I have only ever regarded it as one component of a three-pronged strategy to meet our transport needs. Any solution to the transport problems of the city must include bus and rail services, which are far more relevant to the communities that I represent than the supertram.

I hope that, as one door closes, another is opening. Given my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's indication that the Department for Transport will work with Leeds on a bus solution, I hope that it will examine the role that rail can play, particularly for the communities in my constituency. I hope that my hon. Friend will appreciate why there is some scepticism in Leeds about how far buses can deliver the solution that we seek. Bus services have a major role to play, which could be even greater, not just through extra investment, but through changes to the environment in which they are planned and delivered. However, buses are not a one-club solution; rail has a major role to play.

Since deregulation in 1986, bus services have faced a consistent and irreversible decline, and Pudsey is no exception. I have campaigned vigorously in Parliament for improvements to the way in which bus services are provided. Earlier this year, I introduced a ten-minute Bill designed to facilitate the introduction of quality bus contracts. Private bus operators have had 19 years to show that they can provide decent services, and they have failed. It is time that they were made accountable to passengers and communities. Since deregulation, quality and standards have fallen dramatically, fares have risen by almost 50 per cent. in real terms, and the number of passengers has fallen by over a third in West Yorkshire. In round figures, that represents about 100 million passenger journeys. Deregulation has meant that bus companies can pick and choose which services to provide. They are free to make profits while providing poor services. The result is that many people have been denied a reliable and affordable bus service for travel to work, school, college, shops, health centres and hospitals. Week in, week out, services are chopped, changed, missing or late. Passengers suffer or vote with their feet.

Under the deregulated system, there is little that passengers, communities, councillors, even MPs, or Metro—the passenger transport executive—can do to ensure that private bus companies maintain or improve services. I appreciate that partnership is the Government's preferred way forward, and it works to a degree in some areas. However, where partnership works, it is often in special circumstances that cannot easily be replicated in places such as Leeds or Pudsey. Those are isolated examples where it suits the operators to engage.

Passenger transport executives are totally dependent on local monopoly providers, such as First, in Leeds, to act responsibly and to take a long-term view. That is far from the norm in my experience. Venture off the beaten track where bus services operate well and the nightmare begins for constituents such as mine. Service changes have tended to concentrate on high-frequency major routes in Leeds, such as the No. 4 and No. 16 routes in my area, while frequency has been reduced on services that penetrate local housing estates and provide links to Pudsey, the Owlcotes centre and Bramley.

Recent changes to services such as the No. 97, the No. 647 and the No. 651 in the Guiseley and Yeadon areas have resulted in a significant reduction in links with nearby Bradford. That has caused tremendous hardship for regular travellers who depend on those services. Reliability and punctuality have been major problems and continue to be so. In only four of the last 12 months to September 2005 have more than 90 per cent. of First bus services in Leeds been observed to run on time—that is, up to one minute early or five minutes late. Since October 2005, early indications reveal an even lower average of 84 per cent. That is clearly unacceptable.

Fares have gone through the roof. In the period April 2004 to June 2005, First increased off-peak fares in Leeds by 27 per cent. and peak fares by 19 per cent. During the same period the cost of living rose by only 3 per cent. The bus industry's own figures illustrate that operating costs for the period were about 9 per cent.

We need partnership where it can work, and we must continue to invest in partnership where it works, with operators who are prepared to take a long-term view. However, we also need much tighter regulatory intervention. Quality contracts would specify the routes, quality and performance of bus services over a much wider area. Bus operators would have to tender for those contracts, rather than being able to cherry-pick, as they can at present. Services could then be properly monitored by the passenger transport executives and much better safeguarded.

At present, the conditions that the passenger transport executives have to satisfy to implement a quality contract are far too severe. My Bill proposed that the main test should be that a scheme represented value for money in terms of "economy, efficiency and effectiveness", rather than the much more onerous test of being "the only practicable way" of implementing policies and strategy.

Quality contracts already operate to good effect in London, as my hon. Friend the Minister is no doubt aware from her own constituency and her constituents' experience. Bus use in regulated London increased by about 10 per cent. last year, whereas outside the capital it fell by nearly 3 per cent.

The results of a recent survey conducted by the passenger transport executive group are, therefore, not surprising: an average of 38 per cent. of MPs thought that their constituents were satisfied with the quality of their local bus services. There was a marked London-regional divide, with 88 per cent. of MPs in London, compared with 27 per cent. in the midlands and east, 30 per cent. in the south and 19 per cent. in the north expressing satisfaction. There was a huge disparity. If things are good enough for the Minister's constituents, they should be good enough for mine and those of other MPs who serve constituencies outside London.

On average, bus companies in London make much lower profits than those in passenger transport executive areas. The West Yorkshire subsidiaries of First Bus have consistently returned profits of around 17 per cent., compared with 10 to 12 per cent. in London. The difference between West Yorkshire and the industry norm represents about £6 million, which could be reinvested in services. Unfortunately, passenger transport executives such as Metro are able to influence directly only about 20 per cent. of the network that they provide through tendered services. There is little competition for tenders, so it is difficult to test whether best value is being obtained in those cases.

Given the new emphasis on buses, it is disappointing that we have been unable to make progress on the A65 Kirkstall road quality bus initiative, which would serve part of my constituency. It is estimated that that initiative would save around a quarter of the journey time for the buses on the corridor and would have a cost-benefit ratio of about 2:1. I understand that the scheme was previously provisionally approved, but then "unapproved" due to changes in scope and cost. A revised scheme was submitted to the Department for Transport in July 2005. I understand that the latest position is that the scheme will have to be "remitted to the regions".

Other, similar schemes, such as the Yorkshire bus initiative, have also been "remitted to the regions". The Yorcard scheme, which would have conveyed great benefits to passengers, was approved and then had that approval withdrawn. I would welcome the Minister's comments on those bids, and hope to receive an indication that she may review them and now consider them in a more favourable light, given the rejection of the Leeds supertram proposals and the obvious emphasis that is now being placed on a bus solution.

Even with investment and a fair wind—ideally one provided by quality bus contracts—buses have a limited role to play in some of the major corridors in my constituency, such as the A65 and the ring road. That is why rail must be closely considered. Rail users in my constituency have been ill served by privatisation. My constituency is served by three stations on three routes: Horsforth, New Pudsey and Guiseley. There have been some improvements. For example, all three stations have undergone major refurbishment. The efficiency of Leeds city station has been increased by a £250 million investment that has helped to reduce congestion and delays. A rail passenger partnership grant enabled the provision of excellent new 333-class four-car rolling stock on the Airedale and Wharfedale line, which I use.

Rail has potentially a much greater role to play. Between 1994 and 2000, use of the West Yorkshire rail network increased by 44 per cent. from 11.5 million to 16.6 million passengers. However, that has come at a price. The Select Committee on Transport report on overcrowding on public transport concluded that overcrowding is worse in West Yorkshire than in the south-east. The experience of my constituents backs that up.

Despite the recent renewal of rolling stock, capacity on the Wharfedale line is approaching saturation point at peak times. It is under pressure from new developments such as the former High Royds asylum development in Menston, where almost 600 new homes are to be provided in addition to many others already built in the Guiseley area. The Department for Transport is currently funding eight carriages up to 2007 on the Wharfedale line. I ask the Minister urgently to review that, so that she can confirm at the earliest opportunity that that rolling stock will continue to operate beyond 2007, because that is crucial.

Passengers on the Caldervale line serving New Pudsey station face significant overcrowding problems. The service is mainly operated by ageing diesel rolling stock that does not meet modern-day standards by any stretch of the imagination.

The Harrogate line, which goes through Horsforth in my constituency, is one of the most overcrowded routes in West Yorkshire. Indeed, once the service has called at Horsforth during peak times, it regularly goes straight through into Leeds, leaving passengers standing at the two stations at Headingley and Burley Park.

The Minister is obviously aware that the Northern Rail franchise is under review. It is essential that that review reflects the present demand and pressure on services and the potential for carrying even more passengers and getting even more people out of their cars. Additional units are needed not only to ease present capacity problems but to cater for future growth and especially to serve some of the priority station proposals that are still waiting on the stocks. They cannot go forward because there is insufficient capacity to meet the passenger numbers that it is anticipated will be generated by building the stations. That seems a perverse and ironic way to run any business, whether or not it involves transport.

West Yorkshire Metro has a blueprint for increasing patronage by more than 50 per cent. over the next 10 years with what I regard, and I hope that the Minister would regard, as a relatively modest investment of between £5 million and £6 million per annum over the next 10 years.

I want to take the opportunity, because of the Minister's responsibilities, to raise Leeds Bradford airport. Most people would accept that if an airport site was sought in Leeds today, the present site of Leeds Bradford airport would not even be considered. Its limitations are considerable, but the point on which I seek a response from my hon. Friend concerns the current process of developing the airport's master plan and how it will expand in years to come. Even at present levels of operation, there is a need for improvements to road safety and access around the airport. Transport links are poor and the roads are widely regarded as inadequate and unsafe. The implications of growth cannot be addressed without considering the impact on local communities and the environment.

When presenting the airports White Paper to the House, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State clearly acknowledged the need for a balance between growth in air travel and its environmental impact not only on climate change but on those living near airports, such as my constituents in Horsforth, Yeadon and Guiseley. He confirmed that we needed to reduce and minimise the impact of airports on local communities and the natural environment. Leeds city council's current leadership, however, recently suggested that the White Paper allows for the airport to grow "willy-nilly". It is ironic, therefore, that the controlling coalition on the council is looking to sell off the airport, which is municipally owned, thereby relinquishing the total control that elected councils have over it. I suspect that the trick is to sell it off to a private partner, with a guarantee of expansion, growth and profit, and then blame any unpopular developments on Government policy. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to confirm today that it is not Government policy to allow any airport, especially Leeds Bradford, to expand willy-nilly and that the airport master plan currently being devised will strike a proper balance between growth and the impact on surrounding communities.

[Mr. Paul Truswell]

As I have said, any airport planning process must be based on proper public consultation. The master plan must be underpinned by an independent environmental impact assessment, which should include consideration of the impact, prevention and minimisation of air and noise pollution, climate change and other associated issues, such as operating hours.

The people of West Yorkshire clearly want to fly from their nearest airport at the lowest price to the greatest number of destinations. Although my constituents living near the airport realise that there is a price to be paid for that location, they rightly believe that their quality of life should not be seriously undermined by unrestricted and excessive growth. A fair and sustainable balance must be achieved.

I note that there are only 13 minutes left, so I leave it to my hon. Friend the Minister to try to reassure me on the crucial transport issues in my constituency.

1.48 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Ms Karen Buck): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Mr. Truswell) on securing this second debate on the subject of transport in Pudsey. It is impressive to see how seriously he takes this important local issue and how effectively he campaigns on his constituents' behalf.

The Government and the Department recognise the importance of good transport links for economic and social regeneration. Better access to and from urban centres such as Leeds and Bradford, whether by bus, rail or car, is crucial.

The pressures on the transport system are well known. We have a legacy of under-investment that goes back decades and, as our economy has grown, there have been further pressures on all modes of transport. That is why we are committed to sustained long-term investment in transport and have doubled transport spending over the past few years. People in the Pudsey area will have seen the benefits of that investment.

Our strategy for transport is to reduce social exclusion, tackle congestion and pollution and enhance the quality of life by improving all types of transport—rail and road, public and private—in ways that increase choice. It is a strategy for investment in the future. However, it is important to recognise that we cannot satisfy every demand for transport infrastructure enhancements, rail or road. Major infrastructure improvements are expensive and take time to deliver. We must prioritise and be realistic. That is why we have asked the regions for their advice on priorities, to help to ensure that funding decisions are targeted on the schemes that will deliver the most benefit.

Good local transport is fundamental to building thriving and prosperous communities. The step change in local transport funding that we have made over the past five years emphasises the Government's commitment to delivering sustained improvement to the transport infrastructure and making a real improvement to people's daily lives. The total capital funding made available to authorities for the first local transport plans was £8 billion, more than double the amount for the preceding five years. West Yorkshire alone will benefit from £54 million for local transport this year.

The local transport plan system has provided more certainty of funding for local authorities, so that they can tackle local issues such as improving road maintenance, securing better traffic management, enhancing road safety and making buses more accessible and better integrated with other transport modes.

We have recently consulted on a new formula for allocating local transport plan funding to local authorities. Although we are still considering the responses, our proposals show that funding for integrated transport measures in West Yorkshire will grow by 13 per cent. during the second local transport plan.

Mr. Truswell: On that funding point, I understand that the formula used by the Department to calculate the number of passengers in West Yorkshire is seriously flawed. Will my hon. Friend undertake to revisit it to ensure that as far as she is aware it is correct?

Ms Buck: I assure my hon. Friend that we do not believe that the formula is flawed; however, if he has reasons, of which my Department and I are not aware, to call it into question, I assure him that I shall examine them to see whether any of his concerns can be met.

We are planning for investment over the long term. A critical area for local transport plans, to which my hon. Friend understandably chose to devote a considerable amount of his time, is the sustained investment in bus services. West Yorkshire has benefited from significant investment in major bus schemes, with £39 million committed since 2001 to schemes that are realising major improvements in bus services. These schemes include the east Leeds quality bus corridor, the A641 Manchester road, the Bradford quality bus scheme and West Yorkshire education transport—My Bus.

In the early years of the first local transport plan, there was an encouraging increase in bus patronage in West Yorkshire, from 199 million passengers in 1999–2000 to more than 203 million passengers in 2002. The decline in patronage in recent years is disappointing and concerning, but it is clear from experience elsewhere that where there are the right conditions, such as a determined passenger transport executive and committed bus operators, bus use can increase significantly. I very much hope that the West Yorkshire authorities, working closely with Metro and the bus operators, will be able to produce a strong second local transport plan, including robust measures to attract people back onto the buses and arrest the decline.

Mr. Truswell: Bus patronage is growing by concentrating on popular, profitable routes. That is happening at the expense of shrinkage in routes that are not profitable but socially necessary. The capacity of Metro, the passenger transport executive, to subsidise those loss-making services is diminishing over time. Does my hon. Friend accept that there is a two-speed service: growth where it is profitable; shrinkage where it is not?

Ms Buck: I do not accept my hon. Friend's description of the service. I understand that the successes in bus patronage have in many instances come about through operators and partners choosing routes that are most likely to increase patronage levels. In a trade-off when one does not have unlimited resources, there is always tension about where resources shall be committed. It makes a great deal of sense for a proportion of the £1 billion that we spend on bus services overall to be devoted to increasing patronage as much as possible. It is also true that a separate social exclusion agenda is based more on meeting the needs of isolated communities. Inevitably, there are never the resources to provide all the services that we should like.

Our experience throughout the country, in different areas with different conditions, has been that it is possible to make striking improvements in bus services when there is proper planning for and targeting of good routes. It will be at the local level that the companies and their partners will have to make choices and, inevitably, trade-offs about where they invest.

My hon. Friend asked particularly about the issue of quality contracts. As he knows, the Transport Act 2000 provides a mechanism for introducing a quality contract scheme, although only where that would be the only practicable way of implementing the authority's bus strategy, and would do so economically, efficiently and effectively. Since my hon. Friend's previous Adjournment debate on this subject, the Department has published guidance on how to apply, the supporting evidence required and the matters that the Secretary of State will take into account in considering the merits of the case. An order has been made and brought into force, reducing from 21 months to six months the minimum time that must elapse between making a quality contract scheme and bringing it into force.

As my hon. Friend was comparing and contrasting, London has had a different form of regulated transport since the 1930s—not just recently—and was not affected by deregulation in the 1980s. To introduce a regulated regime in an area that is currently deregulated raises a number of difficult issues, particularly the reduction of commercial opportunities for operators, which did not arise in London. That is one reason why the requirements of the 2000 Act are exacting. Another is that there are many places where the deregulated market is delivering high quality bus services and patronage growth. Brighton, Cambridge, Nottingham, Oxford, Telford and York are some examples. More recently, there has been impressive growth in areas such as Bedford, Exeter and Peterborough. In general, those are places where good partnership between the local authority and the bus operators is working. That is the model that we wish to encourage.

As I mentioned, on the specific area of bus services, we shall shortly announce how the £350 million that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced for the extension of the concessionary bus services will be distributed, and I hope that that will provide an additional boost for transport in areas such as my hon. Friend's.

There are improvements planned on rail services. We are spending more than £80 million a week on the railways and there are a number of examples of the benefits from that investment in West Yorkshire, where patronage has grown from 16 million to 21 million over the past five years. My hon. Friend will be aware of the recent £250 million redevelopment of Leeds city station. It has seen the development of new platforms and a reorganisation of the track layout to the western end of the station. That has improved facilities for passengers, increased the reliability of services and added to the station's capacity. A new bus-rail interchange facility has also been opened outside Leeds city station, making the transfer between bus and rail services much easier.

The new TransPennine franchise began in February 2004 and will deliver more than £250 million of investment, with a brand new fleet of 50 trains due to be introduced in 2006. Also benefiting Leeds and West Yorkshire is a 44 per cent. increase in east coast mainline services since 1996: there are currently 53 services per day, and that will rise to 66 by December 2007. Those are substantial improvements. At a more local level, 16 new four-coach class 333 electric trains have been introduced on the Airedale and Wharfedale lines. They have seen a significant increase in patronage.

If my hon. Friend will forgive me, there are many other things that I could say, and I am happy to get back to him with some detail, but I should like to spend my last few seconds on Leeds Bradford airport. As my hon. Friend will be aware, the development of that airport is part of a strategy developed in the air transport White Paper to promote regional airports. It has many benefits for the regional economy as part of the connectivity theme, which is important for economic growth in the area. However, I am aware that current road links to and from the airport can suffer from congestion, especially in peak hours. Fast and regular bus services now run from Bradford and Leeds city centres and provide a much improved public transport option. In addition, the A6120 study has considered how improvements to road-based access can be made. My hon. Friend has concerns about how the expansion of the airport may impact on the environment and on existing residents, but I assure him that we shall take full account of environmental considerations. We made it clear in the air transport White Paper that airport expansion is subject to environmental constraints.

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 16 November 2005

[MRS. JANET DEAN in the Chair]

Trade (Developing Countries)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Roy.]

9.30 am

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): I am pleased to introduce the debate on this important topic. It is particularly timely, given the World Trade Organisation ministerial meeting scheduled for next month in Hong Kong.

I am sure hon. Members will agree that the international issues of poverty, aid, debt relief and trade justice captured the public's imagination in 2005. The high-profile Make Poverty History campaign has rightly been successful in catapulting the issues up the political agenda. In February, 22,000 people flocked to Trafalgar square to hear Nelson Mandela give an inspiring address, urging world leaders to use 2005 to make poverty history. The campaign focused on three objectives: more and better aid, debt relief and trade justice.

In July, I marched in Edinburgh with almost 250,000 people, including some hon. Members in the Chamber. Just days before, the G8 leaders met at Gleneagles. That summit brought positive news on the first two objectives. On debt relief, the deal agreed means that every year $1 billion will be saved by the 18 countries eligible for debt relief. Many non-governmental organisations and campaigners have complained that that does not go far enough, as it represents only 10 per cent. of the debt that needs to be cancelled. I agree with that, but it is a welcome start and should be applauded.

The additional $50 billion in aid a year is also a great achievement, and I am glad to hear the Prime Minister talk of moving towards spending 0.7 per cent. of gross national income on aid. The United Kingdom should be proud of leading the way among Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries on the percentage of GNI that it spends on aid, but we must remember that the commitment is 35 years old. Call me impatient, but I think that that is too slow. I was interested to hear the Prime Minister, in his speech on Monday, pledge to treble aid for trade. I hope that the Minister will clarify the effect of that on the UK reaching the 0.7 per cent. target.

The third objective of the Make Poverty History campaign was trade justice. More than 250 Members of Parliament have signed up to early-day motion 679 on making poverty history through trade justice. More than 8,000 members of the public lobbied more than 300 MPs at the trade justice lobby on 2 November. I am sure that many hon. Members were lobbied by constituents. Two days ago, in his speech on global trade, the Prime Minister set out his support for cutting trade barriers while implementing measures to help developing countries benefit from trade at their own pace. It is clear that the subject is regarded as highly important.

It is also worth noting the particular interest of young people in these issues. Whether it was at the July march, the April vigils or the lobby a couple of weeks ago, one thing that struck me was the number of young faces in the crowd. That is just as well. One of my constituents, Sahir Hamid, was lucky enough to attend the World Youth Congress, which was held in Scotland in the summer. A statistic that came out of that is quite shocking. It emerged that 51 per cent. of the world's population is under 25. Given that statistic, it is just as well that young people are interested in the issues because we shall certainly not solve them without the active engagement of young people around the world.

I want to focus my comments and questions on the difficulties faced by developing countries with the current trade system, including trade barriers and the prospect of forced market liberalisation. I also want to highlight the problems with the trade-related aspects of intellectual property rights. I shall then turn to some possible solutions, with reference to steps at the local and global level, including the forthcoming WTO talks in Hong Kong and beyond.

On the problems with trade barriers, production support and export subsidies by the developed world can have a devastating effect on developing countries. This is particularly apparent in the agriculture industry. When EU production is subsidised and there are additional subsidies on exports, farmers in developing countries cannot compete. Rich countries spend $279 billion a year on farm support, which is three times more than they spend on aid. It is well acknowledged that a key sticking point, which makes it difficult to envisage a positive outcome to next month's WTO negotiations, is the EU's intransigence on protectionist agricultural policies. We know that France, in particular, is opposed to any concessions on that. What discussions have the Minister, the Prime Minister and others in government had with President Chirac on the reform of the common agricultural policy? What tangible outcomes came from the discussions?

This is not just about agriculture. Tariffs on other industries, such as textiles, also harm developing countries. For example, in 2001, Bangladesh's exports generated $331 million in tariff revenue for the US Treasury. In that year, the net US aid to Bangladesh was just $87 million. The EU spends €4 million each year subsidising milk powder to Jamaica. The impact of dumping our excess milk powder on Jamaica has been a sharp drop in Jamaican milk production of 35 per cent. in the past two years. That makes it difficult for countries to continue to run their own agriculture industries and to produce their own food, which would obviously be a more sustainable way forward.

In the EU, the average cow now receives $2.2 a day in support, which is more than the daily income of the half the world's population. It is absolutely crazy. The EU is exporting sugar and beef at respectively 44 and 47 per cent. of their internal cost of production. No wonder sugar producers and cattle farmers in developing countries are losing out.

Global trade has the potential to lift millions of people out of poverty, but liberalising markets too soon can stifle fledgling industries in developing countries. Christian Aid estimates that trade liberalisation has cost sub-Saharan Africa $272 billion over the past 20 years, which would be enough to pay off the region's debt and pay to vaccinate and educate every child in the region. Developing countries must be allowed the space to set their own timetable for liberalisation.

[Jo Swinson]

Let us consider the example of rice. In 1995, the International Monetary Fund forced the Haitian Government to cut their rice tariffs from 35 per cent. to 3 per cent. As a result, imports increased by 150 per cent. in nine years, and today three out of every four plates of rice in Haiti are produced in the US. The impact of that is that local farmers' livelihoods have been devastated and rice-growing areas now have the highest levels of malnutrition and poverty. At the same time, profits for Riceland Foods Inc. of Arkansas, the world's biggest rice mill, rose by $123 million from 2002 to 2003, thanks in large part to a 50 per cent. increase in its exports, many of them to Haiti. We can see the inequality of the system.

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate at such an appropriate time. That is important. She has made many valuable points, but will she comment on economic partnership agreements? Does she share my worry that in their current form they are causing a great deal of concern? Most people would like the UK Government to take strong action, using their presidency of the EU to encourage other member states to rethink their approach on those agreements.

Jo Swinson: I share many of my hon. Friend's concerns about the economic partnership agreements. Trade with developing countries is obviously not governed only by multilateral agreements. The free-trade deals that are negotiated between the EU and the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries often require countries to liberalise their markets substantially to benefit from trading with the EU. The Government recently said that they have supported the request by the ACP countries to have more time to proceed with liberalisation. However, I agree that the conditionality should be removed from the agreements. Developing countries should be free to choose if, and when, to liberalise. Will the Minister remark on that, in particular the UK's position on economic partnership agreements? Will he also supply a list of the active partnerships?

After the introduction of TRIPS—trade-related aspects of intellectual property rights—in 1995, patent rights had to be guaranteed protection by WTO member countries. Many of those countries wanted to use the formulae from patented drugs to treat their citizens who were suffering from a variety of diseases, from HIV/AIDS to malaria and tuberculosis. However, many pharmaceutical companies were seen to be putting profits before people. The WTO, after much discussion, agreed that TRIPS

"does not and should not prevent Members from taking measures to protect public health."

The reality is different, however, because the only way for many countries to get around TRIPS is to manufacture the drugs in their own country so that they can provide for their population. That does not always run smoothly and not all countries are able to do it. The pharmaceuticals do not always agree that generic drug producers are complying with TRIPS.

I am sure hon. Members remember that in 2001 39 major pharmaceutical companies tried to prosecute the South African Government for passing a law that allowed easy production and importation of generic drugs. There was immense pressure against that from the South African Government, the European Parliament and 300,000 people throughout the world from more than 130 countries who signed a petition. That public international pressure forced the pharmaceuticals to back down.

One company, GlaxoSmithKline, even granted a voluntary licence to a South African generics producer, allowing it to share the rights to GlaxoSmithKline's drugs, as long as 30 per cent. of the net sales went to a non-governmental organisation fighting HIV and AIDS in South Africa. That continues to this day, and in many ways it was a positive result. However, let us remember that globally only 15 per cent. of the estimated 6.5 million people who need such treatment were receiving it this year.

Given the public health challenges facing many developing countries, from not just HIV and AIDS but malaria, TB, and—most likely at some point—a bird flu pandemic, it is clear that a review of TRIPS is urgently required. Protection must be in place to exempt things that have an impact on the millennium development goals and global disease control. The example of TRIPS demonstrates how the current provisions have proved inadequate.

Global issues require global solutions, but individuals can and do change their behaviour, doing their bit to make trade fairer with developing countries. The Fairtrade Foundation, in accrediting products that are fairly traded, has played a role in enabling consumers to make informed choices. The fact that sales of Fairtrade products have almost doubled during the past two years to more than £140 million shows the rising demand from consumers who take those issues into account when making their buying decisions.

In my constituency, many keen campaigners have got together to take action at a local level. Setting up a steering group, they are working with local businesses and employers to try to become to first fair trade zone in Scotland. I should be delighted if the Minister would agree to meet me and a group of my constituents who are working hard to promote fairer trade with developing countries, so that we can discuss those issues. Perhaps during his remarks he will say whether he is willing to do that.

I should like to share a story from my constituency which sums up many of the problems. There is a local gift and tea shop called the Coach House, which is run on a not-for-profit basis to fund charitable projects at home and abroad. Some 20 years ago, a lady called Angela Gomes came from Bangladesh to the Coach House. She represented 4,000 destitute women who made beautiful embroidery. When she was offered a grant for her organisation, she said, "I don't want handouts. I want you to sell our women's products. That's what gives them their dignity."

Angela Gomes was spot on. The women she represented did not have much and they were destitute, but being able to ply their trade and have it sold abroad helped to lift them out of poverty and they had dignity. That is why, of the three aims of the Make Poverty

History campaign, trade justice is the most important. Trade really can help to lift people out of poverty, and it presents a great opportunity for developing countries. However, the balance needs to be evened up between the rich and powerful developed world and the developing countries.

The talks next month in Hong Kong are vital, as are the discussions that follow in 2006 to secure the details for the Doha round in time to take advantage of the US fast-track agreement. We have all read reports of the recent difficulties with the pre-negotiations. Will the Minister say a little about the Government's view of the procedures of the WTO, its institutional set-up and how effective it is in producing outcomes from talks that favour poorer countries, given the experience of previous rounds in Cancun and Seattle?

In conclusion, the UK should be in a strong position to influence events with its presidency of the EU and when the Trade Commissioner is not only a UK nominee to the Commission but, as is well documented, a close personal friend of the Prime Minister. We should be able to use that influence to get a good outcome from Hong Kong. What discussions have the Minister, the Prime Minister and others in government had with Commissioner Mandelson regarding the Doha round in Hong Kong next month? How does he view the potential outcomes and what does he believe can realistically be achieved at those talks?

A fantastic opportunity to make progress on poverty and trade justice has been presented in 2005. I hope that it will not be remembered as a missed opportunity. This week the Prime Minister encouraged many with his comments on trade in developing countries. I hope that he, the Minister and all those involved in the WTO negotiations will remember the words of Nelson Mandela earlier this year when he called on world leaders to recognise that the world is hungry for action, not words.

9.47 am

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) on securing the debate and on her excellent introduction to it.

My first interest in international development started 21 years ago when I had the privilege to be, in a very minor capacity, a voluntary aid worker in Honduras in central America, which was then and still is the second poorest country in the western hemisphere. My concern about trade and development has burned brightly ever since.

Trade justice campaigners are right to call on the EU to reduce its trade barriers against developing countries—they remain far too high—but the EU should still encourage poor countries to open their markets as it will also bring those countries gains. There is a wonderful opportunity, as the hon. Lady said, for this country to play a major role at the forthcoming WTO talks in encouraging the EU to lead the world in improving trade relations with developing countries.

However, it is important to remember that reducing trade barriers across the board will do more for poor countries than granting them trade preferences, which, in many respects, might do more harm than good. That is the subject of my humble contribution. I take as a large part of my text the excellent work by Open Europe, which is a think tank specialising in, and encouraging, reform in the EU and in its trading relationships with the rest of the world.

An idea advocated by many in the trade justice lobby is that the developed world should introduce more trade preferences. However, there may be huge dangers in going down that route rather than encouraging a general reduction in trade barriers. The goods that are the most heavily taxed by the EU tend to be goods that developed countries have a comparative advantage in producing, not least agricultural produce and textiles.

In a well meaning attempt to offset that disparity, the EU maintains a system of trade preferences, but the system has not been effective. In fact, the net effect is that the EU's applied tariff rate remains higher for exports from poor countries than for those from rich ones. To give some statistics, countries with a gross domestic product per capita of under £5,000 a year face, on average, an EU tariff of 5 per cent. Countries with a GDP per capita of between £5,000 and £15,000 a year face an average tariff of just under 3 per cent. Countries with a GDP per capita of more than £15,000 a year face a tariff of just over 1.5 per cent. Some of the developing nations that are the poorest in the world face the steepest applied tariffs from the EU. For example, Bolivia and Ecuador face an applied tariff of more than 26 per cent. and Lesotho, Namibia and Swaziland face a tariff of 21 per cent.

Another problem is that the trade preference arrangements in place are extremely patchy. Full tariff-free access is supposedly granted to 49 countries on the UN's list of less developed countries. However, that list does not cover some of the world's poorest countries and excludes large poor countries, such as Kenya, India, Pakistan and Nigeria.

Much of the benefit of the system for developing countries is lost because of complex rules of origin. Although in theory a country might be able to export its products to the EU duty-free, such preferential access is available only to goods that contain no parts, materials or ingredients from other countries. One study found that although 84 per cent. of goods from Albania are supposed to be able to enter the EU duty-free, in practice only 2 per cent. do. It is worth remembering that Albania is a country on the continent of Europe and is still, sadly, a developing nation.

A study undertaken by the World Bank in 2005 found that the overall value of EU preferences to sub-Saharan African countries amounted to just 4 per cent. of the value of those countries' exports to the EU. It also noted that the majority of supposed beneficiaries of US, EU and Japanese preferences have experienced little or no impact.

The complex system of trade preferences discourages developing countries from reducing trade barriers that might help their development in the round. Without preferences, exporters in developing countries have an incentive to counteract the protectionist tendencies of domestic producers. Preferences are particularly damaging when they are specific to certain industries. For example, the EU's preferential access arrangements for bananas and sugar from Caribbean producers encourages those countries to invest heavily in volatile, primary industries, which narrows their production base. That leaves those countries more vulnerable to economic shocks in those sectors.

[Mr. Philip Hollobone]

That system of trade preferences distorts the correct investment decisions that those countries should be making because they act as an artificial incentive to invest in industries in which the recipient countries, with the best will in the world, are not internationally competitive. That is now having a very damaging effect as preferences are gradually eroded as global tariffs fall, albeit too slowly, as part of the WTO process. For example, the effect on Guyana in south America of the first round of reductions in the EU sugar preferences is likely to be the equivalent the UK losing its entire financial services industry overnight. Some research suggests that preferences may have had a negative effect, for many of the reasons that I have mentioned.

All of us want to encourage developing countries to prosper. We have huge sympathy with our constituents who support the Trade Justice Movement. Many of us are extremely sympathetic to those who lobbied us recently, as the hon. Lady said. However, with a cool head, it is important to say that while there is a wonderful opportunity in the next WTO round for the EU to play a leading role to encourage the world to continue to reduce trade barriers, the EU should concentrate on reducing its trade barriers across the board because that will do far more good for poor countries around the world than granting them imperial trade preferences that may do more harm than good in the long run.

9.56 am

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) on securing the debate, which is obviously a product of the fair trade lobbying event that took place recently. It is good that lobbyists who come here determined to achieve something can have some influence. The Minister also gets an opportunity to set out the Government's stall before the WTO round. The debate is important in that context.

I profoundly disagree with the last point made by the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone). He talked about doing more harm than good. He should look at the recent United Nations human development report for 2005, which indicates just how horrific the disparity of wealth and power is in the world and how the living standards of the poorest in the poorest countries in the world are steadily falling. Those countries that have been exposed to free markets for the first time have also suffered losses in public services and falling life expectancy. We must think seriously about what we are doing to this planet.

Like other Members, I have substantial numbers of people in my constituency who are involved with development and world trade issues, mainly surrounding the churches, the mosque and various faith communities. However, since I have the privilege of representing a constituency that is very multicultural, there are also people from all parts of the world. So, when we have WTO-type discussions, they are very real. People who have been farmers in Africa, Asia or Latin America talk about their own experience. That makes the debate lively and interesting.

When the lobby group from my area arrived at Parliament recently, I said, "Look, you don't need to convince me of the arguments. We all know each other quite well. But if I was the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, what would you say to me?" This interesting debate took place in the rain on the south bank so it was quite brief, but several points were made and it is my duty to put them to the House. First, people were alarmed at the levels of poverty that exist around the world. Secondly, they were alarmed at the degree of power politics involved in the world trade debate and in world trade negotiations. Thirdly, they wanted the European Union—because it is the European Union that leads the negotiations—to recognise that Europe and north America must give up a great deal in order to do something about world poverty:

It is not good enough for the world's leaders to embrace Nelson Mandela in Trafalgar square or anywhere else or to go round wearing wristbands, saying 'Eliminate poverty now', if at the same time they are not prepared to make the tough trade and aid decisions that are required if we are to do something about eliminating poverty in the poorest parts of the world. Strong political action is required.

In common with other hon. Members, I have had the opportunity of visiting and, a long time ago, working in poorer countries of the world. One quickly sees what the whole problem is. There is little industrial development happening in most of sub-Saharan Africa, simply because there is not a local market that can purchase the goods on sale; exporting goods is virtually impossible, because the trade barriers of western Europe and north America make that completely hopeless. At the same time, the countries concerned are encouraged to invest in local industry and agriculture, if they can. I remember well visiting some new agricultural enterprises in Angola, although planting the goods in the first place was hardly worth the prices they were receiving. Producing maize anywhere in southern Africa is frankly a total waste of time while the American Administration are paying their friends in the mid-west to produce vast quantities of maize that are then given away in order to destroy local economies all over sub-Saharan Africa. The same is repeated with milk powder and around the world, as the hon. Members for Kettering and for East Dunbartonshire pointed out.

We have to be realistic. There has to be an end to the food dumping strategy. That is really what brought about the fate of the Cancun talks, because Europe and north America were not prepared, in sufficient strength, to give up their food dumping policies and, because of that, the talks broke down. I was not particularly sorry, because the alternative was worse. I guess that most of the poorest countries felt the same.

As we move towards the talks that are going to take place in Hong Kong, there is interesting power-play politics going on. The European Union is attempting to get a united position and the United States, having set its face completely against ending any farm subsidies, then announces that it might be prepared to consider some reduction at some point in the future. Everyone starts running around and jumping for joy, as though there has been a complete change of heart. I do not believe that there has been any change of heart in the US Administration whatever. An awful lot more than an undertaking that at some point in the future some degree of farm subsidies will be reduced in the United States is required.

I hope that when we go to the talks in Hong Kong we are prepared to recognise that the current situation cannot go on if we are serious about conquering poverty in the poorest countries in the world. An end to the food dumping policy is required, but also an opening up of markets to the poorest countries and producers in the world. To some extent that flows against the received wisdom, which the International Monetary Fund and others have been lecturing poor countries about for a long time. Whole lectures have been about the need for free trade. We are not quite sure what they mean by free trade, because they never get to the definition.

I look at things this way: every industrial country in the world, bar none—ours included, obviously—has developed industries, agriculture or whatever the main product behind some degree of tariff wall. That is how every single country has developed. They have been successful. For example, most of India's post-independence industrial development was behind a tariff wall; pre-independence, protection was from the colonial tariff wall.

However, for the poorest countries in the world, we say, "Sorry, no tariffs for you." They must, in return for being allowed to export some agricultural—unfinished or unprocessed—goods to the west, open their markets up to western goods and policies. That is not just in the manufacturing and sales field, but, crucially—something I was pleased that the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire mentioned—with regard to the agreement on trade and services. The way such trade deals are worked out effectively forces the privatisation of public services in many of the poorest countries, which then provide a huge market for western water companies, telecom companies and so on to take over and run those services. We must be serious in what we are trying to achieve. I hope that we come out of the Hong Kong agreement with an end to dumping policies, an end to the pressure for the privatisation of services and an acceptance that if the poorest countries are to lift themselves out of poverty they must be given some protection.

There is a negotiating issue in that the world is too simply lumped into groups of developing and developed countries. The matter is not as simple as that. Some developing counties are very poor, principally in sub-Saharan Africa and central America, but others are not as poor and may seek to benefit greatly. There must be a better definition of the situation in those countries.

The Minister needs time to reply and I know that other hon. Members want to speak. My final general point concerns working conditions and the conditions of women in the world's poorest countries. The International Labour Organisation is worthy and deserves greater attention, greater support and greater power in the world. The working conditions experienced by garment workers in Bangladesh and most industrial workers in China, Indonesia and many other countries are appalling. The goods they produce, particularly in China, are sold on the high streets of this country, Europe and north America at prices at which we could not even produce them, let alone make a profit. The working conditions in those countries and particularly child labour—it is still rife in many parts of the world and a blot on the world's conscience—should be dealt with and included in trade rounds. It is unlikely that any of the Governments of the poorest countries in the world will raise issues of working conditions or child labour because they either benefit from them or feel embarrassed by them. It is also unlikely that many of the richest countries will do so because international companies that invest in the garment industry in Bangladesh, China and other places benefit from those appalling working conditions. We must look towards minimum working conditions and labour standards and, above all, the right to join and to organise trade unions. The treatment of women and their lack of education in those countries is serious.

I know that the Department for International Development shares most of those views and in its development models seeks poverty-reduction programmes and improvement in the status of women and the education of children in those countries. However, we have a long way to go. The UN human development report for 2005 came out a couple of months ago and referred to child mortality rates and changing life expectancy. In the highest income countries between 1980 and 2003—a little under 25 years—life expectancy rose from around 73 to 80. In sub-Saharan Africa it rose a little after 1980 but has now dropped to around 45. That is the average for sub-Saharan Africa, but in many countries it is much lower and falling fast. The only other area of the world where life expectancy has not risen is Russia and eastern Europe, the countries that were formerly part of the COMECON—the Council for Mutual Economic Co-operation. There, the imposition of free-market economics, privatisation and, frankly, robbery of the public sector has damaged health and education services beyond all recognition. One hopes that the next time a human development report comes round that situation will be reversed.

Above all, one hopes that the situation will be reversed in sub-Saharan Africa. However, it will not be reversed, and the millennium development goals will not be met, unless there is real change in the attitude of the richest countries in the world. That means a preparedness to stop food-dumping policies and to allow developing countries to export goods freely to western Europe and north America, if that is what they wish to do. Also, we need to allow poorer countries to maintain a degree of tariff protection so that they are not dumped on in terms of manufactured or farm goods; that way, they could develop their own economies in exactly the way that western Europe and north America have done in the past. These are crucial issues. It is not enough to say, "We wish to eliminate poverty and make poverty history"; we have to be prepared to do something about it.

10.11 am

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): I want to take this opportunity to make direct representations. The Make Poverty History campaign has been inspiring, but we have to ask ourselves whether it will be any different from previous campaigns. Will we achieve anything? Will people look back and say, "That was a turning point."?

In my constituency, I find it particularly inspiring to see how schoolchildren now have a real understanding of the unfairness in international trading. That is hope for the future; it shows that we will continue making progress and that people will not forget. There is a real understanding of why some countries are still poor, why people are suffering so greatly, and of the fact that we have the opportunity to change things.

[Annette Brooke]

We have a great duty to deliver something in the next round of talks. I shall refer to representations that we may have all received in different forms. The first is from the mass lobby. It was encouraging to see so many people here, some of whom had travelled so far, and so many young people. We were all asked to write and ask what changes to the EU's negotiation position the Government were calling for at the World Trade Organisation meeting. We would like to hear some answers on that.

I have received more particular representations asking what we, as a nation, will do during our presidency of the EU to come to an early agreement on a date by which rich countries will have ceased to give export subsidies, to dump products on the developing world and to distort world trade in such a bizarre and almost obscene way.

At the WTO conference, attention will be turned to the manufacturing and industrial sectors. Christian Aid submits that concessions on the export subsidies of rich countries are likely to be used as a carrot to induce poor countries to agree to further harmful trade agreements on manufacturing. We have to be clear on that type of thing. We have to give without demanding quite so much in return; we will all benefit as world trade grows. We have to make what might be seen as short-term sacrifices for the greater good. I understand that the EU wants to debate issues such as rules on investment, whereas the poorest countries feel that they have already achieved the exclusion of some of those items from WTO negotiations. The very worst thing would be if we were perceived to take steps backwards at the talks.

I have already mentioned economic partnership agreements, an issue that causes me great concern. A strand of that—the issue of bilateral agreements—has been reflected in everybody's contributions. The concern is raised because although the Government are saying the right things, we are not at all clear that our Commissioner in Europe is taking forward our view. There are comments in the press that Commissioner Peter Mandelson openly dismisses the huge opposition to EPAs, which is a great concern. I should be grateful if the Minister addressed that in a little more detail.

There are so many reasons why we should be concerned about economic partnership agreements. Are we making grossly unfair demands? There is a lot of evidence that we are seeing EU goods flooding markets and, in return, putting so much pressure on the local economy. Are we forcing new issues through the back door through such agreements? Are we undermining regional integration? That is a serious point, because there is a balance between the very poor countries that already have some agreements with the EU and a certain amount of openness, and they could suffer. There is a conflict with some ACP countries: is their priority trade with Europe, or trade within a regional area? That is difficult to work through. The underlying point is that it is unfair. It is, as many people say, like playing football on a steep slope, and we know who is unfortunate enough to have the uphill struggle.

I should like to round off my remarks with some of the facts with which we were all presented, but which need to be put on the record. We all know that African people cannot afford delay, and we cannot afford not to get it right. If Africa increased its share of world trade by just 1 per cent., it would get $90 billion, which is three times more than it gets today in aid and debt relief combined. Hon. Members have already said that that is why trade is so important in our way forward. Unless we get the deal at the WTO, the scandal of unfair trade will continue unabated. Rich countries spend $279 billion on farm support, which is three times more than they spend on aid. The figures are alarming, but we have it at our fingertips to speak and take action.

How can we live with our conscience when we think about the EU dumping sugar and beef at less than half the production cost and how that is affecting the developing world? I hope that the Minister is reassuring about the robust stance that will be taken in the EU and at future trade talks.

10.18 am

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I strongly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) on not only securing this important, timely debate, but setting out clearly and strongly a case for the United Kingdom, with its European partners and in the wider world, to take a lead in the vital negotiations in Hong Kong from 13 December.

Like my hon. Friend, I was in Edinburgh in early July, marching with hundreds of thousands of others in support of the Make Poverty History campaign. It was telling that not only were many hundreds of thousands of people marching there and elsewhere, but people were attending concerts in various parts of the country and around the world. There were also all those who wished to be at those events but could not attend, and those who wore the wristbands, all of which demonstrated mass popular support for a campaign that reached a crescendo at that time. There were significant expectations of the Government, with their presidency of the G8, to push for a strong, clear outcome in the G8 negotiations.

Clearly, a crucial cornerstone of the announcement—the communiqué—that came out of the Gleneagles summit was the expectation of a positive outcome for the World Trade Organisation negotiations at the end of the year. My hon. Friend rightly emphasised and welcomed the announcements and promises made on the aid and debt relief packages, although I am sure that they were slower and more modest than a lot of us would have wanted. However, as she demonstrated, they represent only a cup of help in comparison with the tidal wave of impact that trade has on developing countries.

Trade is clearly the cornerstone. Until we get the trading relationship right, we need to do all we can, through aid programmes and support, to enable developing countries to build up their infrastructures and develop health, education and other programmes—literally, to save lives now—so that those countries have the capacity to develop economically. Economic development will provide the sustainable economic background against which those countries can establish a future that will genuinely make poverty history.

Emphasis on such issues goes back to the beginning of the Doha round in 2001, when there was a recognition among western countries that the Uruguay round, which finished in 1993, resulted in a deal that was clearly pro-western in outcome. It is worth reminding ourselves that the primary purpose underlying the Doha development round—this is understood among the 148 countries engaged in the negotiations—is to achieve a deal that will make a major contribution to the development of underdeveloped countries, in particular the G33—the poorest countries.

In a thoughtful contribution, the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) set out an argument that mentioned research from Open Europe, which I have not had the benefit of seeing. I look forward to doing so. It lobs a challenging device into what are sometimes easy, intellectually non-challenging campaigns on trade justice. I should be interested to hear what the Minister knows of the evidence that argues that the best way to develop developing countries is to liberalise at a much more accelerated rate than is proposed either by the campaigners or even by many countries engaged in the negotiations. That is a challenging proposal and, frankly, those who want sustainable development of developing countries and genuinely to make poverty history should not close their eyes to those who take a more libertarian view.

Westminster Hall is a debating Chamber in which we can consider ideas that we may not be able to consider in the usual cut and thrust and party political point scoring of the main Chamber. There may be some merit in elements of the points raised by the hon. Member for Kettering, and it is important that we do not close our eyes to that. In an ideal world, if all things were equal, there would be no tariff barriers but complete liberalisation of markets, and economies would prosper in those circumstances.

However, as the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) made clear—his contribution stood in contrast to the contribution of the hon. Member for Kettering—we live in an unequal world. That is the reality. Many of the agreements that are being negotiated or reviewed, such as the general agreement on tariffs and trade, are not always favourable to developing countries. There is a great deal of evidence that liberalising services and opening up opportunities to privatise basic service markets, such as water provision, in developing countries, have not always resulted in a satisfactory or happy outcome.

I have raised the privatisation of water services in Tanzania and Sierra Leone with the Minister, and lessons need to be learned.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): The hon. Gentleman rightly refers to occasions when liberalisation has not delivered the benefits that some suggested it would. However, does he acknowledge that there are many cases in many developing countries where liberalisation has had a positive impact? The key is to help the developing country to make judgments for itself about opening barriers and opening up sectors, so that it can do so in ways that serve its own interests. Liberalisation per se has not led to the end of the world as we know it. It has brought many benefits, but we need to learn the lessons from the times when it has not worked.

Andrew George: I am glad that the Minister expresses that point in that way. There are problems to do with access to services in developing countries, and people have not always benefited in the way that they expected. However, that does not mean that we should not recognise that there are opportunities for investment which will genuinely improve services in developing countries. The key question is whether inward investment to such countries improves services or whether, as some have argued, it results in exploitation and a dysfunctional outcome.

There are clear examples of that. The non-agricultural market access negotiations—NAMAN—is a case in point. The hon. Member for Kettering offered some interesting statistics—for example, on comparative tariff barriers as a proportion of per capita gross domestic product. If the figures can be proven to be robust and the Government accept them, they will challenge the assumption that developing countries should have preferential access to western markets. Also, implicit in the Minister's intervention were questions to do with whether protection of markets in developing countries attracts new investors. Will such protected markets encourage investors because they know that it gives them some advantage, or discourage them?

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) mentioned bilateral agreements, and in particular economic partnership agreements, which are currently being reviewed in the European Union. The issues that she raises and the concerns about what one assumes are unintended and detrimental consequences of the economic partnership agreements highlight the potential dangers of failed WTO talks in Hong Kong.

It is clear from the Prime Minister's speech on Monday night that he sees the west, particularly Europe, as the major stumbling block to a successful WTO outcome. As the Government hold the presidency, one must question whether they will achieve the satisfactory outcome on the talks which we all want. The UK Government and the Prime Minister, who said that he will throw everything he has got at it, have apparent passion for the issue. What things in particular will he throw? What negotiations has he had to unblock the current European Union position?

If the talks fail, we will return to bilateral agreements between rich western nations and developing countries, as the capacity and the authority of the rules-based trading system, which is what the WTO represents, will be undermined because of the failure of the talks. Many people are rightly arguing that an agreement on agriculture would have a domino effect with regard to achieving a favourable outcome on the WTO talks.

I was interested to hear that following discussions with the President of the European Commission, Mr. Barroso, the World Bank president, Paul Wolfowitz, said that the sticking point is that the developing countries must make concessions. That statement was made after a meeting on Monday. Does the Minister believe that the primary area of focus, where the biggest move needs to be made, is on an agreement on agriculture and the common agricultural policy in the EU? Alternatively, does he agree that the apparent intransigence of developing countries and the question of their preparedness to open up their own markets and to reduce tariff barriers by up to 75 per cent. on industrial markets need addressing to break the logjam with regard to the future of the talks?

[Andrew George]

It is clear that there is significant uncertainty about the outcome of the Hong Kong ministerial meeting. Many people are predicting that it will collapse in failure. What plan B are the Government preparing? Do they recognise that if the preparations are, as they appear to be, insufficient, the further extension of the Hong Kong talks to Geneva in March will be required? The expectation is that the Hong Kong discussions will be seen merely as pre-negotiations.

I should like to know the answer to something my hon. Friend the Member for East Dunbartonshire asked. What representations have been made? What discussions have the Minister's Department and other Departments had with the European Commissioner? What change is required from the EU to break the logjam and get the talks in Hong Kong back to a position from which we can expect a favourable outcome?

This is a serious time. There is only a month to complete what needs to be done for the talks in Hong Kong. In fact, there is a further guillotine on the talks, as the fast-track capacity of the President of the United States, George Bush, to further some of the agreements that he might achieve in those talks ends in the middle of 2007. If we fail in Hong Kong, the timer will still be running on the negotiators and the negotiations. I would appreciate hearing the Minister's comments on what is likely to happen after the Hong Kong talks in December, which people widely expect to fail.

10.36 am

Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) on securing this important debate at this time, and also on the articulate and polished way in which she set out the case during her initial remarks. She made several good points, including the one contrasting the US tariff versus aid regime with Bangladesh. She could have used many other examples, but that was an extreme one.

I do not accept all that the hon. Lady said. I do not accept that further significant protectionism is the answer, which she seemed to be suggesting. I shall say a little more about that later, if there is time. Indeed, it is interesting to note that those NGOs that are at the forefront of the lobbying have switched their terminology from infant industry protection to infant industry promotion, which is much more in line with what the Minister would accept and with what I would agree is probably the way forward.

The hon. Lady rightly highlighted intellectual property rights. She will be aware that some progress was made in 2003. The Conservative party believes that there is a need for further weakening of intellectual property rights, particularly in the field of health to facilitate easing the HIV/AIDS problem.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) made a powerful speech in which he brought his experience to bear. He made just one factual error. I believe that Honduras is, in fact, the third poorest country in the western hemisphere, after Haiti and Nicaragua, which has now overtaken it. Having said that, I thought that he gave an excellent analysis, particularly of the current system of preferences and the problems that it raises for developing countries. He supported that with some interesting and illuminating statistics.

My hon. Friend was absolutely right to highlight the problems that the rules of origin are creating. If there is one thing on which I agree with the European Trade Commissioner, it is his description of the rules of origin as being like a Russian doll: one layer of complexity is removed to reveal another layer underneath. That summarises well some of the problems of the current international trade negotiations.

The hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) is a regular contributor to these debates, and I always enjoy his contributions. If nothing else, he is consistent in his arguments and extremely lucid, but I strongly disagree with some of his perspectives. For instance, I do not agree that free trade has damaged the population. In fact, that flies in the face of what has happened during the past 20 years in south-east Asia, where 500 million people have been lifted out of poverty.

However, the hon. Gentleman was right to highlight that we are all, irrespective of our party political persuasion, alarmed at the levels of poverty around the world, and that we all want to alleviate poverty to the greatest extent possible. This debate and others in other places at other times are about the policies that we must put in place to ensure that we succeed in facilitating the alleviation of poverty.

Jeremy Corbyn: The south Asia example is an interesting one. The countries that developed quickly from the 1970s onwards mostly did so with agricultural tariff protection, which meant that they maintained their own food supply and were not forced to accept cheap food dumped from elsewhere.

Mark Simmonds: I accept that. The Conservative party certainly does not believe that we can flick a switch and, overnight, go to international free trade without any recognition of the role that tariffs, and, indeed, subsidies in a small way, can play.

The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) made a good and sincere contribution, but she was perhaps a little over-simplistic in her description of the complex trade talks. I think that she said at one point—I am paraphrasing—that we should give a lot, but expect little in return. It is not as simple as that. If that were the case, Brazil, one of the G20 developing nations, would totally dominate the production of sugar and many agricultural products, primarily because it has two facets that do not exist in many other countries—an almost infinite supply of cheap lamb and very poor labour rules and regulations. That makes it impossible for other countries to compete.

Sugar is the best example. If we allowed Brazil to swamp the market in sugar and other agricultural products, the most damaged countries would be the developing nations that are trying to obtain access for their products—sugar and others—in the developed world. Therefore, it is a complex set of negotiations.

The developing nations do not all have the same agenda: they have different roles, attributes and aims. There are not just the major blocs—the United States, the EU and Japan—but the Cairns group and the Caribbean group. Even the countries in the G20 group, which is led by India and Brazil, have different aims in terms of agricultural production and trying to limit competition in their industrial and service sectors.

Opposition Members welcome the work that was done at Gleneagles, particularly on aid and debt, but we were disappointed—I accept that the terrible tragedies in London got in the way—that the G8 meeting did not make the progress on trade that was expected and hoped for not just by hon. Members, but by outside organisations. I understand from anecdotal evidence that the journalists were briefed by senior Ministers at the summit that progress was nearly made on significant trade reform. The Minister may like to confirm or deny that if he has time; if he does not have time as usual, I shall follow it up with a letter, although I still have not had a response to my initial one.

Mr. Thomas: Today, I promise.

Mark Simmonds: That is excellent.

We agree with the Government's aspirations with regard to promoting free and fairer trade and we fully support the reduction of protectionist trade barriers and harmful subsidies, which other hon. Members have spoken about. However, and here I disagree fundamentally with the hon. Member for Islington, North, history is littered with protectionist folly. We do not have free trade in the world at present; we have protectionist blocs, and matching protectionist blocs with further protectionist blocs is not the answer. The evidence shows that, in every decade, countries that pursued a freer trade agenda grew faster than those that pursued protectionist agendas.

There are good examples in history of attempts at protectionism, where countries and regions have tried to hide infant industries behind significant tariff barriers. The best example is Latin America in the 1950s and 1960s and India in the 1970s. Those attempts did not work, because they protected inefficient industries that could gain access only to a domestic market and could not compete internationally. Particularly when those tariff barriers were removed, more efficient industries from outside came in and destroyed them. The Indian heavy steel industry is perhaps the most recent example.

We accept the necessity for a transition period and we must be careful about moving too fast to the total removal of tariff barriers. We understand the importance of tariffs to many developing countries: they not only enable them to facilitate infant industry promotion, but act as a revenue generator for their exchequers. The statistics show that if all sub-Saharan Africa's tariffs were removed, the income to the countries' exchequers would be reduced by 10 per cent. overnight, causing severe difficulties to their Governments and to the improved accountability that we all wish to see in African nations.

However, it is not just the poor and developing countries that are set to benefit from an ambitious conclusion to the Doha round. Non-agricultural access could generate €20 billion for Europe alone. Economic development, wealth creation, and pan-African as well as international trade, offer the best hope for long-term, sustainable solutions to poverty and suffering in Africa.

If I were asked to pick out one point from the remarks of the hon. Gentleman with which I wholeheartedly agree, it would be his assessment that what is required in African countries is an improvement in infrastructure to enable people to get their goods to market—not just to the ports, but to internal markets. I visited Mozambique earlier this year, and I had discussions with its lead trade negotiator. I asked her this question: if I could take one message back to the British Parliament, what would she want it to be? She waved away with her hand the importance of the WTO negotiations in Hong Kong, and said, "We need more assistance to develop our internal infrastructure so that Mozambicans can trade with Mozambicans. After we have got to that stage, we can start to worry about exporting our products." Not enough focus has been given to that point today.

I have a few questions to ask the Minister, before I sit down and allow him to respond. Some of them have been put before; I think the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) touched on one of them. It is clear—not just from reading the press, but from discussions with those who are in the know about the WTO negotiations, and from a recent edition of "Newsnight" that focused on the Trade Commissioner's negotiating skills, or lack of them—that it is by no means certain that an agreement will be reached. Some countries are manoeuvring into a position to start bilateral trade talks, on the basis that the WTO discussions in Hong Kong will fail. Will the Minister confirm whether the British Government are doing that, or are they still tirelessly working to ensure a successful EU presidency and a successful conclusion to the WTO talks in Hong Kong? Do the Government have a plan B, if, as looks likely, the WTO talks do not progress in the way we all hope?

Finally, will the Minister confirm whether the Prime Minister is prepared to sacrifice the EU budget rebate in order to persuade the French to back down on their trade—and, in particular, their agricultural—subsidies? They are continuing to hold out for them, and those subsidies are seen as one of the main blocking points of the Hong Kong negotiations.

I, along with all Members, hope that the WTO negotiations in Hong Kong are a success. However, I have doubts about whether they will be. The issues under discussion are extremely complex. The generalised system of preferences needs to be addressed, as do the rules of origin. The EPAs have not worked, and they need to be looked at. People prefer to use the Cotonou preferences, but under the Cotonou preferences trade between Africa and the EU over the past 30 years has decreased, not increased.

There needs to be a significant reappraisal of the whole international trading framework, but it is important that the WTO stays together, and that we have an international trading framework. We do not want to go back to the situation where countries make bilateral arrangements that are purely in their own selfish interests rather than in those of developing countries, and which do not alleviate poverty.

[Mark Simmonds]

10.48 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): It is a pleasure to have this opportunity to serve for the first time under your chairmanship in Westminster Hall, Mrs. Dean. May I begin by echoing the comments of other contributors by congratulating the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) on securing the debate and on the manner in which she made her case?

I agree that this has been good year for development. The hon. Lady was right to highlight the $55 billion debt relief deal that has been secured. It will initially benefit 18 countries and will potentially benefit as many as 38. She might also have wanted to highlight the almost $18 billion Paris Club debt relief deal that has been secured for Nigeria. That will free up an extra $1 billion a year in that country, specifically for poverty reduction.

The hon. Lady rightly highlighted the progress that has been made on development assistance, and $50 billion extra in development assistance will be secured by 2010, half of which will be for Africa. That is hugely important in its own right. She could also have highlighted the threefold increase in UK aid since 1997, as well as the historic commitment to achieve the 0.7 per cent. goal by 2013. She and other hon. Members will know that if we can persuade other countries to launch the international finance facility, we hope to achieve that target earlier than 2013. Similarly, good progress has been made this year on securing further funding for the fight against HIV/AIDS and the other poverty diseases—TB and malaria, in particular. The commitment on universal access was just one of the highlights of the millennium review summit, as heralded by the G8 process.

The hon. Lady asked a range of questions, which I shall attempt to answer. However, let me first welcome her praise for the work of the Fairtrade Foundation and the many different organisations working up and down the UK to promote fair trade goods. In particular, I highlight the Co-op group, which has led the way in selling fairly traded goods in its stores. I would be happy to meet her and a delegation from her constituency to discuss fair trade issues in the way that she wants.

Looking ahead to the substance of the WTO meeting, the hon. Lady asked about the Government's view of the process to date. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn), one of the House's long-term doughty campaigners on the issue, rightly highlighted the failure of the Cancun talks. However, I agree with his analysis that one of the positive outcomes of those talks was the way in which developing countries organised themselves for the first time as a strong bloc to make sure that their voice was heard, perhaps also for the first time, in a sustained way in the WTO process. Frustrating as it was that we did not get a good outcome at Cancun, the fact that the voice of developing countries was so strong was hugely significant.

The fact that the WTO is a multilateral rules-based trading system is something to cherish. Regional and bilateral deals cannot, by definition, offer as much negotiating power to developing countries. Such countries, which continue to come together and organise in the various blocs around the various issues—they are doing so for the WTO talks—would not be seen in anything like the same way in regional and bilateral deals. Therefore the deadline, to which the hon. Members for East Dunbartonshire and for Boston and Skegness (Mark Simmonds) rightly alluded, on the waiver of the President of the United States is hugely important, and progress needs to be made before that waiver comes to an end.

We remain committed to the World Trade Organisation talks in Hong Kong. We will continue to seek an ambitious outcome for the round and recognise the importance of the Hong Kong ministerial talks in that process as a galvanising meeting to secure the progress that we want. We have been encouraged by the American and the subsequent European Union offers. Clearly, there is still a long way to go before we can be confident that agreement will be reached. However, as the Prime Minister made clear as recently as Monday, we remain determined to do all we can to continue to promote the securing of agreement.

A pro-development outcome from the Doha development round would result in improved participation by developing countries in the world trading system, particularly through substantially increased market access, the dismantling of trade distorting subsidies by industrialised countries and an end to export subsidies. The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) asked specifically about when we wanted export subsidies to come to an end. The UK has made clear our support for an end date of 2010 for EU export subsidies, and we continue to argue that line with our EU partners. Perhaps understandably, at one level, our EU partners want to see other developed nations committing to end their export subsidies and want the WTO negotiations to be the vehicle by which end dates are agreed. Nevertheless, we are clear that we want 2010 to be the end date and are continuing to push European and other countries to continue to move towards that.

A development-friendly result from the Doha development round would ensure that poor countries are given the flexibility to plan, decide and sequence trade reforms as part of wider poverty reduction and development strategies. Fundamental to our work to date has been the focus on the issues that matter most to developing countries. As the House is aware, and as the Tanzanian ambassador to Brussels made it clear to me when I met him recently, since developing countries rely so heavily on agriculture for their livelihoods, that any WTO deal that does not deliver on agriculture is simply not relevant.

As I said, we need to maintain our ambition, particularly in the face of the pessimism that is out there. The fact that some European member states have expressed concerns about how far Commissioner Mandelson has gone in the negotiations implies that there is a serious offer on the table from the European Union. We want further progress in the talks, particularly in relation to the concerns of poorer countries about, for example, special products in agriculture and a special safeguard mechanism. We want all developed countries to follow the European Union lead and offer immediate duty and quota-free access to their markets to the least developed countries. We want to agree on an approach to cutting tariffs on industrial products to allow developing countries the space—I return to the point alluded to by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North, in particular—to decide the pace and sequencing of their own reform.

The hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) rightly highlighted the problems relating to rules of origin and the need for further progress. He may be aware that the G8, both at Gleneagles and previously at Sea Island, made a commitment to continue a process of reform of the rules of origin. We are certainly arguing for the reform of rules of origin in the European Union, which has been consulting on the issues. We will continue to push for that, for all the reasons to which he rightly alluded.

The hon. Gentleman also touched on the important issue of sugar. It is hugely important not only that we push through sugar reform, but that we give real and sustained assistance to a number of key sugar-producing countries, particularly those in the Caribbean, with which we have a strong historical relationship. We have been working closely in the Caribbean with a number of those developing countries and have helped them to prepare action plans so that they can take advantage of the assistance that will be on offer from the European Union to move their industries forward in the way that they want.

I agree with the support that the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Mark Simmonds) gave to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North about infrastructure. A Minister from Zambia highlighted two key transport routes in and across Zambia that need development assistance. He rightly noted—other hon. Members alluded to this—the importance to the least developed countries of sorting out some of those problems first, although there are also other issues relating to making trade more effective and opening up opportunities. That relates to why my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced £100 million for aid for trade.

I recognise that I have not had the opportunity to answer every question that hon. Members put to me, not least the points made by the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole about economic partnership agreements. I shall write to her on that subject and copy it to other hon. Members.

There has been a series of discussions across all levels of the Government with European partners, including discussions between my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the President of France. We continue to make the case for reform of the common agricultural policy. When something takes up 40 per cent. of the budget but helps the interests of only 5 per cent., further reform is clearly needed.

A3 (Hindhead)

11 am

Mr. Jeremy Hunt (South-West Surrey) (Con): It has been said that the definition of a politician is someone who says when there is light at the end of the tunnel, "Let's go out and build some more tunnel." On this occasion, I only wish that that were the case, because my constituency desperately needs a tunnel.

The arguments that I will put today have been put many times before, not least by my predecessor as the Member of Parliament for South-West Surrey. As the Minister is new to the Department, I would like to take the liberty of briefly going through the arguments again.

The A3 links London and Portsmouth. Portsmouth is the second biggest passenger port in the country, carrying 800,000 vehicles and 3 million passengers per annum, and is a key gateway to the continent.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry (Portsmouth, North) (Lab): I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way and allowing me, as the Member for Portsmouth, North, to make a point. On freight, at the moment we are not allowed to increase the container size on our railways, so it is likely that more freight will have to be carried by road. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, if Portsmouth is to continue to develop freight business at the port, a decent road from London down to Portsmouth is even more important?

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Lady makes an important point. Portsmouth carries more than 1 million tonnes of freight per annum and is the fourth largest local economy in the south-east of England. However, of those top four economies, it is the only one without a motorway connection to London and the only one that requires the use of a single carriageway on the main trunk route to London. In fact, Hindhead has the only single carriageway on that network between Portsmouth and Scotland. In addition, Portsmouth is the only one of the four in which the main arterial route to Heathrow and Gatwick is blocked, right in the middle, by traffic lights. The Minister will appreciate the severity of the bottleneck created for my constituents. The queues to get through the traffic lights at Hindhead are utterly horrendous.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: We are trying to build a venue for conferences in my constituency, but we are being told that conference organisers will not send delegates through that bottleneck, particularly at the peak times, so we are losing out on conference traffic. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that is yet another reason to pursue the matter?

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Lady again makes an important point—the implications of not having a tunnel stretch way beyond my constituency. Her city is trying hard to catch up with the affluence that is common to the rest of the south-east, but in which Portsmouth has so far been unable to share. She will know that the city is one of the 50 most deprived areas in the UK; that it ranks just 31st in the south-east in average weekly earnings; and that there are 25,000 people of working age in the city without a job.

[Mr. Hunt]

There is not just the economic cost to Portsmouth; there is also a massive environmental cost to the region. The Devil's Punch Bowl at Hindhead is an area of outstanding natural beauty, of national and international importance, and of special landscape value.

Let me tell the Minister some of the benefits of a tunnel, as identified by his own Department. There would be a positive economic cost-benefit ratio of 2.8 through reduced journey times. A tunnel would meet the policy objectives to and to "conserve and enhance biodiversity", and there would be a substantial reduction in the number of accidents—estimated at 40 fewer a year. One accident nearly every week would be avoided.

"provide an efficient and effective road system and reduce congestion"

A tunnel would have a large beneficial impact on driver stress and would create a reduction in noise levels in Hindhead and the surrounding areas, providing substantial benefits to the historic landscape of Hindhead common and an opportunity for townscape enhancement, including visitor gateways to the common and the Devil's Punch Bowl. Most importantly, more pedestrian and cyclist trips would be encouraged.

The final argument that needs to be addressed is whether the tunnel is of regional or national significance. It apparently fails to meet three of the four criteria necessary to define it as of national significance, but it does so for the chicken-and-egg reason that those criteria cannot be met as long as there is a bottleneck. The volume of traffic flows—fewer than 60,000 vehicles a day—the low proportion of freight traffic and the route's lack of inclusion in the trans-European route network are all due to the bottleneck. If the bottleneck were removed it would become the route of national significance that its function as the connecting road between London and Portsmouth demands.

I conclude by telling the Minister of the terrible price that my constituency pays because it happens to sit right in the middle of that transport disaster zone. The village of Hindhead, home to only 3,000 people, is sheared in half by the A3. If one is on the wrong side, it is quicker to go to nearby Haslemere for one's shopping than to use the local shops. A huge amount of pollution is generated throughout the day by cars idling, slowing down, revving up and starting at the Hindhead lights. Rat-running is destroying the local villages, and there is a huge problem with planning blight. The lights sit on the main road between Haslemere and Farnham. They are two important towns in the area, but connections between them are massively hampered by the difficulties of travel over the junction.

What I have said is fully supported and endorsed by my right hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot). He is not present today, but he speaks with great passion about the issues faced by his constituents, particularly in Grayshott, the town next door.

I hope that I have demonstrated to the Minister the seriousness of the situation. In his reply, will he address some of the concerns throughout the region about the procedures used to decide the fate of the tunnel? For example, why has the inspector's report on the public inquiry, which was completed in January, still not been published? Despite my arguments today, why has the scheme been downgraded from supposedly national significance to only regional significance?

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: On the point about national and regional significance, I was reading in the national newspapers this morning about the national Olympics in 2012 and the massive boost to tourism that it will bring. My constituents hope that we will benefit from the huge tourism potential of our naval heritage. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that unless we deal with the bottleneck at Hindhead my area certainly will not reap the benefits of the national Olympics, because people will not want to come through it? I return to the business argument. In the previous Hampshire economic partnership business transport survey, in which 730 businesses took part, 37 per cent. of those that responded made Hindhead their major priority for road investment. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that adds weight to his argument?

Mr. Hunt: I absolutely agree with the hon. Lady. The Olympics is a huge opportunity not just for London but for the whole country, and particularly for areas such as her constituency that need regeneration. We should grasp that opportunity for Portsmouth. We must however recognise the threat in my constituency of the extra traffic created by the Olympics making a bad situation into a traffic nightmare. The forthcoming Olympics is a strong reason why the issue must be progressed and not delayed.

Why, nearly a year after the conclusion of the public inquiry, do local people still know nothing about whether funding will be made available for the project? Given the strength of cross-party support for it, about which the Minister has heard this morning; given the huge damage that delays inflict on the environment, the lives of my constituents and the prospects for Portsmouth's regeneration; and given the opportunity cost to the country's economic infrastructure caused by not proceeding with the project, will the Minister at least agree to facilitate a meeting with the Secretary of State, as requested by the hon. Lady, to resolve this transport crisis with the greatest possible urgency?

11.10 am

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I am grateful to the hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt) for securing this debate and bringing his concerns to the House.

I think that we can start by accepting that there is some common ground. The stretch of road that we are talking about undoubtedly suffers from bad congestion, journey-time unreliability and a poor accident record, and I guess that we can also accept the social and economic importance of improving it. The points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Sarah McCarthy-Fry) on freight, the opportunity cost of not proceeding with conferencing development and the benefits of the Olympics were well made. There is no question but that that stretch of road needs to be upgraded—we accept the fact—and there would be important social and economic benefits in doing so.

If a cost-effective, affordable and easy-to-provide solution were obvious, and if the environment were not a factor, I have no doubt that the road would be being built as we speak. Indeed, it would probably have been built many years ago. Unfortunately, however, the environment is an important factor and a cheap solution is not available.

The landscape, as both the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend know, is of high quality. It is part of the Surrey Hills area of outstanding natural beauty and owned by the National Trust on behalf of the nation. The Devil's Punch Bowl is a lowland heath site of special scientific interest and is part of the special protection area. It is not just any part of the country that we can drive a dual carriageway through, which is why a tunnel scheme was identified as a potential way to deal with the problem. Unfortunately, however, tunnels are very expensive and we have to take that on board.

Environmental constraints have meant that we have spent 20 years searching for a solution to the problem. The hon. Gentleman was kind enough to offer me a history lesson on the development of the project, but he skipped over the fact that although the tunnel was identified as the correct solution in 1993, the scheme was stopped in 1995 by the Government—his predecessor was a member of that Government—because it was regarded as unaffordable.

Following our review of the trunk road programme in 1998, we considered the feasibility of a toll tunnel to make the scheme affordable, but we decided not to pursue that option because of the likely diversion of traffic on to less suitable routes. So, in March 2001 the current tunnel scheme was put into the targeted programme of improvements as a conventionally funded project.

Draft legal orders and an environmental statement were published in October 2003 and a local public inquiry sat for 29 days between 7 September 2004 and 15 February 2005. Although the hon. Gentleman implied that the public inquiry was finished nearly a year ago, the end of the public sitting is not when such an inquiry finishes. It finishes when the inspector delivers his report, which did not happen until close to the end of August this year. Before a public inquiry statement is put in the public domain, it is normal for the Secretary of State to make his or her views known.

Because this project is of such great importance, there is not just one Secretary of State who has to take a position on the inspector's report, but three: the Secretary of State for Transport, the Deputy Prime Minister—because of his planning duties—and the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. All three Secretaries of State have to take a position before we can proceed further, and they are in the process, with their officials, of working through the inspector's report. Hopefully, they will come to a position as soon as possible and we will put that in the public domain.

Mr. Hunt: Is the Minister able to give me any indication of when he expects the three Secretaries of State to come to their conclusion about the inspector's report? I am grateful to him for mentioning that the inspector's report was concluded at the end of August, because I did not know that until today. Does he know what the timetable is likely to be?

Dr. Ladyman: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman precise details, but I can certainly say that we will conclude the examination as expeditiously as possible. That will not be a very long time away, but it certainly will not be a matter of days; it is a complicated process. It involves us not only studying the inspector's report but looking at the scheme itself to make sure that the Highways Agency is content with the scheme, the construction and its methods, the costing and all other such issues. Normally, we would make the announcement on whether the scheme was to go ahead and publish the inspector's report at the same time.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned that the scheme is being treated as a regional scheme. The decision was taken to divide schemes into those of national and regional importance. One reason for that is that we believe in devolution; we believe that it is important that local people should help us to prioritise transport projects. There is a finite amount of money available for transport projects, so we decided that we would ask the regions to help us to identify which were the most important schemes that needed to go ahead.

How were we to do that? Well, initially the regions just gave us a big shopping list of billions of pounds-worth of transport projects, as if we would spend the entire transport budget in one region. That clearly was not going to work, so we decided to give indicative allocations of funding to each region and to encourage them to give us prioritisations, according to that funding envelope, in order to get realistic advice about the way forward.

One or two schemes were separated out as not appropriate for regional prioritisation. The scheme that we are discussing was left with the region so that it could give us regional advice on it. That advice is expected from the region early in January, and then a series of decisions will be made about which schemes we take forward. It is then that I would normally expect the inspector's report to be put in the public domain.

Mr. Hunt: Does the Minister accept that because of the significant costs of the scheme, to which he alluded earlier, there is a real risk that if it is re-designated as a regional rather than a national scheme, it will simply not go ahead? That is because the sums of money involved would eat up the entire budget for regional schemes for about two and a half years. Does he accept the arguments put forward by the hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Sarah McCarthy-Fry), and by me that the regeneration of our inner cities and the connection of major cities to the capital using proper trunk road networks is of national significance?

Dr. Ladyman: I certainly accept that we are talking about a large sum of money, and that it would make serious inroads in the regional budget. However, that does not excuse the region from its duty of giving us an indication of what priority it gives the scheme. To be fair to the region, it has initially suggested that it thinks that the scheme has very high priority. However, in making that decision, it seems to be a bit unclear about where the money would come from. We are clarifying that with the region and are making sure that it understands how the funding works before it finalises its prioritisation.

[Dr. Ladyman]

Assuming that the scheme remains an important part of the region's priorities, and assuming that we decide—on the basis of the inspector's report and other information—that we want to go ahead with it, it remains in the Highways Agency's targeted programme of improvements as a scheme for construction after 2007–08. However, I repeat the caveat that that is subject to the funding being available, and to the inspector's report not identifying a show-stopper. That may be a disappointing time scale for the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend; I have no doubt that they would rather that the diggers were there as we speak, but unfortunately that is the timetable.

There is probably not a great deal that I can add to the debate. I think that I have dealt with the hon. Gentleman's questions. The simple fact of the matter is that the importance of the scheme is recognised. There is no question about that. I understand why my hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman are pressing so hard to move it forward. I would be doing the same if I were in their position.

Mr. Hunt: I hope that I am not about to ask the Minister something that he was about to come to. The concern that the hon. Member for Portsmouth, North and I have is that, although this Chamber is a good forum in which to raise the issue, we need to go into more detail. Given the importance of the matter to our constituents, we are keen to have a meeting with the Secretary of State to go through the issues. Will the Minister agree to facilitate such a meeting so that we can express in more detail the concerns that we have expressed today?

Dr. Ladyman: I was indeed about to come to that. It is not for me to offer meetings with the Secretary of State and it would not normally be for the Secretary of State to have a meeting on this matter. I am the roads Minister and the advice to the Secretary of State will come through me. I can offer to have a meeting with the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend to discuss the details. However, before deciding on the timing of such a meeting, we need to ensure that we are following appropriate protocol, because I am in the process of reviewing the inspector's report and making decisions on the scheme.

I would not want to do anything that got us into legal conflict, but, in principle, I am happy to meet the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend to go through the issues. However, I assure him that the issues are well understood. The project has been hatching for 20 years so I suspect that there is little that he or my hon. Friend can tell the Department about the scheme, its complexities and importance that we have not come across. If it will help them, however, I am happy to have a meeting with them to discuss it.

Mr. Hunt: Does the Minister accept that if he is still considering the result of the independent inquiry, this is a particularly good time for him to meet me and the hon. Member for Portsmouth, North so that we can express the concerns of our constituents and he can consider them before making his decision? If we waited until after he had made his decision on the independent inquiry, the meeting would be just a reporting process and we would be unable to make any impact in representing our constituents' views.

Dr. Ladyman: I certainly accept that we should have that meeting before making the decision—there is no question about that. The issue in my mind is whether it would be helpful to have the meeting in advance of receiving the regional priorities. It might be a good idea for the south-east region to confirm its priorities and to have the meeting when we know the lie of the land. I suspect that we would then be in a better position to talk about the practicalities of how the matter moves forward. I suspect that if we have a meeting now, which I am happy to have if the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend want that—I would never deny a meeting to a colleague—I will be told what I already know and what I have been told today: that this is an important scheme to the hon. Gentleman and his constituents. I know that, so would a meeting to tell me that help?

On the other hand, when we have the regional priorities and know the fundamental position—I hope that by then we will also have had confirmation of the final cost of the scheme—we might be better able to have a more useful meeting. However, if the hon. Gentleman wants a meeting in advance of that, I am happy to try to put one in the diary.

I encourage the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend to pick up the pace of their lobbying with the region. The regional prioritisation of the scheme will be key to the speed at which it moves ahead. I encourage the hon. Gentleman to talk to the regional assembly, the regional development agency and so on to stress the importance of the scheme and ensure that it is ranked highly.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: My hon. Friend mentions the assembly and the South East England Development Agency. Which body makes the decision on the prioritisation: SERA or SEEDA?

Dr. Ladyman: It is SERA that makes the final decision on prioritisation. Indeed, had I not been in this debate today, I would have been addressing its plenary session, explaining the importance of regional prioritisation and perhaps even the importance of this road. Unfortunately, the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck), who was due to attend the debate on my behalf, has slipped a disc and has been immobilised.

It is for the assembly to provide regional advice and it is showing a considerable amount of wisdom in the way that it is carrying out prioritisation—it is showing other regions how to do so. Nevertheless, if the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend were to make their views known to the assembly, that would be very helpful. Perhaps the appropriate time for us to have a meeting is when we have that regional prioritisation.

I confirm once again that I understand the importance of the scheme. I accept entirely that it will unlock a great many economic benefits for Portsmouth and local citizens, but again I express a note of caution. This is a fabulously important area of environmental concern; we cannot just do anything there, and what we can do is extremely expensive. That will be an issue for us in future, whichever way we cut it. I have heard what the hon. Gentleman said, and I conclude by thanking him again for bringing his concerns to my attention.

11.27 am

Sitting suspended until half-past Two o'clock.

Security Companies (Accreditation)

2.30 pm

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): It is a pleasure to introduce this debate on the accreditation of security companies. I was joined in applying for it by my hon. Friends the Members for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) and for Selby (Mr. Grogan). I sincerely hope that they will contribute to what should be an interesting discussion.

We are debating matters arising out of the Private Security Industry Act 2001. In a debate earlier this year, I raised the issue of door supervisors, a category of security personnel who come within the legislation. Problems around the registration of a category of security operative, generally known as wheel clampers, have also been well documented. Unfortunately, the Act does not appear to be working too well. We are already hearing anecdotal evidence that door supervisors are circumventing the requirements of the Act by becoming bar staff and taking on a dual role, or by disappearing into the black economy, and wheel clampers are achieving registration and now doing legally what they did somewhat clandestinely in the past, but with a little stamp on the side of the van stating that they are "Government approved".

We are now dealing with the licensing of security guards, for which the deadline is March 2006. It appears that we are already running into the same problems that were highlighted previously in respect of the licensing of security company operatives. Perhaps the difference in this case is that the security guarding companies about which we are speaking are a little more serious—for want of a better word, a little more important—than those in the liquor industry.

I know that the representations made by the liquor industry were not taken too seriously by the Government, but there is probably a little more urgency and seriousness involved in this case, given that we are talking about some of the major security companies in our country. The classic example is Group 4 Securicor. Such companies transport huge quantities of cash and valuables. They guard certain establishments, including Government establishments, and, in some respects, they are involved in the private prison industry. This sector of the industry is involved in big Government contracts, so the Government cannot dismiss it in the same way that they did the liquor industry. When I say that, I do not refer to my hon. Friend the Minister, who was not responsible for this issue the last time we debated it and, in particular, when we debated it in relation to liquor licensing. However, I hope that he will take on board the seriousness of the matter.

I shall not go into the Act itself. It has been on the statute book for some years. It sets out the licensing requirements for various categories of security company: door supervisors, vehicle immobilisers, security guards, key holders, close protection operatives, cash and valuables in transit operatives, CCTV personnel and private investigators. I wish to focus on security guards in this debate. As I said, the deadline for licensing is March. If I quote a few statistics, hon. Members may get an idea of the problems that have been encountered with the licensing of other categories.

[Mr. Eric Illsley]

Licences have been legally required for door supervisors since April this year, at the latest—there were various cut-off dates throughout 2004. Only 34,778 licences have been granted as of 9 November, against an industry estimate of 100,000 door supervisors required. That figure was contested, but even a lower industry estimate of, say, between 60,000 and 80,000, is still well above the number licensed. It is estimated that the industry will require thousands of doorkeepers, many of whom have yet to apply.

The Security Industry Authority set up by the 2001 Act is clearly having difficulties in getting the security industry to comply with the Act. The issuing of licences has been slow and to some extent over-bureaucratic. In an industry in which checks on individual personnel must be completed in a short time—perhaps a couple of weeks—licensing is now taking much longer. More and more individuals are passing the deadlines without being able to obtain their licences, so in many cases they are simply not allowed to work.

I recall that, shortly after the debate earlier this year on door supervisors, a number of police forces throughout the country clamped down over a weekend on the number of unlicensed door supervisors. Many establishments in the liquor licensing trade were closed down if door supervisors were found to be operating without licences. Therefore, there is the dynamic that the police will enforce the legislation. When the industry has a staff turnover of at least 30 per cent. per annum, it is easy to see the difficulties that we face.

The SIA now acknowledges that the licensing process takes six to 20 weeks. In April it was reluctant to admit that it faced delays, but even its website now states:

> "If you or your staff are travelling abroad in the next three months please do not submit your passport in case of processing delays."

That is an acknowledgment by the SIA that licensing can take up to three months. With an estimated 50 per cent. of guards and key holders yet to be licensed, the SIA is looking at at least a 12-month delay, so it would seem impossible that the requirement for 50,000 personnel to hold licences will be met by the March deadline. Therefore, a number of law-abiding companies and blue-chip companies—if we want to call them that—that are attempting to comply with the Act will be penalised, and the industry will fall further and further into disarray.

The problems of delays have already been highlighted. A security company contacted me last week with another example of a Home Office nationality document that was refused as proof of identity. There are many examples of applications being returned because the form has been incorrectly filled in, so the whole process has to begin from the beginning. Group 4 Security told me yesterday that it has about 25 full-time staff working purely on licence applications. That company has taken on the expense and the job of dealing with licences for its staff, but not every company is likely to do that.

Where do we move from here? What is the answer? How does the industry get round these delays? It would appear that the SIA has now decided to look to an approved contractor scheme to try to alleviate its problems. Under the Act, the authority can formulate an approved contractor scheme. Indeed, the Act requires the SIA to establish a voluntary system of inspection of security services providers, under which those that satisfactorily meet the agreed standards may be registered as approved and may advertise themselves as such. That is all well and good.

The key word in that phrase is "voluntary". The system is intended to be voluntary and details of the approved contractor scheme are listed on the Home Office website under the partial regulatory impact assessment with details of the approved contractor scheme on the SIA's website. The partial regulatory impact assessment states:

> "The Act does not specify the exact nature of the approved scheme nor how it should operate."

The foreword to the document states:

> "The attached document 'Partial Regulatory Impact Assessment 25th August 2005: Implementing the Private Security Industry Act 2001 . . . ' provides the opportunity for interested groups and individuals to examine and choose from one of the range of options contained in the document. The Home Office hopes that recipients will take this opportunity to respond with their views."

The consultation period for those who are interested to respond with their views ends tomorrow. Despite that, the SIA has already decided on and implemented an approved contractor scheme. The SIA website refers to that scheme and the criteria involved in complying with it, how to obtain the brochure and how to make an application to be part of it.

With the closing date for the consultation being tomorrow, 17 November, one would have expected a wait before implementing the approved contractor scheme. Yet we seem to be well down the road. One would have expected the consultation period to end before considering the options. There are four options: doing nothing, a scheme with no standards set, a scheme using existing industry standards and a scheme with new standards. Today, we are discussing option 4, which is on the SIA website, and the way in which it was decided to pursue the issue by bringing in a completely new set of standards in a completely new scheme.

It seems that the industry and particularly the SIA are acting as though the scheme has already been set up. The SIA website states:

> "The objective of other SIA's Approved Contractor scheme is to raise performance standards and to assist the private security industry . . . The scheme is voluntary and was developed in consultation with representatives from across the industry."

It goes on to say more about how the scheme was set up, the extensive market research, the process involving interviews with managers and so on. It gives the impression that an approved contractor scheme is already in existence, has already been consulted on, has already been put out to the industry for comment and that the major players in the industry have had their opportunity to contribute. However, one of the bodies that is responsible for standards in the security industry and perhaps the one that sets the highest standards—the National Security Inspectorate—has not been consulted or been part of the consultation by the SIA, which did not consider it a relevant organisation.

I understand that eight assessment bodies, which include the NSI, have been set up under option 4 and that some days ago staff were selected and sent for training for that approved contractor scheme. It seems that, to all intents and purposes, the consultation process ended a considerable time ago and the SIA is going for option 4 as the standard for the industry. Why has that occurred? Why was the NSI not consulted and why has the SIA, despite the fact that the consultation process is still ongoing, decided on that option? When we examine matters in detail, we see that the answer is simple.

The SIA needs an approved contractor scheme in place by March 2006 because of the delays that it is experiencing in issuing the licences. An approved contractor scheme will allow for fast-tracking so that the top 20 companies in the industry, which are probably also approved by the NSI, will be fast-tracked on to the scheme and allowed to employ unlicensed staff. Staff will be able to be deployed by the companies before their licence is supplied. Obviously, the NSI has been excluded from the consultation because its standards are too high. We will not be able to have a fast-track scheme in March 2006 that does not allow companies on to it quickly.

The NSI standards will be too high. The SIA needs a scheme in place quickly to get around the delays in the licensing process to allow companies the leeway of employing staff who have not yet been given their licence. As a result, we will have a compulsory scheme. It will no longer be voluntary because every company will need to be part of it so that it can be fast-tracked to obtain the accreditation to allow it the exemption in respect of unlicensed staff. The chances are that we shall see an approved contractor scheme with lower standards than those that already exist in the industry.

It is incredible that the consultation period has been ignored. Everything seems to be up and running before the period has ended. The SIA seems to be wedded to option 4 to the point at which it has excluded consideration of any other available option. It has ignored the NSI, the accreditation body with the highest standards and attributes of any accreditation organisation in the security industry. The consultation process has become something of a sham. Option 4 has to be the one on which the SIA embarks to minimise the problems of the delayed licences. Has my hon. Friend the Minister given approval to the SIA to go ahead with option 4? Has the Secretary of State given approval for the approved contractor scheme to be the option chosen in advance of the consultation period?

Other options are available under the regulatory impact assessment. My colleagues might refer to them in the debate. One of them is the option to do nothing. Throughout the process, it seems that the NSI has been sidelined by the SIA to the point at which the SIA has suggested that the "do nothing" option is not available to it. The SIA stated that a decision to implement option 1 would mean "that the SIA would be failing in its statutory duties under the Act to implement a scheme and this would be open to challenge and possibly judicial review."

That is stretching the limits of logic a little, in that the SIA is always open to challenge and/or judicial review. However, no such challenge could stand up if the Secretary of State were acting within his powers. How can someone be liable to judicial review—to challenge—for implementing an option that is contained in the Home Office consultation document? How can the Secretary of State be subject to judicial review for implementing an option that he placed as part of that consultation? It seems rather strange that the SIA has taken that attitude—unless it has done so to try to ensure that its approved contractor scheme is the one that is chosen, instead of the NSI scheme or any other.

I will now run through some of the consequences of option 4. If the industry goes along that route, the approved contractor scheme will not be voluntary. Because of the licensing delays and the need for every company to get as many people as possible operative by March 2006, every company will have to be part of that scheme; they will want to be part of it to ensure that they can enjoy the exemptions.

For companies that train their security guards, there will be a short period of training, but they will simply not be able to have security guards standing round for between four and 20 weeks doing nothing until they get a licence. That will be a cost to companies that they cannot incur, especially bearing in mind the 30 per cent. turnover of staff in the industry. Companies will need to have their operatives deployed as soon as possible, so they will need to have approved contractor status to enable them to take advantage of the exemption.

That means that from March 2006, unlicensed guards will be working throughout the security industry. That defeats the whole object of the Act. The idea was to have regulation and improving standards, but we appear to be going the other way. Rather than address the cause of the delays, we seem to be moving the goalposts in order to try to defray the effects of what is now happening.

I am reminded of the response that I received when I raised the issue of door supervisors. No assistance was forthcoming when we asked for an extension of the time available for door supervisors to be licensed. However, it now seems that the SIA is willing to bring in the approved contractor scheme and to allow unlicensed operatives to work. There appears to be a bit of hypocrisy there.

Before anybody challenges me on the unlicensed operatives, let me state that the impact assessment says that 15 per cent. of operatives can be unlicensed, provided that 85 per cent. of them are licensed. If there were a four-month licensing period in any one year, that would mean that a security company could take advantage of three tranches of 15 per cent. throughout the 12-month period; in other words, 45 per cent. of the operatives working for it could be unlicensed. If the SIA got the licensing period down to two months, there could then be up to 90 per cent. unlicensed operatives working throughout any 12-month period. Therefore, it appears that we are allowing standards to go the wrong way.

Because of the way that the approved contractor scheme allowing the exemptions is progressing, we will lower the standards in the security industry. In order to get this type of accreditation quickly, the standards will have to fall; they will have to be lower to enable companies to fast-track themselves on to the scheme. If the SIA were to consider the other options—for example, the option of doing nothing and retaining the existing standards, or of using an existing body to accredit the industry—those standards would remain at the current high level; they could, of course, also be improved.

[Mr. Eric Illsley]

At present, given the way that things are going, the approved contractor scheme is likely to lower standards. As there has been negotiation with parts of the industry—not all of it—over the past few months, it appears to me that the SIA has happily agreed with the industry that that is the way forward. The SIA will get round the problems of delays by allowing companies to employ unlicensed security guards from March, as a consequence of the lower standards of the approved contractor scheme.

One of the issues that has been raised with me is that extracts of speeches have appeared on the SIA website relating to improving companies' profitability, although I understand that they have now been removed. As far as I am aware, there is no mention in the 2001 Act of any requirement on the SIA to promote profitability or to improve the functioning of the companies, other than to regulate them and to license them. One must question in exactly what direction the SIA is travelling in relation to this approved contractor scheme.

It is also worth pointing out that many companies have spent a hell of a lot of money on accreditation, in particular the accreditation with the NSI. Many companies have spent a lot of money getting their employees licences; Group 4 Securicor representatives told me yesterday that it is paying for all its operatives and it is questioning who will pick up the cost. It looks like the customers will pick up any costs arising from the problems in the licensing regime.

It is clear that the 2001 Act has caused huge implementation problems for every sector. It was designed to reassure the public and to improve standards in the security industry, but it is failing yet again. An approved contractor scheme is being forced on the industry unnecessarily, in an attempt to get around the delays in licensing.

I make a plea to the Minister to re-examine these issues, in particular the attitude and the actions of the SIA, because we are in danger of seeing the industry introduce a scheme that will enable it to avoid criticism over its delays and incompetence in the licensing regime, and allow unlicensed operatives to work from 2006. As far as I am concerned, that is defeating the spirit and intention of the 2001 Act.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mrs. Janet Dean (in the Chair): Order. May I inform Members that I intend to call Front-Bench spokespeople at 3.30 pm and that four Back-Bench Members wish to speak?

2.58 pm

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South) (Lab): My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) should have started his speech the other way round, because it was a quite naked presentation on behalf of one organisation within the security industry, which feels that its near monopoly—70 per cent. of the market—is being taken away.

I have a long interest in security. I campaigned for 25 years, unsuccessfully, to get away from self-regulation. It was a pathetic industry that had enormous turnover—100 per cent. a year and sometimes more—of personnel, appallingly low standards and very low profits. Profits are important for companies—to get the investment and pay the salaries. It was an industry with hardly any training. Most of the guarding companies provided no training whatever. Even the better companies, which belonged to the British Security Industry Association, provided two days' training—usually pathetic—and one day's on-the-job training.

I worked very hard to try to persuade the previous Government to introduce licensing. They rejected it. When this Government came to office, they introduced legislation—and the 2001 Act is on the statute book. The Security Industry Authority has, I think, now been in operation for 18 months. It could have decided to rattle through in six months the licensing in an industry that involves about 400,000 people. It decided to be patient. Let us remember what the passport office did when it tried to move too quickly. There was chaos. The SIA is moving slowly but carefully.

Of course, there are problems and people are whingeing. Perhaps the people who take a long time to have their forms returned and validated have not filled them in properly. What percentage of forms sent in by people seeking a licence had that form dealt with? The answer is that 30 per cent. of all forms submitted are returned to the person signing them to ask for the information that was requested. Am I pleased with the scheme—which my hon. Friend is apparently pleased to see return—where nothing is to be done, with a self-regulatory body in charge of the inspectorate? No. The party that we represent fought for a long time to change it, and to return to it would be going backwards at a rapid pace.

The industry is in the process of being regulated. I can answer my hon. Friend's question as to why it is concerned about profit. Every Bill I have introduced—all five of them—has said that the regulatory authority should not just be a gatekeeper, admitting people or rejecting them. The industry is fragmented and its members are constantly at war with each other, which is not satisfactory. Having a neutral organisation—the SIA—trying to bring a degree of coherence is wholly desirable.

I hold a number of honorary positions in the security industry, none of which are paid, but I declare them. I hold a position in the Joint Security Industry Council, for which I am not getting paid; that is representative. Even the dog handlers have me as a patron. I do not want any jokes about being barking mad, because I have used them already.

I have a good feel for the security industry. I have written two books and 172 articles and have spoken in hundreds of meetings, trying to set up an organisation that eventually became the Security Industry Authority. One of the happiest days of my life was when the Private Security Industry Act 2001 came about. Was it perfect? Like hell it was, but it was rushed through before the election and was the only legislation that was feasible. I was told, "It's either this or nothing at all." The Act is so bad it is almost good, in that it allows the SIA to regulate through subordinate legislation. Is this global industry—growing to $120 billion in the world—doing its job? It certainly is here.

I believe that the industry is improving enormously. We are getting away from many of the faults, which have now been eradicated. Is the SIA perfect? No, it is not. The people who opposed regulation in the first place are still whingeing. They did not like it then and they will take any opportunity to criticise the SIA if it acts against their interests. The SIA has done reasonably well. So far, it has had a catalytic effect on the private security industry. I shall mention my criticism in a moment, but it has done a good job.

Some ask why the regulatory authority exists when there is self-regulated delivery. Whose self-regulation today is delivering? Did it ever deliver? It certainly is not delivering now. I do not want to go back to that period of statutory self-regulation.

I am told that the model for training and accreditation has already been decided. It is up to the Minister to tell us whether he has made a decision already. I doubt whether he has. Many organisations—a vast number—offer training. I was told that there are not enough trainers, but there are 6,500 of them, and 2,000 training providers. That is no shortage.

I am told, "It is too difficult to license people." However, 140,000 people, some 60,000 of whom are private security guards, have been licensed and trained already. Yes, there were problems with door supervisors, but that was in a trial run in Hampshire and the Isle of Wight and, as I said earlier, a lot of people did not complete the forms correctly. Lessons have been learned from that.

The idea that the approved contractors scheme will somehow result in a lower standard is a fantasy. My hon. Friend makes the following argument: "All right, let the person's friends run their section of the security industry. Let's have a regulatory scheme with no standards at all." No, I do not want that; I want a proper, approved contractor scheme. If anyone reads the brochure that has been put out, it will tell them exactly what is intended. There is an attempt to raise management standards. The licensing is for the personnel. The approved contractor scheme will try to raise the quality, the process and the commercial relationships, to improve the management, the financial management, the quality of people and the quality of leadership and to develop corporate responsibility. If that is going backwards, my sense of direction is completely unacceptable and intolerable.

The scheme will be good. My criticism is that management training will not be compulsory; it should be. If the guy in the infantry has to go through a training programme—and four days is not enough—why should management in myriad organisations not be obliged to get a degree or qualification?

The approved contractor scheme will supplement licensing. It is very good, and the idea of reneging on a commitment to introduce it is totally erroneous. My impression is that a number of companies will now bid to be, in essence, the approver of the various schemes across a wide range of activities. I believe in competition; it is better to have one organisation losing its ability to control perhaps 70 per cent. of the market and to allow in others who will operate to a scheme laid down by the SIA. At the moment, the NSI is market leader, with 70 per cent. of the business, I am told. If the Minister approves the scheme, others will be competing. I would have thought and hoped that most people would be prepared to see a system under which others enter the market.

The industry is becoming more professional. Thousands of men and women now have qualifications when previously they had none. I had estimated that there were 100,000 door supervisors, but the figure was much lower, and I shall say why: because thousands of door supervisors knew full well that they would never pass a criminal records check, so they disappeared from the scene. My hon. Friend said that he had anecdotal evidence; if he is able to provide more than that and say which bars or restaurants employ unlicensed door supervisors, he should please pass the details on to the local police, who have the responsibility for prosecuting.

I move on to my last point. The industry is accused of taking too long to license; I think that 80 per cent. of all licence applications are dealt with in six weeks. [Interruption.] I listened patiently to my hon. Friend; perhaps he will listen to me for a few more seconds. I wish that the period was shorter than six weeks, but we are not talking about 18, 20 or 30 weeks. If we are, it will perhaps be because the relevant guy lives in Botswana, and it will take some time to find out whether there is a regulatory authority in that country to get the information back over. That is the reason.

Of course, the approved contractor scheme's fast-tracking is going to be criticised. However, my hon. Friend says that the process takes too long. Under the new scheme, if the approved contractor is seen as honest, ethical and meeting all the standards, somebody who applies—no contractor should employ a security guard if it has not gone through its own system of vetting—and gets past the system will be allowed to enter work, and the licence will follow. So the contractor decides whether it wants the employee quickly or at all.

I hope that the Minister will answer some of the questions. I have my criticisms of the SIA but, on balance, it is doing a good job. It is being undermined by people who are trying to do it in for their own commercial reasons. I really hope that the Minister will say that, in the 18 to 20 months that it has been functioning, the SIA has done pretty well. When mistakes have been made, they can be remedied, but any idea of loosening its control or of taking away its right to enable a number of companies to operate in the role of supervisor, and of leaving the current arrangements in place would not be adequate. Those with many interests in private security would wonder whether that was the right decision.

I ask the Minister to give the SIA support. It deserves it. In two or three years, the industry will become unrecognisable from the pathetic industry that it was prior to the legislation, and that will be due to the SIA.

3.11 pm

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): I thank the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) for raising the matter and for his persistence. As a new Member of the House, I find that life here is very much an education, and his depth of knowledge and that of the right hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) is certainly something with which I cannot compete.

[Mark Williams]

I shall focus briefly on my brief experience of door supervisors in my constituency. I might be charged with being a whinger but, as the right hon. Member for Walsall, South said, worries have been expressed about the working of the system as it is constituted, and that needs to be dealt with by the Minister in his discussions with the SIA. There are widespread concerns about the working of the SIA, in particular its interface and record in dealing with those who seek accreditation.

A month ago, I accompanied my local police force in Aberystwyth on night patrol. As we visited the pubs and clubs in the town, it quickly became apparent that the system does not always work as effectively as it should. There is the worry that a body that is funded publicly to the tune of £25 million and which charges up to £590 for administration per application is not coping with the situation.

I wish to cite a brief example provided by a constituent. Mr. Aled Davies of Aberystwyth assures me that his worries are widespread. His business has a capacity that requires a maximum of nine door supervisors, an extensive pool of people all of whom require training and accreditation. Above all else, he needs a prompt and efficient system that deals with applications within six weeks at least. Sadly, he told me of delays of six months. Few of us would deny that the current system is better than what existed before, as the right hon. Member for Walsall, South said, but individual failings need to be addressed. My constituent reported some delays of more than a year. However, I accept the right hon. Gentleman's point about the huge number of forms that are inaccurately completed and the time that it takes to remedy the mistakes.

Aberystwyth is a university town. The income of many students is supplemented by such work, but by the time that many of the applications are processed, they have already left town. Mr. Davies also cited examples of lost application forms and the failure to reach relevant officials by telephone. He is a responsible business man who wishes to comply with the spirit and detail of the law, but he has been in the responsible position of turning away business because he lacked sufficient accredited employees as a result of the system not working.

I do not wish to enter the debate on whether the figure is 90,000 or 120,000, but there is a huge backlog of applications and that needs to be dealt with at the first opportunity. Earlier this year, there was a truce between the police and the SIA in that there were to be no prosecutions in certain areas, such as Ceredigion and London, as long as the bouncers could prove that they had applied for a licence. That short-term approach makes a mockery of the system. It would be helpful if the Minister clarified the extent of the application backlog. We have heard conflicting figures. Can he explain what procedures are in place to measure the performance of the SIA? It is clear from the widespread support that the 2001 Act had at the time that the SIA is a laudable organisation in its intent, but serious matters need to be addressed.

3.15 pm

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): It is a pleasure to take part in this debate, which has been a little more spirited and lively than I expected when I sat down this afternoon. I congratulate the three hon. Members who have taken part so far, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) on securing it. I shall try to carry on the Yorkshire flavour that he brought to the debate. My right hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) spoke with a great deal of authority and experience, and I learned quite a few things. I did not know about his connection with a dog-handling authority. I shall go away and contemplate that. Equally, the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mark Williams) brought a great deal of local experience to the debate. That is what I want to follow.

I speak as chair of the all-party parliamentary beer group. It is a tough job, but someone has to do it. We held a seminar on this subject in the dying days of the previous Parliament. I do not have the vast experience of some of my colleagues in this matter, and that was my first association with the issue. Over the months, I have kept in touch with the pub and club industry about the implementation of the 2001 Act.

I start from the standpoint that this industry needed regulating. The 2001 Act was a substantial advance, and clearly many hon. Members more experienced than me have devoted a great deal of time to it. However, it is right to consider how the Act is working in practice. The approved contractor scheme cannot come a day too soon for many pubs and clubs. There are three reasons why we now need to increase the number of door supervisors who can legally work in pubs and clubs.

First, we are coming up to Christmas. Even though we will probably not need door supervisors at the all-party beer group's Christmas party, parties up and down the land will need them, and the demand for door supervisors will be high. Secondly, next week, following yesterday's vote in the House, the Licensing Act 2003 will come into force. That will increase the time that pubs and clubs are open, so there will be an increased demand for door supervisors. Thirdly, the industry wants to co-operate with the Government's alcohol misuse enforcement campaign and, again, door supervisors are an important part of that.

It is a matter of some concern that, in recent months, the number of people who have applied for door supervisor's accreditation has slowed up considerably since accreditation became mandatory. Many people applied in the run-up to the cut-off date, but the number has now slowed to a trickle. For many of those who were door supervisors, the economics of having to find £450 for the application and the accreditation, when they will not work for six weeks or whatever it may be, may mean that they have to look for alternative work and do not go into the industry.

The approved contractor scheme is therefore vital in increasing the supply of door supervisors to the industry in this critical phase. Clearly some people are arguing for option 4 and completely new standards. In terms of option 3, some British standards—BS7960 is one—are widely respected in the industry. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South that a monopoly is not desirable in these circumstances—there should be a number of competing providers—but we do not necessarily need to reinvent the wheel. I therefore urge my hon. Friend the Minister to scrutinise the options carefully.

There is even a possibility that, at some stage following the Hampton review, the SIA will be merged with the Health and Safety Executive. Where to go from here is a finely balanced judgment. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to look carefully at some of the existing standards and to consider whether he can build on them instead of scrapping them and going for option 4. We need the approved contractor scheme in place quickly, to ensure not least that the pub and club industry is completely in compliance, but that it has a supply of door supervisors to allow it to comply but still provide a service for the nation.

3.20 pm

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): I wish to make just a few points, and will try not to repeat what has already been said by other hon. Members. I largely support what my hon. Friends the Members for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) and for Selby (Mr. Grogan) said.

I wish to reiterate why many of us worked for and supported the legislation that set up the SIA and that introduced regulation for all parts of the security and leisure industry. My particular interest since I was first elected in 1997 has been the issue of door supervisors. I am particularly interested in it because it is a matter of public safety, in particular the safety of young people, as they tend to make up the majority who frequent pubs, clubs and large-scale pop industry events. In common with many hon. Members, I had heard all sorts of horror stories from constituents—or, more often, from constituents' parents—who had fallen foul of door supervisors who were either overtly criminal and violent, or who involved themselves in the drug trade and simply used their door supervising role to sell drugs. In the context of pop concerts, which have an extremely young clientele, there was the added problem of supervisors who were suspected of sexual offences. They used their position at concerts to put young people at considerable risk. Therefore, I am absolutely behind the SIA and the legislation as vital methods of protecting public safety.

I have some concerns, however, about how the SIA is operating. First, I do not think it good practice to consult on something but put a decision into effect before the consultation has ended. It makes a mockery of consultation, and that has a much wider impact than the issue that we are discussing. People will say, "It just proves that the Government consult only when they have already made up their minds." People run everything into "the Government". It is extremely bad practice to consult and then to anticipate the result of the consultation.

Secondly, I am concerned that the approved contractor scheme is giving firms a licence, in essence, to subvert the will of Parliament. That is a hard thing to say, but I believe that is what it is. In passing the legislation, Parliament wanted there to be no unlicensed door supervisors, wheel clampers and so on. Not 85 per cent. but 100 per cent. were to be licensed. Whatever the safeguards involved in including in the approved contractor scheme only companies that have signed up to it and that have passed certain standards, the scheme allows companies to operate legally with unlicensed operators. I do not believe that that is acceptable, and I do not understand why it is allowed. It seems to be completely against the spirit of what Parliament intended and is subverting the democratic and parliamentary will. One can argue about what 15 per cent. means, but, because of the fast turnover in the industry, 15 per cent. can mean a lot more than 15 per cent. over time.

The third issue is the nature of the standards in the approved contractor sch[illegible] There is merit in a graduated scheme—that is, a threshold and then grades above that clearly require a higher standard of some firms than of others. Presumably, such grades would give firms a competitive advantage over firms that have achieved the legal standard, but not the two-star or one-star standards above it. I am concerned that the approved contractors scheme far from maintains and improves standards in the delivery of security services, as was said in the written answer received from the Minister yesterday, on 15 November.

Imposing a single threshold, which is lower than many of the standards already operating in the industry, although requiring every company to reach a minimum standard, will not give any encouragement whatever to firms to do any better than that minimum standard. That will lead not to an improvement in overall standards, but merely to a raising of the standards of the poorest firms.

3.25 pm

Lynne Featherstone (Hornsey and Wood Green) (LD): The debate has been tremendously interesting, particularly for someone like me, who does not have huge experience of the security industry. However, I have huge experience of what my constituents face locally. We welcomed the Private Security Industry Act 2001 as a way of regulating an industry—whether door supervisors, wheel clampers, for which I have forgotten the technical term, and now the security industry itself—that was upsetting a great number of people.

Clearly, with the relaxation of the licensing laws, there is going to be a greater need for door supervisors. I have listened to the debate, and I would stand up for the public. Trust has been put in the Government to ensure that an industry that had a tremendously bad reputation, and was dangerous, would come under regulation. I am less than happy to hear that there is a way of circumventing the rules put in place for the public's protection.

I liken the situation to what happened when I was a member of the London assembly, where I was chair of transport and the Mayor of London licensed unregulated minicabs. The attempt to regulate is not dissimilar. There is an owner, an individual or driver and—for the taxi trade—the vehicle itself. Frankly, any circumvention or shortening of a process that will deliver safety to the public should not be encouraged.

On wheel clampers, I have terrible examples of their effect on the public. One of my constituents was clamped and, as is not unusual, was extremely upset. However, the vehicle immobiliser—that is the term—called her a great number of names. She rang me in tears. I cannot attribute what happened next directly to the clamper, but the police were involved and, three weeks later, she killed herself. That is a tremendously tragic case. An industry that was so cavalier is required to have much higher standards, and what the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) said about door supervisors applies to the security trade. Standards must be raised to avoid such tragic events—that case was clearly at one end of the scale. I would be extremely disheartened if an approved contractors scheme allowed the industry to circumvent the intention of the original legislation.

[Lynne Featherstone]

The SIA has a tremendous problems and is clearly not coping with the load, although I do not have the information as to whether that is because it is badly run or inappropriately resourced. Private security companies have now become an important part of the industry, so the licensing scheme is important and the public need confidence in the industry. If the licensing process falls into disrepute, we are back where we started and no gain has been made.

What is happening with the licensing of doorkeepers is not comforting. We are only part of the way through the process and are having to delay or make agreements with the police, such that, so long as one has applied, one is let off being prosecuted, because the licence is on the way: "I've applied for my licence, officer." The SIA set out to license about 85,000 door supervisors, but only 40,000 have been put through.

In the end, some criticism has to be levelled at the Government for not analysing what would be necessary or the time scales that would be involved to maintain the standards that the public are relying on, coming out of the legislation. I hope that the Minister will give us an assurance that resourcing will be increased to enable more licensing and that no standards will be dropped during the licensing so that the public can be reassured that the legislation enacted will serve them as they expect.

Mr. Bruce George: Of course there are people who have had problems, but will the hon. Lady accept that the process has not been discredited? When it comes to guards, the process of licensing is a long way from being concluded, and a lot of people have been licensed already. I feel that people have been got at by the use of wrong information. The system is working reasonably well and I hope that when she explores the matter further she will realise that the system has not been discredited and that standards are not falling. I speak as someone who has spent 25 years observing the process.

Lynne Featherstone: I very much hope that the system has not been totally discredited but there is a concern that it will be if it is circumvented. In such circumstances, an approved scheme operator could employ effectively unlicensed employees to carry out the same job that they would have done if they had made a direct application.

Mr. George: All I would say is that the system has not been circumvented. Standards are continually being raised and attacking them with little more than anecdotal evidence or sad stories will give the impression that the system is falling apart when it really is not.

Lynne Featherstone: I do not really have any more to add.

3.32 pm

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): Thank you, Mrs. Dean. It is a pleasure to be serving under your guidance. I apologise for my poor telephone discipline earlier, and may I say what a pleasure it is to be opposite the Minister again?

This has been an extremely interesting debate. I begin by thanking the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) for securing it and allowing us all to air views that will be helpful to the industry, whether we agree with what is going on at the moment or not.

My own exposure to the matter came initially while serving under the right hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) on the Defence Committee some four years ago when that Committee for reasons best known to posterity—and the right hon. Gentleman himself—was chosen to carry out the investigation of 11 September 2001 and, for want of a better phrase, the homeland security measures that the Government might choose to put in place to defend the nation in the event of such an incident happening again.

I had always regarded the community of people in question as those who look after pubs, clubs and other establishments and still see them as such in my community. I began to realise that these ladies and gentlemen could have a much more serious, far-reaching effect, were they to be properly regulated and brought into the wider police family. It is a move that I could wax eloquent about, but I will not for the simple reason that much more needs to be done about the matter.

Although I, as a Tory, feel strongly that government should be small rather than large and believe in all the principles of competition, I understand that the industry needs some regulation. I hope that the Minister will be able to explain whether that regulation is working correctly.

I thought that the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Lynne Featherstone) gave some very interesting insights into her personal experience, which, with respect, she said is not deep; I suspect it is more visceral. It shed a light on the situation of those who are on [illegible] receiving end and it is an interesting juxtaposition to the experience of the right hon. Member for Walsall, [illegible] who is clearly deeply knowledgeable on the [illegible]

Similarly, the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, [illegible] West (Dr. Starkey) made some extremely good [illegible]—without wishing to sound patronising—particularly about doorkeepers who, without regulation in the past, had given the police not assistance but serious problems. The views on the industry of the hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) blew the froth off the whole subject; he took more or less the same view as the hon. Members for Milton Keynes, South-West and for Barnsley, Central.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mark Williams) talked convincingly about the need for prompt accreditation. That subject will come up throughout this summary—and I am sure that it will also come up in the Minister's reply. Questions will arise as to how long accreditation should take and how efficient the 2001 Act is, regardless of what we might think about the rights and wrongs of this subject in general.

The star turn of this debate has been the right hon. Member for Walsall, South versus the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central. I have no doubt that they are the best of friends, but they clearly disagree strongly about this subject. A debate has been had about monopoly on the one side versus over-regulation or lack of regulation on the other. I hope that the Minister will be able to provide some insight into that.

Mr. Illsley: There is probably less difference between me and my right hon. Friend than has been suggested. I agree that there should be regulation, but it should be done properly, and we should not exclude any company that has a good track record in respect of accreditation systems.

3.36 pm

Sitting suspended for Divisions in the House.

4.3 pm

On resuming—

Patrick Mercer: I am now utterly confused about how much time we have left so I will romp through the rest of my speech and allow the Minister time to answer the various questions.

The hon. Member for Barnsley, Central was just saying that the distance between himself and the right hon. Member for Walsall, South is not that great. I have no doubt that, both physically and emotionally, the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Gentleman are close to one another. However, anyone who knows the right hon. Member for Walsall, South knows that he always speaks passionately and makes his case with great perspicacity. No doubt because of his association with the guard dog association, his bark is worse than his bite on many occasions.

I will ask the Minister some specific questions, so that I can spare everyone else the ghastly puns. Schedule 1 of the 2001 Act requires the authority to consist of members appointed by the Secretary of State. Will the Minister say who those members are and publish a list? Will he say whether they include among their number anybody who is, or has been, working in the private security industry? Similarly, the same schedule allows the authority to establish committees and sub-committees. It was understood that the authority intended to set up steering committees for each licensing category, using professionals in that sector to advise on best practice for licensing. Will he say who is on the committees and sub-committees and publish their names? Along similar lines, it has been suggested that the SIA policy on employment is not to employ anyone from the private security industry. Will he say whether that is correct?

To go a little further than the hon. Member for Selby, it seems that a significant number of British standards—for example, BS7499 for guarding and BS7858 for screening—already cover the private security industry. Those are used to identify competence, good practice and other aspects of the SIA's requirement for licensing and the approved contractor scheme. As that is the case, would it not have saved the SIA considerable time to have adopted the experienced British Standards Institution committees to support its role rather than trying to reinvent the wheel?

Will the Minister confirm that the SIA will not assign or contract out any of its rights or duties to an organisation that operates or invokes its own proprietary scheme? Further to that, as a probing question, where is the evidence that it is necessary to legitimise the areas that the SIA now plans to go in to and regulate? Does the Minister agree that although the SIA was established to regulate those parts of the security industry that needed regulation—wheel clampers, door supervisors, security guards and so on—by regulating private investigators and security consultants it will go into areas where there is a lack of any evidence to suggest that they need regulating? If the Minister agrees, will he expand on that point?

Does not the way in which the SIA now operates suggest that it has forgotten the approach to regulation supported by the Better Regulation Task Force? Is it not now creating unnecessary hurdles and obstacles, particularly for small security companies? Perhaps that is against the whole idea we are trying to achieve with the regulation that we agree is necessary. However, it must not hamper small firms.

The SIA has been promoting its approved contractor scheme for more than a year. The scheme is still under consultation. Many small and medium-sized security companies have decided that they wish to be assessed against existing British standards and the quality standard ISO 9001. That is option 3 under the approved contractor scheme consultation, as we have heard from several hon. Members this afternoon, and accords with the UK Accreditation Service benchmarks established by the National Security Inspectorate. However, the SIA has made its preference known for option 4. I will not go any further, but I am sure that the Minister will have a view on this important subject. I wonder also about the SIA having unilaterally abolished the only external strategic oversight body, the stakeholders' advisory group, two years ago and not replacing it. What plans do the Government have to oversee the SIA in the future?

A small but important point is whether SIA statistics are up to date. Is it giving out statistics that might make it seem more favourable than the facts in case? Lastly, were the senior executive members of the new sector skills council appointed through the normal process for the appointment of people to public bodies? If they were not, does the Minister not think that, given the importance of such posts, they should be?

I am grateful for the opportunity to summarise and take the points that we have heard today. The debate has been extremely useful, particularly the differing views expressed by the right hon. Member for Walsall, South and the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central. I will be extremely interested to hear the Minister's reply.

Mrs. Janet Dean (in the Chair): For the Minister's information, the debate will finish at 4.27 unless we are interrupted again.

4.9 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): Thank you, Mrs. Dean.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) on securing the debate. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) that it has proved to be more lively than any of us anticipated, and rightly so. It is an important issue and there is a lot of experience in the Chamber today. We have been provided with an opportunity to review the performance of the Security Industry Authority and to update the House on the consultation that is ongoing, until tomorrow, on the proposals for an approved contractor scheme.

The context for our discussions is the Private Security Industry Act 2001. My right hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) has long experience of such matters, as do my hon. Friends the Members for Barnsley, Central, for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) and for Selby. I am a relative newcomer to such issues, as is the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mark Williams), and we are learning all the time. It is good that Members have been able to contribute their experience to this important issue.

As private security has increasingly come into contact with the public and as the volume of the private security industry has increased, we have had to ensure that criminal elements are not part of it and that decent standards are maintained. I freely admit to my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central that that has entailed some additional costs for the industry, but they are costs that will give added value to those companies and make them more competitive and, we hope, provide a better service. I say to him in all seriousness that if he has evidence of or anecdotes about the flouting of any of the regulations, he should bring them forward and we would have them examined urgently and in great detail.

It is important that the laws, rules and regulations are properly enforced. I regard that as an important responsibility for me, coming into this role, as is improving standards in a way that is not over-burdensome to the industry, but that engenders greater public confidence. Both those things are important. Given that the SIA has been open for business only since March 2004, a great deal has been achieved in a sector that was almost wholly unregulated in many respects.

My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central expressed concern about the rate of applications and licensing decisions. He asked for progress. Just last week the SIA announced that it had issued its 50,000th licence. Given that it started its business in March 2004, that is quite an achievement. I have been watching the performance of the SIA carefully over recent months and I am pleased to say that it has improved. More than 85 per cent. of licence applications are now processed within the target of six weeks, and there is currently no backlog. It is dealing with about 7,000 cases, few of which exceed the six-week period. I acknowledge that there have been difficulties, but I am pleased to say that progress has been made and that performance is improving.

Thanks to various improvements that have been made to the application process by the SIA, the number of incomplete applications received is beginning to decline. That was a point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South. The SIA has improved the advice, the booklets and the information available.

Incredibly perhaps, to many hon. Members, the failure rate of applications initially was some 50 per cent.—one in every two applications was incomplete. That number has now been reduced to some 36 per cent., which, again, hon. Members might regard as high, but I put it to them that the Passport Agency, which is working far better these days, has a failure rate of applications of 33 per cent. Clearly, there is much that all public agencies can do to ensure that more information is available and that people process applications as accurately as possible. There have been improvements and that should be recognised.

The number of door supervisors licensed over the past year and a half is 34,000 of a total of 40,000. Obviously, some are therefore not licensed. They will increasingly come under the scrutiny of local authorities and the police, who will seek to find out who those people are and where they are. There are prosecutions and there will be prosecutions. It is quite timely perhaps that under the Licensing Act 2003, which comes into operation next week, it can be made a condition of the licence that door supervisors operate on the premises concerned, and they will need to be properly accredited by the SIA.

My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central is quite right to say that the security guarding sector, which employs more than 120,000 people, is by far the largest of all the six sectors that are required to be licensed under the 2003 Act. Given such large numbers, it is vital that the licensing of security guards is carried out in a phased manner, to ensure that no complications with the processing of applications are caused by any late surge just before the legal requirement date of 20 March 2006. The SIA was obviously in discussion with the industry and reached agreement with it that applications would be spread as evenly as possible over a 14-month period, targeting about 8,000 applications a month. That number could easily be managed within the SIA's own procedures and within the resources of the Criminal Records Bureau. The Home Office and the SIA are dependent on the industry's co-operation for a successful and effective roll-out of licensing for the security guarding sector.

The good news is that a growing number of companies are meeting and, indeed, exceeding the targets for licence applications that they agreed with the SIA. I am very encouraged by that, and it means that future pressures on the licensing system are being reduced. I appreciate the efforts of those companies meeting their targets, and I am impressed by their dedication and commitment.

Unfortunately, however, other companies are not yet meeting their targets for submitting licence applications, and that has the potential to lead to a shortfall in the applications received. It means that the processing capabilities of the SIA and the Criminal Records Bureau may be being under-utilised. We run a great risk of processing insufficient numbers of licence applications and, therefore, restricting the number of operatives who will be licensed from 20 March next year.

I am about to send a letter to all private companies in the sector urging them, particularly those that have not yet done so, to encourage their staff to submit their applications as soon as possible or to utilise the SIA's bulk applications process. The SIA is working with the Home Office to develop plans to deal with a late surge in the number of applications, if one occurs. However, it will be difficult for the SIA's systems to handle a last-minute flood of applications in the last couple of months before the March 2006 deadline. It is therefore vital that as many applications as possible are received by the SIA before the end of this month.

My officials and I have been working closely with the SIA to ensure that the process is as smooth as possible, and that the message goes out loud and clear that people need to get their applications in now—or certainly in the next few weeks—and not leave it until February and March of next year. I make it absolutely clear that there is no intention to change the date from 20 March next year. From that date, it will be a criminal offence for any security guard, supplied on a contract for services, to work without a licence. It will also be a criminal offence for directors and managers of guarding companies to supply unlicensed operatives.

The SIA licensing scheme is a valuable system of regulation that protects the public, and it is improving standards throughout the industry. It is important that the industry continues to work closely with the SIA to implement an effective regulatory system that meets those aims.

All hon. Members who have contributed to the debate spoke about the approved contractor scheme consultation taking place. The partial regulatory impact assessment is out for consultation. Hon. Members know that it was published on 25 August, and the consultation period ends tomorrow. There have been 1,000 requests for copies of the consultation document, and already 100 submissions have been made. We expect that others will arrive before the deadline tomorrow.

The powers to create an approved contractor scheme were contained in the original legislation—in sections 15 to 18 of the Act. There are four options in relation to the consultation, and I shall come on to them. I want to emphasise an important point: the approved contractor scheme is not a carte blanche for companies to take on indefinitely people who are not suitably qualified and accredited. The scheme allows an approved company to employ staff while their application for a licence is being processed. However, those staff must have completed the training and submitted an application. If the application were subsequently turned down by the SIA, they would no longer be able to operate in the industry. In other words, in an industry in which there is rapid change and where credible companies are undertaking suitable training, those companies are able to employ those staff for the first few weeks, but if the staff do not come up to scratch they will lose their job.

Dr. Starkey: Will the Minister clarify whether the individuals would be working without having undergone a criminal records check?

Paul Goggins: Yes, but because the process of application obviously includes a Criminal Records Bureau check, we need to ensure that the companies employing the staff would maintain credible quality in training and other matters. We are placing trust in that credibility. The arrangement would enable them to employ staff, provided that they had done the training in the first few weeks.

The scheme is out to consultation. Four options have been mentioned: option 1 is to do nothing; option 2 is a self-regulatory approach; option 3 is a scheme using existing industry standards; and option 4 is a scheme with new standards. Hon. Members have several times asked whether a decision has been made. I assure them that no decision has yet been made about which of the options will be followed. How do I know? I am the Minister who will make the decision, and I have not done so; nor would it be proper for me to do so while the matter is still the subject of consultation.

It is true that the SIA has had a meeting with eight potential assessing bodies collectively to establish the workability of option 4. However, those are the same assessing bodies that would be likely to be involved in implementing option 3. It is necessary for the SIA to be prepared to implement any of the options that I may decide on. Preparations by the SIA are not a problem. Of course, we would want any option to be implemented as quickly as possible but no decision has been made, and the decision is ministerial, not one for the SIA.

The SIA has a duty, under the 2001 Act, to establish and maintain an approved contractor scheme. The scheme will also help the SIA to carry out its functions under the Act, including maintaining and improving standards in the provision of security services. An important objective of the approved contractor schemes is to enable security firms to operate more efficiently, by providing a mechanism for them to deploy staff who have already done the appropriate training and applied for a licence, but not yet received it. Without that mechanism, firms cannot deploy staff until they have physically received their licence, which will typically take six weeks from the receipt of the completed application.

To reduce risk to an acceptable level, the ACS will need to ensure that only those firms that meet certain requirements will be allowed to deploy staff without a licence. Of course, the standard that they will have to reach—the option that Ministers will decide should be followed—has not yet been settled on.

In drawing up the consultation, we have been keen to involve the Better Regulation Executive and the Better Regulation Task Force. We want always to create a balance between self-regulation and regulation that is promoted and asserted by Government. It is important to do so, and to take advice and guidance from the various bodies. The consultation draws to an end tomorrow, as hon. Members have pointed out, and before I make a final decision I shall give urgent consideration to the representations that have been made.

The hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) asked me some detailed questions about the SIA and I undertake to write to him with all the information that I can give him. I shall send copies to other hon. Members who contributed to the debate. He mentioned the extended police family, and we are keen to support that. The private industry—like all citizens—plays a part in that; we all have a responsibility to make sure that our communities are safe.

I have mentioned the balance that is needed between self-regulation and self-responsibility, and regulation imposed from above and properly monitored. I believe that we are striking the correct balance with the SIA and the various systems that are in place.

[Paul Goggins]

I again congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central on having introduced the debate. It has given us an opportunity to review the current position. The progress that we have been able to make since the legislation came into force should encourage us all. There have been difficulties, but they will be overcome and as a result we should all have greater confidence in the private security industry.

Teaching Vacancies (Advertising Costs)

4.25 pm

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk) (Lab): Discussions about Government spending priorities are usually, rightly, rich in ideology. Resource allocations have to be properly matched to intended outcomes, and determining what those outcomes should be is the stuff of politics. However, I approached the subject of the cost to schools of advertising job vacancies not through the prism of ideology or party politics but from the perspective of good old-fashioned cost-effectiveness. Schools pay many times more than is necessary in order to advertise the jobs that they have available. I am convinced that the adoption of a number of simple measures, none of which would require legislation, would enable schools to save millions of pounds every year—tens of thousands of pounds each. My aim today is to show that savings could be made and services to schools improved by greater use of the internet.

A few months ago, I attended the New Statesman new media awards. The debate was full of exciting, young and some not so young internet entrepreneurs who had found truly creative ways of delivering services—some traditional, some new—through the new media. It was a great event to attend, because the excitement generated by finding new solutions to old problems was palpable. The event was a real credit to the New Statesman. One of the main prizes was won not by the private sector but by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency, and that was marvellous.

As I watched the prizes being presented, I was reminded of an Adjournment debate that I had secured in Westminster Hall four years ago, not long after arriving in the House. Then, I could not understand why The Times Educational Supplement managed to continue to base its price to schools on a newspaper format when it was clear that there was ample scope for the job advertisements that sustained it to move to a cheaper and much more versatile internet platform. Then I was told by the Minister that the Government would be reluctant to interfere unnecessarily in the market but that perhaps in due course—this is a quick summary—the market would come to a better solution in its own way. I wonder whether that is still the Government's position. I am not sure, but in due course I shall find out. Things are changing so fast, both on the internet and in the market in general, that what was not practicable four years ago may well be feasible now. So I decided to have a second run at the subject.

The commercial viability of newspapers across the UK is based on advertising and sometimes, in particular, the "jobs vacant" column. Many of the jobs on offer are funded by the public purse, in central or local government or some agency or other. It follows that it is public money that keeps the wolf from the door of many excellent publishing ventures. There is nothing wrong with that in principle, as hiring decisions are among the most important that any manager will take, whether he is in the public, voluntary or private sector.

In recent years there has nevertheless been a steady move away from conventional job advertisements in newspapers, as managers and budget holders take advantage of new websites that cater for their needs and that are much cheaper than their newsprint alternative.

That is not a reflection of the quality of the newspapers and journals that are losing out, and it is certainly true that there is still value in advertising in newspapers in particular situations. For example, those who are likely to take up lower-end jobs in a local authority may be less mobile and more local, and perhaps less likely to do their administration on the internet. In such circumstances, it remains prudent to advertise in a local newspaper. However, as a generality, the more internet-literate the population become, the more people shop and buy cinema tickets on the internet and the more jobs can be advertised effectively too. The winners from the trend are the advertisers and the jobseekers; the losers are the newspapers and journals.

Even as I wrote this speech, I and other Members received an e-mail from Thomson directories about e-marketing, which seemed relevant. The growth of job advertisements on the internet is reflected in the advertising that we now see on television for recruiters such as monster.co.uk, and there are rumours that some of the larger corporations, such as Microsoft or Yahoo, might develop software that searches the internet for job vacancies advertised on specific sites. Those things may well be in the pipeline, but for the moment the question for any job advertiser is whether the internet options on offer are fit for his purposes. For example, regardless of the technological offers on parade, if the target population do not on the whole use the internet, managers will be wasting their time and money. To some extent, therefore, although developing technologies will drive change, as ever, human behaviour will still play the most fundamental part in their design and their constraint.

Some public sector organisations are further down the internet road than others. The NHS has set up its own website, www.jobsnhs.co.uk, aimed at saving NHS employers the cost of advertising in local and national press. The website does not seem as effective or successful as it might be, as it advertises relatively few jobs. Interestingly, other websites have rather more. However, some websites, including www.nhsjobs.co.uk—I suspect that it got the name before the NHS official website did, and that is why the latter uses the reverse—are quite successful; that one has a thousand or so jobs on it.

Nurses in particular and those in other specialisms are moving away from conventional publications such as Nursing Times and across to the internet. They are confident that the jobs that they are looking for will be advertised there, so the advertiser has confidence that the readers will be there, too.

The websites have led to a significant reduction in the advertising income for traditional sources. Recently, for example, the owners of Nursing Times, Emap, announced that it anticipated a 40 per cent. reduction in advertising income for that one publication alone. It is a relatively small part of the Emap empire, but, as I understand it, it is a very high-margin publication. Nurses are computer-literate and need a quick and easy means of looking and applying for jobs. NHS employers have confidence that advertisements will be read by the target population. These jobs have migrated in the true sense, meaning that no cost is being expended elsewhere in another newspaper publication. That is a crucial detail that I will come back to.

The NHS is, of course, the largest employer in the world, and because it is so diverse, there are specialisms. Specialisms can migrate bit by bit in bite-sized chunks or packets, as it were. That makes migration to the internet rather easier in that field than in education, which is my primary concern. Education is much more homogenous, so packeting—chunks moving across to the internet bit by bit—will not really work. The nation's teachers want to use the same source, and so do the nation's schools and local authorities. That makes migrating those adverts to the internet very challenging, because it would have to be done in very short order. We would need to move everyone across; it would be like switching the side of the road that one drives on, or going over to broadband.

I should like to describe how schools recruit, and in particular mention the role of The Times Educational Supplement. Most or all of us here will know this, but I want to put it on record in Hansard: for more than half a century the TES has dominated the market in advertising teaching vacancies. It has done that by taking advantage of being part of The Times empire, and by having access to the whole distribution network. Historically, it was the only paper to advertise to teachers nationally, once teachers travelled more outside their local area. It was the place to look for jobs nationally. Increasingly, people looked away from local papers and to the national TES for jobs, as they were prepared to move anywhere in the country for a promotion or a different type of job.

Today, pretty much all teachers looking for a job look in the TES, and all schools and local authorities looking to fill jobs advertise there. Staffrooms subscribe to a special dog-eared version, which is passed around as a kind of recreational activity. The journalism in it is perfectly fine; indeed, it can be extremely good. However, a teacher in a staffroom looking at the TES—I do not think that I am being cynical—is more likely to be looking at the job vacancies, and fantasising about what might be, than reading through the learned pieces written by journalists. That is my instinct, and my claim is probably provable through empirical observation, but I could be getting out of line.

The market has proved virtually impossible to penetrate. The Guardian education supplement has tried raids on the higher education segment, which the sister paper of the TES, The Times Higher Educational Supplement, covers, but essentially if someone is looking for a job or looking to advertise one they still have to pay the TES. Of course, there are many niche recruiting websites, such as eteach.com and Teachers Plus to name but two, but their primary function is dealing with supply teachers, although they would rather do a lot more. The full-time vacancies on those websites tend to be advertised also in the TES, so those jobs cannot truly be said to have migrated, because there is still a cost being paid to the TES.

There are almost 30,000 schools in the UK, and well over 20,000 of those are in England. To make a stab at a typical example of the advertising cost per school, during 2004 a large secondary school of which I am aware filled 18 vacancies through the TES at a combined cost of £30,000. The cost for primary schools is rather less. Inner-city schools and those with diverse populations—those with more issues, shall we say—will often be more expensive, because they have a higher staff turnover. In addition, the advertising cost does not simply last for one week. Schools generally advertise for two weeks and often have to re-advertise. Advertising for promoted positions costs more, and so forth.

[Mr. Eric Joyce]

An easy way to measure the success of the TES is to pick it up at the end of a period when teachers are getting close to the contractual cut-off point and see the thousands of jobs that are advertised. Although I cannot give the particular month, I vividly recall a banner headline in the TES saying that there were 9,000 jobs advertised in that publication. Each page is worth around £5,000 in advertising income and there are hundreds of pages on such a day, which means that there is in excess of £1 million-worth of advertising—possibly getting towards £2 million—in a single publication. Of course, we are talking about the huge, thick issues and it is not like that all year round. I understand that the income from schools could be above £50 million, but I should be happy to hear the actual figure from the TES.

The expense for schools is considerable, but manageable, and historically it has been a necessity. However, there is now a workable alternative to the status quo. The historical fit-for-purpose reputation of the TES has made its position pretty bomb proof, largely because of the homogenous nature of the teaching profession. It is not sustainable for schools to advertise anywhere else, which means that if a migration to another publication or format were to happen, it would have to happen in very short order so that the same synthesis of the needs of advertiser and jobseeker would continue. No other publication can enter this ground at the moment, because the TES is universally trusted as the place where jobs will be advertised. That is true; it is a fact. It is open to question how any other newspaper-based publication could improve on that, because the cost would have to be about the same. It is more troubling, however, that whereas other sectors are migrating to the internet to make huge savings and provide a better service, there is a logjam in education—for the same reason: any switch to one of a number of excellent internet providers would have to take place in very short order. The problem of a big, homogenous profession persists, and it is fundamental.

As each school in England advertises separately, co-ordinating a fast move to the internet would be hard.

Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware of work by several councils and local education authorities, such as Wakefield council, which has an overview and scrutiny committee that is considering how the LEA can support schools procurement? Does he agree that LEAs have a role, and that as well as the big bang theory that he is advocating—a single switchover—useful work could be done by local education authorities or regional procurement consortiums to start moving the process forward? We need to travel in both directions if we are to achieve the goal that he is suggesting.

Mr. Joyce: That is a useful point. It sounds like Wakefield council has got its act together. I am a big fan of the big bang, but there will probably be another solution in due course, with a combination of different initiatives.

There is one piece of evidence of the fact that teachers would rather use the internet than a big, thick newspaper: most of them go to the TES website. However, the trouble is that although they use that site, the schools still have to pay the price for advertising in the newspaper, so there is no saving.

The TES may argue that it is a high-quality newspaper that happens to do advertising. That is fine if people are paying £1.30 for it, but the extension of that argument is to see the £20,000 or £30,000 spent by schools as a kind of subscription, which I guess most heads would rather not pay—so that argument does not stand up. I accept that with the demise of the TES we would lose a valued publication for teachers, but the market would fill that gap with another publication on the internet, or The Guardian or The Times would expand their education coverage.

I believe that we can clear the logjam, and I shall briefly explain how I think we can do it. The first step is to acknowledge that an internet-only solution would save tens of millions of pounds and provide a higher quality service. I have not heard any colleagues in this place dissenting from that.

The second step is to agree that that solution is possible. I suggest that the evidence is clear. The overwhelming majority of people accessing eteach.com and tes.co.uk are looking for jobs. The eteach website allows everything to be completed online, but the TES website does not. The TES website merely pastes advertisements on the internet for people to read and print out, but the eteach website has gone several steps further and allows everything to be done online. Applicants can save money on postage and some people estimate that schools could save £5 million on postage if everyone applied online through sites such as eteach.

The TES has been slow to adapt because it has not had to. Money has been pouring in and it has been a bit lazy. News International recently sold the TES—its first divestment in the UK—and there is a sniff of a change in the way in which the markets are working. It was sold for £230 million, which is a little less than some people expected, to Exponent, which is funded by venture capital. I wish it well, but at the moment the fundamental position seems to be that the money that the TES generates for TSL Education's new parent company comes from a market dysfunction. No one else can break in because we cannot move all schools across at the same time. There are only two solutions: a harder solution and a softer one.

The harder solution would be for the Government to top-slice a certain amount of money from the schools budget, create a website and give more back to schools by way of savings. That would be difficult to sustain in terms of taking powers back from schools. My instinct—my political antennae are out—is that that would not be feasible.

The softer solution, which my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mary Creagh) suggested, is for the Government to help to facilitate a number of mechanisms to put us in a position where we can switch people over through good practice in councils, getting head teachers prepared, as we are preparing people for broadband, and, as eteach has done, encouraging the Secondary Heads Association to do the same in respect of head teachers. Over a period of perhaps a year or two we could prepare for a big bang when everyone could be moved across at the same time. I look forward to hearing the Minister's response.

4.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): What a pleasure it is to be here, albeit slightly late with the next debate straining to get in. It is good to be here in front of you, Mrs. Dean, for the first time and I am sure that you will keep us in good order, not that my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk (Mr. Joyce) has to be kept in order. His enthusiasm for the subject was clear from the way in which he set out his full and detailed knowledge of it. I congratulate him on that.

My hon. Friend has identified an important area in which he has seen great potential savings for schools, but which it might be difficult for individual schools to deal with. He raised the matter, as one might expect, positively and demonstrated extensive knowledge of the subject. He had a similar debate four years ago and, with great persistence, has come back to see what progress has been made. I did not have the advantage of hearing his exposition first time around, but I have been able to read in Hansard what was said. I hope that, in the time that I have to reply to the debate, I shall be able to reassure him about some matters, although I am sure that he will leave feeling a little impatient about progress.

It is important to remember why there is still a lot of spend on teacher vacancies and why schools must use a substantial portion of their budgets to advertise. Obviously, there is still churn in the profession. There are no longer extensive teacher shortages because there are almost 35,000 more teachers in England since 1997 and the vacancy rate is lower. However, in any profession of 432,000 people—that is the number of teachers in England—there is bound to be a great deal of movement and churn. For that reason, advertising vacancies will always be with us and my hon. Friend is right to try to find a way in which that could provide better value for money.

Every year, there is an influx of newly qualified teachers seeking their first jobs, and employers advertising vacated posts to attract them into schools. The latest figures suggest that 18 per cent. of teaching posts change hands every year—about 70,000 posts—which means that a substantial chunk of information spreading needs to be done as efficiently as possible.

My hon. Friend is right to say that switching the entire advertising effort from using the printed word, which is the old-fashioned way, to the internet is the way of the future. He also said that that should, perhaps, be done in a big bang or all in one go, and compared it to switching the side of the road on which we drive. That is an interesting analogy because we have often contemplated doing that, but have never done so. One barrier to making the kind of effort that he urges is that big bangs can have unforeseen downsides.

I shall tell my hon. Friend a little about what has been going on in the four years since he last raised the subject. The key is to change teachers' attitudes about where they should look for job vacancies and employers' attitudes about where they should place advertisements to get the best possible response and good candidates into posts. My hon. Friend fully explained the tradition surrounding the TES. I do not think that there is a staff room in the country in which one will not find a dog-eared copy that is fairly up to date, but well thumbed. That illustrates his point about the profession being wedded to the TES as the way in which to find and fill vacancies.

Some 70 per cent. of teachers access the internet at least weekly, so there is not a total barrier to using new technology. We need to persuade more teachers to associate the internet with browsing for jobs. My hon. Friend will be pleased to know that my Department has made a start since the last debate. Last December, we added a new online recruitment portal to our popular TeacherNet website to encourage more jobseekers and recruiters to use the internet for recruitment. TeacherNet receives almost 3 million hits a month and is widely used by teachers and employers, so it is a good window in which to advertise and encourage cultural change, which is, I suppose, what we are talking about.

The portal does not currently hold vacancies independent of other websites, but has links to many online recruitment sites that offer that service. As it is on TeacherNet and the links are all in one place, it is, in a sense, a place to which people can go to find other online places where vacancies in the profession can be seen and accessed. It brings things together for the first time in one place to which teachers often go. That is valuable.

As well as linking information and websites, the portal adds value and introduces teachers, particularly those who have not tried it before, to the convenience of online job searching by offering advice on researching jobs on the internet. People may have used the internet but not for researching jobs, and therefore may not have seen what extra it can bring when compared with thumbing through an old copy of the TES. It also has a standardised CV and application form, which we are encouraging schools to accept in place of their individual forms, which will, to the extent that it is done, make it easier to apply for different jobs. There is also a career development section for teachers, which includes the online CV, which can help them to work out what they are looking for in their next job and get their thoughts together.

Those measures are helping to win teachers, particularly younger, newly qualified and web-aware teachers, over to job searching on the internet. They will be able to experience the advantages of sites that offer other relevant information at the click of a mouse, such as the Ofsted report on the school that they are considering, a prospectus, or information about where the school is in the performance tables, as well as simply advertising vacant posts in their areas of search. That brings a lot of information together in much less time than one could ever obtain using print-based mechanisms. All those things are available at the click of a mouse on TeacherNet to get teachers used to the idea of job searching online. It is also important that employers increasingly realise the advantages of internet advertising, whether they be Scottish local authorities or, as is more often in England, schools themselves.

The portal offers employers tips to get the most from their advertising. As my hon. Friend made clear, employers spend a great deal of money on advertising. The portal also offers information on advertisers that publish their vacancies online; case studies of head teachers who have already recruited successfully on the internet that cite the advantages of internet recruitment; and general advice on recruitment and retention of teaching staff.

[Maria Eagle]

The new recruitment portal is being used—it had 51,000 hits last month. That is not many in the context of 3 million hits on TeacherNet, but it is a useful start. The portal has been operating for a comparatively short time, but one can already see a discernible change in awareness of online recruitment. My hon. Friend will probably say, "Not before time," given the speed with which other professions have embraced online recruitment.

My hon. Friend mentioned other parts of the public sector, particularly the national health service. He did half my job by pointing out some differences between health service and schools recruitment. I am grateful to him for that. He is right to say that there is not a central, dominant long-standing player such as the TES for vacancies in the health service. There are, however, sectorally based print publications, which he also mentioned. Far less disaggregation of different employers perhaps makes it easier to introduce centrally orchestrated change in the health service than in the teaching profession.

My hon. Friend made several suggestions, which I want to deal with briefly before we hand the Chamber over to a debate on Oxfordshire. He said that one way in which we could promote faster change would be to top-slice schools' budgets. It is always tempting to do that, and the Department for Education and Skills has been doing so for years. We are trying, however, to be more consistent by stopping ourselves top-slicing schools' budgets. We wish to ensure that our new funding arrangements provide clear three-year budgets for local schools and far greater autonomy for schools to spend their money.Crude top-slicing can cut across that trend, but, unfairly, it also creates winners and losers. For example, schools with rapid staff turnovers would gain at the expense of those with greater staff stability. Some schools would argue that that would be unfair.

Mary Creagh: I wanted to know whether a statutory framework is in place for local education authorities to provide procurement support to schools. The Minister has concentrated on what the Department is doing. Are LEAs given any advice?

Maria Eagle: There are reams of advice given to local authorities and schools. I am sure that a framework is in place—I would be surprised were there not—but I shall have to write to my hon. Friend with the precise answer. I do not wish to mislead her.

The portal has been running for almost a year. We shall review its benefits soon and think about what more the Department can do to speed up the changeover to online recruitment. The debate introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk is therefore timely. Having read his article, which the Fabian Society is soon to publish, and having heard what he has said today, I am more than happy to ensure that the points that he has raised, many of which are extremely persuasive, are thrown into the mix when we look at what more can be done.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on making such constructive and persuasive suggestions. The speed of Government decision making does not yet match that of the fastest broadband connections, so I cannot give him an answer one way or the other yet. I agree, however, that the savings that schools could make in respect of the current high cost of advertising vacancies are worth another close look.I shall ensure that officials in my Department and my ministerial colleagues who are primarily responsible for this area of schools policy hear what he has to say.

8

NHS (Oxfordshire)

4.55 pm

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): I am grateful for the opportunity to have this debate. I welcome the Minister and other hon. Members whose timetables may have been slightly affected by the inevitable delay to the start of the debate owing to Divisions in the House. I am happy to see that the hon. Members for Banbury (Tony Baldry) and for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) are in their places. I know that they hope to catch your eye, Mrs. Dean, as does the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith). I intend to sit down at seven minutes past 5 o'clock, after 12 minutes, in order to give those hon. Members a chance to have three or four minutes among them and still leave the Minister a chance to reply.

I have given the Minister notice of the broad subjects on which I wish to speak. I have no prepared script, because the problems are obvious and not much preparation is required to address them. Oxfordshire's health economy is faced with huge cuts because of the savings that it has been asked to make. Those savings are to be made this year, not over a number of years through a financial recovery plan, which many of the units of that health economy—especially the hospitals and trusts—are undertaking. Those cuts represent about £30 million. Given the scale of the savings that must be found and the fact that the decision comes after years of cuts because of the need of many trusts to achieve financial balance through financial recovery plans, it will be impossible to meet that target without cuts to front-line patient services.

As other hon. Members representing Oxfordshire constituencies will know, this matter must be seen in the context of the history of repeated annual cuts in social services provision. The pressure on the Oxfordshire social services budget is a result of an unfair formula, the imposition of extra duties on local authorities that have not been properly funded by central Government, and a capping regime that prevents local people from voting to preserve services to the vulnerable, even at the cost of increasing an unfair tax that I would like abolished in favour of a fairer one. The matter must also be seen in the context of cuts in funding for the Supporting People programme owing to an irrational change in the funding formula. That will result in extra pressure on the health service.

The strategic health authority was told in July that it had to break even within a year without brokerage from the wider NHS. It is not possible, fair or reasonable to impose that time scale. There will need to be hundreds of whole-time equivalent job losses even to begin to meet that. The Government must step in and say that that is not what is supposed to happen in the NHS. If there must be a cuts programme, it ought to be phased, so that huge cuts are not made that result in redundancies.

The strategic health authority decided to impose the cuts on a formula that is based mainly on staff numbers. That is unfair on those specialties and services that are human-resource rich compared with the broader operating figure or turnover of a trust. That applies especially, but not exclusively, to mental health and learning disability services. There are questions as to what consultation took place with providers when the formula for allocating the cuts was set out and, indeed, on what wider consultation occurred before that decision was taken. It is one thing to have to make cuts, but another to create an arbitrary basis on which hospitals should make them when, by common consent, many of the hospitals instructed to cut budgets are not responsible—having met their financial recovery plans—for the position in which the Oxfordshire health economy finds itself. The Oxfordshire health economy is faced with an impossible situation: the Government have asked it to do things for which there has not been sufficient funding while still meeting its targets.

The Government will say one thing that I would like to address pre-emptively: more money has gone into the health service nationally. That is a fair point to make to those who voted against the tax increases that brought that extra money for the NHS, but the Minister will know that I voted consistently for the tax increases, and I am still concerned. I did not criticise the tax increases to pay for the NHS. Indeed, my party said that we should implement them before the election in 2001 and not just after it. Obviously, people who do not support tax rises to pay for the NHS have to find other ways to provide the money, but the imposition of political targets that Oxfordshire health trusts have been told to meet or they will be named and shamed or zero-starred and the managers sacked means that they have chased the targets at all costs. That may not have been the right thing to do. I think that they should treat patients at all costs, not chase targets. It is not fair that patients should suffer because of the cost of meeting the targets.

The sort of cuts that we are discussing—we do not have time in half an hour to go into them in detail and we know about only a few of them at the moment—apply already to the pain clinic beds. I gave the Minister notice of this list. I am referring to the in-patient beds to treat people suffering from chronic pain. That measure will, as I understand it, save only tens of thousands of pounds—it will not make a big dent—and the service is a specialist one for a very special group of patients who do get relief from it. A community-based service, without in-patient beds, cannot provide that service. When I was a doctor in the Oxford area, I recognised the value that other clinicians placed on it.

We have heard about the proposed closure of the Barnes unit. That is the acute psychiatric service at the John Radcliffe hospital, on which when I was a doctor in Oxford we relied in accident and emergency to deal with people whose physical problems were based on or largely due to acute mental impairment. The fact that a unit was embedded in the hospital took a big load off the emergency department. Losing that service without there being a direct replacement will put more pressure on beds elsewhere in the hospital, and patients will be treated in inappropriate beds, which is extremely unfortunate.

That situation is associated with seven consultant job losses. At a time when the NHS needs to be growing and there is a shortage of psychiatric posts, to say that there will be a loss of seven posts, even though the post holders have been saved through a merger, is a worrying sign of things to come. As I understand it, the scale of the cuts that have to be made across Oxfordshire means hundreds of redundancies. We would not often expect to find ourselves talking about a bigger NHS, as the Government tend to, and then about making doctors, who cost a fortune to train, redundant. That is not a good way to seek to recruit people into Oxfordshire.

[Dr. Evan Harris]

There are other cuts in mental health and learning disability services. Horton general hospital, in the constituency of the hon. Member for Banbury, is also affected by these provisions. The only response that there seems to have been to the general concern about the extent of the cuts is a bizarre proposal to privatise the management of the primary care trust. Will the Minister tell me about the Department of Health's role in the genesis of the idea that the solution to Oxfordshire's problems was to sack some managers in the new PCT and to outsource the management by tender, probably to a private company, which would then have the commissioning role? As we have discussed in this Chamber before, there are real problems to do with the vested interests that private companies would have in commissioning services from themselves or their commercial rivals. The proposal seems to miss the point in a big way.

There was no consultation. The notice about the proposal said that there had been consultation of key stakeholders. I do not want to give myself or other Oxfordshire Members airs, but clearly the health service in Oxfordshire does not think that Members of Parliament or the PCTs are key stakeholders. I presume that we are talking about the Department of Health. I would be interested to know, if the Department of Health was not behind the proposal—Lord Warner said in the Select Committee on Health recently that the proposal would not be imposed, because it would be a matter for the PCT—whether the Minister is happy that we have a health service that proposes something and then gets it withdrawn. At best, the situation is a mess; at worst, it is a U-turn forced by the opposition to the proposal. If we could have some explanation of what on earth was going on, and reassurance that the proposal is firmly off the table, I would be grateful.

I have a thick file of letters from concerned constituents, and I am sure that that applies to other hon. Members from Oxfordshire. Our constituents are very worried about the impact that the proposal will have on patient care.

I share with the Government the aspiration of a bigger, wider NHS that is properly funded. I do not see why Oxfordshire should be left out of that wish and why Oxfordshire patients, across the board, should be facing such cuts. If there have to be reductions, there needs to be time to plan them, but I cannot believe that it is beyond the Government to find a way of ensuring that patients and, indeed, hard-working staff, are not punished for the fact that what the NHS is being asked to do by the imposition of Government targets and, I accept, by patient need is greater than the amount of resources available.

There are particular issues in Oxfordshire such as the need to employ agency staff; it is difficult to recruit and retain staff because of high living costs. There are special factors but they are not adequately recognised in the funding formula, although generally I support a funding formula based on need. Oxfordshire has particular problems and I urge the Government to do something about that, because it is a centrally funded service—centrally funded by the Government. There is no option for local people to be able to contribute and they should not therefore be facing such cuts. I urge the Minister in her response to give some comfort to Oxfordshire patients, and to the doctors and nurses.

5.6 pm

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) for making available this opportunity, albeit brief, for other hon. Members from Oxfordshire to intervene in the debate. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister and the Government will take note of the strength of feeling on the issue in Oxfordshire, which is reflected by the fact that hon. Members from all parties are raising concerns on behalf of their constituents.

I want to make four points: first, patient care must be paramount. Secondly, the scale of the deficit in Oxfordshire this year cannot be eliminated in one year without doing unacceptable damage to patient care. It is a tragedy that we are faced with these cuts when £15 million a year extra is being put into the Oxfordshire health economy. That puzzles local people. It is their unanimous view that things cannot be straightened out in one year.

Thirdly, the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon did not mention that the region had to find £15 million extra this year for Milton Keynes. Milton Keynes has a very good case, but it has limited the ability of the strategic health authority to help with the situation that Oxfordshire faces. If the Government wanted to make some extra help available without setting a precedent nationally, which for various reasons might be difficult for them to accept, I suggest that that is a particular and very important factor that should be considered.

Fourthly, I want to highlight the putting out of primary care commissioning to private tender. An indication of delay in that respect is not good enough; it would be much better for it to be refused now, because when several trusts are grappling with financial imbalances and other difficulties, the last thing they want is that threat and uncertainty hanging over what should be the core responsibility of primary care trusts. It is a bad idea, which it would be better to bury now.

5.9 pm

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) for allowing me to intervene in the debate. I agree with almost everything that he and the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) said.

I shall say a quick word about deficits. Originally it was said that there would be a deficit in the Thames Valley strategic health authority of £35 million and in Oxfordshire of £25 million, mostly in the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS trust. I understand that at a recent meeting of the strategic health authority it was said that that figure may have come down to £15 million, but the figures £23 million and £18 million have also been bandied around. My first request, therefore, is please can Richmond House—the Department of Health—and the strategic health authority agree on the size of the deficit? That surely must be possible.

Secondly, the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS trust did not start this year with a deficit. It had a three-year recovery programme, so all the deficit is in this year because of what the Oxford Radcliffe hospitals—the John Radcliffe and the Horton—have been doing to meet the Government's waiting list targets. It has not been financial recklessness. My next request is please can we have a clear indication from Ministers whether the hospitals can have more than one year to pay off the deficit, as the right hon. Member for Oxford, East said, or will it all have to be done by the end of this financial year?

When I wrote to the Secretary of State about this matter, I was told that it is the responsibility of the strategic health authority. I have written to the chief executive of the SHA, but I have yet to receive a response. However, I understand that Sir Nigel Crisp has signalled that in-year deficits must be met by the end of this year. The Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS trust would have to find about £18 million or £15 million in this financial year. That cannot be done without crazy slash-and-burn policies. That would have a dramatic impact on both the John Radcliffe hospital and the Horton general hospital in my constituency.

I have two simple requests for the Minister. Can we agree on the deficit and can a clear signal be given to the Thames Valley strategic health authority that it is not feasible for the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS trust to save £15 million or £18 million in a single year, especially as that would come after a three-year recovery programme? There has to be a sensible proposal for how that money can be recovered over a number of years. Unless that is made clear now, we will have a disaster in the last quarter of this year. In order to make such savings, the chief executive and the board of the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS trust will have to make cuts, not because those cuts are rational but just because they are the quickest way of saving money. That will damage patient care.

5.11 pm

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): When I asked the Prime Minister about this issue this afternoon, I quoted from an excellent and closely argued editorial in The Oxford Times, which concluded that Ministers must intervene, and set out three reasons why they should do so. The right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) has four reasons why Ministers should intervene, and I have five. The Prime Minister gave me the brush-off—to use a colloquialism—but I hope that the Minister will not do so.

There are five reasons why there must be intervention. First, historically, Oxfordshire has been underfunded; we receive 85 per cent. of the national average. Secondly, as the right hon. Gentleman pointed out, £15 million has gone to Milton Keynes. That is a demonstrable case of underfunding; the money has gone there because the population of Milton Keynes has increased rapidly over the past four years, but the funding is still based on the 2001 census. Thirdly, as my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) pointed out, the John Radcliffe hospital has done such a good job in meeting its targets and cutting waiting lists that that has put a strain on finances.

My fourth reason is a more general point. Health inflation is running at about 6 per cent. The Prime Minister said that funding had increased by 6.5 per cent. Therefore, in effect, that increase is almost negligible. Finally, we have had a bureaucratic organisation imposed on us—the five primary care trusts that were imposed from the centre. That is now being scrapped, as my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury and other Members mentioned, and one PCT will be formed instead. That has imposed costs on us that are not our responsibility.

In conclusion, I simply say that I hope that the Minister will intervene.

5.13 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): I congratulate the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) on securing the debate. As he said, there is cross-party concern about the matter under discussion. I understand the points that have been made—

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

5.20 pm

On resuming—

Ms Winterton: Thank you for your indulgence, Mrs. Dean, in allowing us to carry on.

The hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon made the point that extra money has gone into the NHS. He also pointed out—I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) would agree—that the Conservative party voted against the increases that have enabled us to put it there.

As my right hon. Friend said, our aim is to improve patient care, and we have to make sure that patient care is paramount. However, it is also important to realise that good patient care and good financial management go hand in hand. As my right hon. Friend said, an extra £50 million has gone into the Oxfordshire health economy this year. The primary care trusts in the Thames valley have received an overall increase of £167 million this financial year and will receive £427 million next financial year.

We are devoting big increases in spending to the NHS. Despite that, the Oxfordshire health economy has built up a financial deficit. We need to make sure that that is sorted out; otherwise, one area in the strategic health authority will effectively carry on subsidising another, year on year—that will mean taking money from one area and putting it into another. It is therefore important that we are rigorous and firm in saying that the financial deficits need to be sorted out.

Both my right hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) asked about Milton Keynes. Milton Keynes is in a situation similar to that of Oxfordshire, and the SHA is providing financial assistance there. However, the SHA has given £10 million in financial assistance to Oxfordshire and an additional £1.5 million to support the Oxfordshire mental health trust, and that has been achieved by using surpluses generated by other organisations within Thames Valley. As I say, that situation cannot continue.

All hon. Members who spoke, particularly the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), asked about the balancing of the books for this year. The situation in Oxfordshire is fluid and can change month by month, so it is not possible at this stage to predict what any deficit may be. We never do that until we have audited accounts. However, SHAs are being expected to achieve overall balance this year. That means that they may adopt methods similar to those used previously: they may take surpluses from some areas and use them to subsidise areas with particular problems.

[Ms Winterton]

However, I reiterate that in such situations we expect the health authorities to achieve that overall balance and ensure what is best in the longer term for local people, patients and staff working in the area. I pay tribute to the staff working in Oxfordshire, who, I am sure, are doing everything they can to deliver good quality services to patients. Nevertheless, it is important for all concerned that we achieve that financial balance.

As right hon. and hon. Members know, the revenue allocations are made direct to primary care trusts, based on the relative needs of their population. A formula is used to determine each PCT's target share of available resources. There are always arguments about the relative merits of the formula, but we work extremely hard to ensure that it is fair.

I want to deal with some of the concerns about the proposed closure of services. NHS organisations have a duty to involve and consult patients, the public and their representatives in planning and development of and changes to the operation of services, and the overview and scrutiny committees also play a part when such changes are considered. Therefore, I would expect there to be good consultation.

I understand that the proposals for the closure of the acute psychiatric in-patient service at Moorview and the Barnes unit will be consulted on shortly and that the Oxfordshire Mental Healthcare NHS trust is seeking to redeploy staff in the Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire mental health services. I hope that that gives right hon. and hon. Members some reassurance. In regard to the closure of services at Henley, I also understand that Henley was a partnership between the council and the Oxfordshire learning disability trust. The council stopped funding the Chiltern Centre at Henley and, for a while, the future of the service was in doubt. However, the charitable Chiltern Centre for Disabled Children now runs the centre.

I think that all hon. Members referred to the possible out-sourcing of the management of Oxfordshire primary care trust. I shall use this opportunity to reiterate what we have already made clear. We want SHAs and PCTs to put forward proposals through "Commissioning a patient-led NHS", when it comes to the reconfiguration of PCTs. We want proper consultation on the proposals, and a model for organisational boundaries then to be determined. However, it will then be down to each PCT to propose how it will discharge its statutory functions. Only after some of the organisational changes are made will the PCTs consider how to make the changes, if they wish to do so, in running services.

Dr. Harris: I welcome that, which I recognise as the position put by Lord Warner in the Health Committee. I have two questions for the Minister. First, who is to blame for the fact that people were led to believe—it is clear in the SHA paper—that all this would happen very soon, long before the merger was complete and the PCT would decide itself? Secondly, did Ministers in the Department know at the time about the proposal, which has now been pulled, and did they say that it was unacceptable to make it so prematurely?

Ms Winterton: The Secretary of State has made it clear that the letter sent out on 28 July was not meant to indicate that the services provided by PCTs should suddenly be removed, but that we wanted proposals for organisational changes. If PCTs then wished to divest themselves of the provision of services, as opposed to the commissioning of services, they would do so only if they had fully consulted local people and felt that that was the right way forward for their local area. PCTs do not, therefore, have to divest themselves of services. I hope that that has now been made clear to all SHAs and will be reflected in the proposals that they put forward.

I shall now turn to the closure of the in-patient pain service beds at the Churchill hospital, which are part of a strategic review to look at ways of linking chronic and acute pain services and to ensure that the trust can continue to deliver high quality and integrated care, to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East referred. The trust is considering how to provide access to in-patient facilities in an alternative location within the hospital. It is following due process in line with the trust's policy on organisational change and redeployment.

I understand that the closure of an orthopaedic ward at the Nuffield orthopaedic centre is part of plans to modernise service delivery. The trust has reviewed its operation to ensure that service quality is maintained following the changes. Again, the overview and scrutiny committee has been consulted and has determined that the proposal does not constitute a substantial change to services.

It being twenty-eight minutes to Six o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 17 November 2005

[MR. EDWARD O'HARA in the Chair]

Rehabilitation of Prisoners

[Relevant documents: First Report from the Home Affairs Committee Session 2004–05 HC193-I, and the Government's response thereto, Cm 6486.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Coaker.]

2.30 pm

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): I am pleased to initiate this debate on the Select Committee's report on the rehabilitation of prisoners. I should say at the outset that the Committee's interest in the topic was stimulated by the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), who was a formidable prisons Minister in her time. She encouraged the Select Committee to take an interest in the topic but, for personal reasons, she had to leave the Committee shortly after the inquiry started. I hope that she feels that we have looked into the issues that she raised.

The report is lengthy and covers a large number of issues, so it might be helpful if I set out the main theme that I want to refer to in my opening comments. It is pleasing to see so many hon. Members here on a Thursday afternoon when there is a one-line Whip. It shows that the subject is of interest—[Interruption.] Some of my hon. Friends did not realise that there was a one-line Whip. I hope that they do not leave too soon.

The central issue in the report is that we know from many sources, including the social exclusion unit, that a released prisoner's ability to get a job, to have a home to go to and to maintain family ties is critical to the likelihood that they will not reoffend. Everyone accepts that the rate of reoffending by released prisoners is far too high. In simple terms, that means that far too much crime is committed in our communities by people who have already served a custodial sentence. We need to improve our ability to reduce reoffending.

Our report acknowledges the importance of the strands that I mentioned of work, housing and family ties—it also looks at other issues such as drug treatment—and we make recommendations on all three. I would like to acknowledge at the beginning—I will not deal with them in detail—the submissions that we have received for today's debate from Citizens Advice, Action for Prisoners' Families and the Local Government Association; they reinforce the importance of those issues.

There is important work to be done in all those areas, but the central theme of our report is how well or how badly the prison system prepares prisoners to get a job on their release. I shall concentrate most of my comments on that theme. Housing and family ties are extremely important and changes must be made; drug treatment needs to be improved; but it was on how well our prisons do in preparing people to work that we felt that the gap was largest between what is happening in our prisons today and what needs to be happening in the prison system in future.

I know that the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) shares my personal commitment to these issues. We both spoke recently at the launch of an Exodus project by South East England Development Agency which was aimed at prisoner rehabilitation. We both have an interest in the matter, but the gap between what the Committee found when going round prisons and taking evidence and the picture described in the Government's response to our report is uncomfortably wide. If this debate has one effect today, I hope that it will be to encourage her to look again at what is happening in our prisons and the way in which they are or are not preparing people for work. The Government's response does not reflect the very difficult reality that we found.

I want to make a few other background comments. Overcrowding was an issue that came up a lot during our inquiry and we describe some of the difficulties that arise from prison overcrowding. We acknowledge that the Government have put a new sentencing framework in place and we hope that if public confidence can be built up in that framework it will reduce the number of people who go to prison unnecessarily. We highlight our belief that a lot more should be done to reduce the number of people who go to prison on remand and do not ultimately serve a custodial sentence. We also highlight the large number of women going to prison for minor crimes. All those issues have an effect on prison overcrowding.

As far as we could see, on any reasonable projections prison overcrowding is with us for the foreseeable future. It is difficult to foresee in the next 10 years either the number of people sentenced falling rapidly or the number of prison places increasing quickly so that we will not be living with overcrowded prisons. A culture seems to have grown up in the Prison Service that we shall be able to deal with issues such as work when the prisons are less overcrowded. The Select Committee says that that view must be challenged. We must find ways in which to improve the ability of the prison system to help prisoners find work, even though for the foreseeable future prisons will be overcrowded.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I thought that the right hon. Gentleman would be interested in some figures. In March, when the Government wrote their response to the Select Committee, there were 75,187 prisoners. This month, the figure has increased to 77,683—a net increase of 2,496 prisoners. All the problems that existed when he investigated the system and when the Government replied in March have now increased by that amazing leap.

Mr. Denham: Fluctuations will happen from month to month. We said in the report that the Government's longer-term projection shows the prison population stabilising at about 80,000, which will be the maximum capacity of the prison system. That depends on some fairly optimistic assumptions about sentencing patterns. Even that would represent a prison system that was functionally overcrowded. The message from our report is that, unfortunately, we must assume that that will be part of the backdrop for the next five or 10 years. We must then consider what we need to do to make the system work better.

[Mr. Denham]

We acknowledge the importance of drug treatment. I hope that hon. Members will speak on that issue during the debate. We must be careful not to create a situation in which the quality of drug treatment on offer to offenders in the prison system is of lower quality than the drug treatment that is offered to those who are entering the criminal justice system for the first time. There has been a substantial investment in drug treatment in some high-crime areas. I welcome that, but it is odd to have an apparent improvement in the quality of drug treatment available to newer offenders when we are failing to deal effectively with drug treatment for those who are already in the prison system.

At least three offenders out of five reoffend within two years. The number is often more for young offenders, which has a high cost for the individuals and society. Let us consider three strands that concern work. First, what do prisoners do when they are in prison? Secondly, what links can prisoners maintain with work outside, while they are in prison? Thirdly, how can they secure jobs on their release from prison? The Select Committee asked many prisoners to complete a prison diary. We carried out that innovative research because we considered that the average information on purposeful activity that was available from the Home Office did not reflect the many individual stories that we heard from prisoners about the activities that were available to them, the amount of time that they spent locked in their cells, and so on.

The Government can reasonably say that our exercise was not entirely valid statistically, but it highlighted the fact that substantial numbers of prisoners do not have access to purposeful activity and spend much of their time not gainfully employed. A lot of activity that is described as purposeful may be necessary within a prison such as cleaning the floors, but it does not equip them to obtain a job when they are released. The averages in respect of such activity tend to blur the way in which the system is failing a substantial number of prisoners. As the Government acknowledge, that may be worse for short-term prisoners and remand prisoners, who none the less are equally likely to reoffend and whom we should not write off within the prison system. If there were weaknesses in the Select Committee's prison diaries approach, I hope that the Home Office can rectify them by making sure that it is monitoring individual prison lives and not looking only at the overall averages.

We found that little in the prison regime equipped prisoners directly with the discipline or skills that were likely to improve their employability on release. That is a somewhat harsh statement because significant improvements have been made, for example in adult basic education in prisons. We acknowledge that in the report, and it is important. There is a big gap between providing that and giving individuals the confidence and the skills to get a job on release. We found that the nature of the prison regime does little to prepare people for the world of work.

The report is called "Rehabilitation of Prisoners", but many prisoners have never been habilitated in the first place—I hope that that is not an appalling use of the English language. They have never had steady skilled jobs, brought in regular money and all the rest of it. It may be that their time in prison is one of the first opportunities to bring some discipline and work-related learning into their lives.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend is talking about the rehabilitation of offenders and the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974. In 2002, the Home Office produced a report entitled "Breaking the Circle: A report of the review of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act", which made proposals to improve the chances of those who had offended. The report's recommendations have yet to be implemented or turned to by the Government. Is that not the case?

Mr. Denham: As we say throughout our report, a number of good policy and strategy papers have been produced by the Government: by the policy unit at No. 10; by the Home Office; and by the Prison Service. If they were put together as a policy framework on paper, they would add up to a pretty good picture of what ought to be done. The difficulty is that many of them have not been fully or energetically implemented.

I remember going to one young offenders institution. There was a clear awareness among the young people we talked to about what type of skills would enable them to make an honest living when they went out. They could see the difference between those courses that enabled the boxes to be ticked and the national vocational qualifiations gained, and the sorts of skills that would enable them to get work, given that they had a criminal record. There is too little tailoring of the courses and training available to what would genuinely make prisoners employable.

More fundamentally, very few prisons offer the discipline of what the report calls a nine-to-five working day. We were impressed by what we saw at Coldingley in Surrey and by what we saw in prisons in Sweden and in Germany, which had what in the jargon is usually called "an industrial style of prison work". Such examples are very much the exception in our prison system and although there is a prisons industry strategy, which is supposedly being implemented, we found no real sense of energy, urgency or drive to put that type of widespread change in the prison regime into place.

We suggested that there could be new innovations; an agency could be set up to develop public-private partnerships for prison industries. That was given a half-hearted welcome in the Government's response; I hope that the Minister will be able to say more about the likelihood of its happening. The first core message is that unless we have a way of changing the fundamental regime in most of our prisons so that they offer a real work-like experience, it will be difficult to equip people with the disciplines and skills to find work outside.

I say in passing that we recommended that the economic potential of higher employment among people who are released from prison should be investigated. That was rejected by the Government, which is a shame. We said at the time of writing our report that it was slightly odd to be producing large numbers of unemployable people out of our prisons to be unemployed at the same time as attracting significant numbers of economic migrants from eastern European accession states or from around the world. We might win more resources for prisons if the full economic potential of making greater use of our prison population was fully taken into account.

There have been missed opportunities. I am told by people in business that 18 months ago one could make a good business case to an employer for employing ex-offenders because there was a labour shortage. Not enough was done at that time, and today people tend to say, "Well, there's a pretty large pool of people from the eastern European accession states, with skills, who can come here quite cheaply." The business case is now moving against the Government. However, even at this late stage, it would make sense for the Government to make a full economic assessment of the advantages to the British economy of ensuring higher employment rates among ex-offenders.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): The right hon. Gentleman made an important point when he outlined one of the economic benefits of training prisoners. Is there not another economic benefit, in that, according to all the evidence, prisoners are much less likely to reoffend if they find employment after leaving prison? That reduces all the costs associated with their offending.

Mr. Denham: The hon. Gentleman, who is a very constructive member of the Committee, is absolutely right; there is something about the economics of the entire system that strikes one as decidedly odd. It costs an enormous amount of money to run the prison system—the cost is well over £30,000 per individual in the system per year—yet we do not do half enough to ensure that offenders are not likely to be equally expensive when they come out because they reoffend. So, my first point is that the prison regime needs to change, not bit by bit, but starting with a fundamental rethink by the Government and a real drive to change the nature of the prison regime.

My second point is about the links between work and prisons while prisoners are serving their sentence. When we went to Germany, we saw the Tegel prison in Berlin. Committee members of all parties were impressed by the extensive system of day release for work in Berlin. It was at a level of security clearance that would not be allowed in this country. In other words, day release for work is not restricted to the category D prisoners whom we are used to going to work from our open prisons.

This is a difficult issue for Governments and Oppositions, because if a prisoner offended while out of prison, it would guarantee tabloid headlines, widespread criticism and all the rest of it. None the less, in Germany we were told that Tegel prison managed to operate the system with remarkably low offending rates by prisoners, even though those prisoners had a higher level of security risk than those whom we allow to go out of prisons. That is something that the Government should seriously explore.

One gets the impression—the Minister may be able to help us on this—that the Government have given a pretty blanket no to other than category D prisoners going to work outside prison, unless it is a prisoner on one of the new short sentences. I hope that that is not the case, because innovative thinking is necessary. Not everybody can be accommodated within ideas such as weekend prisons, which are now being piloted. Prisoners who are able to sustain a job while serving their prison sentence are much less likely to offend.

My final point is about securing employment at the end of the prison sentence. The evidence seems to be pretty clear that if prisoners know that they have a job to go to and can work towards it, they are more likely not only to go into that job but to be in that job in a year or two's time. The innovative work by National Grid Transco has demonstrated that beyond reasonable doubt. That model needs to be extended more generally.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton) (Con): I apologise to the right hon. Gentleman for not being able to stay for the rest of the debate for constituency reasons. Will he comment further on the National Grid young offender programme? If reoffending is reduced to about 7 per cent.—a massive reduction on the average for young offenders—surely the scheme could be self-funding, if it were rolled out across more than the 15 prisons that are now part of the National Grid scheme. Is the right hon. Gentleman satisfied that the Prison Service has taken that to heart? Although it responded to his report, the right hon. Gentleman's comments in that report were quite worrying to those of us who hoped that the scheme would be fully embraced by the Prison Service.

Mr. Denham: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point. I am sorry to say that I am not satisfied with where we are with National Grid Transco, despite its proven track record, despite its ability to produce some remarkably low reoffending rates—among young offenders, who have a higher recidivism rate than adult offenders—and despite being financed entirely by the private sector, to the tune of about £10,000 per prisoner. The Committee was not convinced at the time, and I have not been since, that the Prison Service has taken on what is necessary to make the model spread.

There is not, to be fair, an absence of warm words about National Grid Transco from Ministers—from the Home Secretary and everybody else—but at the moment everything is being done other than the provision of funding or listening to National Grid Transco to find out how the model could be replicated. The private sector initiative is an odyssey, developed among the business community of our country. The problems seem not just to be an absence of Government funding for the programme but a desire in the Prison Service to invent a different way of doing a similar thing, involving the learning and skills councils, Jobcentre Plus and the whole panoply of state institutions. They may work perfectly well outside prisons, with different objectives, but are less likely to be able to engage with the private sector and make sure that the Transco model works.

The model probably only works for major corporate employers, and is not so easy for small and medium-sized enterprises to adopt. A quick and fundamental reassessment of the relationship between the Prison Service and the Transco approach to employment is needed if the benefits of the scheme are not to be lost. We found no hostility in our evidence sessions. Everybody we spoke to from the Prison Service was positive about the initiative, but nothing seems to be happening. We need some central drive to make sure the model is spread.

[Mr. Denham]

I made a point earlier about the business environment becoming more unfavourable, largely because of EU expansion and the ability to attract people into jobs that could not be filled a couple of years ago. For an employer to employ an ex-offender is less obviously sound business than it was a couple of years ago. It is important that we move quickly to embed the Transco model in the rehabilitation programme in this country before the opportunity slips away.

I will not give more details about the Transco scheme. It is familiar to some Members and it is described in the report, and I suspect that others wish to speak about it this afternoon. It is perhaps symptomatic of a slightly "not-invented-here" response, which came up on a number of occasions during our inquiry when we were putting radical and innovative proposals and ideas to officials. I hope that the Minister will lend her considerable authority to an urgent review of what is happening.

In my remarks to my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), I referred to the various reports that have been produced over the years—the social exclusion unit report on reducing reoffending or, now, a national action plan on reducing reoffending. Those are not being driven through the system with great energy. Many have the right aspirations but no time scale, ill-defined resources and unclear delivery mechanisms. We will have to move faster if we are going to reduce reoffending rates.

When we were doing our report, we were in the early stages of the establishment of the National Offender Management Service, which is still working its way through the pipeline. As a Committee, we took the view that the principle behind NOMS was right—a system that starts from the assessment of the needs of the individual prisoner or offender and goes right through to rehabilitation. I would make the point that NOMS cannot easily be effective unless we are able to change the regime within the prisons and the arrangements that are available to get prisoners into work. NOMS will only be able to work with what it is given; at the moment those tools look inadequate.

David Taylor: My right hon. Friend has reached the important section of the report that deals with end-to-end sentence management. Does he not agree that until about 10 years ago probation officers expected to be closely involved in routine contact and sentence management? They would also write to, ring and visit prisoners, and that greatly helped the rehabilitation process. However, budgetary restrictions and overheads associated with the setting up of NOMS seem to be preventing them from doing that currently. Does my right hon. Friend agree that this is not a new idea, but it needs to be reintroduced with proper resourcing?

Mr. Denham: Of course, there has been a dramatic expansion in the number of probation officers over the past few years, but of course that goes with a greatly increased prison population compared with 10 years ago.

My point is that unless the people working in NOMS can get support—for example, from an expansion of the National Grid Transco scheme—so that they can direct prisoners towards jobs and be sure that they are doing them, it will be difficult for them to do what is being asked of them in respect of getting people back into work. The Committee supports the broad change of direction in the development of NOMS, but we must ensure that it has the tools to work with.

We must—this is by the bye—also remove from the system some of the sillinesses that gets in the way of delivering a coherent approach. I do not know whether it is still the case, but we were told that prisons scored half a mark on the rehabilitation target—whatever that was—for managing to get a prisoner an interview with a jobcentre. We can best do without that sort of box-ticking target that reveals nothing at all about how likely it is that the prisoner will end up getting a job; I suspect that my hon. Friend the Minister agrees with me on that. We must concentrate on measuring things that really make a difference to the life of the individual prisoner.

Work is central to the prison regime, and to achieving its objectives. I do not wish in any way to diminish issues to do with drug treatment, housing, family contact and so forth, but if we do not get the work strand right, it will be difficult to deliver on other things. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to look again at what is happening. Is the pace of change fast enough? Is there sufficient focus in the prison system on this critical issue?

Lynne Featherstone (Hornsey and Wood Green) (LD): A Basic Skills Agency report found that up to 80 per cent. of prisoners were functionally illiterate. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that that is also a main contributor, and that it needs to be dealt with even in advance of the work strand?

Mr. Denham: That is an interesting point. Functional illiteracy among the prison population is a major issue; it is one of the indicators of likelihood of offending. We acknowledge that the Prison Service has made great strides in the past few years in terms of adult basic education and skills. About 10 per cent. of all adult basic education qualifications are achieved in prison; that is significant.

The difficulty is that, if we look at this matter from the point of view of the individual, making somebody functionally literate may be a necessary step towards enabling them to get a job, but it is a long way from getting them into a job. Gaps appear to open up in the process when we look at the career of an individual offender and ask, "What happens next?" The way the system is managed, the Prison Service can tick its box and say, "We've got this prisoner to the level of adult basic skills that is necessary," but the next bit might not happen. That process probably creates a slightly more literate reoffender, rather than somebody who will go on to get a job.

The important thing is to join up the system. We should not move away from the focus on adult basic education as a starting block, but neither should we limit the system so that when people get to that educational level there is no further progression in respect of real work-related skills. Adult basic skills are an essential element of this system, but perhaps the system is not quite right at present because the focus has been almost exclusively on it, rather than on the things that need to follow on from it.

I have spoken for longer than I intended. I hope that I have set the scene in terms of some of the main themes in our report.

2.59 pm

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): I am delighted that we have this opportunity to debate the report. It is an important report, and I support all its conclusions, and the gist of what its Chairman, the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), has been saying.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned the impetus that my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) gave to the Committee in terms of this report. When she was Prisons Minister, she was renowned for the number of prisons she visited, and I am sure that the present Minister is also no slouch when it comes to visiting prisons. Given the number of prisons that the Committee visited in the course of producing this report, I like to think that we have done justice to the impetus that my right hon. Friend has given us. I pay tribute to the energy, commitment and hard work that the Chairman has put into the report and the work behind it, which I am sure hon. Members will have been impressed with today.

As an Opposition spokesman, I had occasion to visit prisons, and before that I frequently visited them in a professional capacity. Every time I went into a prison I was impressed when I saw prisoners engaged in what is termed "purposeful activity". Unfortunately, that was often not enough. By the same token, I never failed to be anything but depressed when I saw, as I did all too often, prisoners either hanging around on wings or locked up in their cells. One of the most frequent causes of complaint to me from prisoners was the inordinate length of time that they spent banged up in their cells. I believe that there have been improvements in that regard, but much more needs to be done.

It seems to me that time spent either hanging around on prison wings or simply locked up in cells is unlikely to have much rehabilitative effect. I, and I think most members of the public, would prefer to see prisoners who have to be in prison doing something constructive that will give them a better chance of staying out of trouble in the future. I am sure that all forms of rehabilitative activity have their place, including addressing offending behaviour, but the strongest and most useful form is working.

As I suggested to the right hon. Member, there is a good deal of evidence to show that prisoners who work in prison and go into work as soon as they leave prison are much less likely to get into more trouble. There are no panaceas for reoffending, because in many cases prisoners have led disordered lives, have come from unfortunate home circumstances or have personality problems or other cause of their offending. However, if they get into the habit of work while they are in prison, the chances of their staying out of trouble once they come out are much increased.

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): The hon. Gentleman may not know that Latchmere resettlement prison, which is in my constituency, has a very low reoffending rate of about 25 per cent., even though the prisoners are mostly long-term servers and have therefore committed some of the most serious crimes. The last year or 18 months at Latchmere is used to get them not only into work but into work in the community where they will be living. That enables them to take on financial responsibility for their families ahead of rejoining them, and thus to reintegrate into the family circle.

There are only 207 places at Latchmere, the largest of the three resettlement prisons. Does the hon. Gentleman believe that, combined with his other proposals, the expansion of resettlement prisons of this kind could make a real difference to reoffending rates?

Mr. Clappison: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for that contribution. We could not visit all the prisons and we did not visit Latchmere, but it sounds as though it is doing important work. It certainly supports the Committee's view on this issue. I am sure that what the hon. Lady said is right. I believe that the Home Office has evidence from research done a few years ago into the value of employment on release which shows that it reduces the risk of reoffending by between a third and a half, which I think is better than any other form of rehabilitative activity.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Perhaps I may introduce chapter 12 of the report, which is about women in prisons. Stroud is next door to the constituency of the hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb), who has Eastwood Park prison in his constituency, which has had some difficulties over the years. When I have been there, I have realised that a particular issue about women in prison is how often they are moved around the system. Sometimes that adds to the problem of never being able to go home; such women may have been living with a violent partner, so they may have to be thinking of starting another life.

I agree entirely with what the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) says about needing to prepare people for when they leave prison, through work and work-related activities. However, that is particularly difficult for women, who, as they are moved around the system, do not know exactly where they are likely to be released. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the Government have to pay really close attention to that, because such women are the most vulnerable?

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Gentleman makes a valuable point about women and work. Moving women around the system is undesirable also because it tends to break up the contact between the woman, her home and any children involved. I was going to mention later, but shall mention now, that the Committee has suggested that the Government should set a target for reducing the number of women prisoners. I do not know whether that is seen as radical or not.

[Mr. Clappison]

As the hon. Gentleman will know—he takes an interest in these matters—the number of women prisoners has gone up by more than the proportion of prisoners as a whole. That is somewhat surprising, given that women, as we all know, are much less likely to commit violent or sexual offences and are probably much less threatening offenders. The increase has never been properly explained, but if we all put our minds to it we could find a way of reducing the number of women in prisons or help them by putting them in prisons nearer their homes. We could also look into the question, which will come about through intermittent custody, of women spending only part of their time in custody and being able to keep in touch with their families more.

Mrs. Gillan: Given the work that he has done on the Select Committee, does my hon. Friend agree that when women are put in prison, there is a disproportionate effect on their families?

Mr. Clappison: Absolutely.

Mrs. Gillan: Often, the children have to be taken into care and that starts the cycle again. It is therefore imperative either to try to keep women in the community so that their families can remain intact, or at least to arrange things so that there is a continuation of family care, so that we do not put a new generation at risk or risk the family being totally broken by the time the woman comes out of custody.

Mr. Clappison: I am absolutely delighted that my hon. Friend, who serves on the Opposition Front Bench, is putting forward what are undoubtedly very important public policy reasons for trying to deal with women in a different way, as far as is possible. Those are important points, and my hon. Friend made them extremely well.

Mr. Nick Hurd (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend, the Chairman and other members of the Select Committee on focusing on this important issue and the way in which they have done so.

I want to discuss transfers, a problem that is not restricted to women. If I read the report correctly, a recurring concern of the Committee is the rather ad hoc and premature process of transfers. If I read the Government's response correctly, they do not recognise that as a major problem. Is my reading accurate and is my hon. Friend satisfied with the Government's response?

Mr. Clappison: My hon. Friend makes an important point; he has an important interest in this issue because of his background. He is absolutely right. The Government's response was depressing on that issue. However, I should be fair to them. My hon. Friend may not be aware—it was not part of our report—that the Home Secretary came before our Committee last month. I put to him that very point about the high and increasing volume of transfers, which shuttle prisoners around the system and disrupt their chances of getting any education or worthwhile work activity. To be fair to the Home Secretary, he was far more responsive to the Committee than were the somewhat defensive remarks in the Government's response to the report.

I am not making a partisan point, but it is fair to say that the Government's response to the report was a little too defensive on a number of issues. Other things that the Government have been doing and saying have been slightly more encouraging.

To come back to my main point about work, if one baldly asked the question, "Are we doing enough to provide work for prisoners in prisons?", the answer would have to be, "No, we could all do much more." I agree with the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen that we need a greater sense of urgency from the Government and more practical results. I do not doubt that they have good intentions, but they need to be translated into results.

Our report makes uncomfortable reading as far as purposeful activity is concerned. In paragraph 37, we said:

> "disturbingly high proportions of prisoners are engaged in little or no purposeful activity."

In paragraph 28, we noted that the Prison Service admits that it is has met its key performance indicator only

> "once in the last eight years."

I should add that the key performance indicator for purposeful activity is hardly one that sets the world alight. For all the forms of purposeful activity—which total about 30, including work, education, washing the floor and all the rest of it—the Government set a total of 24 hours a week for prisoners. That has been met only once in the last eight years. I suggest to the Minister with all due respect that the solution is surely not to abandon the key performance indicator.

The report also says that

> "it is difficult to avoid the suspicion that the KPI has been dropped to avoid embarrassment arising from the Prison Service's continuing failure to meet the target."

I know that the Government's response rejected our comments on that. However, when a target is not met the solution is surely not simply to get rid of the target and then choose other targets which people think might be met; surely it is to make more effort to reach the target.

The Government have good intentions, and I give them credit for taking an interest in the subject, but we need a commitment to carry those good intentions through. What the Committee said, and what the Chairman of the Committee said in his opening remarks, is also supported by the conclusions of the prison industries review and the prison diaries, to which he referred and which is a worthwhile experiment. The prison industries review, instituted by the Government, supports the conclusions that we reached.

I can do no better than to quote paragraphs 153 of our report, which said:

> "We agree with the Prison Industries Review that it is 'indefensible' that the Prison Service cannot find enough work or purposeful activity for prisoners. There continues to be an unacceptable disparity in the provision of work opportunities for prisoners across the prison estate. Whilst a maximum of just over 30% of prisoners may be involved in some form of prison work activity, only a third of those have been placed in prison workshops, the type of work activity which most closely reflects 'real working life'."

We go on to suggest that all this shows that involving prisoners in work schemes has not been given sufficient priority.

Drawing on what we say in the report, what the prison industries review said and what the prison diaries also revealed about the lack of sufficiently serious work, I emphasise three points. They are implicit in our report. First, I believe that work in prison should resemble as closely as possible work outside prison. That is why it is so important that more prison workshops are up and running and that more of the work is in workshops where prisoners receive training rather than do functional activities concerned with prison life itself, such as mopping floors.

I do not shy away from the question of paying prisoners an appropriate rate for their work. That could be of benefit to everyone. It might enable some prisoners to pay compensation to their victims. If it gets the prisoners into the idea that they can earn money honestly as opposed to dishonestly, that can only be a good thing for the future. It is interesting that in the comment that I have seen on our report in the press and elsewhere there was not the reaction that some people might have thought. The public would accept that paying prisoners and getting them into the idea of making an honest living is a good thing, which in the long run could save a lot of money.

Secondly, I believe that work in prison should, as far as possible, include the training of prisoners in appropriate skills; that is self-evident. Thirdly—this point has already been made by the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen and the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer)—work should be linked wherever possible to employment outside prison.

I echo the remarks that the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen made about the Transco approach; the whole Committee was impressed by that. I believe that the Prison Service's "custody to work" initiative deserves support. I praise the Government for setting it up, but I hope that they will follow it through and support that approach. I draw some encouragement from what the Home Secretary said when he appeared before the Committee, but he and the Government will be judged on what flows from the report, on the progress made in establishing more work in prisons, on giving prisoners training and on linking all that, as far as possible, to prisoner employment on release.

Again, I make common cause with the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen. I do not shy away from more day release if it is necessary to get prisoners into jobs at the end of their sentence. I do not believe that that is a soft option, and I certainly agree with the right hon. Gentleman about trying to implement such schemes as much as possible, and not finding obstacles to put in the way.

We visited a prison in Germany that ran an extensive day release work programme. More than 70 per cent. of prisoners on the scheme who went through the training in prison, some of whom went on to day release, continued to work for their employer when they were released from prison.

So, there are strong public policy reasons for supporting the scheme. There is a great deal to be gained. I do not think that giving prisoners work in prison is a soft option. I do not think that it is a soft option to reward prisoners, or let them out of prison so that they get used to work. There could be a great deal to be gained from that. One has to be realistic; such schemes will not solve all reoffending. However, they are by far the best way of reducing the reoffending rate and the best way of giving some prisoners a second chance, particularly the younger prisoners. There are great benefits for us all. I certainly impress on the Minister the gist of what the Chairman of the Committee said.

The Government need to have a sense of urgency about the issue. They need determination to translate their intentions into results. We need workshops in prisons and we need prisoners to work. We will wait to judge the Government on that, but there needs to be real commitment. The test for the Government will be whether they can translate their intentions into practical consequences, whether they can sweep away the obstacles to getting prisoners into work and whether giving prisoners training gets the priority that most right-thinking members of the public would say that it deserves.

3.18 pm

Mrs. Janet Dean (Burton) (Lab): I am pleased that we have this opportunity to debate the report on the rehabilitation of prisoners, and I, too, commend my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), the Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee, for his hard work in conducting the inquiry.

Recommendation 122 of the report summarised the changes needed to improve the prospects for rehabilitating prisoners. In order of priority, they are:

> "(i) a major drive to provide work and work-like regimes and training within prisons;
>
> (ii) an extension of this provision and other rehabilitative interventions to short-term and remand prisoners;
>
> (iii) significant improvements to drug and alcohol treatment;
>
> (iv) independent inspection of mental health provision; and
>
> (v) specific provision to address the needs of minority and vulnerable groups."

One of the main conclusions of the Committee is that the overcrowding in our prison system has a hugely damaging impact on the delivery of rehabilitative regimes across the prison estate. Overcrowding means that it is less likely that prisoners will be held in prisons close to their home, and that will restrict contact with family and friends, as well as making it harder to have a coherent pre-release strategy.

Overcrowding means that it is less likely that prisoners will be engaged in purposeful activity, as other hon. Members have mentioned. The Government acknowledged in their response to the report that the Prison Service has regularly missed the target for purposeful activity in recent years. Overcrowding also produces a so-called churn in the system, whereby prisoners are moved at short notice to other establishments, thereby interrupting the work that has been done with those prisoners. Having said that, I agree with my right hon. Friend that we can consider how to improve matters in spite of overcrowding.

[Mrs. Janet Dean]

Conclusion 5 of our report says:

> "We are critical of the management of transfers of prisoners across the prison estate which appears to be more ad hoc and pragmatic than strategic in design. The very high levels of transfers have a direct and significant negative impact on rehabilitation measures, both through disruption caused to intervention programmes and failure to provide prisoners with the particular interventions they need, as identified through assessment and sentence planning."

We were impressed by the way in which transfers take place in Germany. Where the prison system is based on the federal system, prisoners are transferred back to their home region when they are convicted. It brings all the advantages that would benefit the rehabilitation of prisoners in this country, such as reducing transfers during sentence, allowing prisoners to retain links with families and enabling sentence and rehabilitation planning, including settlement on release.

The Committee's report stressed the need for real work opportunities in prisons, as others have mentioned. In conclusion 29, we stated:

> "We endorse the conclusion of the Prison Industries Review that:
>
> 'Industrial workshops are one of the best means, within prison walls, to reflect real working life. A proportion of the prison population will never have been exposed to real work before, and this may be their first opportunity to gain some transferable employment skills. In order to advance the resettlement agenda prison work needs to be targeted at those who are least likely to want to work. These individuals should be allocated for work, particularly on work initially that requires little training. They should not be ignored if they are difficult, or lack motivation. They should be the target audience of industries, and will benefit most from prison work. They have the potential for most return in terms of reduced re-offending on release.'"

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen said, we were impressed by what we saw on our visits to Her Majesty's prison Coldingley, where prisoners can obtain transferable qualifications and skills and gain experience in a real working environment. I was pleased to read in the Government's response to the Committee's report that the prison has now adapted its regime to allow part-time working, with time given to other rehabilitative activities, including education. The report recommends that the Coldingley system be used as a model for other prisons, as well as expanded to cover prisoners who are reluctant to take on prison work.

Members of the Committee were impressed also by the collaboration with private companies such as Transco, bringing skills training into prisons and young offenders' institutions. The scheme not only makes the rehabilitation of those serving custodial sentences more possible, but it can address the skills shortage in many places.

Besides the development of more work opportunities, the Committee also felt that there should be pilot schemes that pay prisoners more realistic wages. The schemes should not make the prisoners better off while in prison, but give them the experience of paying tax and living costs, and thus better prepare them for life outside prison. More realistic wage levels could help to address the concerns of some private businesses that prisons can undercut the prices at which businesses produce goods.

One major cause of criminal activity is drug addiction, and I am pleased that the amount of Government money made available to offer treatment to those in our communities who wish to get off drugs has increased dramatically in recent years. However, the majority of prisoners have drug and alcohol problems, and they should be addressed. That applies to short-term prisoners as well as those serving long sentences.

In conclusion 75, the Committee stated:

> "We recommend that every prisoner should receive health care screening, including mandatory drug testing, on admission to prison".

Although the Government did not accept mandatory drug tests for all prisoners, their response to the Committee's report provided the reassurance that screening procedures on admission shall identify drug misusers. I welcome that, and I am also pleased by the Government's statement that following a pilot in 2004, a drug rehabilitation programme for short-term prisoners specifically is being introduced.

Progress is being made. The OASys model enables better information about prisoners to be transferred with them between establishments and when they leave prison. Will the Minister confirm whether the roll-out of connectivity between the Prison Service and the probation service is now complete?

One of my main concerns, which is highlighted in the Committee's report, is the increase in the number of women prisoners and the even greater isolation they can have from their families. Although it is true that only 6.1 per cent. of the prison population are women, the annual average number of women prisoners has increased by a massive 173 per cent. since 1992, compared with a 50 per cent. increase in the number of male prisoners during that period. In the 10 years from 1994, the average number of women in prison in England and Wales rose from 1,811 to 4,487. Most of the women prisoners are mothers and primary carers, so many children are affected by the absence of their mother. More than 30 per cent. of women prisoners have suffered sexual abuse.

The majority of women prisoners are in prison for non-violent offences and are therefore not a danger to others.

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Lady touches on a point that is close to my heart. Does she agree that it is worrying that about a third of women prisoners lose their homes and possessions? When they come out of prison, they have no home to go to and their possessions have usually been disposed of.

Mrs. Dean: Yes, I would agree with that. Isolation and imprisonment for women causes more problems because most of them have primary caring responsibilities. They might be escaping abuse in their home, and if they come out and find that they have no home and that their children have been taken into care, it is even more difficult for them to get back on their feet.

We must look at better ways of punishing women than just locking them up. We need to consider more effective community punishments for women and men; we cannot keep on building prisons. Intermittent custody offers the greatest benefit to women prisoners because it enables them to continue to mother their children. However, they have the greatest problem in accessing such an option because there are fewer women's prisons and a relative sparsity of offenders. Many women would have to travel long distances to reach their place of custody.

The answer may be to provide small local units or it may be to restrict the number of women given custodial sentences, which is what the Committee suggested. I hope that a new sentencing regime will provide more opportunity for community sentences.

Mr. Hurd: The report acknowledged that there is a public relations challenge in getting across to the public that community sentences are not a soft option. Does the hon. Lady feel that the Government have taken that on board, and did the Committee come up with any constructive ideas on how that message could be put across?

Mrs. Dean: I think that the hon. Gentleman has been reading my notes because I was just about to say that we need to ensure that the general public are made aware of the benefits that community sentences can bring. The hon. Gentleman will note that conclusion 11 states:

> "To ensure confidence in the new sentencing regime, there must be public education about the new sentencing measures, and publicity about actual sentences imposed, to demonstrate that they are robust and legitimate alternatives to prison in terms of punishment, public protection and rehabilitation."

In that respect, I commend the work of SmartJustice, a representative of which I met the other day. SmartJustice is a five-year campaign supported by the Network for Social Change and run under the auspices of the Prison Reform Trust. It is involved in increasing public awareness of alternatives to custody and working with the popular press to take a less punitive and more rational approach to crime. It gives talks on crime and punishment throughout the country to a wide variety of groups, including community and civic groups, such as rotary clubs, faith groups and schools.

SmartJustice for Women is a targeted campaign that was launched at Holloway prison on 27 July. I believe that the Minister was present on that occasion. SmartJustice says that it is involving women's groups in the campaign, including Soroptimist, the townswomen's guilds, the National Federation of Women's Institutes, the Mothers Union, Maternity Alliance and the National Council of Women. I hope that those involved will be instrumental in raising public awareness of the alternatives to prison. I hope also that, through better sentencing and rehabilitation of prisoners, more treatment for drugs, improved education and, in the long term, through tackling the root causes through early education and tackling deprivation, we can at least stabilise the prison population.

3.31 pm

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The hon. Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean), my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) and the other members of the Home Affairs Committee, under the chairmanship of the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), have done the House a considerable service with their report on the "Rehabilitation of Prisoners". It must make a welcome change for them—a release—from having to carry out pre-legislative scrutiny on yet another asylum and immigration Bill or yet another criminal justice Bill. That seems to be their normal diet.

I take an interest in this subject partly because I practised as a barrister for a number of years and represented a number of people who then went to prison and partly because the first non-governmental organisation that I ever subscribed to was the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders, but most importantly, in the context of this debate, because I have Bullingdon prison in my constituency. I want to comment on Bullingdon in more detail later.

We must recognise that the punishment element of prison is the loss of one's freedom. The punishment is going to prison. Prison itself should not be a further punishment. The punishment should be the removal of freedom. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere said that quite often, if prisoners are given good treatment, we have to deal with the type of knee-jerk reaction found in the Daily Mail or The Sun. However, we have moved on from Victorian times. We are now in the 21st century and we need to trumpet clearly the message that the punishment is the removal of freedom.

We must also recognise that the average stay of most people who go to prison is 23 months. Although they may be taken out of the community for a period of time, it is not necessarily that long. At present, we have a vicious circle of overcrowding and transfers in the prison system that make it much more difficult to help to rehabilitate offenders and, as a consequence, too many of those in prison reoffend once they leave.

We have not yet heard much mention of the recent report by the social exclusion unit, but I think that it shows that more than half—some 58 per cent.—of all prisoners are convicted of another crime within two years of release. Tragically, that figure is as high as 72 per cent. in the case of young men aged between 18 and 20. Those figures are tragic for us as a community. They mean that, clearly, prison is not succeeding in rehabilitating people.

The social exclusion unit made several recommendations, particularly with regard to helping ex-prisoners to find jobs. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere said, getting a job on release reduces the risk of reoffending by between one third and a half. Most of the recommendations from the social exclusion unit have not been implemented. We need to hear much more clearly from the Government what strategies they have for reducing overcrowding and reducing the need to transfer prisoners constantly between prisons in the system, and what more they are going to do to help to ensure the working of rehabilitation programmes in prison.

Paul Boateng is now the high commissioner to Pretoria, but when he was Minister of State at the Home Office, he said, in a Prison Service briefing in June 2000:

> "Too often I hear of good projects in one prison rejected by another; of inconsistency of funding and a lack of coordination . . . I want to see some strategic developments".

We would be interested to hear from the Government what the strategic developments are.

[Tony Baldry]

The prison population is now at a record high, at somewhere near 77,000. It has grown by more than half in the past decade, and numbers are rising by an average of 250 prisoners a week. The Select Committee states in its report that "it is clear that overcrowding is having a hugely damaging impact on the delivery of rehabilitative regimes across the prison estate, both in terms of quality and quantity of appropriate interventions."

It goes on:

"We are critical of the management of transfers of prisoners across the prison estate which appears to be more ad hoc and pragmatic than strategic in design. The very high levels of transfers have a direct and significant negative impact on rehabilitation measures, both through disruption caused to intervention programmes and failure to provide prisoners with the particular interventions they need, as identified through assessment and sentence planning."

There seems to be a vicious circle of overcrowding, which leads to transfers, among other things. The combination of overcrowding and transfers makes it difficult to rehabilitate prisoners, which means that prisoners leave prison not having benefited from the experience very much, and that leads to high reoffending rates. That is crazy, and something needs to be done about it. I shall make a few suggestions.

I am sure that most colleagues will think that my first suggestion is reactionary, so I shall start with that one and come on to the more liberal ones shortly. There are many foreign nationals in our prisons—some 10 per cent. of the prison population—and I suspect that that is a consequence of an increase in drug trafficking, more people involved in drug offences and so on. However, there is no justification for keeping overseas nationals in our prisons. When they finish their sentences, the burden should be on them to demonstrate to the courts why they should not automatically be deported to the country from which they came.

Mrs. Gillan: My hon. Friend might be interested to know that foreign nationals make up more than 10 per cent. of the prison population. At the end of March, when there were 9,194 foreign nationals in prison, the figure was 12 per cent. The Home Office does not have a grip on the situation: at any one time, there are some 1,200 people in prison for whom it has not been possible to ascertain a nationality, so the figure is even larger than the one he quoted.

Tony Baldry: Whether the figure is 10, 11 or 12 per cent., it is a significant percentage. We should make it clear that the burden will be on overseas nationals who have committed offences to convince the courts that they should not automatically be deported to the country of their citizenship at the end of their sentence. Then, if they are inclined to reoffend, they are less likely to reoffend in the United Kingdom. It is as simple as that. Any foreign national who breaks the law in this country such that it merits their going to prison forfeits their right to remain in the country.

Much good work is being done with the rest of the prison population.

Mr. Denham: I have a genuine query. Although I chaired the Committee, I may have misunderstood the report. My understanding is that those who are sentenced to more than two years generally are deported at the end of their sentence, and that the problem with those who are sentenced for less than two years is that the courts rather than politicians have judged, on the basis of various international conventions, that that is not a sufficiently serious sentence to deport. I may be wrong about the law on that, but perhaps the obstacle is the court's interpretation, not of the convention on human rights but of other international conventions.

Tony Baldry: The right hon. Gentleman reinforces my position. At present, the courts decide whether a person should be deported, and the sentencing practice of judges in such cases varies greatly from Crown court to Crown court. We should change the position, by statute if need be, so that there is a presumption that any foreign national whose offences in this country merit a prison sentence should be deported at the conclusion of that prison sentence.

Bullingdon prison is in my constituency. It is a sizeable local prison for men and one reason why I wanted to take part in this debate is that I do not think that those who work in the Prison Service have their achievements trumpeted often enough. Being a prison officer or prison governor must be a tough job. Prison staff work with people who, by definition, do not want to be where they are. They must often deal with people who are vulnerable and who have a history of personality difficulties. Treating them with dignity and firmness must often be testing, particularly if prisons are overcrowded.

Bullingdon prison makes every effort to try to help people to prepare themselves for the world outside. For example, it involves the St. Giles Trust, which has a contract to provide accommodation advice to prisoners. Interestingly, much of that advice is given by prisoners who have been trained to NVQ level 3 by the trust. It does its best to provide education and work opportunities. As Sue Saunders, the governor of Bullingdon prison, explained:

"Education is pivotal to prisoner resettlement and is provided throughout the"

prison

"both in the classroom and workplace. Through working closely with Milton Keynes College, we fulfil a provision for Basic and Key Skills and Wider Key Skills in the workplace. In addition Vocational Training is provided within all industrial areas across the prison. That currently equates to over 60 qualifications in a wide spectrum of subjects and areas of work. Where self-study in cells is identified as the most appropriate way for the individual to learn, the education contractor offers peripatetic learning where tutors support the student. In addition to this all prisoners have a minimum access of 20 minutes per week to the library.

Having moved away from providing 'traditional' prison work, we are now focusing on providing qualifications to prisoners within our workshops. An example of this is the relocation of the Industrial Cleaning Workshop into the main prison, giving the workers a real life environment by providing cleaning services across the prison. This has been recognised by the Adult Learning Inspectorate who stated that this training provided real work experience in a way that would not normally be seen in a prison environment. In addition we also deliver in excess of 500 qualifications in this area.

> In conjunction with colleagues from the Probation Service we now provide an access to work course: Transit. The aim of the course is to offer prisoners who are able and willing to find work, extra support and guidance to help them achieve their goals. This includes helping prisoners to understand the process of applying for work, writing CV's and completing application forms as well as helping with interview skills.'"

The prison has

> "secured the services of Job Centre Plus for three days a week, offering advice and guidance on employment issues as well as a job brokering service."

Sue Saunders continued:

> "On 4th October, Bullingdon held its second Job Fair. 12 Potential employers and over 150 prisoners who are approaching release attended this and the feedback from all . . . was very positive."

As a consequence, a third job fair is planned for early next year.

Bullingdon prison also runs a two-week debt management course every eight weeks that covers income and expenditure budgeting, how to read statements and payslips correctly, and the importance of saving and planning finances. Trading standards at Oxford county council runs a bespoke money management course at Bullingdon consisting of four two-hour sessions each on budgeting, banking, accounts and borrowing.

That all seems excellent and well in support of what the Prison Service now has as part of its motto: unlocking potential and releasing success. It was not, therefore, surprising to me that Martin Narey, the chief executive of the National Offender Management Service, gave Bullingdon prison a glowing reference in his report, in which he said:

> "There is some innovative and significant work taking place for the remand population. Rather than allowing remands to be marginalised—frequently inevitable in many"

local prisons—

> "Bullingdon is giving some of them an opportunity to sort their lives out."

Martin Narey thought that the multi-skills workshop at Bullingdon was "first class" and commented that it was

> "unusual to meet so many prisoners so enthusiastic about the training they were receiving and the quality of work was extremely high. A significant number of prisoners have made very impressive progress to NVQ level 2 and 3 qualifications in printing and related skills. Significantly, a number of them had achieved category D status, but were very keen to stay at Bullingdon to continue their training."

What he says after that, however, is the sting in the tail that causes me concern:

> "Regrettably, prison population pressures mean that it is unlikely that we will be able to keep them at Bullingdon. This is tragic. Bullingdon are developing offender management on the lines of the national offender management model and are well placed to operate successfully in a commissioning environment. And not for the first time, I thought the work being done by RAPT to arrest drug abuse, was outstanding."

It is sad that the work of a local prison where, by every standard, the governor and the prison staff are doing excellent work in terms of advice on housing, rehabilitative training and getting people back into the world of work within the available resources is undermined by a combination of overcrowding and prisoners being all too frequently moved around the prison system. That is genuinely tragic.

Martin Narey concluded his report with comments, which should be trumpeted, about the governor and staff at Bullingdon prison, praising

> "the consistent enthusiasm of every member of staff I met and the frequent evidence of prisoners being treated with dignity."

I have a footnote on that. I frequently find myself to the left of the Labour party, which is an increasingly uncomfortable position. Martin Narey argued two years ago for Bullingdon to remain in the public sector, and it has. I believe that prisons should be in the public sector, for this reason: my experiences with the proposed accommodation for asylum seekers at Bicester was searing, for whenever I sought information from the Home Office about what was being proposed, I was told that it was commercial in confidence. I emphasise that, because last time I said it, the Hansard reporter recorded it as "commercial incompetence".

One of the institutions that should be most transparent in its activity and delivery in our society is a prison. We should know what is happening in prisons in terms of the inputs and their outcomes. I have yet to be persuaded that handing institutions such as prisons over to Group 4 Securicor enhances the rehabilitative process of Her Majesty's prisons. However, that is just a parenthesis. There is no necessary consequence that private is good and public is bad. I believe that those who work in the public sector in prisons do a good job.

The thrust of my submission to the House this afternoon is simple. The best way to get the prison population down is to stop reoffending. If those in prison ceased to reoffend, our prison population would drop considerably. If consistent efforts were made at rehabilitation and ensuring that those who left prison had a better chance of accommodation, employment and life skills, the likelihood of their reoffending would drop and thus the probability of our prison system being overcrowded would be reduced.

Although Ministers do not have it entirely in their gift to control the total prison population, the Prison Service could certainly make greater efforts to ensure that people, whether men or women, do not spend the whole of their prison experience being shunted around from one prison to another. Each prisoner should be treated as an individual. The Home Office and the Prison Service should take pride in ensuring that people leave prisons with the best possible skills and qualifications in order to tackle the rest of their lives crime free and in society with the rest of us.

3.51 pm

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): I congratulate the Select Committee on its excellent and timely report. I thank my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) for securing the debate. I am interested in the subject because I have a community prison, a high-security prison, a women's prison and a youth offending centre in my constituency.

Does my hon. Friend the Minister concur with the sentiments about women prisoners outlined in paragraph 297 of the report? It says that the > "majority of women in prison are in prison for non-violent offences and have never been a danger to the public."

[Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods]

In paragraph 308, the Select Committee suggests that offending behaviour programmes need to be adapted to meet the specific needs of women prisoners and, in particular, to take note of their life experiences and the fact that many of them are victims of abuse, and that that can be a long-term problem.

Such comments are echoed by the governor of the women's prison in my constituency. She has explored with me ways in which the Government can deal not only with the mental health problems that many women prisoners experience, but how their self-esteem can be improved. She argues that, unless women's self-esteem is improved and they are more independent when they leave prison, they are likely to reoffend. The governor expressed concern about the lack of emphasis that is placed on women in prison to prepare them for work. Too often, programmes focus on developing basic skills. Some women will need that training, but insufficient emphasis is placed on their being prepared for work outside prison or on linking any of the schemes within prison to outside employers.

I draw attention to the work of SmartJustice. In my constituency, it has been working with the prison as well as it can to implement the new sentencing regime, so that community sentences are considered more appropriate for women. Hon. Members have said that prison is an inappropriate punishment for women, particularly when they are not a danger to anyone except themselves. When their children have to be taken into care, that has enormous ramifications for their family and wider society. I should appreciate the Minister explaining how the Government will carry out the Select Committee's recommendation of setting a target to reduce the number of women in prison.

I wish to make a few comments about education. It is clear from visiting prisons in my constituency that the Government are putting additional resources into prison education. That has been particularly successful in the teaching of basic skills. However, we have some way to go in terms of making vocational education in prison work, and particularly in ensuring that it leads to a job outside prison. Several Members have commented on the Transco scheme, and I would like the Minister to say whether that will be rolled out across the country. It seems to be particularly successful in reducing reoffending rates. It is also important in that it connects prisoners to work and to work environments when they are in prison.

We have all read reports that show that although prisons can train prisoners and give them qualifications, including vocational qualifications, that will not necessarily lead to them getting a job outside prison. I would like the Minister to comment on how vocational education will be monitored, especially in terms of the extent to which it reduces reoffending and leads to prisoners finding meaningful work.

3.56 pm

Mr. Nick Hurd (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): I did not serve on the Committee, I have no prison in my constituency and, as will become painfully obvious, I do not know a great deal about this subject, but I am drawn to it by the simple statistic that three in five prisoners reoffend within two years. That starkly highlights that the problem we are discussing represents a great waste of both money and lives. I congratulate the Committee on throwing a spotlight on this important issue.

I listened closely to the opening remarks of the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), and it seems to me that there is a major cultural problem within the Prison Service that needs to be tackled. I noted that there were comments throughout the report—more in regret than anger—that the Government might not attach great enough priority to that issue; in particular, there was concern about the dropping or reclassifying of targets, such as public service agreement target 5.

One of the keys to making progress on rehabilitation is getting to know our prison populations better. Information technology has an important role to play in that. I read with interest about the OASys programme, and I look forward to the Minister's comments on the process of connectivity in that respect, not least because I suspect that I am not the only Member present who has concerns about the track record of the Government in implementing and co-ordinating IT programmes, particularly through the Home Office.

I was shocked by the statistics on drugs. Regardless of whether 55 per cent. or 80 per cent. of prisoners enter prison with serious drug or alcohol problems, it is clear that drugs use is a major driver of reoffending, and tackling it must therefore be at the heart of any Government strategy to get serious about the problem that we are discussing.

Susan Kramer: I have talked with my local prison governor, the local police and local community safety staff. Although a lot of extra money has been made available for drug rehabilitation for prisoners, similar programmes with the same kind of energy do not seem to be available for tackling the alcohol problem that so many prisoners have and that is far more widespread than drug problems.

Mr. Hurd: I thank the hon. Lady for that comment. I am not in a position to address her point, but I hope that the Minister will do so in her closing remarks. Although the report places a heavy emphasis on drugs, arguably, it does not place enough emphasis on alcohol.

I welcome the introduction of drug rehabilitation for short-term prisoners. I would like the Minister to expand a little on the comments that the pilot that triggered the expansion of the programme was helpful. What is the statistical evidence about the effectiveness of such programmes?

I also welcome the Government's comments on the targets for increasing capacity in terms of drug rehabilitation. However, as we have grown to learn, targets are one thing, and meeting them is another. I would also be grateful if the Minister could update us on the progress that has been made, particularly in achieving the March 2006 target of 9,000 offenders on drug rehabilitation programmes.

Overcrowding seems to be a hugely important issue that is clearly undermining the whole process of rehabilitation, and I agree with the comments of the previous speakers. As a society, collectively, we need to get more comfortable with revising the culture of sentencing. We need to go back to the basic principle that prisons should be for those who are dangerous to the community. I would like to associate myself with those saying to the Government that a significant effort needs to be put behind the message that community sentencing is not a soft option.

There seems to be no getting away from the need to increase capacity in our prisons and to build new prisons. I will be interested to hear how the Minister refutes the charge, which is regularly made, that the Government prison-building programme is a case of too little too late. I would be interested to hear her views on the degree to which the Government are prepared to involve the private and voluntary sectors in that expansion of capacity.

Lastly, I would like to introduce a separate concept—apparently absent from the report and from the work of the Committee—which is the possibility that increasing an offender's awareness of the impact of their crime on victims could have a beneficial effect on future behaviour and reduce the likelihood of reoffending. I do not know whether the Committee addressed that issue—I have not had time to read all the submissions—but I point the Minister to the work of the Sycamore Tree Project, which is under the umbrella of the Centre for Justice and Reconciliation. There seems to be some statistical evidence that such an approach can introduce significant changes in attitudes to offending, putting us back on the path to recognising that we must get people off the conveyor belt of crime if we are to reduce our prison population.

4.2 pm

Lynne Featherstone (Hornsey and Wood Green) (LD): I too welcome the report and add my congratulations to the Committee and to the Chairman. My party's position on such matters is close to theirs.

The prison portfolio came to me recently—I am recent altogether. Early on I sponsored a visit to Parliament by an American author, Michael Jacobson, who had written a book on downsizing prisons. The prison population in New York, I think, dropped dramatically. Part of that was to do with not putting people in prison in the first place if their crimes were so minor that they were better treated by community sentences or restorative justice, as many Members have said. Also, those offenders would then not be going to crime schools. There is an advantage from that point of view. What was clear from my meeting, which I sponsored with a Labour and a Conservative Member, was that we all agreed, much as has been the case in the Chamber today.

There is a great consensus that prison does not work and that the offending rate—60 per cent. recidivist—is not a way forward and has led to the overcrowding. The political climate in which we work outside such discussions here is not helpful and is destructive of what many Members have said about getting across the message that community sentences are tough. They are not soft on crime or prisoners. Politicians are going to have to grow up if we are to join hands across the issue and deal with some of the necessary measures for prisons.

When speaking to people, I have used an example. How well developed would a human being be if they were locked in a room, not talked to and not given skills? Would they be a well developed human being who could retake their place in society or would they be irresponsible for the rest of their lives, a burden to the state and almost certainly reoffend? If people are talked to, they understand the message; they do not have a problem with that.

On Tuesday or Wednesday of this week I went to an all-party parliamentary group where the Home Secretary signalled that he was moving towards the sort of proposals that we have been talking about. That is welcome, and I look forward to the Minister's comments on that.

I have been to Holloway prison and I was impressed with the governor and with the work being done with the women there. However, it was clear to me even as a novice that the sentences that women were given—mostly under six months—were incredibly detrimental to a sensible way forward. A sentence of that length is not long enough to get them off drugs or give them educational skills, but it is long enough for them to lose their homes and possibly their children, despite best efforts and a new 24-hour reception centre at that prison, which is next door to my constituency. I also commend the work of SmartJustice, whose members I have also met. It is doing a fantastic job.

At Holloway, I spoke to a group of women called "the listeners", who have volunteered to listen to other women prisoners who need someone to talk to. They do not proffer advice. These women were serving two, three or four-year sentences, possibly longer. I sat down and talked to them for a while, and every one of them wants to have a career in counselling; two were taking university degrees. It is a real step forward. I would say that a good percentage of those women will not reoffend, because they have something to look forward to—a place in society. That is to be welcomed.

We have all said today that the system is not working. We must realise the benefit for society of placing rehabilitation at the centre of the prison system. Only then will we see a dramatic drop in rates of reoffending, which I understand costs about £11 billion.

Hon. Members have touched briefly on education, but, as the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) said, education alone is not enough. People must be given the fundamental skills with which to move on, not simply to get back into work but to understand what they are doing.

It is a tremendous leap for someone who is not used to a working life to go from three and a half hours of work activity in prison to an eight-hour working day. Members of Parliament may not understand that, because we do a much longer day. I was interested in what the right hon. Gentleman said about the German system, which seems very advanced, but I wonder whether letting prisoners out on day release would begin to be acceptable politically. As I have said, unless we learn not to attack one another for mentioning such things, we shall never get anywhere.

[Lynne Featherstone]

We must expand the number of prisons involved in commercial work.

Mr. Clappison: I am listening carefully to the hon. Lady. She mentioned prisoners being let out on day release and the German example. I do not have the details to hand, but I believe that in the German case, where a lot of prisoners were going out on day release, the rate of offending by such prisoners for absconding or the like was very low.

Lynne Featherstone: We can learn our lesson from Germany. It is clearly succeeding where we are not. Extending the use of tough community sentences will be good. There can be no better way to rehabilitate prisoners than by moving them into the community. That is the best place for them.

In conclusion, we need to help offenders, in particular young people, to avoid reoffending by increasing the resources for education, training and skills. Basic literacy, numeracy and communication skills are incredibly important. This is a complex world and, although simply having a job is a start, the likelihood of keeping it without other support is slim. We do not want people to slip backwards.

I look forward to hearing the Minister address some of the points that I have made and would welcome hearing what action she proposes to take, what funding is proposed and what the time scale is for action and change. I would also welcome an assurance that downgrading targets will not be the Government's answer to not reaching them. At present that is a significant failing.

4.10 pm

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I do not know where to start. I usually do not have the luxury of so much time on my feet, but hon. Members will be pleased to know that I do not intend to take advantage of it. I too am interested to know what the Minister has to say about the report. I appreciate that the Minister who will respond to the debate does not have direct responsibility for prisons.

The Parliamentary Under-Se[illegible]ry of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactagg[illegible]): I share it.

Mrs. Gillan: The Minister shares responsibility with Baroness Scotland in another place. No insult was intended to the Minister; I was not quite sure which of the two had the main responsibility in the Department. There is no doubt that the Minister has a job on her hands, as has Lady Scotland. The evidence for that is in what I consider to be one of the most comprehensive reports by the Home Affairs Committee for some time.

The right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) is to be congratulated—I merely echo the words of other hon. Members when I say that—on the scope and breadth of the report and the depth in which the Committee has examined the issues and problems affecting prisons. In common with a couple of my hon. Friends, I also started my career in prisons. As a young articled clerk I was dispatched off to Brixton nick, as we used to call it in those days, to visit clients of ours who had fallen on hard times. I am afraid that many clients of the firm to which I was articled ended up spending much longer periods of time at Her Majesty's pleasure.

What struck me 12 months ago when I was given the brief of visiting prisons is that they have not changed that much. That is quite frightening. I appreciate that it is mostly dictated by the physical nature of the prisons—the fact that so much of the estate is made up of old-fashioned Victorian establishments. However, there was a definite feeling of déjà vu when I walked into the first of the prisons that I visited. There was a lot of déjà vu when I entered Holloway—although I was particularly impressed by some of the work being done there, not least the work to deal with mental health problems.

The report, to which the Department responded in March, makes pretty uncomfortable reading. There is no doubt that although great strides are being made in some respects, there are enormous problems, and the Government need to tackle them before there is a catastrophe—although the current offending rate is itself a catastrophe.

As my party's spokesmen on the subject, I want to say that too many people take a neanderthal approach to the subject. They say, "Prison works. Lock them up. Throw away the key." They forget, first, that those in prison are human beings, and, secondly, that there is a cost to society. If anyone says, when I come up with ideas for rehabilitation or keeping people out of prison, that I have gone soft and am left-wing and wet, it is not true. It costs more than £37,000 a year on average to keep a man in prison. The Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but every prison place that she has had built since 2000 has cost £99,839. That is a significant cost to the taxpayer.

To those costs must be added the cost in human misery and family break-up, the cost to victims of crime, and the cost to the economy as a whole. I am not going soft when I suggest that perhaps we should not lock too many people up, or that we should do something with them when they are inside. I do not subscribe to the views of people who say, "Shut them in a room, take away their television, don't give them education; they must pay their debt to society." They are paying their debt to society by being inside a prison. I do not think that anyone in this Chamber would want to spend more than a few hours inside any of our prison establishments.

In England and Wales we have the highest imprisonment rate in western Europe, with 145 people in prison per 100,000 of the population. That is more than France, which has a rate of 91 per 100,000, and Germany, which has a rate of 96 per 100,000. According to the most recent figures that I have, which are for 2003, the average age of those sentenced to custody was 27. More alarmingly, nearly one quarter of our prisoners are 21 or under.

As we have discussed, the number of women in prison has doubled over the past decade. Before I came into the Chamber, I checked how many female prisoners were in our establishments on 11 November, and it was 4,599. That is a considerable figure, compared with previous years. More frighteningly, Home Office research shows that approximately 66 per cent. of those women are mothers. In that respect, the point that I tried to make in an earlier intervention is very pertinent. It is estimated that more than 17,000 children each year see their mothers put in prison. When we separate them from their mothers in that way, there is a risk that they will end up on the conveyor belt to crime. One of the social characteristics that identifies people who finally end up in prison is that they are victims of family break-up, and, in this case, it is the state that has broken up the family. With more than 17,000 children a year affected, we are very much preparing the seed bed in which we will grow our future prisoners, and we should not be doing that.

Prison has a poor record in reducing reoffending. Three out of five prisoners, or 61 per cent., are reconvicted within two years of being released. The frightening thing is that for young men and boys under 21 the reconviction rate stands at 73 per cent. That means that we have put a phenomenal percentage of people in prison, done nothing with them and then allowed them to come out and return to their life of crime.

Everyone who has spoken in the debate has mentioned the serious problem of overcrowding. At the end of August, 81 of our prisons—57 per cent. of the estate—were overcrowded, 13 were at more than 150 per cent. of their certified normal accommodation and 11 had populations over their operational capacity. The situation has not got better; indeed, it has got worse. As I said when I intervened on the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen, 75,187 people were in prison when the Government responded to the report in March. By 11 November, that figure had increased to 77,683—an increase of 2,496. Usable operational capacity stands at 78,341, and that means that there are only 658 places left, which is quite alarming. Far from home detention curfew being used to free up capacity in our prisons, there has been a drop in the imposition of HDCs; there were only 3,178 on 11 November, compared with 3,417 in March.

If we compare the prison population now with that 12 months ago, we see that there is an enormous difference. In November 2004, there were 75,023 people in prison. In the Minister's March response, the figure was 75,352, so the prison population was holding steady. I had discussions with various people in the prison sector, who were all a bit surprised by that. They could not understand why the figure was holding steady; they had expected an increase and did not know why there had not been one. Of course, the increase has now kicked in in spades, judging by the figures on the Home Office website.

The overcrowding of the prison estate is very much linked to the issues of reoffending and rehabilitation. If the system is overcrowded and has no capacity, and buildings are used that are not fit for purpose or have been patched up rapidly—that has had to happen as the prison population has increased—it does not provide an environment in which modern interventions can be made in prisoners' lives to enable them to go outside and become useful members of society.

The Minister plans to build more prisons, which I thoroughly commend. What sort of innovative thinking is she putting into that? I have looked at examples of new prison builds produced by the Design Council. They are not perfect, but they have a particularly interesting concept. The current prison system—I know that I am generalising—is 80 per cent. about security and 20 per cent. about learning, but the Design Council was looking at designing buildings that would create an environment 80 per cent. about learning and 20 per cent. about security, because some of the security problems in the old hospital-style prison system can be designed out of buildings.

The Home Secretary addressed the all-party group on penal affairs in the Moses Room the other day. I went along and was pleased to hear that he had a vision. He started by saying that he intended to re-examine the entire prison estate. I would like the Minister to put some flesh on the Home Secretary's vision, which was welcomed by all parties in both Houses of Parliament—Members of both Houses were there—because it is yet another vision. I hope that the Minister will forgive me, but I am slightly tired of visions; I have been hearing about them since the Carter report two years ago, and I do not see that vision being translated into action on the ground.

Mr. Denham: I would like to reinforce that point. I hope that this view came across in my earlier comments. The story that we have had from Ministers, particularly in the past six to nine months, and the Home Secretary's important speech to the Prison Reform Trust, set out a vision of how the system should be, which accords with a great deal in the Select Committee report. We need to acknowledge that getting to grips with the system and the people who run it, many of whom are good people, is an enormous change management job for Ministers. The Prison Service is a huge organisation that is very complex and difficult to manage. Our report was aimed every bit as much at getting the people who run the system to see the possibilities as at criticising what Ministers were saying to us.

Mrs. Gillan: I am sympathetic to that intervention. I agree entirely. I suppose that I should have said this at the beginning, but I am worried that we are talking about the rehabilitation of offenders against a background of unprecedented change and movement within the prison and probation services anticipated by Ministers, but against the background of the vision in the Carter report two years ago. When I go around prisons and when I talk to probation and prison officers, prisoners and prisoners' families, I do not see, two years down the line, the results that were expected from the major change management programme.

The administrative centre was set up at extraordinary cost, but there has been little communication with the people who work in the system. I might return to the issue of the National Offender Management Service and where it is going. The Minister has an opportunity to respond on that as well.

Many hon. Members spoke about women in prison. I want to touch on the issue of women and children. Some 57 per cent.—nearly six out of 10—of women released from prison in 2002 were reconvicted within two years of release. Those are the latest figures that I have. I understand that that is an improvement. It was better at one stage, but there were fewer women in prison. We now have larger numbers of women to set the targets against. What frightens me, particularly with women—although the same applies to men—is their dislocation from home and the disproportionate distance from their family and support structures at which they are held. Many are damaged individuals who have been living with domestic violence or in violent relationships, are single mothers or have been tied up with groups of people such as drug dealers, but nevertheless they are held an average of 62 miles from their home environment. That is not conducive to their resettling and coming out of prison to a productive life.

[Mrs. Gillan]

I alluded to the fact that a third of women in prison find that they have lost their homes and possessions. I want Members to think briefly about the effect on a woman who finds that she has lost absolutely everything, even the family photograph of her grandmother who is dead, or any small personal possession that means something to her. If we are to concentrate on rehabilitation, the state has to consider how to preserve somebody's life.

Many such women find that their flat has been cleared out by the housing authority, their life packed up in a black plastic bag, and their memories, everything that held them and their anchors thrown away. That is difficult for a sane person to deal with. However, it is very difficult for someone whose mental health is fragile. That takes me to my next point. I am greatly concerned not just about drugs and alcohol but about the mental health of our prison population. Many prisoners have mental health problems and it is obvious that the percentage is much higher in the prison population than in the general population.

It is alarming to know that 72 per cent. of male and 70 per cent. of female prisoners have two or more mental health disorders. That is a frightening statistic. To put it bluntly, it tells me that we no longer treat the mentally ill in a hospital environment, but lock them up in prison. From going round some of the establishments it has been obvious to me that, despite the best efforts of prison governors, staff and those dealing with mental health issues, many people who are incarcerated should not be in prison in the first place. They are certainly not in an environment where they will get the correct interventions.

I was at one young offenders institution the other day, which shall remain nameless. I was told of a young man who was so badly brain damaged and ill that no mental health establishment would take him. Although he had finished his sentence, he was still effectively in prison. That is pretty frightening in the United Kingdom in 2005.

The number of staff working in mental health also concerns me. About 300 mental health in-reach staff work in and across the prison estate in England and Wales. I query whether that is enough, considering the statistics. Effectively, 50,000 people in prison have mental health issues that need dealing with. The problem is that when those inside a prison deal with people with mental health problems, they do exactly the wrong thing.

Prison regimes do little to address the mental health needs of prisoners. Research has found that 28 per cent. of male sentenced prisoners with evidence of psychosis reported spending 23 hours or more a day in their cells, more than twice the proportion of those without mental health problems. If we are to talk seriously about rehabilitation, the Government have to get a grip on that.

We have talked about moving prisoners around the country. The evidence that I found with the Select Committee is that there is so much churning and, because of overcrowding, people get moved at short notice. Indeed, I came across a situation the other day when six weeks before the end of a sentence a prisoner was moved 100 miles away. All the efforts that had gone into preparing them for release were destroyed. The drugs and alcohol treatment programmes in the prison system are not only inadequate but they are interrupted by the churning. The more overcrowding there is and the more that prisoners have to be moved around the country, the more interruption there is of the very programmes that will facilitate a reduction in reoffending.

I would like to know how many prisoners are moving around the country at any one time. That might be apocryphal, but when the overcrowding figures were two or three away from the total capacity of the prison system a prison officer said to me, "Well, we do not know how many are sitting in vans and being run between prisons and between courts". So, we could well be in the danger zone without knowing it. It is a problem and it needs to be addressed.

Education and training are the key. We have heard many tributes today to the Transco programme. It has been the thrust of most of today's contributions that education, training and real commercial work is where we should be looking. I have looked at the Transco programme and I cannot speak too highly of Dr. Mary Harris, who has done a first-class job. The programme is being spread out into 15 prisons, but I thought it was being spread out into a lot of industry sectors. The last time that I looked at the plans and the last time I talked to Dr. Harris, I understood that there were plans for it to be spread out.

I think that the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen hit the nail on the head when he said that we might have missed the boat on this. There is evidence that many more people are coming in to work in the trades that would have been suitable for prisoners. I hope that the Minister will comment on that and perhaps set out what she thinks we could do to address the matter at this stage, bearing in mind the background.

I took on board the right hon. Gentleman's request for an economic study from the Minister. He gave me the impression that he was referring to one on a national basis. I would go further and ask for it on a local basis, for the simple reason that when I visited a prison in Doncaster I was impressed with the emphasis that it put on training for skills that would be relevant to the new and expanded airport. The local economy is important when we consider which training programmes would be suitable.

Mr. Denham: We were given an example as a Committee. We went to Aylesbury young offenders institution, where people made the point that there was an enormous demand for labour at the Heathrow fifth terminal project but that the institution did not have the capacity to do training in the relevant skills. That was a good case of where people could have been supplied into a major project, which will employ tens of thousands of people over years. However, there is no ability in the system to spot the opportunity to put the investment in place and to meet the demand.

Mrs. Gillan: Let me take the right hon. Gentleman back. I talked about the prison estate, the Design Council and new prison build. Another thing I picked up going round the prison system, is that when we build new prisons we are not building the warehousing and the workshop units that can go with them. Companies can go to such units to provide training or real work in the prisons. More thought must go into prison design, particularly if we are really to focus on rehabilitation.

On basic skills—reading and writing—there is the work of something such as the Shannon Trust, which encourages prisoners to teach prisoners. There is a huge stigma about illiteracy; if people cannot read and write, they do not always want authority figures to teach them how to do so. Work such as that of the Shannon Trust is excellent. It will help with rehabilitation, but it is not the entire key. Operations such as the training operation run by my constituent, Harry Quinton, in various prisons are very helpful. I have seen the work that Amersham and Wycombe college, which is in my constituency and is just down the road from the Minister's constituency of Slough, does in prisons. I have been very impressed by that. Thought must be given to what each individual wants.

That brings me to the NOMS situation and the Carter report. Like many people who take an interest in the subject, I was most impressed by the Carter report. The principle behind the report is right. I hate the term "end-to-end offender management". It depersonalises things; it is new Labour speak. However, I like the idea that once individuals are in the custody of the state, the state will assess their needs and track them through the system; and that even if individuals manage to break out of the system, when they come back they are captured and the information that the system has on them is reapplied. It is not rocket science.

I cannot believe that the Prison Service system cannot get prisoner A from B to C accompanied by his or her file. Having spoken to people in the Prison Service, I know that prisoners can arrive at a prison very late at night without the accompanying documentation. For instance, a woman may arrive at 10 pm and say, "I have two children; what has happened to them?" That happens now. We need a system, particularly if the state is acting in loco parentis, that takes an individual's needs into consideration and looks at that person's long-term needs.

Assessment is the key. I thought that NOMS was going to give us that, but two years down the line it has not done so. It has given us metamorphosis. It has given us a series of restructured bureaucracies, including regional offender managers. It has not communicated with prison officers or probation officers. The probation service is almost in emotional meltdown. I hope that the Minister will consider the problem.

We have a system that holds more than 75,000 individuals in prison, and the staff are demoralised. We have one of the highest levels of sickness among front-line staff, and we have a high turnover of prison governors. The average length of stay for prison governors is about 18 months. Indeed, and with respect, we are now on our seventh Prisons Minister since 1997. Continuity of care in the system seems to be sadly lacking. I am holding back, Mr. O'Hara; I have used much stronger language on other occasions about the fact that the system is falling apart.

We also need desperately to consider the position of foreign nationals. We have more than 9,000 of them in our prisons. That was mentioned earlier, and it has been addressed. We need innovative thinking. It will be no surprise to the Minister that we have more than 2,500 nationals from one country. We should have real negotiations with that other country, perhaps about building a facility in that country and letting people serve their sentences there.

No foreign national who has served a sentence here should be allowed to languish in prison because the Government have not deported them, even if there is a deportation order; they deserve to be released back into the community. They may have lost the right to be here, but in some cases they cannot be returned to their home country. I perfectly understand that.

Restorative justice was mentioned earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd), whose family has taken a distinguished interest in it for many years. I think that restorative justice is rather exciting. It shows people the effect of their crime, which can stop them in their tracks. I would like to go further, and consider something like the North Carolina system. There, before a person is tried, a form of restorative justice is used whereby the criminal and the victim agree to meet and decide on a course of action and restoration. It does not replace the criminal justice system, because if the person who has allegedly committed the crime breaks his or her agreement with the victim, he or she will stand trial in the normal fashion and face the penalties of the law. That sort of innovative system must be considered carefully.

The prison system is dangerously full and over-stretched, and there is every indication that the situation has deteriorated since the Committee made its evaluations and the Minister responded. We need a Minister who will take a grip on this area, starting, as the Home Secretary said, with the rationalisation of the prison estate, and take a cold, hard look at the costs in human misery and the financial costs of the way in which we treat prisoners in prison and how we put them back into society. We must be better placed in 2005 to turn people out of prison with the potential to be net contributors to rather than net drainers on our society.

The new technology may help the Minister, and I encourage her to visit Salford and the Group 4 Securicor satellite tracking pilot, because satellite tracking combined with the tag is the way forward for keeping people out of prison. It may even be the way forward for controlling truanting children. Truanting is where the conveyor belt to crime starts. If one could use new technology to check that a child goes to school, one could perhaps intervene early enough to prevent the prison population from expanding.

[Mrs. Gillan]

The Government, sadly, have had eight years. I thought that with their rhetoric before they came to power in 1997, they would at least have taken a healthier or more successful approach. Sadly, "tough on crime and tough on the causes of crime" has resulted in an explosion in the prison population, and that has resulted in more individuals reoffending. That is recognised within Government and throughout all parties represented in this Chamber.

I hope that there will be some co-ordination. I hope that you will forgive me for saying so, Mr. O'Hara, but it might take a good woman to do the job. There are two good women now in charge of prisons. I know that that makes uncomfortable reading, but I have known the Minister for many years, and I should like to think that she and her colleague in the other place could make a difference. I am very interested to hear what she has to say.

4.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): I thank the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) for the gracious remarks at the end of her speech. I have really enjoyed the debate, because it has reminded me that when I first took on this responsibility, I was somewhat of an oddity. When I spoke to anyone about what we did in relation to prisons, I asked, "What impact did it have on reoffending?" Sometimes, if not always, people were surprised by that total focus.

An aspect of government, which was highlighted by what my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) said about the size of the change programme, is that one can forget such drive and the point at which one started. I should like to say thanks to all hon. Members who have contributed to this debate, because my pointy stick, which is concerned with how much difference can be made to reoffending, has been sharpened by today's events.

The clear vision set out by the Home Secretary in his speech to the Prison Reform Trust on 19 September has helped. He said that we must see radical improvements in the delivery of sentences, focusing on how best to tackle the individual's offending behaviour. One problem with this mass system, which was obvious from what the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Lynne Featherstone) said, is that it sometimes misses out the impact on the individual. We must focus on that. We must have clear goals for a sentence, and ensure that there is a plan for a particular offender's sentence which reduces the likelihood of their reoffending.

That is not an easy challenge. As hon. Members have said, offenders are drawn disproportionately from the most socially excluded members of society. They have often experienced long-term disengagement from services, and they have histories of poor relationships with those who might help them. By tackling some of the educational, housing and health inequalities from which they suffer, we aim to help them to re-establish themselves and to contribute to society. We cannot deal simply with those disadvantages. I welcome the way in which the debate has focused on employment out of all the issues highlighted in the Select Committee report, which was pretty wide ranging. It is right that our debate did so.

How have we done so far? Hon. Members referred to our targets. The 2004 Home Office strategic plan set out our target to reduce reoffending by 10 per cent. by 2010. We believe that we can meet that target. Adjusting for the changes in the population, 3.2 per cent. fewer prisoners who were discharged in 2001 were reconvicted within two years of release, compared with the position in 2000.

The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham referred to the datedness of the figures, an issue that was raised in the Committee's report. At the moment, we use a very brutal measure of reoffending—the two-year reconviction rate—to measure our success against public service agreement targets. We need to get better at this. The research report on frequency and severity has been received and the recommended methods are being applied to larger data sets so that we can decide whether there are different ways of measuring reoffending, as the Committee recommended. We will have to use the standard reconviction rate. That is our PSA target. We are not trying to duck those targets. We have not missed anything that we have changed. We must examine such issues as the severity and frequency of offending and the length of time before reoffending and see whether we can do better.

We have had to invest as well as set the target for reducing reoffending. Spending on our prisons has increased by more than 25 per cent. in real terms since 1997. We now spend £300 million a year on rehabilitation regimes in prisons, and our spending on probation has also increased by 39 per cent.

We recognise that extra resources are not enough, so we have made three radical changes in our approach to working with offenders. First, we have changed the structure of sentences. For the first time, reform and rehabilitation is a statutory purpose of sentencing, to which the courts must have regard when handing down a sentence. Community sentences will be better targeted on rehabilitation as well as on punishment, so a young person can be required to take education classes or attend a drug course as part of a community sentence.

All prison sentences will be followed by a much longer period of supervision in the community. Hon. Members referred to work in prison and in the community not being joined up. The change will allow rehabilitation work begun in prison to be carried on in the community, creating the throughput that the Select Committee report implied was necessary.

As I said, my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen focused on the job part of the job-home-family equation in reducing reoffending. He was anxious that there was a gap between reality and the report, and that what prisoners did all day did not always match the report of what they had done. That is one of the reasons why we have done one of the things about which my right hon. Friend is also a bit suspicious: we have focused a lot of the work on what has to be done in prisons, because we know that that is sustainable. We have sought to make sure that if someone's positive activity is working in the prison kitchen, they will get a qualification to accompany that. If they do cleaning, which a lot of the positive activities involve, the prisoner can get some of the NVQ cleaning qualifications. I recognise that such qualifications are not as high level or likely to lead to substantial incomes as some of the industry schemes. Nevertheless, we know that we can sustain them and that they can provide people with employability.

One of the points that the Select Committee made was that a specialist agency should be created outside prison industries to co-ordinate investment and marketing for prison industries. We share the concern that we should draw on the expertise of the business world for that, and we have been restructuring prison industries to help us seek more commercial partners for support. A new sales and contracts scheme has been developed and is working with the private sector to develop the case for involving commercial partners. That seems to take very long, but we have to do it well.

In the south-west, a pilot is developing a regional strategy for prison industries that will respond better to the needs of business and offenders there. The Isle of Sheppey project has considered the issue in the context of market testing and trying that within a cluster of prisons.

Hon. Members referred to the importance of locality; we are getting clever about that. Commercial partners are being engaged to update the workshops at HMP Wymott; the Committee and hon. Members mentioned such workshop investment. My right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen talked about the employment opportunities that terminal 5 creates. In the south-east, the regional offender manager is leading work on engagement with construction industries.

We are making progress, although perhaps not as much as everybody in this Chamber wants. However, the picture is better than is suggested by what I have heard from hon. Members. We have heard a lot about Germany, which does some of these things well. However, every day, more than 1,500 prisoners do real work outside prisons for more than 500 different employers. We want to improve that figure, but let us not forget what we have already been able to do. Many longer-term prisoners will be given such an opportunity before they are released.

Mrs. Gillan: Those 1,500 prisoners are generally long-term prisoners close to their release dates, so that work is part of the rehabilitation process. Is the Minister satisfied that at any one time—even taking into account cleaning and laundry work, as well as that done in prison industries—only a third of those held in our prison establishments are working? Does she think that that figure will remain about the same or will she try to improve on it? It is only a third.

Fiona Mactaggart: We need to do better. Work is not the only positive activity. For a number of prisoners, education is a critical part of positive activity. We have made real progress in making education more work-like. It is important to recognise that most people in prison fell out of the education system. If education is education-like, such prisoners have absolute expertise in taking no notice of it because that is what they have done all their lives. If we just offer them education that looks like education in schools, it will slide off the sides. So we have been trying to use education that is like work to engage prisoners. For example, I saw in a prison that I visited not long ago a build-a-kitchen project. It was designed to help young offenders meet their basic skills requirements in literacy and numeracy, but they were not told that. They were told that they could get on to a popular scheme—there was a waiting list for it—to learn how to build a kitchen. Young men quite like the idea of learning how to build a kitchen, and, in the process, they were able to acquire key stage 1 and 2 qualifications. In addition to work, we are improving education by making it work-like.

People have asked whether we are meeting targets on purposeful activity, or whether dropping programmes meant that we had conceded that we were failing. The outturn in 2004–05 was 24.2 hours. Everybody knows that this year, to date, there has been a substantial increase in the number of people in prison—that has been a subject of this debate. However, the average increased to 25.4 hours during that period. I agree that that is not enough. Nevertheless, it is a significant percentage increase at a time when the system is under a great deal of strain. It is a 5.8 per cent. improvement on 2003–04, so we are going in the right direction.

I do not believe that we can offer a nine-to-five day in prisons. In fact, I do not want to make that the focus of how we deliver programmes. We need to focus on more purposeful activity, on work and on real skills that will enable people to be more employable, and we need to build relationships with employers. However, if the only way that we can succeed is by offering nine-to-five employment, that will create significant strains on prison regimes.

I am interested to learn of prisons—and they exist—where the regime has been adapted to enable prisoners to do real work on night shifts. We are capable of adapting, but we cannot have that as the core target. If we do, we will be less inventive and make less progress.

Mr. Denham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for dealing with this point head on. In many ways, nine to five is an illustrative phrase rather than a detailed timetable to be met. Prisons are 24-hours-a-day, seven-days-a-week operations. There is all sorts of flexibility. Does she accept that it is important for the Government to promote a concept of what a prisoner's typical week should be like in terms of their activities and quality use of time? No one really minds whether it is nine to five or different times of the day, but it is difficult to accept that a regime in which different activities are scattered somewhat haphazardly through the week will provide the routine and discipline that are necessary to equip prisoners for the world of work outside.

[Mr. Denham]

Fiona Mactaggart: My right hon. Friend is right that things such as predictability and organisation, and teaching prisoners to organise themselves, are critical. I have been involved with the National Grid Transco scheme from the beginning, and was probably the first constituency MP to hand out certificates to graduates. I was pleased to hand out some certificates earlier this year, including one to Karen Bignall, who I suspect is the first black woman gas engineer. I was very pleased to give her a certificate.

Mrs. Gillan: She was probably better than the men.

Fiona Mactaggart: She certainly ran the team—that was obvious. She was older than the others, and she kept them in their place in an impressive way. I heard something interesting from a Transco foreman that made me think that perhaps we should not be paying for Transco's training programme. The foreman said, "We want more of these people because, unlike most teenage boys, these ones get up and arrive on time." Why is that? Because we send them there with prison officers; let us be clear about that. They get up and arrive on time. They are carefully selected, of course, and that is perfectly reasonable. One result is that it means that other offenders want to get into the selection band, too, and that is an important tool if we are to affect behaviour.

It is true that the scheme is not as widespread as we would like. It was in place in five prisons at the time of the report; now, it is in place in 15 prisons in England and Wales, and in one, I think, in Scotland. However, the scheme is not the only card in the pack. Later, I shall speak about our ambition to create a set of alliances with civic society, employers and others. Transco is working with some 50 other employers to look at ways in which its model can act as a pioneer, as it were, for more work with employers, and we want to be able to work with those employers. There is, of course, an issue of scale, and that is one of the reasons why we must make sure that the activity that prisons need to deliver includes qualifications.

Mr. Hurd: If 24 hours is not good enough, but a nine-to-five day is not practical, what is a reasonable aspiration for an ambitious Government?

Fiona Mactaggart: I have not set a target. Earlier, I talked about focusing on the individual prisoner; I suspect that, for a prisoner with profound mental health needs, doing more than a small amount of purposeful activity might sometimes be a substantial strain. In a way, I am uneasy about having crude targets, but we certainly need to improve on where we are, and we will make sure that we continue to do so. We measure the situation carefully in every prison.

I am aware of the work of the Select Committee that pointed out issues such as the fact that sometimes getting from cell to workshop took up a large chunk of the available time. We are trying to drill down to those issues, so that the purposeful activity is as purposeful as possible. That is certainly one of the things that I always ask about when I visit a prison.

The hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) focused on whether we are meeting the key performance indicators on purposeful activity; I dealt with that, and share the view of most hon. Members that work is the strongest form of rehabilitation. He was generous to recognise the Home Secretary's commitment, in his speech of 19 September, to community prisons. That, in part, is the trigger to enable us to achieve some of the things that we have talked about. In an estate strategy, we should ensure that prisons point more towards the community and are more engaged with it. The kind of partnership that can exist with local employers really can make a difference.

I was in Wormwood Scrubs the other day and was struck by how close it is to the BBC. It occurred to me that it would be interesting to see whether there could be a much better partnership between the two—in fact, I do not think that there is any partnership between them at all. I do not know; I did not actually ask. It was as I was leaving that I saw the geographical connection. It is not unusual for a prison to have a major employer quite close and, where that is the case, we need to do better work to ensure that the prison engages with that employer. We should see whether there are particular things that we can do.

Mrs. Gillan: Is the Minister saying that she will look favourably on creating new, smaller prisons that are closer to the local community? If so, is that why recently there has been no move on the two sites for very large prison establishments for which planning permission is held? Can she share her vision of the way forward on prison building? Is it huge, American-type jails, or smaller, community-focused projects that have a better chance of rehabilitation and that keep people closer to the communities that we eventually want them to come out into?

Fiona Mactaggart: The hon. Lady said earlier that she heard the speech that the Home Secretary gave to the all-party penal affairs group, in which he said that he is looking at an estate strategy that will attempt to deal with some of the issues.

There is not a one-size-fits-all arrangement. Our local prisons serve the courts, so they have the most intense churn. Prisoners are required to go to and from court hearings and so on, so those prisoners who have only a few weeks of their sentence left to serve are moved from those prisons.

Can we create court-serving prisons and community prisons? We do not have a blueprint yet, so we are looking at the physical estates to see whether they can be created. Is there a place for some big prisons? Hon. Members have referred to the number of foreign national prisoners. Some of those foreign national prisoners are people who have close family links with, and long-term ties, to the UK. A substantial number of them do not have those links and are here temporarily, so I do not think it matters very much where they are placed. Obviously, we must deal with, among other issues, good order and an appropriate regime.

The Home Secretary has a vision for community prisons. One reason behind that vision has featured strongly in this debate. Prison is punishment enough on its own. We can work with the prison community to solve problems in our communities. If we can organise it, part of prisoners' rehabilitation and reparation can be to provide some solutions. A bit more civic energy will sometimes be required to deliver those solutions. The Prison Service cannot do it alone. People must work with businesses, the local authority and community groups to find ways in which we can work with the prison community. We must do that while also continuing to serve the courts and continuing to keep the most dangerous offenders absolutely secure. Those are the challenges that we face in order to devise a new prison system.

My hon. Friend the Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean) and the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer) asked about women offenders. The number of women in prison had been soaring at the time of the report. Interestingly, the female prisoner population was 4,672 on 4 May 2004. It has never been that high since. Therefore it was at its highest level around the time when the report was published.

I agree with hon. Members that it is essential that we deal with women who offend in a way that works. I am pleased that this debate is happening on the day on which I have announced a review of how we deal with a particular group of women in the system. That group is one that gives us the most distress—very vulnerable women who are poly-drug users; those who have been victims of abuse; and those who are not coping well in prison and are in prison partly because they did not cope well outside of prison. We must look carefully at those women, who are at high risk of self-inflicted death in prison, to see whether we can do more.

Let us not forget that we have already done quite a lot. We have established a women's offending reduction programme, which gives women offenders a special focus. We are making more than £9 million available over the next four years to set up community based one-stop shops to meet the needs of women offenders and divert them from prison so we can do targeted work with them. We are also considering other groups, such as young adult offenders, for whom we have set up a project. That is part of targeting services at the offender, because different challenges arise in reducing reoffending in each offender. We are right to recognise the importance of work to reduce reoffending, but people's families are also a powerful engine for reducing it, and maintaining family connections is important.

We have spoken a little about information technology. The present prison information system does not include whether a prisoner has children, so people do not automatically know that. At the initial interview, with a good reception, governors will check and find out whether a prisoner has children, but we do not have an IT system that can record that. The challenges faced by children of prisoners are substantial. Being the child of a prisoner is one of the most predictive factors for future offending. That is a real challenge.

The hon. Member for Bullingdon focused on foreign national prisoners—

Tony Baldry: Banbury.

Fiona Mactaggart: Forgive me. The hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) will recall why I accuse him of being the Member for Bullingdon. He spoke generously about what Bullingdon prison does; it has a good impact and let me reassure him that it is not alone. We have been able to sustain most of the qualities in that prison and the other prisons that he so generously praised.

The hon. Gentleman also said, "As well as being the soft guy, I want to be the tough guy, and I want you to be more effective in dealing with foreign national prisoners." We have done that, but I am not complacent about it.

Last year, we introduced the early removal scheme, which provides that foreign nationals who meet appropriate criteria can be removed up to 135 days before their normal release date. They are released for removal. More than 1,500 prisoners have been removed under that scheme since July 2004, with a saving of some 300 prison places. We have prisoner transfer agreements with 90 countries and agreements with a further four have been reached but await ratification. We can also use repatriation.

I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that his sounding tough was as nothing compared with how the Home Secretary sounds on this subject. My right hon. Friend is determined to ensure that we reduce the number of foreign nationals in our prisons. However, that is not always to be done by deporting everybody. Some foreign nationals in prison have spent their whole lives in the UK and are not serving long sentences. It would be a breach of someone's human rights automatically to deport them if their family were British but they happened not to be.

Rather than inventing a new system to deport people automatically without taking notice of the courts—judges would feel that that was treading substantially on their toes—we need to get on the case more efficiently and effectively where the courts have recommended deportation, or where there are mechanisms by which people can be removed appropriately. For example, they may not have further permission to stay in the UK if they were here as a visitor when they offended and had overrun their permission. That is a substantial priority.

We also need to reduce the foreign national prisoner population. We have made some progress on that. The number of foreign national prisoners from Jamaica—which provides the largest number—has declined because of much more effective drug detection systems at Kingston. The most effective way to reduce the foreign national prison population, much of which is associated with drug trafficking, is to reduce drug trafficking. We need to speak to the Governments of countries where drug trafficking is endemic and is producing problems in our prison system and find out how they can collaborate with us to deal with these issues.

[Fiona Mactaggart]

The hon. Member for Banbury raised the question of the private and public challenge—should prisons be public? I absolutely agree with him that there should be transparency in respect of prisons. In some of his remarks, he prayed in aid Martin Narey. I was told by Martin Narey that one of the things that private sector prisons have done is challenge, in ways that are imaginative and progressive, how we do things in public prisons. That has led to the introduction of powerful innovations that have improved the way we organise our prisons. However, I share the hon. Gentleman's view that how we deal with the people we incarcerate should be as transparent as possible, and that it should be possible for Members of Parliament and members of the public to examine that.

My hon. Friend the Member for City of Durham (Dr. Blackman-Woods) spoke movingly about women in prison. When I visited a prison in her constituency, I had the terrible experience of meeting a very vulnerable woman prisoner who later killed herself. That experience has made me even more determined to ensure that we stop sending women prisoners to places that are inappropriate for them—such as Durham prison. We must put a lot of energy into providing more appropriate places in our prison estate for women, and also into ensuring that sensible sentences are available that connect the community and imprisonment much more intelligently than at present, so that there are fewer women in prison—and fewer men. One of the custody-plus initiatives will lead to everyone having six months of supervision—and perhaps only a matter of weeks in prison in order to give them a jolt. That could make a real difference to many people.

Mr. Denham: My hon. Friend the Member for City of Durham also mentioned Transco, which the Minister touched on briefly before moving on. I was hoping that she might return to that issue. So far, she has told us that she is not inclined to fund the scheme; instead of committing herself to its expansion she talked loosely of alliances that are being put in place. The people who developed the National Grid Transco scheme are confident that it could expand a lot with greater Home Office backing. The alternative Home Office strategy of various alliances is not likely to be so successful. Will the Minister return briefly to this point, and give us further assurances that there will be serious discussions with Transco—I do not think that they have taken place yet—about the expansion of its approach?

Fiona Mactaggart: On 22 November, we will launch that series of alliances. Transco will, effectively, be the leader of the corporate alliance—the employers' alliance. As it will be in that position, it will be able to influence greatly what we do. I hope that that reassures my right hon. Friend. The strategy is not just a bit of paper; it is a clear strategy. It is not being dictated by us; it is being developed in partnership with businesses and industry, and we recognise the leading role of Transco in that.

The hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd) made a key point about the power of computers to track what is going on. On the OASys system, we will have completed connectivity by the end of the financial year. That will take longer for the National Offender Management Information System—NOMIS. I am pushing hard to ensure that we improve all our IT systems in prisons so that we get better information about prisoners' lives and careers.

The hon. Gentleman talked also about whether we were determined to use the capacity of the voluntary and private sectors to make a difference. That is the case. It is one of the opportunities that we perceive in the new regime of offender management. If we are managing the sentences of people not only in prison but in the community and there is a seamless transfer, there are more opportunities to facilitate community-based, voluntary-led sentences, which can be more effective at rehabilitating offenders than some of what is done in prison.

The hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green echoed the comments on the importance of community sentences, particularly short-term sentences. I think that we all struggle with that issue. We have been ensuring that all prisoners are assessed to identify their pressing needs for housing, basic skills, health care, drugs treatment and job search and benefits advice right at the beginning of a short-term sentence to try to prevent them from losing their home and possessions. I am talking about making clear at the beginning of a short-term sentence whether people can sustain a tenancy, for example, during the sentence and about making housing advisers available to ensure that they can.

I believe that when custody plus comes into effect next year, we will be better able to deal with the needs of this group of people in respect of reoffending, because all of them will have at least six months' supervision in the community, even if the average sentence is only six weeks. The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham critically said that offender management had sometimes seemed more about a headquarters operation than something on the ground. Actually, it cannot be on the ground until some of the new sentencing regimes are in place, but we need to ensure that we are prepared for it to be there. We need to ensure that we have in place the kind of interventions that can make a difference. Under the new community order, for example, we can sentence people to going to school, as it were. Doing that might make more of a difference than many of the things that we do currently.

The hon. Lady mentioned the cost of prison places. They cost different amounts depending on what is being done, but the cost of a full new prison place is normally estimated at £76,000. The normal figure per year is £37,000 for all costs, but clearly the cost is different for different kinds of prison.

The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham talked movingly about people losing their tenancy and possessions. We are improving housing advice. I spend a lot of time talking about advice and people may say, "What difference does advice make?" Actually, with good, powerful advice, tenancies that would otherwise be broken by a prison sentence can be sustained. Housing advice is now available in more than 120 prisons. As a result, the proportion of offenders released from prison without accommodation to go to has dropped by one third. That is an important achievement. Since April, local prisons have been required to carry out a housing needs assessment for every prisoner, including those on remand. All those things will begin to help.

The hon. Lady referred to home detention curfew and the fact that the figure for those on the scheme has hovered at about 3,000—it is 3,100 currently; it was 3,400 previously. I share her view that home detention curfew is under-used. I suspect that recent reductions have probably been caused by tabloid stories of cases in which someone on curfew has offended in a serious, horrible and outrageous way. I recognise that with a curfew there is always a risk of that. We need to improve our risk assessments. The chief inspector of probation has highlighted the need to do so in the probation service. I assure the hon. Lady that I am determined, as new technology offers us these new opportunities, to do more effective risk assessments, so that we can use them to the full. The rehabilitative impact of working in the community could then be supervised, so that people can maintain employment and so on.

Mrs. Gillan: I agree with the Minister entirely, but the success of an HDC depends on the back-up services that go with it. One cannot rely simply on the cuff around the prisoner's ankle. There must be both adequate risk assessment and adequate service from the probation service. That is where the weak link is.

However, I am particularly excited, and I hope that the Minister shares my excitement, about the satellite tracking that accompanies an HDC. I believe that it will provide all sorts of benefits, including encouraging those whose paths have been tracked by satellite to plead guilty to a crime, when the company can place them exactly on the corner of a street where the assault or crime took place. Therefore, I hope that the Minister will fully embrace new technology and use it with the offending population and others, such as truanting children. I hope that she will take that on board as well.

Fiona Mactaggart: As the hon. Lady knows, we are conducting a pilot of satellite tracking. She would not expect me to commit to adopting it until we have studied the pilot. One problem with pilots is that sometimes they say that things are more difficult than they look on paper and sometimes they say that they are easier. However, it is sensible to learn the lessons of pilots before the schemes are rolled out. Otherwise the roll-out may not work so well. I ask the hon. Lady to watch this space. I share her enthusiasm for the use of new technology, but I am not committing to anything until I know how it works in practice.

The debate has shown that across the House there is a determination that prison should do what it says on the tin—reduce reoffending. As members of the public, we want less crime. We want to feel safe in our homes. That is not necessarily achieved by a prison regime that locks people up. Of course while they are locked up, they are not offending, but if, during that time, we do nothing to reduce the likelihood of their offending again on release, the present chronic and shocking levels of reoffending—the historic, appalling levels of reoffending—will continue. That is why we must be determined to reduce reoffending.

I believe that the alliances that I have referred to will help to do that. An employer-led alliance working with offender managers and the prison service will ensure that, practically, we can do what we would like to do with employers. We must work with civic society—local authorities and others—to deal with issues such as reparations and restorative justice, to which some hon. Members have referred. We must also use the strength of the voluntary sector and general society.

The Select Committee called for an annual progress report, and I expect our report to be published next week. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen does not consider that disrespectful. It would have been nice to be able to publish it in time for this debate, but he is well aware that these things roll on with their own timetables and suddenly bump into other things, so I apologise for that. It will show what we have achieved in the areas that can affect reoffending, and I shall ensure that it is made available to members of the Committee for them to consider.

It being half-past Five o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Tuesday 22 November 2005

[John Cummings in the Chair]

Contaminated Brownfield Sites

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Cawsey.]

9.30 am

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am most grateful for the opportunity to debate the crucial problem in my constituency of land contamination. It has a direct and personal effect on the lives of some of my constituents and wider implications for the Environment Agency and the Government in respect of pollution issues and the Government's brownfield site development strategy.

The contaminated site is a mainly owner-occupied residential area in the village of Littleport, near Ely in east Cambridgeshire. Part of the site was previously a coal-gas works, while the remainder was adjoining school playing fields. Its industrial use ceased in the 1960s and housing, as well as a fire station, was built on the site between 1967 and 1992, with little or no clean-up works being undertaken at any stage. Thirty-one families now live in houses on the site, which they are unable to sell or remortgage, and their children are prohibited from playing in their gardens. Theirs is truly a truly nightmare scenario: they live in fear for their health, but are unable to move on in their lives. In fact, their properties are completely blighted by the discovery of contamination by chemicals that are frequently associated as a by-product of coal-gas production, but the legislation that by rights should be helping them is proving both obstructive and unworkable.

The residents are unable to pin down who is responsible for the contamination, as the two sites in question have changed hands many times, including between private and county council ownership. The Gas Board, later British Gas, never cleaned up its part of the site. The local district council's planning department gave both outline and detailed planning consent for housing on the site. The National Home Builders Registration Council denies any responsibility and the last developer/builder on the site has gone bankrupt.

Although the environmental health department of East Cambridgeshire district council considers that the contamination poses no increased health risk for the majority of residents, potential buyers of the properties are deterred by information revealed in local land charge searches. In fact, that all came to light about three years ago as a result of diligent searches by a prospective purchaser's solicitor. The local council, whose responsibility it is to investigate the contamination at the site, has been endeavouring since the problem was discovered to find a solution that would result in remediation of the site. It maintains that it has been hampered by inadequate guidance from both the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Environment Agency, which has prevented it from resolving the situation.

The main stumbling block is that the contaminating compound found on the site, benzo(a)pyrene, is so widespread at levels exceeding the standard acceptance criteria in the gardens of properties beyond the footprint of the original gasworks—those built on the former school playing field. The council is unable to define accurately the area of land contaminated as a result of the industrial activity, because higher than acceptable readings of the compound were discovered on some properties outside the development site. It seems highly unlikely that the contamination readings outside the site are even associated with the gasworks. They are far more likely to be attributable to the anthropogenic practices of past residents, who spread the ashes from domestic coal fires on the garden areas.

It is firmly believed that further sampling and analysis of soil from properties around the gasworks site would merely extend the area found to contain the contaminant, presumably until the edge of the village and greenfield land was reached. Working within the guidance available could therefore entail remedial work to hundreds of houses in Littleport where levels of the contaminant are present without any conceivable link to the activities of the former gasworks. If we extrapolate from that scale to the national level, we could catch hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of older properties that were in existence when coal was our primary domestic fuel.

The widespread presence of the compound is causing huge problems across the whole contaminated land sector—a sector that is fundamental to achieving the Government's national brownfield redevelopment targets. Benzo(a)pyrene is one of a large group of polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons formed by the incomplete combustion of organic materials. Man-made sources include motor vehicle engines, coal and wood fires, refuse incineration, and even cigarette smoke. It is often present in ash. The overall conclusion of a health working group in 1987 was that benzo(a)pyrene was probably carcinogenic to humans. There were no adequate human data then and, to my knowledge, there are still none, but there was "sufficient evidence of carcinogenicity in experimental animals".

It therefore comes as no surprise that acceptable threshold doses of the compound for both oral and inhalation routes have been set at very low levels indeed.

Benzo(a)pyrene is of paramount importance in the investigation of contamination at the gasworks and the associated site in Littleport. The governing legislation for land contamination of such a nature was first introduced under the Environmental Protection Act 1990—or, more particularly, part IIA of that Act, which finally came into force, after extensive statutory guidance was issued, on 1 April 2000. Unfortunately, that was some eight years after the latest houses at Littleport were built. The guidance addressed such issues as what constitutes contaminated land, what course of action will be required, to what extent remediation will be required and who will have to bear the costs.

An essential ingredient of that guidance was the role of the Environment Agency and ultimately DEFRA in defining soil guideline values. Those values are designed to answer the question: does the soil concentration of contaminant x pose a risk to human health or the environment? Unfortunately the Environment Agency has yet to issue its soil guideline values for benzo(a)pyrene and the current rate of production of SGVs—there have been none since December 2004—suggests that it is unlikely to do so in the near future. Perhaps the Minister can say something about when that particular SGV might be published.

[Mr. Malcolm Moss]

In the absence of an SGV for benzo(a)pyrene, local authorities have had to fall back on the contaminated land exposure assessment—CLEA—model, which sets an acceptable level for benzo(a)pyrene of 1 mg per kg of soil. The readings at Littleport of between 6 and 15 mg per kg are unfortunately well in excess of that. However, in a document of April 1986 entitled "Notes on the Redevelopment of Gas Works Sites", the interdepartmental committee on the redevelopment of contaminated land—the precursor to the CLEA—set trigger concentrations for polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons, including benzo(a)pyrene, at a threshold of 50 mg per kg of soil in domestic gardens, and the trigger for remedial action at a remarkable 500 mg per kg. It is therefore not surprising that among both polluters and the polluted there is considerable confusion about the appropriate levels of risk for benzo(a)pyrene.

In reality, SGVs allow levels of contaminants that under current interpretations represent an acceptable level of risk; they do not signify the level of unacceptable risk. Unlike the Netherlands, the UK does not have an intervention level at which the regulatory authority must intervene and remove the risk presented by the contaminated land. In the absence of other Government guidance, however, the release of SGVs by the Environment Agency has naturally led the regulatory authorities to use those figures as cut-off levels. Any levels that exceed the SGV are considered unacceptable, although that was not the intention. As I have already said, that has the potential to blight huge swathes of pre-second world war housing in this country.

DEFRA has warned councils that determinations based on a simple exceeding of SGV levels will not necessarily satisfy a legal challenge. The test is how far above the published level the concentration of soil contaminant would have to be to meet the definition of "unacceptable". DEFRA guidance published by the Environment Agency is silent on that issue. That worst-case scenario may be appropriate for brownfield, undeveloped sites, but for existing sites—not redevelopment sites—it is not practical, because the levels are very low and are often exceeded by background, naturally occurring contamination across the United Kingdom. Those whom the figures should help—regulators, developers, private companies and the general public—do not find them particularly useful and their investigations may be significantly hindered by them.

The first requirement is that the contaminated land sector be given a full complement of SGVs for all contaminants of concern; currently only about half have been determined. Secondly, some indication is needed of what level above the SGVs would be considered acceptable. Perhaps two levels need to be set for each compound—a target level and an intervention level—like the Dutch do. If it is decided that that approach cannot or will not be adopted, some more comprehensive and practical guidance on how to use the existing SGVs must be issued to provide a clear steer to investigating authorities. Until clear advice and support is available, local authorities have to proceed without all the necessary SGVs, which in their present form are of limited use anyway.

The regulators are in a very difficult position as they struggle to approve site-specific reports prepared using figures borrowed from various sources, including the Dutch, the now defunct interdepartmental committee on the redevelopment of contaminated land—ICRCL—recommendations, various American studies, and the out-of-date CLEA model. The reports may then be disputed by the Environment Agency, which inevitably is reluctant to approve standards that vary from those that it has published as guidance. The system is incomplete and already out of date, which puts a huge strain on the resources of local authorities and the Environment Agency and means that basic investigations do not always reach a conclusion, because the system is not sufficiently structured. As a result, developers, councils and council tax payers end up paying more for investigations.

Recently the rate at which remediation notices are issued has dramatically decreased nationally, as many councils choose to wait for more substantive guidance before proceeding with determinations. However, in the case of the Littleport site, the financial implications for the residents living there are too severe to delay progress to the determination of this site. Under the regime of part IIA of the Environmental Protection Act, local authorities and the Environment Agency have increased responsibilities to investigate contaminated land, but the programme is often driven by their own resources. To increase the efficiency of that process and make the implementation of the regime less onerous, the determination of contaminated land issues needs to be evaluated according to a more structured set of values for any site. The rate at which councils are tackling sites is extremely slow, partly as a result of the strain on resources that the process puts on individual authorities. If the demands placed on local authorities are considered too great, the answer might be to place more emphasis on the Environment Agency to deal with more sites, particularly the more complicated ones. However, if that were done, the Environment Agency's resources in this sector would need to be significantly bolstered, as it is grossly understaffed in certain regions.

The current position on benzo(a)pyrene is untenable. Multiple local authorities, and the Environment Agency in the case of special sites, are pursuing site-specific solutions. To increase efficiency, it is essential that a solution be put in place to allow more joined-up working between the different tiers of authorities. Sites could be assessed much more quickly with less strain put on resources if a partnership approach was advocated by all levels of government. That would help ensure that the silo mentality was eliminated and that all parties were committed to reaching agreement on the best practical solution in each case. It is therefore vital that the Health Protection Agency and the Environment Agency support local efforts to reach practical solutions and adopt an approach that recognises the need for local public accountability in each case.

The interests of members of the public affected by the contaminated land legacy should be paramount, yet on the one hand, given the presence of contaminants above the published thresholds, residents find their properties defined as contaminated and therefore blighted, and on the other, even if a subsequent, site-specific risk assessment finds that the contamination presents no additional risk to their health, the residents will still not be able to sell their homes. That has been the situation for nearly three years at the Littleport site, as the local authority struggles to make sense of the regime in the face of understandable public concern. If the process of investigation does not proceed to determination, the perception of health risk will continue to blight the properties; if determination proceeds, a legal challenge may arise. I trust that the Minister agrees that that is a totally unacceptable situation, not least from the point of view of my constituents, who are now desperate for a solution that will release them from that living hell.

It is simply not good enough to tell the residents to take the matter to the courts, because universal standards for contamination have not been produced and the residents do not have the financial resources to fight a protracted case. Their plight is not of their making and it behoves legislators to rescue them from their nightmare. I look forward to a positive response from the Minister.

9.47 am

Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss) on securing this important debate. I shall keep my contribution as brief as possible, as I am aware that the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) might want to catch your eye later, Mr. Cummings.

I asked a question at Prime Minister's questions last week on 16 November and last night I received a response, which I am grateful to the Prime Minister for and I shall make sure that it gets to the right quarter. My question concerned the contamination of a site proposed for building development in Rochdale. I live in Rochdale; the hon. Member for Rochdale is my Member of Parliament, so I take all my complaints to him. I live close to the site, which is called Spodden valley and was the site of the world's very first and largest asbestos textile factory—first a Turner Brothers factory, then a Turner and Newall factory. It was the largest employer in the town in its time.

Many people in Rochdale, including local people who had never worked at the factory but were exposed to its environment, have died as a result of the asbestos produced; asbestos was produced on the site from the 1870s until the 1990s. As we know, asbestos is now outlawed throughout the European Union. The factory site produced high levels of asbestos dust, including asbestos fall-out that escaped from the factory buildings and settled on the factory and the surrounding land. The surrounding land included disused coal mines and was used for dumping large amounts—potentially tens of thousands of tonnes—of asbestos waste on the site.

The entire Spodden valley, which is approximately 72 acres, was sold by the administrators of Turner and Newall in April 2004 to property developers MMC Estates Ltd. An offshore company, Rathbone Jersey Ltd., which is a subsidiary of Countryside Properties plc, entered into an option agreement at the same time. In May 2004, contractors working for the developers began destruction of the woodland to the north and south of the site, but felling was halted by the intervention of the Forestry Commission and the local council because of their concerns. A reaction to the woodland destruction and concern about disturbance of soil that could be contaminated with asbestos was the formation of a local group, Save Spodden Valley. In December 2004, Countryside Properties (Northern) Ltd., Rathbone Jersey Ltd. and MMC Developments Ltd. submitted an outline planning application for demolition of all the buildings on the site and replacement with more than 600 homes and community facilities, including a children's nursery. That is when the problems started.

The planning application was put on hold by the local authority pending an environmental impact assessment commissioned by the authority. I understand that the results of that assessment were due this month. Throughout 2005, there has been a continuous series of BBC reports and Private Eye articles. Although the developers denied that there was asbestos on or around the site, it has been reported that they knew about exposed asbestos since at least September 2004 and about a 2003 site-contamination drawing suggesting contamination throughout the site. Those are the concerns of the local community.

I am directly involved because it was recently decided to move some of the 3,000 tonnes of rubble, which is a huge amount. Discovering the extent of the contamination of that rubble by asbestos is difficult; it seems to be a secret. I am not sure whether the agencies are allowed to publicise the results of tests, but the local community is finding it difficult to obtain the information.

The issue for me is the transfer of that rubble through the constituency of the hon. Member for Rochdale and the length of my constituency, and its eventual dumping in the Viridor landfill site in the constituency of the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor). There is a hazardous waste cell on that landfill site that can take some of the rubble, but I do not know how much. The issue for me is: how safe is it to transfer that rubble by road through two constituencies and into a third? Assurances were given in the Prime Minister's letter that all checks have been carried out, but the local community is not convinced and tried to have an injunction put on the transfer of the rubble last week and the week before but failed to achieve that. A public meeting will be held in the town tonight because of people's concerns. They have experienced the problems caused by asbestos for a very long time.

I hope that the Minister will look at the matter in the light of what I have said. I am sure that if the hon. Member for Rochdale is allowed to speak he will support what I have said.

9.54 am

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): I thank the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss) for initiating this debate. It is timely, not least because if the Government's targets for house building are to be achieved, it will be necessary to use more brownfield sites. It is important that the guidance given by

[Paul Rowen]

Government Departments is clear and deals with some of the complicated issues to which the hon. Member referred and which cause concern when sites are proposed for development. As the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) said, I am particularly concerned about that because a site in my constituency had the world's largest asbestos factory.

Hon. Members may be aware that I had an Adjournment debate on the issue earlier this year. It is interesting that a Minister from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister was put up to answer at that time, but today we have a Minister from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. The ODPM, DEFRA and the Department for Work and Pensions, and four Government bodies—the local authority, the Environment Agency, the Health and Safety Executive and the Health Protection Agency—are involved in dealing with sites of this nature. It is clear that there is a lack of co-ordination and guidance in dealing with sites as complex as the Spodden valley, and that considerably hinders development of them.

We must be clear about the issues, to which the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire referred. Like the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton, I would like to discuss the effects on the Spodden valley. DEFRA has not yet issued clear guidance on safe levels of asbestos in the ground. As we speak, the rubble that he referred to is being moved from Rochdale through Heywood and Middleton to Bury. Unlike the first time rubble was moved, there has been a good deal of co-ordination between the Environment Agency and the HSE this time, but it has been voluntary.

I am pleased to say that this time there has also been co-operation from the developer. The method statement that he produced has not been released. When I spoke to him, he said that he was willing for it to be released, but neither the HSE nor the local authority are prepared to release it. The Freedom of Information Act 2000 applies to Government agencies, but it seems not to apply in this case. As the hon. Gentleman said, there is a great deal of concern about what is going on, given the past actions of the developer. If brownfield sites such as this one in Rochdale are to be developed safely, we need clear guidance from the relevant Departments.

I understand that the Environment Agency has prepared guidance, but it is up to the ODPM and DEFRA to issue it. When one is dealing with a site as big as this one—as the hon. Gentleman said, up to 650 houses, a nursery and industrial premises are planned for it—the lack of guidance is extremely serious. Can we have some co-ordination between Departments?

Guidance must be issued on safe levels of contamination and even on how levels of asbestos are to be tested on the site. Then there must be clear guidance on the stages of remediation. Such guidance is not given at present, and that causes great concern. No one has said that they do not wish the Spodden valley site to be developed. However, the development should be done carefully and with transparency, and that is not happening.

As has been said, the local authority paid for the environmental impact statement in this case. The developer paid £2,500 to submit his planning application, yet the local authority will have spent £70,000 to carry out the survey. Clearly, the old maxim that the polluter pays does not apply in this case. I hope that the Minister will respond to some of these concerns so that not just the Spodden valley site but other sites can be developed safely. We all wish to see that.

10 am

Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss) on securing this important debate. I know that the issue has affected a number of his constituents and he appears to have uncovered a flaw in the system for dealing with contaminated land. It is only right that we should seek to pursue a "polluter pays" policy on contaminated land, but in this case the principle appears not to have been enforced in the way that was intended.

I want to broaden the discussion slightly and praise the Government for their endeavours in bringing brownfield sites back into use. That is a worthwhile policy and the Government are making some progress. It is clear that there are a large number of reasons why we should not let the kinds of difficulties that we have heard about undermine what my party believes is a crucial aim. Given the finite amount of land resources available to us in Britain, brownfield development is an obvious and correct policy. That is why I am interested to know how seriously the Government take proposals put forward by my party, and supported by a number of respected and independent bodies, to alter the VAT regime so that we can do away with the frankly ludicrous situation in which it is often more expensive to repair an old house than to build a new one. It is still cheaper to build new houses than to convert the estimated 1 million dwellings that could be brought into use which are located above shops, the conversion of which would go a long way towards filling the black hole in housing provision. I would be interested to know whether the Government intend to publish the report by Grant Thornton, which I understand effectively sounded the death knell for revitalising over-the-shop living. It would make interesting reading.

It is also my belief that the tax regime does not provide the incentives that we need to encourage development on brownfield sites in the first place. Despite some of the problems that can be encountered when dealing with brownfield sites, we simply cannot ignore the fact that that is the only game in town if we are serious about meeting the housing challenge at the same time as protecting our natural heritage. Are the Government still considering proposals for a planning gain supplement, as proposed by the Barker report, or a planning tariff to encourage brownfield over greenfield development?

On development on contaminated land, all the evidence of which I am aware suggests that we are dealing with a hopeless lack of knowledge about the precise location of the land involved. That lack of knowledge has led to the type of unfortunate situation that we heard about this morning. In my constituency, a planning application on the site of a disused landfill site has caused much local controversy. It is my view, and it was the view of my predecessor in Cheadle, that the local authority lacks detailed knowledge of what went into the tip when it was in use. We should not allow a major development on the site without far more details on the level of contamination.

Following detailed work at the end of last year, my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) found that local authorities across the country had uncovered only the tip of the iceberg when it came to identifying contaminated land in their localities. The problems can be traced back to the mid-1990s, when a certain Environment Minister, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), cancelled plans to develop a toxic land register. With greater vision from a previous Government, we might have avoided many of the problems that an increasingly large number of hon. Members will face over the coming years.

I would be interested to learn of the progress that has been made by local authorities on inspections under part IIA of the Environmental Protection Act 1990, which was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen). I understand that the first round should be completed by 2006. It would be interesting to hear the latest progress report and to know the scale of the problem. It seems that this is yet another case of extra burdens being placed on councils with a complete lack of resources to back up the requirements. We cannot forget the danger that some of the chemicals that we are talking about pose to human health. After all, that is the most important aspect of the problem. In many cases, such chemicals can cause terrible damage.

In conclusion, a lack of knowledge has caused the problem to arise and it is imperative that we have clarity about its scale so that other residents do not suffer as some already have. More importantly, people need to know more about the location of contaminated sites to protect the health of current and future generations. That does not appear to be happening at present.

10.6 am

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss) on securing the debate. He spoke with great feeling about his constituents in Littleport near Ely and the difficulties that they face because their houses are built on the site of an old gasworks. It is extremely difficult for people who are unable to sell their homes and who live in fear for their health. They are unable to escape such health hazards, and, through scientific developments, by-products from coal and gas production will become easier to identify as time goes by.

My hon. Friend asked who was responsible and made it clear that the responsibility was historic. It was difficult to pin down one group who should or could foot the bill for clean-up. It is a great shame that the guidance from DEFRA and the Environment Agency is so confused. Although we all have benzo(a)pyrene in fires in our homes, in the right concentration it can be extremely dangerous. He did an extremely good job in identifying the problems involved and I have a great deal of sympathy for those poor people in Littleport. I hope that the Minister will tell us who will help them.

The hon. Members for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin), for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) and for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) spoke with great feeling about their constituency cases, although I have to take issue with one minor point of the hon. Member for Cheadle. He said that the burden could fall very heavily on local councils. That is incompatible with his party's policy on local income tax, given that local councils with the worst contamination have constituents with some of the lowest incomes. I am sure that he will forgive me for saying that.

The debate provides us with a valuable opportunity to discuss the brownfield situation in England and the Government's disjointed strategy. The development of brownfield sites, contaminated or not, can play an important role in reducing the housing shortage and preserving our environment. Current Government estimates suggest that 3.8 million new homes will be needed in England by 2021, and if we are determined to preserve the green belt, we will have to develop brownfield sites.

In 1998, the then Department for Environment, Transport and the Regions set a target for 60 per cent. of new dwellings to be built on previously developed land, often referred to as brownfield land, by 2008. The real test is whether we can achieve that target. I believe and hope that we are likely to reach it, but to do so it will be necessary to build on contaminated land. I am concerned about the effectiveness of current Government policy towards contaminated brownfield sites.

The national land database, which is co-ordinated through the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, estimates that 64,130 hectares of brownfield sites are unused or may be available for development, of which only 28,650 have been deemed suitable for housing. In some localities in England, brownfield sites constitute a significant proportion of land use. For example, in Wolverhampton, about a third of the area in the Short Heath and Wednesfield South wards has been classified as brownfield. Overall, brownfield density in parts of Wolverhampton is nearly 15 per cent., in parts of Sunderland it is 11 per cent. and in parts of Bradford it is 9 per cent. Nevertheless, given the industrial past of many of those sites, the Government do not keep accurate central records on the number of sites that are contaminated. Records are only collated at local government level. Moreover, details of developments and remediation for contaminated sites are dealt with through a variety of Government organisations, including the Rural Development Service and the Environment Agency, as well as local government. To clarify the situation, we must have records from central and local levels.

We must also know which Department is overseeing the remediation of contaminated brownfield sites. Is it DEFRA, with a responsibility for the environment, the ODPM, with its responsibility for planning matters, or even the Treasury? The Department of Health and the Department for Work and Pensions were also mentioned. One of those Departments at least must take the lead.

It is hardly surprising that with all those different organisations, authorities and Whitehall Departments managing brownfield sites and their remediation, local authorities have failed to make full use of funds available for investigation and contamination clean-up. Although the Environment Agency estimates that there are between 5,000 and 20,000 contaminated brownfield sites in the UK, not all are brownfield. We must know from the Government exactly how many there are.

[Bill Wiggin]

In a report published in 2000 which surveyed eight locations throughout England, the national brownfield sites project found:

> "The highest remediation cost is attributable to those sites that are categorized as contaminated and/or derelict."

Additionally, the Environment Agency has stated that the cost of developing brownfield land is more expensive than greenfield. It stated also:

> "The regulatory complexities of reclaiming some brownfield land may . . . be a barrier to new development."

Contamination is a major problem environmentally and economically. It must be redressed so that development can take place. We must know the costs, and only the Government in Whitehall can provide us with that information. I hope that the Minister will ensure that those figures are produced. Once the costs are known, effective action can be taken. We should like to know when it will take place.

The Government could make progress on cleaning up and developing contaminated brownfield sites by adopting policies, such as tax incentives, that are designed to encourage private investment, especially in areas where the economic costs of clean-up deter investment. Some 55 per cent. of brownfield land is privately owned and 28 per cent. is publicly owned.

If land is to be developed and, if contaminated, cleaned up, the Government must use a range of economic instruments to promote such activity, particularly in the private sector. If they were to promote clean-up and development of privately owned brownfield sites, the stability that it would offer would provide private developers with the confidence to invest.

When there are plans afoot to develop brownfield sites, currently developers must make provisions for the investigation of contamination and the clean-up of those sites. The Government could help by making the planning process easier and by performing their own studies to ensure that contaminated land is cleaned up effectively. The Environment Agency advocates that, favouring economic incentives such as corporation tax relief and landfill tax exemption. Developers can qualify for tax incentives from the Treasury, such as a 50 per cent.. relief for "qualifying land remediation expenditure." None the less, the Government could do more, including offering VAT relief for new developments. Such incentives would be particularly constructive in promoting developments in the north-east, where many developers are deterred because the high costs of clean-up and red tape do not always make projects economically viable. Those incentives could also be repeated to support the remediation of publicly owned brownfield sites.

I understand that the business regulation team has formed a taskforce to consider the possibility of granting a single remediation permit for brownfield developers, and I hope that it will cut through the red tape and bureaucracy that restrains development. None the less, I am concerned about the implications of the decision in the European Court of Justice to classify contaminated soil as landfill. It opens up a new set of red tape and bureaucracy that may serve only to replace any savings made by the business regulation team. I hope that the Government ensure that the decision of the Court does not damage the prospects for brownfield development. I should be interested to know from the Minister how the Government have responded to its decision.

We want to continue to develop brownfield sites, making them available for residential and business use. We must ensure that the Government can facilitate the clean-up of such sites, so that they become available for development. We know how much land is brownfield, but we need to know from the Government the cost of clean-up. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cambridgeshire and the hon. Members for Heywood and Middleton, for Rochdale and for Cheadle spoke with great expertise and with dismay at the situations in their constituencies. I hope that the Minister will turn his energy and his efforts to assisting the existing situation and the future of brownfield development.

10.15 am

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): I congratulate the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss) on his grasp of a complex subject. I understand the pressures on his constituents, which he ably articulated, and the problems identified by my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) and the hon. Members for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) and for Leominster (Bill Wiggin). I will try to deal with the issues raised.

I welcome the general support that has been expressed for the Government's policy of utilising brownfield sites. Like the hon. Member for Cheadle, I think that it is important because it takes pressure off greenfield sites and releases land that is essential to housing development to meet the needs of communities in England. We have made good progress, having exceeded our target of 60 per cent. of new build on brownfield sites—the current figure is about 66 per cent. That will change as more and more houses come on stream, but it is welcome that those figures are being achieved.

Tackling problems associated with brownfield sites is therefore important. Some perfectly reasonable points have been raised in the debate. It is always worth examining mechanisms that can be used to encourage developments on brownfield sites and a range of measures are available. It would be reasonable to develop a single permit for remediation to ensure that there is not undue bureaucracy in dealing with brownfield sites, particularly their remediation.

I will try to deal with some of the detailed technical points that were raised. I disagree that there is confusion between Departments and a lack of clarity. Part of the problem is that local authorities, not unreasonably, want a simple system with a threshold figure over which there is contamination and under which there is not. That would be nice, but sadly the situation is a bit more complicated than that. The problem with having a single number above which action would be taken relates to the concentrations of any substance. We have been talking about benzo(a)pyrene—or BAP, which is an easy abbreviation and which I shall use from now on. The hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire made the fair point, which the Government accept, that the substance is widespread, so the fact that the substance is being detected does not necessarily mean that the land is contaminated to an unacceptable degree. I understand why he asks what the unacceptable figure is, but that is the point at which things become quite complicated. That does not mean, however, that we should not examine the situation.

The concentration of any substance that might give rise to unacceptable risk varies according to a range of factors and from site to site. Such factors include the exact form of the contaminant, the way in which the land is used—or is proposed to be used—the depth at which the substance is present, the nature of the soil, how the substance might get into the body and whether there is a pathway by which a source of harm might reach a vulnerable receptor and thereby cause harm. Each site must be examined individually and there must be a risk-based approach on each individual site. That is where the problem emerges. It is not appropriate to have one figure that can be applied to every contaminated or brownfield site in the country. There needs to be a more sophisticated approach than that.

Guideline values are needed, as the hon. Gentleman rightly said. They have to be devised for human health risk assessment. The present values are generic, whereas all the sites and their circumstances need to be considered. Soil guideline values are not binding; they are indicative—a tool to be used in assessments. Some local authorities fail to understand that, and it might be useful to try to make the guidance a bit clearer for them. The mere presence of contaminants does not mean that a risk—let alone an unacceptable risk—is present.

Bill Wiggin: The Minister has just identified what he thinks the problem is, but I have been imagining what it must be like to live in Littleport. What the Minister says is not right. I agree that when it is determined that there are bad things in the soil in different places, there will be different levels of those bad things and they will have a different impact in each place. However, I disagree with him on this point. What is the point in having guidelines on what that may or may not be harmful to people's health that might not be understood properly or might be used in such a way that they have a negative impact on people's sense of well-being or the value of their property—which in this country is probably the most significant investment that anyone can make?

Mr. Morley: It is certainly true that there can be an impact on the value of property, which is why I have a great deal of sympathy for the constituents of the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire. However, I understand that the former National Rivers Authority advised his local authority that the site was contaminated. Why the proper examination and site impacts were not done at that time is an issue, but that is in the past, so it does not help the people who are living there now.

Mr. Moss: To clear up that point, the then NRA advised looking at water movement, but there was no problem with water on the site, so that does not feed through to the present problem, which lies in the upper metre of soil. It is suspected—there is only anecdotal evidence—that material from the school playing field was mixed with contaminant from the adjoining gasworks site and then respread into the gardens of the houses that were built in the 1990s. The groundwater issue was looked at, but there is no groundwater problem.

Mr. Morley: I accept what the hon. Gentleman says, but it would not be appropriate for me to go into the background of the case. How we do these kinds of assessment is the issue that I am trying to address. I am also trying to answer the questions that have been asked and comment on the Rochdale case to which my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton spoke.

As I was saying, the mere presence of contaminants does not mean that risk—let alone unacceptable risk—is present. That can be determined only through detailed investigations on site and the risk assessments that are made. That can be a complicated and painstaking process, but getting it right can save unnecessary remediation and disruption. That is relevant to a point made by the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire. That work has to be done for individual sites.

That point also applies to the site in Rochdale. There has to be an environmental impact assessment, which I understand the local authority is doing; that is a sensible and responsible move. There are strict regulations about on-site remediation. Regardless of whether BAP or asbestos is involved, hazardous material has to be disposed of in a licensed site in a separate cell. In terms of lorry and other vehicle movements, there will be a role for both the Environment Agency in relation to waste licensing, and perhaps for the Health and Safety Executive in making sure that the vehicles are properly sheeted and there is proper dust control. A range of regulations exist to protect our constituents. Sadly, clearance of major sites involves a lot of lorry movements—not much can be done about that. The question is whether we want derelict sites to be left derelict as an eyesore for many years, or whether we want them to be developed and accept short-term disruption, which is inevitable in any site remediation or management. I believe that all of us as Members of Parliament experience that from time to time.

Paul Rowen: No one disagrees that a site must be cleared up, but sometimes developers are prepared to exploit loopholes and the lack of manpower in the Health and Safety Executive and the Environment Agency. We have talked about moving rubble. Why is the rubble being moved when the environmental impact assessment has not been completed or the planning application approved? At present there is little that the local authority can do, short of taking out an injunction to stop it happening.

I agree that remediation will vary from site to site, but there must be a clear set of guidelines setting out the process to be followed if brownfield sites are to be developed, otherwise developers will exploit the loopholes and the gaps between Government agencies and Departments.

Mr. Morley: I would not condone any attempt to exploit loopholes in the law and regulations or to find shortcuts. However, I emphasise that there are clear regulations relating to site management and clearance.

Our policy is to encourage remediation of brownfield sites on site and the reuse of rubble, which can be used as hardcore for roads or as building material; increasingly, it is graded. It is for the developer to choose how remediation is carried out, but with landfill tax and the new regulations on hazardous waste, transporting rubble to a licensed hazardous waste site is an expensive option for the developer. I should have thought it would be worth the developer's while to consider the option of on-site remediation and the reuse of building waste. The circumstances vary from site to site, but DEFRA goes to great lengths to encourage on-site remediation. We are seeing major changes in the way in which sites are now remediated on site, as opposed to the dig and dump of the past, and I welcome that.

[Mr. Morley]

It is important to get the assessments right and to ensure that necessary action is taken. We are arguing about thresholds and about what is acceptable and what is not as it relates to the impact on house prices and the costs of remediation, but we must ensure as part of the evaluation that no shortcuts are taken that cause risks to human health. I know that the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire will agree.

Mr. Moss: I accept that the individual characteristics of a site such as the geology and the soil should be taken on board. If there is a CLEA model that says that the acceptable level of benzo(a)pyrene, which the Minister acknowledges is widespread, is only 1 mg per kg of soil and the compound is known to be carcinogenic, surely someone living in a house and garden where the reading is 15 mg per kg will panic. The matter is now in the public domain, so nobody will buy such houses unless somebody somewhere says—this is where the Government must take responsibility—that the risks to health arise at a level well above 15 mg per kg. The government must say that the figure is a tolerance level—that people can live there quite easily—and that with remediation, the problem goes away. That is the comfort zone that my constituents need, and I hope that the Minister can give me some idea of how he and his Department intend to satisfy that need.

Mr. Morley: I will do my best. I understand what the hon. Gentleman says. As he fairly pointed out, there are some sites where the values are way above the scale and where there is no argument about the level of contamination. To be more precise, the argument comes when one is within a band. As I mentioned, the situation will differ from site to site because of the factors that I outlined.

Let me explain to the House the procedure for risk assessment. Both part IIA of the Environmental Protection Act and planning policy take a risk-based approach to deciding when action needs to be taken in relation to contaminated land. On some sites, the risk to human health arising from exposure to contaminants is clearly an issue, particularly when the level of those contaminants is way above the scale. That is the most important factor in judging potential consequences for human health, so we have to assess the risk. To help with that, DEFRA and the Environment Agency have jointly published a series of technical guidance documents specifically about contaminated land assessment. That guidance relates to the CLEA framework and reports linked to it.

Sometimes the criticism is made that the risks have been overstated and that is when we get problems. Clearly, there has to be an element of precaution in our approach. The guidance documents take into account the views and knowledge of many expert Government bodies—notably the various UK committees on toxicology—as well as various EU committees, the World Health Organisation and work done in other countries. That is where the Health Protection Agency comes in. There is no confusion in terms of the number of agencies involved—there is a number of agencies, but they have specific responsibilities. The Health Protection Agency is an expert body on health risk, and we need its input. The Environment Agency is the expert body in relation to site management and regulation; that is what it is for. The Health and Safety Executive advises on risks to workers on site and people in the adjacent neighbourhood.

The technical materials have to be understood and used properly, because we are talking about a complex scientific area involving human toxicology, the science of soil, how substances behave in soil, how substances can reach humans to do them harm, and, of course, what the site is being used for. It is a fact that, for a carcinogen such as BAP, there is no risk-free level. As we acknowledged, that substance and many others are widely present, sometimes in areas where there is no particular industrial history, as the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire pointed out. We cannot deal with every site that contains these substances; we have to use judgment, practicality and a degree of realism in dealing with the issue.

Soil guideline values are a key element. They go to the crux of what the hon. Gentleman said about how we can give better guidance to local authorities. I come back to the point that published SGVs are generic values. They can help to simplify risk assessment, but they cannot reflect all the factors on a site. In broad terms, exceedance of a properly applied value will indicate to an expert risk assessor that further investigation and remediation may be needed, but it does not mean that it is automatically needed, as is often assumed. That is the part that guidance plays in the risk assessment. I repeat: exceedance does not mean that land must automatically be remediated. SGVs are not legally binding numbers. They are not intended to be limits that must be met. Local authorities often think that they are absolute figures and limits—that is a fairly common misconception—but I emphasise that they are not. They are a tool to help to deal with the issues on site.

Mr. Moss: I am listening carefully to the Minister. Local authorities that are tasked under current legislation to look at site contamination accept that SGVs—if they are published; only half are—are to be used as guidelines and are not necessarily threshold levels. However, for gardens in which BAP is present, as it is in Littleport, there is a CLEA level of 1 mg per kg of soil and an earlier ICRCL recommendation of 50 mg per kg as an upper limit before any action needs to be taken. That is a huge difference and that is why confusion is arising.

Someone associated with the Government—whether at the Health Protection Agency or the Environment Agency—should say that in that particular soil type, at a depth of up to 1 m, a particular concentration of BAP is not hazardous to health. I am sorry that this intervention is long, but this is important, Mr. Cummings. The Minister said that there is no acceptable level of BAP because it is carcinogenic. If it is present, it is a problem. However, the risk assessment for health needs to be made—

John Cummings (in the Chair): Order. Interventions should be brief, Mr. Moss.

Mr. Moss: I am sorry, Mr. Cummings. I agree. I shall sit down.

Mr. Morley: I understand where the hon. Gentleman is coming from, and I shall try to address what he says. The issue is complex and I am trying to go through the points methodically for him.

The legal test in contaminated land legislation comes under part IIA of the Environmental Protection Act. It is based on the notion of an unacceptable intake of a substance. If the calculations are properly applied, as I said, exceeding the SGV will not automatically equal unacceptable intake, because there is a judgment to be made about what is unacceptable. That judgment would be easy in the case of a huge exceedance, but in many cases it is difficult to make. A judgment has to be made on the level of risk and therefore of contamination, and the SGVs are a tool to use when doing that. The question raised, not unreasonably, by the hon. Gentleman is how to make the issue clearer to local authorities. I accept that we need to give more help to assessors, who generally work for the local authority, to decide whether a concentration in soil will give rise to an unacceptable intake under the legislation. The debate is about definitions and risks.

Paul Rowen: Can the Minister indicate when the SGV for asbestos will be published? That is certainly an issue for the Spodden valley site.

Mr. Morley: I think that I can answer the hon. Gentleman's question. The issue is being worked on as part of the new draft of SGVs also deals with BAP. The publication of the draft, which looks at all SGVs, has been held up because of the widespread nature of BAP, which we have to take into account. However, it is intended to publish the revision when the issues have been properly addressed in further guidance that the SGV taskforce is expected to recommend on that point. The Environment Agency recognises that an SGV for asbestos is a high priority and that we need to produce it as quickly as possible. The unreleased document that the hon. Gentleman mentioned in relation to the Environment Agency is not an SGV, but, pending the revised SGVs it has been made available to local authorities that have had asbestos cases to deal with. The document is an attempt by the Environment Agency to help local authorities deal with their present pressures. However, a new SGV is being developed for asbestos and BAP. Although I do not have an exact date for its publication, I understand that the intention is to get that done as quickly as possible.

That work is part of our efforts to ensure that we have clear SGVs and give local authorities the best information possible. The SGV taskforce was originally set up to advise on how guidance could be framed to assist assessors to make their judgment on a scientific and authoritative basis. Ideas are being developed by taskforce members—the HPA in particular has a big input—and they will be considered by the taskforce collectively in the near future. We hope that the taskforce will make some specific recommendations for the Government to consider.

I will ensure that, if appropriate, we put work in hand to develop and produce further guidance without delay. Following this debate, I will ask for an update on progress on the various work streams and on time scales to ensure that there are no undue delays. These are important issues and those who have spoken in this debate have made a persuasive case about why we need that revised information as quickly as possible.

Mr. Moss: Because benzo(a)pyrene is so widespread and because the existing threshold figures are so low—I repeat the 1 mg per kg figure—if we did trial testing in half the gardens in this country, we would probably get readings above that level. If benzo(a)pyrene is a carcinogen people in those properties will be worried, and if word gets out those properties will be blighted. Because benzo(a)pyrene is so widespread can the Minister not make it a priority to consider this compound above all others, to ensure that we do not blight huge swathes of the country because we have got our figures on this compound far too low?

Mr. Morley: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point. If benzo(a)pyrene is widespread, as seems to be the case, and if its presence in low levels in gardens at different depths is not likely to present any risk to people, we should take great care that we do not blight large areas of the country. That would not be in any of our interests and it is certainly not the Government's intention to do that.

The hon. Gentleman returns to the point about an appropriate level. All I can do is repeat the point that I made. There will be different risks in relation to different levels. That is why it will be difficult to have an absolute number and say that one point below that things are okay and one point above it they are not. I am speculating in advance of the report, but there may well be a band relating to where greater care has to be taken. The SGVs give some indication—

Mr. Moss: We have not got one for benzo(a)pyrene.

Mr. Morley: There is guidance now and the SGVs are being updated to make them more sophisticated because it is recognised that that is a particular problem. The SGV taskforce has addressed risk levels, which the hon. Gentleman talked about. The taskforce considers that there are two clear and urgent needs in relation to SGVs. First, there is a need to restate the basis on which SGVs are derived and presented. That is because of the perception of a degree of confusion among users about the relationship of SGVs and the health criteria values, which relate to toxicology to the relevant legal test in the part IIA regime, which is the test of the unacceptable intake in table B of chapter A of the statutory guidance. That is one of the points that the hon. Gentleman has been making and the taskforce clearly recognises it as one of the priorities for it to address. Secondly, the taskforce is exploring the production of additional technical material that will enable assessors to address more directly the legal test of deciding whether an intake is unacceptable. Those are complex issues legally, in relation to the definition of terms, and technically, in relation to toxicology.

[Mr. Morley]

Our discussion illustrates why this country has a legacy of brownfield sites that have been left undeveloped for many years. Until recently there was no guidance on brownfield sites. We are having a fairly complicated technical discussion about the present guidance, so hon. Members will understand the difficulties that arose in the past, when there was no guidance at all. A step forward has been taken but I accept that some issues need to be addressed.

Mr. Moss: We are nearing the end of the debate, which has been useful in many ways. If the Minister were the MP for my constituency and he had to face the residents of Littleport tomorrow, what comfort would he give them?

Mr. Morley: I would tell the hon. Gentleman's constituents that the Government have given financial assistance to their local authority to do some of the technical work relating to the site. He mentioned the original developer and we would expect it to be liable because the polluter-pays principle applies. It is the developer's responsibility to ensure that the site is suitable for building; if there is a problem, it is the developer's responsibility to rectify it. In many cases, the developers are no longer around, which appears to be the case in the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

The hon. Gentleman will know that there are funds available through the ODPM for dealing with remediation of contaminated land. It depends on the circumstances, but his local authority can make a bid for the remediation work once it knows the extent of the problem and the steps that need to be taken. To offer encouragement to the hon. Gentleman's constituents, I would say that support is available once the nature of the problem has been identified. It is necessary to identify and understand the nature of the problem and that work is currently under way.

The work has to be done properly because we do not want a long-term legacy for people who live in houses on brownfield land. If there is to be remediation—it sounds as if there may well have to be—it should be carried out properly so that there is a permanent solution. The hon. Gentleman's case is not unique; there are similar sites throughout the country and we are keen to ensure that they are dealt with and that we identify and remove unacceptable risks to human health and the environment. We seek to bring damaged land back into beneficial use and to ensure that cost burdens faced by individuals, companies and society as a whole are proportionate, manageable and economically sustainable.

I doubt that many constituencies do not have sites with similar problems. On the edge of my constituency in the former borough of Glanford, there was an enormous contaminated site on the site of an old fertiliser factory. The site was not only contaminated with a range of chemicals but had the added piquancy of anthrax. The former council thought that it had struck a very good deal with ICI, the former owner, by buying the site for £1. It was very pleased with the deal because it wanted to develop the land for housing. In return for that £1, however, the local authority took on all the liabilities for the site. As I pointed out, it was perhaps not such a bargain after all. Indeed, that turned out to be the case, because a lot of the site was so heavily contaminated that it could never be used for housing. However, it has been turned into a fantastic nature reserve, so I am pleased with that. I thought that it was quite a good outcome, although there was one problem. Glanford was merged into North Lincolnshire unitary authority, which then took over the liabilities. The site was leaching pollutants into the River Humber, and as North Lincolnshire council now had responsibility, it faced prosecution from the Environment Agency because of the contamination coming off the site. There are all sorts of problems with these sites, as I know, and I have a great deal of sympathy with the points that hon. Members have made.

Mr. Moss: I wish to put a couple of points on the record. I think that the Minister said that my local authority, East Cambridgeshire district council, could apply for money from ODPM or DEFRA funds for the full remediation of the site. Secondly, after remediation, there must be some kind of scientific comfort zone, whether in the form of threshold levels or SGVs, which we still have not had for BAP. Otherwise, the blight will continue, because it will be common knowledge that the site had a problem. We must be able to say that it now has a clean sheet and is no longer a health risk.

Mr. Morley: On the first point, I confirm that funds are available from ODPM—not from DEFRA. There is a fund that local authorities can apply to. How much they get and for what depends on the individual circumstances and the basis of the application, and is a matter for the local authority and ODPM.

I can give the hon. Gentleman some longer-term comfort. DEFRA and the Environment Agency have published the contaminated land exposure assessment, the CLEA, which I think he mentioned. That is a methodology—a series of reports—of which the SGVs are just one part. It provides a scientifically-based framework for the assessment of land contamination and the risk to human health. That technical guidance also applies when we are considering regulatory action of proposals for development of the land.

Under the CLEA methodology a wide range of guidance is available, not just from the Government but from external experts. The SGV taskforce is also considering the most recent guidance, contaminated land advice note 2/05, which addresses the short-term points, and a development team is working on additional technical guidance. It remains to be seen what will emerge from that work. However, as the CLAN indicates, it is recognised that we need something to bridge the gap between a tox value and an SGV properly applied. It also suggests how that will inform the assessor and what the legal test demands where part IIA of the Act is applied to an area of land. That should deal with the point about the long-term assessment in relation to the risks.

As I mentioned, a number of sites fall into the category mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, many of them in the north-east because of its industrial legacy. In the majority of those cases, I am not aware of any long-term problems following remediation in the majority of those cases. There may well be cases of which I am unaware, but once action has been taken to deal with remediation, there should be no reason for long-term blight. It is uncertainty and doubt which tend to cause blight on people's houses. As we have seen in the debate, the doubts that can blight property values include questions about what figures mean and whether they mean that is contaminated or not. It can be difficult, but when those questions have been resolved and the contamination level and therefore what needs to be done have been clearly assessed, and when remedial action has been taken, the sites do not just technically comply with requirements in relation to contaminated land, but they legally comply with them as well. Post-remediation, there really should be no problem with the long-term future of those properties. I hope that that reassures the hon. Gentleman and his constituents.

Apart from applications for grants relating to the land, funding is available to help local authorities with their investigation, as well as the remedial costs. DEFRA has some funds available under the contaminated land capital projects programme. I am reluctant to make them public, but the hon. Gentleman has dragged the existence of that money out of me. About £17 million is available to local authorities for carrying out their duties to investigate contaminated land in their area and seeing to its remediation. The Government's revenue support grant helps to cover local authorities' revenue expenditure. An element for that work was added to the RSG in 1997 to support the introduction and implementation of the regime. However, the local government finance system means that the RSG is not ring-fenced to particular functions; it is distributed on a generalised formula.

The hon. Gentleman may like to know that East Cambridgeshire district council bid in 2004 for the Littleport site and received £17,000 for the investigation. A further bid was made in 2005–06 for just over £17,000, which was also approved. Those sums of money are for investigations to help the council to decide whether the land presents an unacceptable risk, and therefore needs to be formally determined as contaminated land under part 2A of the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

DEFRA has issued a letter of intent for a successful bid. Once expenditure takes place on site, a sum is added to the Government's RSG settlement. Support is based on the notional cost of borrowing money and of paying it back over 20 years, and distributed in accordance with the RSG formula. The relevance of this, as I mentioned, is significant harm. So I can tell the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire that there are guidelines, and that they are being revised. Some of the points raised in the debate are being addressed through the taskforce. There is financial help to assist councils in addressing those issues, and providing the reassurance and security that his constituents, and those of other hon. Members, clearly want.

Caste Discrimination Overseas (Government Policy)

11 am

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to discuss this subject. It affects a vast number of people throughout the world and there are various ways in which we, as a major industrial trading power, can help to eliminate such a scourge. I wish to declare an interest. It is not in any sense financial, but I am a trustee of Dalit Solidarity Network UK. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) is also an active member of that organisation. I have attended several conferences on the network's behalf in this country and I have also spoken at Dalit Solidarity Network events in Mumbai in India.

The work of the Dalit Solidarity Network is to give voice to a group of people mainly in India and Nepal, but also in other parts of the world, who are grievously discriminated against. It puts pressure on European and north American Governments to do something about that and to use the international legal system, through the United Nations and the United Nations Committee on Human Rights, to give strength to the cause.

Caste discrimination is an hereditary system of discrimination that comes from a perversion of the values of Hinduism in India and which, in the case of Africa, is a similar corruption of mentality, but just as brutal in its discrimination. The number of people throughout the world who suffer caste discrimination is astonishing. Those who are seriously discriminated against amount to 300 million people. That number is equivalent to the population of the United States of America or to the population of all of western Europe. Those people lose out on education, housing, employment and job opportunities. They lose out on life. They suffer death by violence, death by poverty and death by illness because health care is not available to them. As a planet, we condemn 300 million people to the worst living standards and to have shorter lives than would otherwise be the case. Discrimination has brutal consequences. It is hard for us in the west to understand fully how bad the position is.

A Dalit is the modern form of untouchable. When translated, it means broken people. The magazine New Internationalist quotes Narayanamma, a toilet cleaner in India. It says:

> "'In the rainy season,' the woman began, 'it is really bad. Water mixes with the'"— excrement—

> "'and we carry it (on our heads) it drips from the baskets, on to our clothes, our bodies, our faces. When I return home I find it difficult to eat food sometimes. The smell never gets out of my clothes, my hair. But this is our fate. To feed my children I have no option but to do this work.'"

The magazine then well describes the differences in modern India. For example, major railway stations have internet connections, western cappuccino bars, fast food restaurants, people in smart suits and so on. However, 100 m away from those areas, to the backs of the stations and the toilets, are groups of people using the most primitive equipment and who are treated in the most disgusting way. They are the "untouchables"—the Dalit people, who exist throughout India because of a perversion of the values of Hinduism and because it suits the wealthy and powerful to ensure that they continue to exist.

[Jeremy Corbyn]

It is not as though the problem has not been recognised. Let me outline the social indicators. The infant mortality rate is 83 per 100,000 for Dalits and 61.8 per 100,000 for non-Dalits. The child mortality rate is 39 per 100,000 for Dalits and 22 per 100,000 for non-Dalits. The figure for undernourishment is 54 per 100,000 for Dalits and 41 per 100,000 for non-Dalits. The level of self-employment in agriculture, rather than employment as day labourers, is 16 per cent. for rural Dalits and 41 per cent. for rural non-Dalits. The level of self-employment in non-agriculture is 10 per cent. for rural Dalits and 14 for rural non-Dalits. The poverty rate exemplifies the pattern, and the level of poverty that exists among the Dalit people throughout Indian cities and villages is appalling by any stretch of the imagination.

As if the poverty and the discrimination are not bad enough, the violence that goes with it is shocking. Many stories could be quoted, and many issues are raised in various local and international media on the subject, but I will just quote a 31 August report, which states:

> "In one of the worst ever instances of caste violence in Haryana, upper caste villages belonging to the Jat community in Gohana village near Sonepat burnt down 60 houses of Dalits today. The officials, however, say about 40 houses were burnt."

That pattern of practice by officials is normal. The Dalits were attacked because it was "apparently suspected" that a Dalit murdered somebody else the previous week. The report continues by detailing the murder, violence and the burning of homes that occurred. Unfortunately, such events are common.

That is not to say that India has not sought to address the problem. Gandhi clearly recognised the discrimination against the untouchable people. During all his marches he sought to seek them out and to work with them. He also sought their protection in the Indian constitution, which, ironically was written by Ambedkar, a Dalit. I shall return to that.

It also must be said that India, as the home of the majority of Dalit people in the world—the majority of people who suffer from caste discrimination—is reluctant to have the issue raised internationally. It is to the credit of the Dalit Solidarity Network worldwide and of the Dalit movements in India that the issue was finally brought more to the world's attention in the 2001 summit against racism that was held in Durban.

The Indian Government moved might and main to prevent the subject from being raised in India at all. They said that caste discrimination was not the same as racism and that it should not be equated with what had happened in apartheid South Africa or with the degree of discrimination that existed in the southern states of the USA before the Civil Rights Act. They said it was not of that order and that it was more of a cultural issue. It might well have a cultural basis—or a perversion of such a basis—in where it started, but the reality is that it condemns generations of people to a second-class existence when they should be able to have a first-class one.

It is also important to recognise that the problem is now being more widely understood. Such discrimination does not apply just in India, but in Nepal—I will discuss that a bit later—and parts of west Africa, notably in Burkina Faso and Senegal. The same degree of discrimination applies, with the same degree of people not being allowed to go into restaurants or cafes, not being allowed to use the same utensils as other people and not being allowed to undertake any skilled work—only for such people are the foul jobs of cleaning sewers, sweeping streets and that type of thing.

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office also recognises that. The excellent Library briefing for the debate includes an extract from the FCO human rights report of 2005, page 213 of which states:

> "In many parts of India caste discrimination remains a problem, despite being outlawed under the Indian constitution of 1950. Dalits—formerly 'untouchables' but now known as 'scheduled castes'—make up 16 per cent of India's population (this is approximately two and a half times the population of the UK). A proportional number of seats in both union and state assemblies are reserved for scheduled castes . . . However, many people continue to view Dalits as below the caste system and they are among the most disadvantaged and vulnerable of all Indians. Dalits have poor access to public services such as education, health".

The report mentions that Dalits are reduced to jobs such as "manual scavenging". It also points out that when aid is delivered when a natural disaster, such as the tsunami, takes place, the solution to the problem, obviously, is to assist people at a time of desperate emergency. However, in assisting those people, who loses out but the Dalit people? They are last in line to get water, food, clothes and a place of safety in which to live.

There was a national public hearing on 30 August in Chennai, Tamil Nadu on discrimination against Dalits in tsunami relief and rehabilitation. I shall not quote the entire document, as it is long, but I have selected some of the observations made by the jury of experts who assessed the effects of tsunami relief. It said:

> "The jury panel observed that there is discrimination in distributing relief and rehabilitation during tsunami. Particularly the revenue officials and the district administration that were carrying out the relief operations have neglected the requests made by Dalits and not provided the relief materials."

The report goes on to state that

> "the relief materials distributed to the Dalits have been plundered"

by others, and that the > "district administration appointed for monitoring the distribution was inactive and silent in curbing these atrocities . . . During our visit to the tsunami affected areas, we could see that the temporary shelters constructed by both the Government and the NGOs have segregated the Dalits and the fishermen.

>
> We feel that it is the duty of the Government to bring peace and harmony between the communities where already exists the concept of discrimination. Instead the relief operation carried out by the government of Tamil Nadu has widened the division between the Dalits and non-Dalits."

Those millions of people around the world who responded so magnificently to the tsunami disaster did not give their money so that it could be distributed unfairly. They made a humanitarian gesture to ensure that everybody got a fair share of the aid, but the Dalit people certainly did not get a fair share. When my right hon. Friend the Minister replies, I hope that he will offer some assurance on that. I am not blaming the British Government. The concern is whether the aid got through fairly, and, clearly, the evidence is that it absolutely did not.

Despite Indian objections, the Durban conference managed to raise several important issues. I want to deal with what is, obviously, a terrible scourge on the face of the earth. First, I recognise the strong position of Indian law and the Indian constitution on the matter. However, the reality at town and village level, and in society, is that the scheduled caste reservation system, which provides for reserved places in state and federal elections and other things in India, works for a small number of people but not for the majority. It does not work for the majority of Dalit people, who continue to be extremely badly treated.

To address the issue, we should consider the Ambedkar principles, which were drafted after a great deal of debate among the community in India, among the exiled community and among the Dalit Solidarity Network worldwide. The Ambedkar principles are based on the work of Ambedkar, a brilliant man who was the author of the Indian constitution. I shall not read all of the document, as it is long, but I shall quote parts of it. Those who have been involved in Irish issues over the years will recognise some similarity with the MacBride principles on employment practices which were eventually introduced in Northern Ireland. They helped to reduce the discrimination that clearly existed there. The principles state:

> "The Signatories of these Principles, building on existing national anti-discrimination laws and policies and in the spirit of internationally recognised human and employment rights will . . . Include in any statement of employment policy a reference to the unacceptability of caste discrimination and a commitment to seeking to eliminate it . . . Develop . . . a plan of affirmative action, including training on caste discrimination for all employees and making specific reference to Dalit women".

Then there is this important principle:

> "Ensure the company and its suppliers comply with all national legislation, particularly in relation to bonded labour, manual scavenging, child labour, pay specific attention to the role that caste relations might play in legitimising or covering up such forms of labour, and contribute actively to the implementation of existing anti-caste laws such as the Civil Rights Act and the Prevention of Atrocities Act."

Supplementary principles were approved later, at a conference in Kathmandu in November and December 2004. I shall quote a few of them, because they are important:

> "Ensure that all corporate support to community development programmes and other charitable activities in caste-affected countries or areas includes the participation of Dalits and requires that they receive at least an equal share in any benefits . . . Avoid abuse of local resources to the detriment of local communities, e.g. water, energy . . . Aim to ensure nothing is done which may drive local communities towards ecologically insensitive activities or the desperation of violent protest".

It is easy to stir up violent protest against people. In some parts of the world, that is a cheap way to develop a political career. Those demands are stated because there is a high amount of foreign investment in India and it is important that the situation is addressed. The support of the global companies that are investing in India is needed.

Dalit Solidarity Network UK produced a solid report on caste discrimination in the private sector. It lays down a number of demands that should be made of the private sector companies that invest in India. It has started talks with HSBC bank, Lloyds TSB, Standard Chartered and Barclays about their investment strategies. We have also sought to put what pressure we can on the International Labour Organisation to do far more to protect Dalit people and those who suffer caste discrimination around the world, and to support the activities of the Dalit Solidarity Network.

This matter has also been brought to the attention of the United States Congress. A submission was made to it in which the following points were made:

> "The Indian government 'condones, ignores and in some instances, has even promoted . . . massive catalogues of human rights violations . . . All too often, enforcement of laws protecting human rights has been weak or non-existent' . . . While most Dalits lived in extreme poverty . . . Hindu extremists resented gains made by this oppressed group which benefited from education and medical programmes launched by Christian missionaries."

That leads to further violence against individuals. The report continues:

> "Amnesty International's Asia advocacy director T Kumar told the hearing that the Indian government should fully enforce laws against discrimination on the basis of caste and descent, and rein in groups, including the police, which he said had discriminated against Dalits."

So the problem has been brought to the attention of western Governments, the European Union and the United States.

There is a point that I hope the Minister will address. The subject has been raised at the United Nations. India is required to report to the UN on what it has done in terms of anti-discrimination activities since 1998 to eliminate systematic discrimination against the scheduled castes and the poorest people in India. So far as I am aware, India has yet to report.

The British Government have raised the matter at least once with the Indian Government during bilateral discussions, and I would be interested to learn what further contact the Minister has had with the Indian Government and what requirements are placed on our representatives at the UN Committee on Human Rights and at anti-discrimination conferences of the UN to ensure that we take the problem seriously in terms of implementing the UN charter on human rights and our anti-discrimination undertakings, and of our overseas aid policies and strategy and our investment strategy.

On 24 October, Dalit Solidarity Network UK sent a letter to the Minister for the Middle East, which said:

> "As far as we can understand what is happening, the Study"—

the study that the UN required—

> "has not yet got underway. This appears to be due to a combination of bureaucracy and lack of resources. We are hearing that the necessary Consultation Workshops, to be held in Africa and Asia, cannot go ahead until the Commission has agreed the necessary resources next March/April. This will be a year into the life of the Study, and such Workshops could not then be arranged presumably for another six months".

We must have far more action far more quickly and far more vigorously to ensure that that dreadful situation is addressed properly.

I should also be grateful if the Minister outlines the Government's thinking on the possibility of amending race relations laws to make caste discrimination illegal. There is some evidence—quite hard to collect—that although the degree of caste discrimination in India is extreme, it exists in other parts of the world, such as communities in western Europe, including this country. We must address that problem, uncomfortable and difficult though it may be. Discrimination is wrong, period, whichever group or community and whomever suffers from it. We would do the world and those poor unfortunate people who suffer caste discrimination a good service if we took a more vigorous attitude towards discrimination and led on those matters.

[Jeremy Corbyn]

In 2004 I had the great privilege of attending the World Social Forum in Mumbai. It was attended by more than 100,000 people. They were mostly from south Asia but, as a world forum, there were also delegations from elsewhere. The opening coincided with the completion of a Dalit rights march throughout India. The people recreated the great marches of Gandhi and demanded justice. Their joy, the sense of recognition that those people received, and their sense of liberation when they got to the forum is something that will always live with me. Some of the same people attended the conference in Durban, and they travel around the world doing their best to bring about justice for those people. It is up to us to do what we can.

One Indian President, Narayanan, made it to President despite being a Dalit—an untouchable. He did so by good luck, brilliance, force of circumstances and the incredible generosity of one or two individuals who helped him throughout his life. After he ceased to be President, he gave an interesting interview in which he was asked what he thought about the Dalit people. After describing the horrors that they faced, he was asked how their situation could be changed. He said:

> "Revolution has to come from below—through education and through protest from the oppressed people. We need to gather much more momentum, from world opinion, human-rights groups, etc. We need to give up the bitterness and move on. To be proud of being Dalits. Learn from the Black Panthers, the Black is Beautiful movement. Assert Dalit pride. Only then will we learn to express and assert ourselves. I believe that ultimately we will overcome."

That is a brilliant statement from a man who has been to the top of the mountain and become the President of his country.

I hope that the Government, the House and the country join in that campaign to end the scourge of discrimination based on caste which afflicts 300 million people throughout the world.

11.23 am

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) on securing the debate. He has achieved what I was not able to, and I am delighted to be discussing this important issue in front of a number of people who have come along to listen to our debate.

I shall start with a quotation from my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade, who has responsibility for trade promotion and inward investment at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in addition to his ministerial role at the Department of Trade and Industry. In a letter dated 31 August to the Rev. David Haslam, who, as chair of Dalit Solidarity Network UK, of which I am a member, is listening in the Chamber today, my hon. Friend said:

> "Caste-based discrimination is a contemporary form of slavery."

He is absolutely right. We fought hard to get rid of slavery 150 years ago. Slavery is a moral outrage, and there is a material-analysis reason for getting rid of it. As well as the moral outrage and the destroyed lives, slavery is an economically inefficient way of organising a society. That is what the American civil war was about: morals and a materialist analysis. We should bear that in mind when we campaign against caste-based discrimination.

A year ago, I had the great pleasure of visiting Punjab state in India on a private visit, where 55 per cent. of the population is Sikh. There is still caste discrimination in Punjab state, as there is across India and Nepal, and in Africa, and so on. I am chair of the all-party group on UK Sikhs. We have to recognise that one of the tenets of Guru Nanak, the founder of Sikhism, was to get rid of caste-based discrimination. He has not succeeded yet. Sadly, there is still caste-based discrimination, even in Sikhism.

We have caste-based discrimination here in the UK. Those who know the UK south Asian community quite well, and I count myself as one of those, can sometimes see, by looking at south Asians and those from a south Asian background, from what caste they have come—because of systematic discrimination for 2,500 years. Dalit people look different. That is reproduced in this country. Sometimes, sadly, here in the UK, it is possible to get a sense of which is a Dalit and which is a Jat temple, or gurdwara, on visiting them. Caste exists in this country, as well as in south Asia and Africa.

The Dr. Ambedkar memorial committee in my constituency has a large community hall. I am familiar with the doctor's work. He was born in the late 19th century as a Dalit, as my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North said, and obtained a PhD through patronage. He was an economist, philosopher, sociologist, member of the London Bar and one of the most distinguished Indians who ever lived; he was a brilliant man. He was chair of the committee that wrote the constitution of India and rose, through patronage, from being a Dalit. However, like President Narayan, he did not forget whence he came. In fact, in 1956, in the final year of his life, after decades of frustration with the reactionary elements of Hinduism—although I stress that by no means all Hindus are reactionary on caste—Dr. Ambedkar, with thousands of others, led a mass conversion to Buddhism, as my hon. Friend may know. His touchstone was "Educate, agitate and organise"—and he did that all his life on the part of the downtrodden of India, before partition and afterwards.

Education is one of the keys, but it has to be backed up by resources, a will to act and more than just fine words. United Kingdom companies operating in the subcontinent have a particular responsibility, because of the history between the United Kingdom and south Asia, for the way that they operate and how they treat Dalit scheduled castes. My hon. Friend said that he would not read all the Ambedkar principles, and I understand that. They are contained in a handy book called "Caste Discrimination and the Private Sector: Employment Principles for Foreign Investors in South Asia", published this year by the Dalit Solidarity Network UK.

There are 10 calls to action at the conclusion of the Ambedkar principles. I shall paraphrase them. An employer should have a statement of employment policy, including a reference to the unacceptability of caste discrimination and a plan of affirmative action; they should avoid any form of bonded or indentured labour; they should use fair recruitment selection and career development processes and take full responsibility for their work force, evolve comprehensive training opportunities, designate a manager at an appropriate level to monitor the issue and have effective monitoring. They should also publish an annual report on progress and ensure that all corporate support to community development programmes includes the participation of Dalits. That is the call to action under the Ambedkar principles. United Kingdom companies that operate in India and Nepal in particular should sign up to those principles and that course of action.

I am fortunate enough to be a member of the Trade and Industry Committee, which has announced that, in this Parliament, we will conduct an inquiry into trade and investment opportunities between India and the United Kingdom. That is not surprising, in terms of globalisation; it is such an important country, and such a long-standing friend of the United Kingdom. One of the things that I wish to look into is what UK companies investing in India are doing in terms of corporate social responsibility and the Ambedkar employment principles.

As we know from what our Government have done to assist the most disadvantaged in our society—they are incomparably more advantaged than the most disadvantaged in India, Nepal and Africa, who face caste discrimination—the dignity of employment, employment opportunities, and education and skills training to get into jobs is absolutely central. United Kingdom and European developed-world companies that invest in India have a particular responsibility to try to assist the most downtrodden: the Dalits.

My hon. Friend referred to the difficulties that the United Kingdom faces when the Department for International Development offers aid support, and when UK-based charities try to assist in India after natural disasters there. He also mentioned the issue of unequal distribution of aid, and who loses out. One reason why Dalits lose out is that often they have been denied the educational opportunities that would allow them to hold positions of responsibility and to hand out the money. So, the old caste-based discrimination reinforces itself again.

Sometimes, but not always, those of higher caste who are handing out the money—surprise, surprise—do not take enough trouble to ensure that the most disadvantaged, the Dalits, get the aid. That was the case with the distribution after the recent tsunami, the Gujarat earthquake, and, before that, the Orissa hurricane. That happens all too frequently. I am delighted that DFID has moved on that issue, in terms of both what it says and what it demands when handing out development moneys in India after such disasters.

I am also pleased that DFID has a programme, worth £27 million over nine years, to provide funding to civil society organisations in the 100 poorest districts in India. That programme is addressing discrimination against Dalits and supporting marginalised peoples. I salute DFID and the Government for taking that line.

I have some questions for the Minister, as is traditional in these Adjournment debates. First, what have our Government done to address allegations of discrimination based on caste in the recruitment of Gurkhas from Nepal? What have they done about the experiences of Dalits who have joined that wonderful band of armed fighting men and women? There have been serious allegations of discrimination, as regards both recruitment and what happens to those recruited, in terms of their career progression—or, according to the allegations, lack of career progression.

I reinforce what my hon. Friend said about the UN Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. As I understand it, the report is eight years overdue. India—understandably, given its size, maturity and importance in the world—wishes to gain a seat on the UN Security Council. However, if in eight years it cannot produce a report on this fundamental issue, which covers a quarter of its population, for the moment at least, it would not be appropriate for India to be on the Security Council. We are not talking about a report on discrimination against a couple of thousand people, important as that might be; we are talking about discrimination against a quarter of the population of what may now be the most, or at least the second most, populous country in the world. Yet it cannot produce a report in eight years. What are our Government doing to encourage the Government of India, through the United Nations, to come up with that report?

I salute the fact that the UK, during its presidency of the European Union thus far—there are another five or six weeks to run—has gotten the EU to appoint two special rapporteurs to prepare a detailed study on discrimination based on work and dissent. However, I would like to know what steps the Government, through the EU, have taken with the Government of India to ensure that those rapporteurs have full access. I know from my work with the all-party parliamentary group on UK Sikhs and, during the previous Parliament, the all-party group on Panjabis in Britain, about the lack of access to the Punjab state for the UN special rapporteurs on human rights who, 21 years after the appalling events of 1984, the storming of the Golden Temple, the pogroms in Delhi and so on, are still blocked out and not allowed in to investigate. Will the two EU special rapporteurs be allowed to investigate caste-based discrimination in India and to do a proper job there?

To reinforce what my hon. Friend said, I would like to know what the UK Government are doing to encourage UK companies that invest and operate in India to follow the Ambedkar principles.

11.36 am

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) on securing a debate on such a crucial topic.

A question that I asked myself—it might be worthy of ventilation here—is why such a grotesque and systematic abuse of human rights on such a huge scale is so little known about and so little debated. I confess that when preparing for the debate, the scales fell from my eyes as I appreciated the reality of a problem. I was not fully aware of it—I have not visited India and it is not a part of the world that I know well—and my experience may show why.

[Mr. Nick Clegg]

I studied social anthropology at university and pored over textbooks about the caste system in the Asian subcontinent. We were asked to reflect on the history of the caste system through a prism of moral relativism, which implicitly, if not explicitly, suggested that the caste system and the abuses suffered by the victims of the system were so ingrained in the complex history of society in India and other Asian nations as to be somehow beyond the reach of moral or political judgment or influence from outside. That moral relativism towards something that undeniably exists is complex and has profound religious, historical, social and cultural antecedents. It has prevented the political class in this country and elsewhere from turning the spotlight on a problem as fully and sustainably as it deserves to be. The reticence to deal with the issue as forcefully as it clearly requires is no longer sustainable.

As the hon. Gentleman eloquently illustrated, the scale of the abuse is perhaps without historical precedent. There has been appalling human rights abuse at specific times and in specific places, but for that abuse to take place on such a scale, covering almost 300 million people over such a long period, is almost unique. I am not aware of any other cruelty that has been so durable. The grotesque nature of the abuse cannot be ignored any longer.

I challenge everyone to read the Amnesty International report submitted to the hearing of the US Congress. I dare not read out the section on the scale, nature and cruelty of the abuse suffered by Dalit women in particular. The descriptions of rape and gang rape are about as grotesque as anything one could possibly read.

It is, perhaps, politically important that that abuse is illegal under India's own legislation. That is crucial, and I shall refer to it later. I do not underestimate the difficulty of shifting patterns of behaviour that are inseparable from the social and political history of India, and the cultural patterns and prejudices involved. Nor do I underestimate the sensitivity of external voices, here or elsewhere, seeking from afar to influence conditions on the ground. However, as the hon. Member for Islington, North and the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) made abundantly clear, the need for urgent action is now overwhelming.

In addition to the excellent points already made, I want to emphasise the ways in which fruitful activity could be undertaken. Given that the nature of the abuses suffered by the Dalit community are intimately associated with long-standing prejudices shared by many millions of Indians from other castes, the need to tackle in the classroom the nature of some fundamental prejudices is of paramount importance. Again, I do not underestimate how difficult it is to do that from the outside, but every effort should be taken by the Department for International Development, the European Union and all other donor organisations—they provide assistance to the tune of several hundred million pounds for the Indian education system—to associate aid closely with the requirement to tackle underlying cultural and social prejudices that sustain that level of human rights abuse over such a long period. I am keen to hear whether the Minister thinks that anything can be done, through bilateral and multilateral aid, to influence the way in which the problem is tackled in classrooms in schools in villages and cities throughout India.

It is worth reiterating how clear and unambiguous India's legislation is on that point. The Library briefing—excellent, as ever—says:

> "Article 17 of the Constitution of India states that the practice of 'untouchability' is abolished and forbidden."

Legislation to criminalise abuses against so-called scheduled castes and tribes began in 1955 with the Protection of Civil Rights Act. That was supplemented by the enactment of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act 1989 and, most recently, the rules of 1995, which extended the scope of abuses that were criminalised and provided for ever graver penalties.

The protection afforded to the Dalit and scheduled castes and tribes in those Acts is extensive—I would even use the word "progressive". They include, for instance, the provision of legal aid and travel expenses for witnesses and victims attending trials. However, the fact that the legislation, which stipulates the constitutional requirement and prohibits the abuses suffered by the Dalit community, is ignored by the police and courts is of legitimate external concern. We even have the perverse example of other laws—the National Security Act, the Explosives Act and sections of the Indian penal code—being invoked to override those protections. Given that the abuses are taking place and that they fly directly in the face of the legal protections incorporated in the constitution and Indian law, it is right that the moral outrage that we all feel, because of the nature of the abuses suffered, is also directed at the simple failure to abide by the rule of law, which is one of the founding principles of all mature democracies.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman makes a powerful point. As a solicitor, when I was in Punjab, I visited the courts in Chandigarh, the state capital, which are conducted in English. The Dalit people are, not by law but by practice and poverty, excluded from learning English, so, as he says, their chances of enforcing their legal rights are nil.

Mr. Clegg: The hon. Gentleman has a much greater insight from his personal experiences than I do. What he says merely reinforces the fact that the law is an empty shell if those who are victimised cannot seek legal recourse through the courts, because of linguistic or other barriers. The claim on the democratic credentials of a mature democracy, which India is—it is the largest democracy in the world—will always be challenged and will appear threadbare so long as the legal protections on the statute book that are afforded to so many millions of people are not fully connected.

My final point, which I direct to the Minister, is a political one. If a lot of work needs to be done from the bottom up, particularly in the classroom, it is equally true that pressure needs to be brought from the top down. Given the scale of the abuses suffered in India, and to a numerically lesser degree in Nepal and Pakistan, we want the problem of caste discrimination to be featured at every bilateral meeting at political level between the United Kingdom and India, and between the European Union and India. Recently, there was an EU-India summit—or whatever it was called—which the Minister no doubt attended. Was the subject raised? If not, what measures can he take to ensure that future EU presidencies make sure that caste discrimination becomes a permanent, political irritant, from India's point of view, and a persistent feature in bilateral and multilateral discussions, in the same way as human rights issues are raised in our dialogues with many other countries around the world?

11.48 am

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): This is the third time in three years that I have had the chance to speak in this Chamber on caste discrimination, and I am grateful to have the opportunity to do so again. I join hon. Members in warmly congratulating the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) on securing the debate. I hope that it will not be the last such debate and that there will be an ongoing dialogue to ensure that the subject stays firmly at the top of the international political agenda.

Caste discrimination is clearly a subject that unites hon. Members on both sides of the House. Meritocracy, opportunity for all, fairness, a free and open labour market, and the belief that the only bar to our social and economic advancement is our ability, not to whom or where we were born, are a fundamental part of my conservatism. A healthy market economy depends on free movement of labour, and caste discrimination fundamentally disrupts that. We need to do something about that key aspect of social justice.

A caste system is one where a person's occupation and social status are defined by their birth, and it exists in many countries. We heard a great deal about India, but my research has revealed that caste-based systems also exist in Bangladesh, Burkina Faso, Mali, Niger, Algeria, Libya, Ethiopia, Kenya, Mauretania, Nepal, Nigeria, Pakistan, Rwanda, Burundi, the Democratic Republic of Congo, Uganda, Senegal, Somalia and Sri Lanka. That is quite a list, so we should not only pay attention to India. Caste discrimination affects the whole of south Asia and many countries in Africa, principally in west Africa.

India has constitutional protection for equality. It has criminalised discrimination, for which we are grateful. However, as in so many areas of government, it is one thing to get laws on to the statute book, but it is another to ensure that those laws are enforced and that law enforcement agencies adhere to both the letter and the spirit of the law.

I am pleased that the United Nations is starting to take the problem more seriously, because it certainly must do so. It is long overdue in paying serious attention to caste discrimination. A session of the working group on minorities took place in Geneva on 30 May at the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights. The UN has appointed two special rapporteurs, Mr. Yokota and Ms Chin-Sung Chung. They have been tasked with preparing a comprehensive study on discrimination that is based on descent and work. Furthermore, the UN special rapporteur on racism, Mr. Doudou Diène, has stated that caste discrimination is a problem of racism. It is good to hear that formal acknowledgement that caste is an issue of race.

As the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) said, India's report to the United Nations is long overdue. It has been required since about 1997 or 1998. It is fair for the Government to ask the United Nations when we will see that report and when it will be acted on. I am interested to hear how the Government will ensure that the European Union, on our behalf, takes effective action through its appointment of a rapporteur to look into caste discrimination.

It is worth talking about what caste discrimination means in everyday life for those who suffer from it. The Dalits, or, as they have been known, the untouchables, represent more than one sixth of India's population. That is 160 million people. Many endure almost complete social ostracisation. Many cannot cross the dividing line from their part of the village to that occupied by higher castes. They cannot use the same wells, visit the same temples or even drink from the same cups in tea stalls. Dalit children are often made to sit at the back of classrooms. In what has been called India's hidden apartheid, entire villages in many Indian states are completely segregated by caste.

We know that the Indian Government often allocate separate facilities to separate, caste-based neighbourhoods. Dalits often receive poorer facilities, if, indeed, they receive any facilities at all. In many villages, the state administration installs electricity, sanitation facilities and water pumps in the upper-caste section but neglect to do the same in the neighbouring, segregated Dalit area. Basic amenities such as water taps and wells are also segregated. Medical facilities are often available only in the higher-caste areas.

India's constitution contains reservation or caste-based quota policies that were supposed to deal with the situation and improve it. The constitution reserves 22.5 per cent. of federal Government jobs, seats in state legislatures, seats in the lower House of Parliament and jobs in educational institutions for scheduled castes and tribes. Again, it is on the implementation and enforcement of that policy that things have fallen down. If one examines the percentages to see what the Dalit representation is in those areas, one finds that it is much lower than the 22.5 per cent. that is specified in Indian law.

During election campaigns in India—the world's largest democracy—there is de facto disfranchisement of Dalit communities much of the time. In February 1998, police raided a Dalit village in Tamil Nadu that had boycotted national parliamentary elections. In Bihar, to ensure their majority vote from the Dalit community, political candidates sent in civilian militias whose members intimidated and killed. More than 50 people were killed in elections in Bihar in 1995.

We heard that during natural disasters separate facilities and even separate refugee camps are set up for Dalits. There are serious questions to be asked about how tsunami aid, which was given in good faith by the people and Government of this country, was distributed. It is unbelievable that the issue of caste comes into play even in the face of appalling natural disasters. The allocation of relief aid is one situation in which one would hope that our common humanity would be uppermost and issues of caste would not apply.

The consequences of having a relationship or marrying outside one's caste are severe. On 6 August 2001, in the north Indian state of Uttar Pradesh, an upper-caste Brahmin boy and a lower-caste Jat girl were dragged to the roof of a house and publicly hanged by members of their own families as hundreds of spectators looked on. The public lynching was a punishment for refusing to end an inter-caste relationship. In May 2000, in the Hardoi district in Uttar Pradesh, a police constable who was enraged by his daughter's marriage to a Dalit was joined by other relatives in shooting and killing four members of his son-in-law's family. In Nepal, some Dalits who married people of higher caste have reportedly been imprisoned by local authorities because of false cases filed against them by members of the upper-caste families. Obviously, that raises severe concerns about the justice system in Nepal. Dalits are often forbidden from performing marriage or funeral rites in public areas or, in some areas, from speaking to members of upper castes.

[Andrew Selous]

On debt bondage and slavery, in many parts of the world Dalits are only allowed to perform certain tasks and occupations, which are often badly paid, and in many cases they become slaves. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West was right to equate caste discrimination with slavery. There are many examples in which there are strong similarities between the two. That should give us all pause for thought and should cause serious concern in this country as we approach a significant anniversary as far as Wilberforce is concerned. Again, those problems are due to the lack of enforcement in India of relevant legislation preventing debt bondage. We should be seriously concerned about that.

I mentioned education. There are high Dalit drop-out rates from education. We should consider that.

Jeremy Corbyn: Does the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that in addition to there being poor education for Dalits and a high drop-out rate, large numbers of Dalit children end up being exploited as child labourers in all kinds of dangerous situations, such as brick making? Of course, that contributes to the complete lack of education for most of them.

Andrew Selous: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right, and his point comes back to what I said about debt bondage. On education, the literacy gap between the Dalits and the rest of the population is significant. Almost two thirds of the Dalit population are illiterate, compared with half of the general population. That statistic demonstrates the concern well.

On freedom of religion, it is hardly surprising that some Dalits have wanted to move away from Hinduism because of the place that it has accorded them in society. Again, there are concerns about that, which I raised in Westminster Hall in January 2003. In the state of Tamil Nadu, a law was passed to ban conversions by, as the legislation calls it, "force or fraud." However, the leader of the militant Hindu group, RSS, claimed recently that no one converts voluntarily; it is always motivated by greed. The law is aimed, frankly, at stopping Dalits converting from Hinduism to other religions such as Buddhism, Christianity or Islam, which is something that many have wanted to do. The state authorities in Tamil Nadu vigorously opposed a recent conversion rally where a number of Dalits converted to both Christianity and Buddhism. Again, that is a fundamental issue of liberty and conscience, which the Government need continually to raise.

Jeremy Corbyn: Will the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that there are attempts to introduce the same kind of law in Sri Lanka, with exactly the same effect?

Andrew Selous: I am interested to hear the hon. Gentleman's point. He is quite right about Sri Lanka. Although the caste system in Sri Lanka is often thought to be much less severe than that in India, it still exists. There is a lower caste group, called the Rodiya, which still suffers discrimination. I am grateful to him for putting that on the record.

In India, 90 per cent. of those who live below the official poverty line are Dalits. If we are to get away from the notion that poverty is predestined to be intergenerationally persistent for certain groups, we need to address that problem. The Government need to be concerned with that if they are to have any hope of achieving the millennium development goals to which we are all committed.

When, quite rightly, Martin Luther King and others led the black civil rights movement in the United States of America, they did so for a black population of about 35 million, mainly in the southern states of America. When many in this House and outside it joined the struggle to end the abhorrent apartheid regime in South Africa, we did so for an African, coloured, Indian and Asian population of about 42 million. We were also quite right to do so. When some 300 million people worldwide suffer caste discrimination on an ongoing basis, it is unacceptable that the international community looks the other way, turns a blind eye and has not pushed the issue higher up the international agenda.

This is an issue for our generation. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Islington, North for having secured the debate, to the Dalit social forum in India for its work, to the work of Dalit Solidarity Network UK and to the UK churches that are starting to take the issue seriously. Their interest is important and significant, and I hope that their pressure, along with that of all Members of the House, will continue to ensure that the Government take the issue seriously. If we are, in this year, to make poverty history, we have no choice but to end caste discrimination, as segregation in the USA and apartheid in South Africa have been ended.

We look forward to hearing what specific steps the Government can take in their dealings with international organisations, such as the European Union and the United Nations, and bilaterally with the many countries concerned, to ensure that the issue stays firmly at the top of the political agenda.

12.5 pm

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) for calling this debate. Let me begin by placing on the record my personal admiration for his efforts over several years on this issue. He has been supported by the Rev. David Haslam, the Dalit Solidarity Network and, as a colleague recognised, a growing number of British Church people who, quite reasonably, are greatly concerned about the injustice. Their campaign has been worth while. This is one of several Adjournment debates on the subject and I regret and fear that it will not be the last, as we face an enduring challenge. None the less, it is right to recognise the campaigners' considerable efforts to bring the issue to the attention not just of the Government but of the wider audience in the United Kingdom.

The hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) challenged me to offer specific measures. I hope that he will exercise some forbearance and allow me to set out some general points before I address the wide range of questions that were put to me by each speaker in turn.

The Government firmly believe that everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set out in the universal declaration of human rights, without discrimination of any kind. Discrimination based on descent, to give it the title used by the UN convention on the elimination of all forms of racial discrimination, encapsulates discrimination based on forms of social stratification—caste or similar systems of inherited status—that impair a person's equal enjoyment of their human rights. Caste discrimination of the type found in India, which has featured prominently in this debate, is the most well-known example of discrimination based on descent. In that system, in which social mobility is severely limited and status is completely ascribed, the Dalits, or untouchables, about whose plight we have heard so much this morning, suffer multiple forms of discrimination and are typically assigned tasks or occupations that are considered filthy or polluting.

However, it is not only in south or south-east Asia that caste-like practices, including discrimination based on occupation and descent from slaves, are found. As we have heard today, they are also found in other parts of the world such as Africa. The discrimination suffered by such communities takes the form of a variety of human rights violations, including the lack of ability to alter inherited status; restrictions on marriage outside the community; private and public segregation in housing, health and education, and in access to public spaces, places of worship and even sources of food and water; inability to renounce inherited occupations or degrading or hazardous work; subjection to debt bondage; subjection to dehumanising references such as "polluting" or "untouchable"; and a general lack of respect for their human dignity and equality.

Discrimination based on caste or descent determines an individual's position in the social and economic hierarchy, not on the basis of merit but of heritage. It perpetuates social exclusion and reduces the rate at which poverty reduction can be achieved, as the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire said. The framework of international covenants and national legislation outlawing discrimination based on descent is an important step towards its elimination, but it has not been enough, as the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Clegg) pointed out.

As we all know, such practices remain all too entrenched despite the many international commitments made by the countries in question. It is therefore important that the international community engages at a more practical level to help to implement such commitments. One example of engagement is the child health programme: the Department for International Development has worked with the Indian Ministry of Health to develop targets for including Dalit and Adivasi women and children in the programme. It has worked hard with other donors to develop a monitoring system and incentives to ensure that such women are included. DFID supports similar initiatives in education and other areas.

It is clear that deep-rooted social attitudes and customs must also change. Of course, that is a much more difficult task, as was recognised by some of the speakers this morning. We welcome the fact that that is beginning to happen through natural social change. Migration, urbanisation, greater contact with other societies and new forms of employment all have an effect, but we can and must do more. We must encourage states, for example, to be proactive in tackling prejudice and changing behaviour to ensure that socially excluded groups benefit from public expenditure and have access to services such as health care and education.

Some hon. Members raised the question of tsunami relief in that context. The British public gave to that cause in record numbers almost a year ago, as did the Government. Unfortunately, media reports suggest that Dalits have experienced discrimination and difficulties in gaining access to emergency aid, but the Foreign Office's assessment is that that has been localised and complex, rather than universal. For DFID, I understand that emergency funding and first-stage rehabilitation require a demonstration of an appreciation of social issues and a strategy for addressing the issue of caste discrimination when targeting aid.

The hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire brought to the attention of the House the full range of countries where the practices we have been discussing exist, and my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North spoke about Senegal. We understand that there is a form of caste system in that country based on occupation, affecting blacksmiths and griots—traditional troubadours—in particular, and that marriage outside the caste system is strongly discouraged. An offer that I can make to my hon. Friend is that I will ask our desk officer in the relevant embassy to raise his concerns and write to my hon. Friend about the specific matter that he raised.

I was asked what action we are taking through the United Nations or European Union. We and our EU partners are of course committed to the promotion of all people's human rights and we continue to raise the subject of discrimination based on work and descent in our meetings with the Governments of the affected countries. The Prime Minister, as president of the EU, led the EU-Indian summit at Delhi on 7 September. During the summit a EU-India joint action plan was agreed, identifying key areas in which the EU and India agree to work together, and one such area, I am glad to say, is human rights. The UK presidency is planning to take that human rights dialogue forward before the end of the year and is consulting EU partners and the Government of India on the form, content and date of the dialogue. The British high commission in New Delhi has also discussed the issues with the Indian National Commission for Minorities and National Commission for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes, as well as state level authorities, drawing their attention to British parliamentary and public concern. It will continue to do so.

[Mr. Douglas Alexander]

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North raised the Ambedkar principles. We are aware of the work that the International Dalit Solidarity Network has undertaken. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) for raising the specific challenge to British business that was contained in the documentation provided. I should be grateful, however, if the network provided the Foreign Office with a comprehensive outline of the proposals, as we have only the summary document that my hon. Friend mentioned.

Jeremy Corbyn: I can confirm that the Dalit Solidarity Network would be delighted to provide the Minister with full documentation and details. It will give a personal briefing if he would like one. In return, I hope that, after consideration, my right hon. Friend would be prepared to hold a serious seminar with British investors in India to discuss how they might best advance anti-discrimination legislation that applies in this country and about their attitude to where they invest.

Mr. Alexander: The challenge is complex. I do not claim that the complexity of British government quite matches the scale of that challenge, but as my hon. Friend will know, the Department of Trade and Industry leads on the issue of corporate social responsibility. There is a locus for the Trade Minister in the Foreign Office, who is not present in the Chamber today. I shall certainly pass on my hon. Friend's request. I am aware that in the past Ministers have raised the question of foreign investors' corporate social responsibility, and I shall offer my hon. Friend's suggestion to my colleagues.

Andrew Selous: I apologise for asking the Minister a question that I did not raise in my speech; I shall understand if he needs to confer with ministerial colleagues before he replies to me. We have heard a few examples today suggesting that caste discrimination is being practised in the UK. Given that the Equality Bill is before the House, will the Minister undertake to raise the issue with his colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry so that we can be absolutely sure that if caste discrimination is occurring in the UK, an amendment covering that issue can be tabled?

Mr. Alexander: The hon. Gentleman anticipates the more general point to which I was coming about the evidence that would need to be produced. To add further to the layers of complexity, I think that the Home Office would be involved in what he suggests, given its responsibility for the single equality commission. I happily undertake to make my colleagues in the Home Office aware of the points raised.

Of course we are concerned by reports of discrimination against Dalit and other minority communities in India—as I said, the British high commission in New Delhi has raised them on various occasions. During the meeting of the Commission on Human Rights, the European Union expressed concern about discrimination based on caste and supported the decision to appoint two special rapporteurs to prepare a detailed study on discrimination based on work and descent.

The fight against racism, xenophobia and discrimination against minorities and indigenous people is a priority for funding under the European initiative for democracy and human rights. A call for proposals was launched in January 2005. The projects selected will provide a concrete follow-up to the Durban declaration and programme of action of 2001, and activities to combat caste discrimination are eligible for support. Oxfam, along with other local partners, is already running one such project in Nepal.

Let me respond to a couple of the other points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North about how the United Kingdom Government contribute to persuading the Indian Government to make their report to the UN Committee on the Elimination of Race Discrimination. As we heard this morning, that report is now eight years overdue. A prompt submission of reports to the UN committee on the elimination of race discrimination by all state parties is a key part of the international framework to combat discrimination, and we are therefore concerned about the delay in India's reporting. It is right that we encourage authorities to submit prompt and comprehensive reports, including on the situation of scheduled castes. Together with our European Union partners, we will continue to take every suitable opportunity to make clear our collective concerns on this and related matters. We aim to discuss that with our European Union partners when putting together the proposed human rights dialogue, of which I spoke a few moments ago, and we anticipate that that will take place towards the end of this year.

I was asked whether there had been any follow-up to the UN Commission on Human Rights study in 2004 and whether the United Kingdom could encourage that to be brought forward. At the Commission on Human Rights, the European Union expressed concern about discrimination based on caste and supported the decision to appoint two special rapporteurs of the sub-commission, about whom we heard from the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire, to prepare a detailed study on discrimination based on work and descent. Since then, the experts have been working with the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights on what they are permitted to do under their mandate. In particular, they would like, I understand, to hold regional consultations—ideally in the Indian subcontinent, Japan and west Africa, and possibly Senegal. The Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights has told them that it does not think that they can organise UN consultations, given that that was not explicitly provided for in the mandate. Strictly speaking, from a financial perspective, that may be correct, as no consultations were provided for in the budget approved for the study, but the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights is considering whether to hold such consultations and fund them from some other part of the budget.

Jeremy Corbyn: At next year's United Nations Commission on Human Rights session in Geneva, will there be some way by which either the UK Government or the European Union could raise the matter that we have been discussing, perhaps by initiating the consultation at that venue to encourage the more local consultations to take place later?

Mr. Alexander: The first priority is to make sure that the special rapporteurs are able to do their work. Although I shall certainly bear in mind my hon. Friend's suggestion, it seems to me that the first priority is to support the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights in its efforts to make sure that if there is an alternative means by which that work can be undertaken in the meantime, that should be a priority. For the time being, the rapporteurs have been working on a questionnaire on the issue to distribute to all missions, which I understand should be ready for distribution by the end of November.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam raised a related question: what has the United Kingdom done on caste discrimination during its presidency of the European Union? It is right to recognise that the Prime Minister, as president of the European Union, took part in the summit in Delhi on 7 September, during which an EU-India joint action plan was also agreed. One of the areas under question was human rights. The form, content and date of the dialogue is still under discussion with our European Union partners, but it is possible that the reporting and access for the special rapporteurs could form part of that consultation. I will reflect on the points that have been put to me today as we take forward our discussion with European Union partners on that human rights dialogue.

More generally, the hon. Gentleman said that there was a challenge in working with the Indian Government to ensure not only that the international pressure is felt, but that domestic action is taken. One specific issue that was raised was the need for access to justice, and I am glad to say that specific action is being taken in that respect. The Department for International Development is making good progress on its partnership with the United Nations development programme and the Indian Government in developing the access to justice programme, which has recently been approved by the Ministry of Home Affairs and is now awaiting final approval from the Ministry of Finance to move to full design.

To assist and to inform colleagues, I will say that the aim of the programme is to achieve real access to justice for poor and vulnerable groups in India, including Dalits. To that end, DFID India has contacts at various levels in the Ministry of Social Justice and Empowerment, and also with other groups and institutions that work on Dalit issues. The views and issues of poor and vulnerable groups, including Dalits, will be the driving force behind the design and implementation of the access to justice programme.

I was asked what the Indian Government were doing to help Dalits to get a better education, as well as access to the system of justice. One of the preceding contributions recognised that under the reservation provision India's quota system reserves approximately 26 per cent. of Government jobs in India for Dalits and other tribal groups. The aim is to bring them into the political and social mainstream. I understand that there are also reserved places in the education system for the same groups.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam will appreciate that his specific point on conditionality of aid extends far beyond one country or one specific issue. I make an offer on behalf of my colleagues in DFID: perhaps they can write to him to deal with the general issue of conditionality in light of today's specific suggestion.

The problem of caste-based or descent-based discrimination manifests itself in a range of thematic areas, including contemporary slavery, racism, religious discrimination, poverty reduction, and social exclusion. That means that there are many angles from which to raise, and to tackle, this issue. Wherever poverty adversely affects people's enjoyment of their rights, we support country-led development agendas. We also encourage partner Governments to develop policies to take into account the needs of all groups in society.

A striking feature of caste discrimination is its intersection with bonded labour, where a person is required to give their labour as security for a loan. With literally nothing else on offer, that person is open to exploitation and is trapped into working for little or no pay until the debt is repaid. Sometimes, entire families are bonded or debts are passed down through generations. I say that with some personal feeling, given that when I was the Minister in the Foreign Office with responsibility for south Asia I had the privilege of visiting a DFID-funded project in Nepal. It provides land and a means of sustenance for former bonded labourers through the freed Kamaiya food security programme. It has supported a number of activities including income generation, scholarships and access to drinking water and sanitation, in partnership with international, national and local non-governmental organisations. The work continues through a number of smaller-scale projects under the community support programme.

Mention of Nepal reminds me of the earlier point that my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West raised in respect of the Gurkhas. I am aware that recruitment takes place in Nepal, but I was unaware of the specific issue that he identifies. I give an undertaking that I will raise that matter with the relevant Minister in the Ministry of Defence.

I can assure hon. Members that the Government take this issue seriously. It is an issue on which, not least on the basis of the discussion that we have had today, there is great strength of feeling in this House. I know of the concern that is felt not only by Members of this House but by the many campaigners outside the House who have brought the issue to the attention of parliamentarians. That is why I offer this assurance: we will continue in our efforts to address the poverty, injustice and discrimination to which this issue contributes.

Ardmore Peninsula, Sutherland (Mail Deliveries)

12.25 pm

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): I am grateful to have this opportunity to raise the vital issue for my constituents on the Ardmore peninsula of mail deliveries, the cessation of which threatens the very existence of that small and vibrant community.

Perhaps it would be helpful if I were to explain where the Ardmore peninsula is. It is to be found on the west coast of Sutherland, to the south of Kinlochbervie. It is a small crofting township, comprising some half dozen or so households. There is also an important business located in it. It was founded by John Ridgeway, who is perhaps better known to Members as one half of the team of Chay Blyth and John Ridgeway that rowed across the Atlantic. He founded a very successful adventure school on the peninsula, which has been in operation for some 40 years.

Ardmore is in many ways typical of the remote west coast townships in my constituency and of many other communities in the west highlands, but it is atypical in one regard. Many such communities have withered and died in the modern era, but Ardmore has flourished and succeeded. It has made the most of its environment, and has a business that keeps it going.

Mail deliveries are essential for that business, but in March Royal Mail ceased to deliver mail to the Ardmore township. It cited two grounds for that. The first was that it was caught by the 15-minute rule exception—the rule by which, if it takes more than 15 minutes to deliver to a dwelling, Royal Mail can apply for an exemption from the universal service obligation.

Therefore, I should perhaps explain the access that there is to the township. From the main road, a single-track road goes most of the way to the township, but for the final part of the journey that becomes a one-and-a-half-mile path. It is a public path that is maintained by the Highland council, which has the responsibility of looking after it. I should also mention that the last part of the path is a steep rise through what is described as a waterfall.

Let me deal with the issue of the 15-minute rule. In an e-mail to me of 28 March, Royal Mail stated:

> "Although this decision"—

the decision to cease delivery—

> "has been taken primarily following the recent accident it has also been taken due to the delivery time falling out-with the regulators set criteria. This is set at 15 minutes—where the postman should not be delivering for longer than this to one door."

Throughout its dialogue with me and the residents of Ardmore, Royal Mail has maintained that the 15-minute rule applies, irrespective of what might happen with regard to health and safety. However, when Postwatch looked into this matter, it found that that was not the case. It stated:

> "Royal Mail had cited two reasons for ceasing deliveries to the above-mentioned addresses; health and safety, and delivery to the properties exceeds 15 minutes . . . The Direction states that in order for an address to qualify as an exception under the 15 minute rule it must be a single premise and be located on a private road or track and the track may be in poor condition . . . Therefore the 15 minute rule does not apply in this instance. The issue for Ardmore is therefore a single issue of Health and Safety."

Therefore, my first question to the Minister is to ask him to confirm that that is indeed the case, and that we may set aside the 15-minute rule in respect of Ardmore.

On the matter of health and safety, on 15 March a temporary postman slipped and fell. He reported the incident and also reported suffering bruising. The Lairg delivery manager, who has responsibility for the area, carried out a health and safety assessment and recommended the cessation of deliveries. At that time, I asked Royal Mail for a copy of the risk assessment, which it sent. It is clear from that assessment that it was written with the objective of achieving the desired conclusion, of which I give one example, rather than going through it line by line. The assessment states that by this stage of the route

> "you have been walking for 38 minutes and it is difficult to keep concentration as you are very tired."

Earlier in the year, I actually walked the route. I am nowhere near as fit as I used to be and I indulge in too many cigars, but I managed to walk from start to finish in 27 minutes without breaking into a sweat. I suggest that that is the more proper time for completing the circuit.

What is perhaps more worrying is that when the residents obtained a copy of the health and safety assessment through the Freedom of Information Act 2000, which they were entitled to do, the copy that they received was substantially different from the original copy that I had received, as significant changes had been made.

Postwatch has made it clear that it will not challenge Royal Mail's health and safety finding, as it correctly points out that it is Royal Mail's statutory duty to provide a safe working environment and Postwatch will not challenge its conclusion. However, its independent assessor also it made clear that it is the very last part of the walk, the steep part by the waterfall, that is of particular concern. I find it curious that a path that is considered safe by Highland council for a three-year-old and a five-year-old to walk to and from school every morning and evening, which is used throughout the year by thousands of visitors of all ages to access the adventure school, and which is used—obviously—by residents, and by tradesmen and other visitors, should be of such singular concern to Royal Mail.

There is a compromise that could be acceptable to the community, that the deliveries would be resumed to a point at the base of the waterfall where there is a fence. When I walked the path I was very pleasantly surprised, because there are a great many paths in the other part of my constituency, in Caithness, some of which even fall within my property, which are in nowhere near the same condition. The path is rather good and up to the fence it is reasonably level; it undulates rather than rising steeply. The community proposes that a post-box is placed at that point, which would be visible from their houses. The residents could then make the arduous ascent and descent to collect their mail. I ask the Minister to use his good offices to ensure that Royal Mail considers that option and, I hope, accepts it.

In the words of the residents,

> "mail deliveries are the survival artery of the business community here."

The Scottish Executive's policy objective in Scotland—I am sure that it is shared in Westminster—is to encourage remote and fragile communities to survive, therefore diversification into the kinds of business that they have is vital. For their success in the modern era, it is vital that arteries such as the mail continue to enable them to survive.

I have always suspected that the decision was not really about health and safety, but far more to do with cost-cutting and with removing the costlier ends of the spectrum from the universal service obligation. I also suspect that the decision could be the first of many in my constituency and others like it in rural areas. We have heard a great deal during the last week about Royal Mail's profitability and its desire to become a viable and competitive business. I hope that that will not be achieved by shedding the more costly aspects of the universal service obligation.

Will the Minister commit today to a truly universal service obligation? Will he confirm that the 15-minute rule exception does not apply in this case? Will he confirm that a decision taken under the health and safety exemption is a temporary exemption and that it can and will be reviewed on a regular basis? Would he support the proposed compromise, which should go a long way to solving the perceived problems of delivery and would be—if not entirely—a satisfactory answer for the residents? Will he help a flourishing community in a remote part of Scotland to continue to flourish?

12.36 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Barry Gardiner): I am tempted to begin by saying that we must stop meeting like this, Miss Widdecombe. I am delighted to serve under your chairmanship and all the more so because I know of your keen interest in the rural post service. I congratulate the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) on doing exactly what a constituency MP should do: representing the needs and concerns of his constituents in a matter that is exceedingly important to them. He has done that clearly and set out proper concerns about mail deliveries in his constituency. I hope that I shall be able to address all his points.

It might be helpful if I begin by setting out the background to the restructuring of Royal Mail over the last four years, the universal service obligation, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned, and the framework for UK postal services. My right hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Ms Hewitt), then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, made two statements in the House in March 2002 and June 2002 following the announcements by Allan Leighton, the chairman of Royal Mail, then known as Consignia, about the company's three-year plan to restructure its postal services.

Nobody could have disputed that restructuring of Royal Mail was needed. The company was showing a pre-tax loss of £1.2 billion in 2001–02. Even allowing for exceptional costs from restructuring, there was still an underlying loss of £318 million on day-to-day operations. The company was losing more than £1 million every working day. The aim of the company's three-year renewal plan was to reduce costs by £1.4 billion a year, wipe out these losses and return the business to profit by April 2005.

I am pleased to say that Royal Mail has returned to profitability and the management have got to grips with costs and reduced overheads. The latest figures published last week for the half year to 30 September 2005 show that Royal Mail Group made an operating profit of £159.3 million. These interim results show a 20.5 per cent. improvement on the previous year's figure. As hon. Members will have seen, that performance was tempered by the 1.2 per cent. fall in mail volumes and by the size of Royal Mail's pension deficit.

Nobody should underestimate Royal Mail's achievement. The chairman, board, management and particularly the work force should all be congratulated on their efforts to turn the company around. However, Royal Mail still faces a huge challenge to build on this success and secure long-term sustainable profitability in a liberalised postal services market.

It was unfortunate, although perhaps not surprising, that Royal Mail's quality of delivery dipped for a while during the implementation of the renewal plan. There was a lot of media interest and justifiable concerns were expressed by customers about the poor performance they were receiving. However, it was a period of great change for Royal Mail—certainly the largest in its recent history and one with few parallels in British industry. Major changes were made simultaneously across Royal Mail's huge operational infrastructure—transport, sorting and delivery. Allan Leighton and Adam Crozier, Royal Mail's chief executive, held up their hands and apologised for the dip in service. Both gave personal assurances to the Government that they would give quality of service top priority.

The quality-of-service figures for the first half of the year were published last week and they are very encouraging indeed. The delivery of first class stamped and metered mail stands at 93.9 per cent. and is thus running at record levels. That performance beats the newly increased target of 93 per cent. as well as any performance that Royal Mail has ever achieved in the past. In northern Scotland, the figures for the most recent period indicate that Royal Mail delivered more than 96 per cent. of first class letters the day after posting. Royal Mail believes that 11 of its 15 quality targets are achievable this year.

We welcome those figures, which show a continued improvement in Royal Mail's quality of service results. Royal Mail and, in particular, the dedicated postmen and postwomen up and down the country, should be congratulated on their performance. However, the company recognises that it still needs to do a great deal. Market developments and changing customer needs continue to stimulate service improvement. Put simply, Royal Mail cannot take its customers for granted. Quality of service remains the board's top priority, because it cannot compete in a fully liberalised market if it does not get that right. The Government are confident that the company remains committed and determined to raise the quality of its service and that it will continue to focus special attention on those areas of the UK where local problems still undermine customer confidence.

The Government believe that they have established the right framework for the postal services market and Royal Mail. We have given Royal Mail greater commercial freedom in the public sector, established independent regulation as required by the EU postal services directives, and strengthened consumer representation. That policy was clearly set out in the White Paper "Post Office Reform: A World Class Service for the 21st Century", which was published in 1999 and implemented through the Postal Services Act 2000.

[Barry Gardiner]

Underpinning the framework is the continued provision of the universal service at affordable prices. That is my first assurance in response to the questions asked by the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross. That is why the obligation is enshrined in primary legislation in the Postal Services Act—the first time that any Government had done that—and why Postcomm's only statutory duty is to ensure the provision of a universal postal service at an affordable uniform tariff.

The universal service as written into the law—in section 4 in part I of the Postal Services Act—guarantees the following: a delivery every working day to homes across the UK, a collection every working day from access points throughout the UK, and a uniform and affordable price for posting letters and parcels up to 2 kg. In layman's terms, the universal service means that anyone in the UK can post letters and parcels to any other part of the country at the same affordable rates. It guarantees one delivery of mail for every UK household and business six days a week and one collection of mail six days a week. The Government aim to ensure that all UK postal users have access to postal services that are efficient, innovative and responsive to their needs. As the only licensed universal service provider in the UK, Royal Mail has the universal service obligation written into its licence.

There are exceptions to the universal service daily delivery, but exceptions can be allowed only in very specific and restricted circumstances. The Postal Services Act states that the universal postal service is provided

> "except in such geographical conditions or other circumstances as the Commission"—

Postcomm—"considers to be exceptional". The reason for building that exception into the Postal Services Act is clear. The Act recognises that there are or will be some circumstances in which it may be impractical to deliver and collect mail daily. The responsibility for determining those circumstances was conferred on Postcomm as part of its overall responsibility for operating the regulatory regime. It has approached the issue with proper diligence and care with a view to balancing the needs of the customer and the service provider—Royal Mail.

Following a wide-ranging consultation, Postcomm published a policy statement in January 2003, in which it explained the circumstances in which Royal Mail would be exempted from its licence requirement to deliver letters to all homes or premises every working day. The new direction specified two categories for long-term exceptions to the universal service daily delivery obligation: health and safety, and difficulty of access. Long-term exceptions apply to addresses on islands serviced by regular but not daily ferry or air services. In those instances, Royal Mail should provide deliveries on the days on which a ferry or air service is available.

Fewer than 1,100 addresses receive mail on fewer than six days a week, and three quarters of those are on islands without a daily ferry service. For the few islands and other locations accessible only by boat and without a ferry service, Royal Mail has to provide a postal delivery service not less than once a week, by boat, using local agents. Mail is available to pick up free of charge from the local delivery office on other days, for those customers who can get there. Customers are able to request a temporary suspension of the universal service—for example, if they want delivery only on particular days of the week.

Royal Mail has a legal duty to protect the health and safety of its staff. Where that is put at risk—because, for example, access to addresses is possible only across difficult terrain or over treacherous paths on mountainsides—the addresses concerned will be considered for exemption from universal service on health and safety grounds.

Royal Mail cannot unilaterally decide not to fulfil its licence obligations on an ongoing basis. Any exceptions to the universal service obligation require authorisation from Postcomm. Postcomm has ensured that there is a four-stage formal process by which potential and ongoing exceptions are carefully scrutinised by the regulator. It involves the attention of the consumer watchdog, Postwatch. The first two stages of the process involve risk assessments carried out by Royal Mail. At stage 3, Postwatch, the Consumer Council for Postal Services, takes a view on the case for exception. At stage 4, Postcomm carries out its own evaluation of the site before making a final decision on the case. The process is rigorous and inclusive and it ensures that all exceptions are properly justified.

Postcomm's exceptions policy is designed to ensure that the number of homes or premises exempt from delivery every working day is kept to a minimum. I understand that just over 3,000 addresses out of the 27 million in the UK—about 0.011 per cent., or 1 in 9,000—are exemptions from the universal obligation.

The hon. Gentleman has expressed his concerns about the situation facing some of his constituents on the peninsula. I understand that Postcomm has received "stage 4" universal service obligation delivery exception appeals from the residents of the crofting township of Ardmore, and from Royal Mail

The Ardmore residents and Royal Mail have asked Postcomm to reach a final decision on the debate, following the company's decision based on health and safety reasons to suspend daily deliveries to Ardmore. Royal Mail is, as I have mentioned., required by law to provide a safe working environment for its employees. As part of the exceptions appeals process, it has carried out two health and safety risk assessments of the track conditions in the area. On both occasions, it found the track to be unsafe. Postwatch, the consumer watchdog, also came to this conclusion at stage 3 of the appeals process.

Postwatch subsequently proposed a compromise solution: the positioning of a mailbox halfway along the track that Royal Mail had been using to make deliveries, at a point before the track reaches its most dangerous point. Royal Mail has argued that on this occasion, the compromise solution does not eliminate the health and safety risk to its employees, as the delivery officer will still be required to walk along the first part of the track to deliver mail to the box. I understand that the residents' appeal is based on a view that the track is not so dangerous that their addresses should be exempted from the universal service obligation of delivery direct to their doors.

In accordance with the agreed process for determining appeals, Postcomm has arranged to visit the site at Ardmore. The visit is scheduled to take place on 1 December. The aim is to gain a first-hand account of the background to the appeals case and to take a view on the specific conditions affecting delivery. In line with its policy on determining USO exception appeal cases, Postcomm will be accompanied by an independent health and safety consultant who will be required to carry out a health and safety assessment of the access track used by Royal Mail to deliver to the properties in question.

In due course, the consultant will produce a report summarising the findings from the site visit and recommend what can be done to reduce any identified risks to an acceptable level so that Royal Mail can resume daily delivery. Postcomm will consider that independent health and safety advice and any other relevant facts before a fully informed decision can be taken on the future delivery of mail to these addresses. I am confident that the process that Postcomm has put in place is rigorous, inclusive and robust enough to produce the right decision.

John Thurso: I asked the Minister about the 15-minute rule exception. I am grateful for everything that he has said about the robustness of the processes, but will he say why Royal Mail maintained absolutely in an e-mail to me and throughout subsequent conservations between its authorities and the residents that the addresses were subject to the 15-minute rule, and why it sought to back off from that assertion only when Postwatch visited and ruled in its submission that the addresses were not subject to that rule? Is not that indicative of a desire to close the matter regardless of that submission?

Barry Gardiner: I shall talk about the 15-minute rule in a moment. First, let me respond by changing things around slightly. Postcomm, not the Royal Mail, designated the 15-minute rule and decided that there should be no limit on the additional road distance travelled by a postal delivery vehicle to reach an address over a public or a private road that is maintained in good condition. There is a round-trip limit of 15 minutes on the extra time that the Royal Mail must spend on delivering mail on foot or by the vehicle used for the delivery route along a private road or track where access conditions are poor but not so poor that the address is excepted on health and safety grounds.

John Thurso: My point is that the road is a public road. Until 20 years ago, the post was delivered by bicycle along the track. It is not quite up to bicycling standards now, but it is certainly up to walking standards.

Barry Gardiner: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. I was simply stating the conditions under which the 15-minute rule applies, while making the point that the 15-minute rule was designated by Postcomm, rather than by the Royal Mail as he implied. If the track is public—he has told the House that it is—the 15-minute rule, as I understand it, clearly does not apply. I believe that Postcomm has conceded that already, but that the focus of stage 4 of its investigation is on health and safety. Those are the matters on which we should focus.

The hon. Gentleman also asked whether this was simply a cost-cutting exercise. I do not believe that a minor incident has been exaggerated so that costs can be cut in rural deliveries. Royal Mail has been working very hard to improve its safety record, and the number of accidents has decreased considerably in recent years. Most accidents that occur when someone is accessing customer premises do not result in a suspension of delivery, and cost is certainly not a consideration in assessing whether a situation is safe. The process put in place by Postcomm is robust enough to ensure that any exceptions are properly justified under its long-term categories.

I am confident that this is not a case of people simply saying, "Wouldn't it make life simpler and cheaper for us not to have to deliver to these rather remote addresses?" Royal Mail delivers regularly to such addresses throughout the country and it is happy and proud to maintain the universal service obligation, so I do not believe that we are talking simply about a cost-cutting exercise. I am advised that the postman who suffered the accident was a mountaineer. I have not travelled the track as the hon. Gentleman has.

John Thurso: It might help the Minister to know what the craic, as they call it, is in Kinlochbervie. All the other postmen were issued with high-quality mountain boots to enable them to go along the track. The casual postman, who as the Minister says was a mountaineer, had not been issued with those boots. The view is that he reported the accident in the hope that he would be issued with a good set of boots.

Barry Gardiner: That is a good story and I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman has relayed it to the House this morning.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether the health and safety exemption was temporary or permanent and put a question mark over any permanency. There may be points on which the health and safety exemption could be made permanent, but I imagine that the situation that we are discussing is remediable if the track is improved to such a level that it becomes safe for Post Office officials to walk it. Exceptions are, in any event, subject to annual review or an intermediate review at a customer's reasonable request, so the matter would always be open to reinspection.

I firmly believe that the Government have established the right framework not only for the postal services market and Royal Mail, but to deal with the problems that have arisen in the specific case that we are discussing. We have given Royal Mail greater commercial freedom in the public sector, established independent regulation as required by the EU postal services directive, and strengthened consumer representation. Postcomm's primary duty remains to ensure the provision of the universal service obligation.

Adequate procedures are in place to examine exceptions to the universal postal service. They are being applied in the present case and are ongoing. It is not for the Government to become involved in decisions on deliveries to specific areas; that is, rightly, Postcomm's ultimate responsibility. I am confident that Postcomm is fulfilling its duty correctly in this instance and I hope that, after 1 December, when the final phase 4 inspection takes place, a satisfactory compromise can be agreed between the hon. Gentleman's constituents and Royal Mail. I congratulate him on raising his constituents' concerns so effectively in the House today.

[Barry Gardiner]

Enterprise (Wakefield)

12.59 pm

Ed Balls (Normanton) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity at this my first Adjournment debate to raise an issue that is of real importance to my constituents and to our district. It is about how we can boost levels of enterprise in Normanton and the Wakefield district, and help more young people to fulfil their dreams while making our economy stronger and fairer. I am also grateful to the Minister for agreeing to the debate. His commitment to the area was testified when he toured Yorkshire on 4 November to see our local progress in enterprise, skills and technology. He said:

> "It is evident that the Yorkshire and Humber region is breaking through in a number of important enterprise areas where others could follow."

My right hon. Friend shares my belief, as do my hon. Friends the Members for Wakefield (Mary Creagh) and for Hemsworth (Jon Trickett), that enterprise and skills are critical for the future economic success of not only my Normanton constituency, but the Wakefield district and Yorkshire.

Last week was national enterprise week, a campaign backed by the Government as well as the Confederation of British Industry, the Institute of Directors, chambers of commerce, the Federation of Small Businesses, Business in the Community and the Prince's Trust, which organised 2,000 events throughout the country—twice as many as the year before—that involved young people in enterprise. It focused, in particular, on women's enterprise and social enterprise.

The make your mark campaign is about bringing together an unprecedented coalition of businesses, charities and education bodies to make enterprise a reality for young people aged 14 to 30. In my constituency, many school pupils and college students were involved in enterprise activities last week, not least at Wakefield college, where on Friday an enterprise fair was organised at which I was interviewed by music students from the college who were learning how to run their own radio station. The interview was tough, but fair.

The Minister might ask why I chose this week to debate enterprise in the Wakefield district, when last week was national enterprise week. Last Friday, an important announcement was made that could have profound and historic implications for the district. The national enterprise campaign decided that, over the next two years, it will run and fund local enterprise campaigns throughout the country that can act as demonstration hubs of what can be done locally. It chose four areas for the hubs: Liverpool, Coventry, Lowestoft and, of particular importance to me and my colleagues, the Wakefield district.

The national enterprise campaign plans to invest £500,000 over the next two years in a local campaign to promote enterprise among young people. It will work with schools, local businesses, youth organisations, the local council and Members of Parliament. It will be based on the same principles that inspired the national campaign over the past few years—to motivate young people, to inform them and to allow them to make connections, and to influence local bodies to come together and support them. The same will happen locally.

The Minister might wonder why the Wakefield district has been chosen as the place to demonstrate to the rest of Britain how successfully a local enterprise campaign can be run. Our district has been chosen for three reasons. First, it has great economic potential. It is a great location in which the M1, the M62 and the A1 all intercept. It is truly the crossroads of Britain. We have a good industrial, mining and manufacturing tradition. There are many fine local companies, but new investors have also come into our district, such as Asda, Coca Cola, Next, Pioneer and Xscape, the second indoor ski centre in Britain. We have great skills and a hard-working work force. Over the past few years, unemployment has fallen below the national average as employment has risen.

At the same time, everyone in our district accepts that we have not yet taken proper advantage of our potential. Levels of adult skills in the work force lag behind the Yorkshire national averages. Too many young people still leave school at 16 without going to college, undertaking an apprenticeship or staying on in some form of education and therefore obtaining skills for the future. We have lower levels of business creation than other parts of the country. We have only 29 new businesses per 10,000 residents. In Yorkshire and Humber, the number is higher at 32 new businesses, while the United Kingdom average is 38. The highest number of start-ups in our region is 49, which is almost twice as many as in our area. Therefore, the second reason why our area was chosen is that we have the potential to change.

The third reason is the determination in our district to turn around statistics and to take advantage of our location and potential, and for Wakefield to lead again in the economy of the future, just as the north of England and our district led industrialisation in the 19th century. In our district, we are determined that we should lead again in the new industrialisation of the 21st century, not only closing the north-south divide, but allowing Wakefield to catch up with and even surpass our neighbours. That is not just my view. A year ago, our local authority decided, in response to the northern way initiative, to set up what we call the Wakefield way, to work out how our district should respond economically to the regional and national challenges, and look, for example, at how we can tackle the numbers of people on incapacity benefit and boost skills in the adult work force, regenerate our town centres and boost levels of enterprise in our community.

We also have regional support. Yorkshire Forward, our regional development agency, is a member of the Wakefield way and has backed the local make your mark campaign. Many local businesses are actively involved. I have had commitments in the past week from a number of businesses, not least from Coca Cola, whose bottling plant in my constituency is the largest in the world, actively to engage in our local enterprise campaign and visit district schools, and many other companies are willing to do the same.

We also have interest from schools, where head teachers are enthusiastic about the new opportunities that our make your mark campaign can bring, and from young people. To give one example of the commitment in our area to tackling these issues, only last week Connexions organised a careers fair for modern apprenticeships, which took place on a rather cold Thursday evening last week, and between 100 and 200 people were expected to attend. In fact, the queue looped round the streets of the Wakefield district as more than 500 people came to find out about apprenticeship options and see how they could take up those opportunities. There is a real desire among young people to engage.

Last week I visited Sheridan, a company in my constituency that was started in Leeds by two Normanton residents to make bespoke table tops and work surfaces for kitchens and bathrooms. Their company now employs more than 150 people and it is relocating from Leeds to Wakefield with a £4 million new investment, because they decided that if they wanted the business to expand and grow, with the space to do so, an authority that would back them, and the available skills, it was better for them to come to Wakefield. That is another sign of local commitment to enterprise, the strengths of our area and also the strengths of young people who have made their mark and started businesses that are now flourishing in our district.

Two weeks ago, in a local school, I met a young former pupil from Freeston school, who is now playing professional rugby at Warrington, and a 16-year-old from my constituency called Leeanne Newton, who, while studying for A-levels, is the number one in England at karate and the number three in the UK, with the potential to win a gold medal, if we can persuade the International Olympic Committee to allow karate at the 2012 Olympics.

As well as commitment from young people, we also have real commitment from the wider community. Our make your mark campaign is backed not just by the Yorkshire Evening Post and Ridings FM, our local radio station, but also the Wakefield Express, which is a high-selling local newspaper with some of the best regional business and enterprise coverage of any local newspaper that I have ever seen. So, we have a real commitment to make the initiative work. The national enterprise campaign was inspired by our potential, the gap and the ground that we need to make up, and also by the local commitment across the community to make it work.

I am sure that the Minister agrees that building an enterprise culture is critical if every young person in our district and throughout the country is to fulfil their dreams, whether they want to get an apprenticeship, go to university, write a film script, start a rock band or run their own business. If we in Wakefield could raise our game to the Yorkshire average, 1,500 new businesses would be created every year, and if we could raise that to meet the UK average, 3,000 more businesses would be created every year. Our target for the next few years should be to raise our game to the Yorkshire and then the national levels. As well as encouraging more young people to start businesses, if we can find in our district the next Kaiser Chiefs, and make sure that they come not from Leeds but from Wakefield, we will be putting Wakefield on the map for culture, too.

I thank the Minister in advance for replying to this debate. Can he assure me and my colleagues that the Government will continue to support enterprise among young people, the national enterprise campaign and the four local campaigns over the next two years? Will he encourage our regional development agency to give strategic support to our area, so that we can fulfil our potential, and the potential of our young people? Will he encourage his colleagues at the Department for Education and Skills to throw their full weight behind the initiative in order to boost enterprise and education in the curriculum? Also, will he encourage all schools to back the campaign, and in particular ensure that all teachers have the training and resources to back enterprise in the curriculum?

[Ed Balls]

Finally, will the Minister come and visit our district in the next two years to see how we are doing, to encourage us in our efforts to boost local investment and jobs, and to back us as we fulfil our ambition to make Wakefield district the enterprise capital of not only Yorkshire but Britain?

1.11 pm

Jon Trickett (Hemsworth) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton (Ed Balls) on securing this debate and on the role that he has played in encouraging enterprise, both as part of his present duties as a Member and in his previous role in the Exchequer.

If I may reflect on my own life for a moment, I left school with no qualifications; in fact, the head teacher said: "Trickett, perhaps you shouldn't return for the exams, since you're clearly not going to be too successful." For a while, I wondered what to do, and eventually I joined my father and grandfather in the building industry. I became self-employed and ran a business for a number of years during the Conservative Administration. That was a time when small businesses such as mine suffered from a surfeit of regulation, but that is another story.

Wherever I go in Wakefield—I represent the south-east of the district—I encounter people with similar life histories to mine. They have a dream and they have skills; all that they need is a little advice and support to realise their dream of running a small business that will perhaps one day grow into a larger one. We very much welcome the initiative and thank the Government for making it possible.

I want to reflect on another aspect of enterprise. We can define enterprise as someone having a dream, and then making that dream happen. Wherever I go in the 22 small villages and towns that I represent, I encounter people who have a dream, and who, occasionally, are struggling to make it happen. I describe those people as social entrepreneurs. They tend to invent a series of mechanisms to achieve what they want. I will briefly describe some of them.

In Upton there is a piece of land worth £2 million. It belongs to the local parish council. If it can be developed, that money would be used to develop sports facilities for the local rugby club, but there is no mechanism to achieve that at the moment. In Moorthorpe, St. Luke's church has created a crèche providing care for very young children whose mothers need to go out to work. A small surplus generated from that was used to open a shop selling second-hand clothes to very poor people in the area. Ten per cent. of the profits from those two enterprises go immediately to Romania, of all places, to help women who have fallen into prostitution.

In Featherstone, a range of local sports clubs have joined with the Featherstone Rovers in an attempt to build a sporting village. The village is badly in need of regeneration, and people there have very poor health. It would be wonderful to encourage sport and exercise, and to achieve our ambitions to create a healthier community. The facilities are very run down, but the land is there, as are the buildings, although they need investment. People of the area now understand that they need some sort of corporate vehicle in order to take their ambitions forward.

In Hemsworth, there is the Spring Life group, a small, church, faith-based group. It has created a healthy living centre. Again, we are talking about an area of very poor health. That now employs one person. There are a number of volunteers working there, in a local shop right in the middle of Hemsworth. Again, some small employment is being achieved, which gives assistance to those living in hell as a result of the long-term effects of the mining industry, in which all the villages that I represent were involved.

All those and many other schemes have been started by people who are not motivated by profit, but want to create something in their community, having recognised a need. Another scheme was started in Fitzwilliam. Kinsley, a former pit site, was in a shocking state, with the land derelict and poisoned. Two women, Anne and Margaret, got together and found the money, which, through their initiative and entrepreneurial skills, they converted into a wonderful park. What those entrepreneurial people need most frequently is a corporate vehicle—a not-for-profit company, co-operative or some other mechanism—to help them to achieve their objectives. I hope that, as well as stimulating private entrepreneurs, we do not forget that our communities need social enterprises of that kind. If we are to define enterprise as having a dream and then making it happen, I hope that that kind of initiative will help all those people and many others.

1.17 pm

Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton (Ed Balls) for initiating this timely debate and for his excellent work in this area. I attended with him the launch of the make your mark campaign at Outwood Grange college last Friday and was really impressed by the young people and business representatives whom I met.

As part of national enterprise week, I followed my trip to my hon. Friend's constituency with a trip to Wakefield college, which had been showcasing young businesses all day. I was there last year too, before I became a Member of Parliament. Wakefield college is a centre of vocational excellence in enterprise, which gives the district a head start in creating an enterprise culture. However, I was disappointed this year, because I arrived just as all the stores had shut up and I was too late to do my Christmas shopping. My disappointment increased when I discovered that the start-ups that I had missed included a shoe company called Kitten Heels, which I thought sounded promising, a lingerie company and, best of all, a chocolate company. The lesson for all politicians is to make sure they get there on time and have a chance to spend some money with these new companies. I shall make sure that I arrive a little earlier next year.

I am particularly glad that enterprise week is a national event, as there was clearly an exponential growth in the number of people attending this year. We need more entrepreneurship education, so that young people have a greater financial understanding, as well as the confidence and the aspirations to go out into the world and achieve their dreams. I believe that the make your mark campaign will go a long way to providing that education and creating a solid foundation. However, we must also address the gender gap and encourage young women to start their own businesses. A couple of months ago I led an Adjournment debate in this Chamber that looked at the difference in the numbers of men and women who start their own businesses. Young women have all sorts of extra barriers to doing so, such as child care responsibilities, very low incomes and lack of capital.

A number of projects in Wakefield help young women to start their own businesses. As my hon. Friend said, Yorkshire Forward has a women's enterprise strategy, and West Yorkshire Enterprise Agency Ltd. has a women's network that brings women together from across the county. I attended its monthly networking meeting in September and met some of the women business leaders who are putting our area on the map.

To return to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Jon Trickett), Wakefield has several excellent social entrepreneurs. A new community centre in St. Swithun's at Eastmoor now has a healthy living centre and a crèche, which my son attends. There is also a new Denby Dale centre, which has been given by the mill owner, where community enterprises can start their businesses.

In short, I would be keen to hear what plans my right hon. Friend the Minister has to address the gender gap in non-gender specific roles, and I wonder whether our education system can support social entrepreneurs and help young people to aspire and achieve their dreams.

1.21 pm

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Alun Michael): I think that this is the first time, Miss Widdecombe, that I have had the pleasure of serving under your eagle eye in Westminster Hall. I shall behave myself.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton (Ed Balls) for initiating this debate. What we heard from him and from my hon. Friends the Members for Wakefield (Mary Creagh) and for Hemsworth (Jon Trickett) demonstrates that Wakefield is lucky to have such a strong team of representatives, who clearly believe in driving enterprise forward in the area.

I am extremely pleased that Wakefield was chosen as one of the first places in the United Kingdom to run a make your mark local enterprise campaign. I suspect that there are three reasons for that. The first is the partnership demonstrated today, with my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton being supported vigorously and knowledgably by his two colleagues. That makes clear their local leadership. Secondly, my hon. Friend referred to the determination to change the face of the local area and its statistics, because of the human misery that goes with underperformance. Thirdly, my hon. Friend showed leadership today by voicing the will and determination of the local area not only to be selected but to use the opportunity to the full. I congratulate him on that.

I will do all that I can to support national enterprise week, and the expansion of those activities throughout the year. I have met people from Enterprise Insight on several occasions to try to ensure that we do as much as possible this year, and to throw the full weight of the Department of Trade and Industry behind enterprise week. My hon. Friend may be interested to know that we will have a manufacturing day next year, as well as the social enterprise and the women's enterprise days that took place this year. Manufacturing is still crucial to the economy, and it needs that specific focus.

I also agree with my hon. Friend on the importance of working in close co-operation with colleagues in the Department for Education and Skills. The money going into enterprise education is crucial, but one of the messages that I have been trying to put across to business leaders is the importance of them engaging with schools that are undertaking enterprise education. We do not want enterprise talked about; we want young people to get the feel and the smell of enterprise from those who have done the work of setting up their own businesses. In that way, they will understand the options before them. I am happy to promise to visit Wakefield to see how it is developing. There are some real challenges in the Yorkshire and Humberside area, and a variety of approaches is being taken in a number of towns and cities, which will be particularly interesting for us all.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield referred to a range of imaginative enterprises, and she rightly underlined the importance of women's enterprise. Were we to have the same proportion of women running businesses as the United States, we would have another 750,000 businesses. Think what contribution three quarters of a million more businesses could make to the economy. Promoting women's enterprise is not only a question of enterprise and economy; it is also a question of equality. I am pursuing the matter in conjunction with the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Meg Munn), who is enthusiastically dealing with such issues in the DTI.

I was pleased to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth refer to social enterprise. He spoke of having a dream and making it happen. People aspiring to live in a better society and making change in a business-like way is what underpins the community interest company that we launched recently. It makes it easier for people to become involved in real businesses—ones that address the triple bottom line of achieving commercial, environmental and community value. That contribution to the economy should not be underestimated.

Promoting enterprise involves engendering a can-do approach to life and business. Specifically, the make your mark campaign gives Wakefield a unique opportunity to promote enterprise and to inspire its young people to turn their ideas into reality by launching businesses and community projects and by developing new ideas in existing organisations.

Wakefield is one of only four places in England that have been chosen for these intensive local campaigns. The others are Liverpool, which I visited recently,

[Alun Michael]

Coventry and Lowestoft. Each has been chosen because senior local figures are willing to act as champions for the campaign. Moreover, key local and regional organisations are working in partnership to run the campaign. Importantly, each area has a sense of identity. Local people share a sense of place and community.

The aforementioned leadership is important, and Wakefield clearly has it. However, we must also promote activity in places where leadership is not so apparent. I look forward to working with my hon. Friends and others to promote ideas that spin out from what I hope will be considerable success in Wakefield. The make your mark campaign is the first business-led and Government-backed campaign of its type. It aims to kick-start an enterprise culture among the UK's young people, particularly those aged 14 to 30. The message at the heart of the campaign is that enterprise is about having ideas and ambitions, and about making those ideas and ambitions reality.

A coalition of business, charities, education bodies and Government supports the campaign to inspire young people to be enterprising, so that their ambitions can be expressed through business start-ups, through social and community enterprise and through becoming enterprising employees—people who make their ideas happen at work.

I have always favoured promoting the culture of an enterprising public sector as much as promoting the culture of an enterprising private sector. I hope that I contributed a little to that through my youth and community work. Life can be exciting in the public sector as well as in the private and third sectors.

The local campaign will use a proven coalition-building and campaigning approach. To summarise, the local enterprise campaign will seek to lead a coalition of partners that inspires young people to connect to the enterprise agenda. The campaign will bring together businesses, including regional development agencies, business links, enterprise agencies, local government economic development units and others to support and act to inform people who have a genuine desire to advance their ideas. It is important to form local networks to connect young people. Those networks will encourage peer-to-peer engagement and personal development.

We should not underestimate the extent to which peer influence brings about change. Young people look to their peers and to their peers' attitudes. The sky is the limit for a generation of young people who want to be enterprising. Enormous possibilities exist. It is also important to gather the necessary evidence in order to influence key players. We must lobby locally and nationally for resources to support what is essential work.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton on forming such a strong group in Wakefield. It includes the council leader, Councillor Peter Box; the chief executive, John Foster; the deputy chief executive, Tony Reeves; the director of education, John McLeod; the director of regeneration, Jonathan Hall; and Yorkshire Forward's deputy chief executive, Tom Riordan.

As my hon. Friend said, enterprise week was a great success this year. I am very impressed by the range of activities that took place in Wakefield: Wakefield goes live for "Children in Need"; the Wakefield media challenge; and Wakefield enterprise goes live, which was a young people's enterprise radio station.

That is an impressive basis on which to continue with the campaign for which Wakefield has been chosen after winning the national enterprise challenge. The campaign will also form an important part of Yorkshire Forward's activity. We want the regional development agencies to drive the enterprise agencies—

Miss Ann Widdecombe (in the Chair): Order.

Flood Prevention (London)

1.30 pm

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): I am grateful for the opportunity to have a short debate on flooding in London. I thank the Minister for attending and for his continuing interest and expertise in these matters. I look forward to a response.

I have asked for the debate now because of three interconnected issues. First, in my borough—although, as it happens, not in the part that I represent, but in Dulwich—significant flooding was caused last year by the drainage system not being able to cope. That was in April, when severe thunderstorms happened periodically across the city. The local authority, together with Lambeth, the authority next door, has completed its investigation and made recommendations as to what might be done.

Secondly, I represent a riparian constituency, which is nearly all extremely low lying. Indeed, almost nothing is above sea level and many homes and commercial properties in north Southwark and Bermondsey have below-river-level basements, living accommodation, cellars and storage places. There is general concern that we plan to ensure that the floods of yesteryear are not repeated in the years ahead.

Thirdly, a comprehensive study was undertaken by the London assembly and completed, as the Minister will know, a month ago. It was chaired by Darren Johnson with the participation of colleagues across the parties, including my colleague Mike Tuffrey, and has made some recommendations about what we should do for the future. It would be helpful to flag up what it suggested was the responsibility of the Government and of public agencies, and how there ought to be a response.

In the month that I was elected for the first time—February 1983—the Thames barrier opened for business. A year later, it was formally opened. I remember going to the event. It was an extremely cold day in what can be a fairly bleak bit of the Thames estuary in Woolwich. The Thames barrier has been a huge benefit to London. Ever since it opened, it has helped to prevent some of the flooding that we used to have in the part of London upstream of the barrier. Between Teddington lock, which I formally visited for the first time this summer, and the Thames barrier, there is a much greater sense of security than there used to be. Happily, the Thames Gateway has not been severely affected since the 1950s, when the whole of the east coast was severely affected by flooding.

The design and construction of the Thames barrier was based on projections up to 2030. Although it will be able to function after that, planning is now beginning to ensure that it will meet demands beyond that. My hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) submitted a written question not many months ago in which he asked the Secretary of State on how many occasions

> "the Thames Barrier has been closed in each year since its inception"— it is obviously closed to deal with the tidal surges—

> "and what estimate she has made of the number of occasions when it will be closed in (a) 2010, (b) 2020, (c) 2050 and (d) 2100."—[Official Report, 16 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 564W.]

It traces a pattern, which we would have expected, that shows that the climate is changing and the water level is rising. We need protection more than we used to and will need it even more in the future.

To select figures from the answer, the barrier was closed for tidal reasons once in the year it started, in 1982–83. A decade later, in 1993–94, it was closed seven times. In the last year for which we have figures available, 2004–05, it was closed three times. In 2000–01, it was closed 24 times and in 2002–03, 20 times. The Environment Agency expects 10 to 12 closures a year until the end of this decade, 20 to 35 by the end of the following decade, anything up to 75 closures a year by the half century and 325 a year by the end of the century. That is because, as the Minister will accept, the combination of climate change, heavy rains and rising sea levels causes the agency rightly to anticipate that it will be used much more.

There is another consideration to add to the list of concerns, which includes local issues relating to the capacity of the current sewerage system infrastructure to take away surplus rain and other water, and the safety of areas upstream from the Thames barrier. We must consider how we will cope with the projected house building and development in the Thames Gateway. Although it is welcome, it needs to be done in a way that gives people security.

When preparing for the debate, I noted that the Association of British Insurers estimates that the further investment in defences that will be needed for the whole of greater London is between £4 billion and £6 billion over the next 20 years—if development is allowed north and south of the river in the boroughs along the Thames in east London—if we are to do what Government planning, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and others want done.

I received an unsolicited but helpful note from the London borough of Barking and Dagenham. I am conscious that the riparian boroughs consider and plan for these things, and that they are on the case—as they should be. I hope that it is appropriate to get some of the planning work out into the open. Will the Minister do that in his reply?

I shall address the considerations that I listed in turn, starting with the lack of capacity in the sewerage or drainage system. Occasionally, we in London see how much pressure the system is put under when there is heavy or continuous rain. What does the Minister consider to be the ability of the responsible authority—Thames Water, under the regulation of Ofwat—to respond to the need for significant investment in drainage in London? Thames Water says that if it is to do that, it needs much more than Ofwat will allow it to raise. The Minister and I know that there is perfectly reasonable consumer pressure from our electors, who do not want their water bills to go through the roof, so there will always be tension between the water companies, which say, "Give us the money and we can do the work; we can make the drains work," and the regulator, which says that that is unreasonable.

Some parts of the drainage and sewerage system are old, and there is sometimes feedback of sewage into the Thames when there is flooding. That is highly undesirable. I do not detect any particularly political debate on that, and there is a general desire to get the infrastructure in place as soon as is practicably possible, so that there is capacity around the London boroughs to process normal or frequent heavy rainfall without a significant number of homes being flooded.

[Simon Hughes]

The number of homes flooded as a result of the flash floods in Southwark in April 2004 was just short of 1,000, and there was considerable inconvenience and cost to those concerned. That could happen anywhere. It happened to be there on that occasion, but Dulwich is not the most low-lying part of the city. It would help if the Minister said where the Government envisage their role to be in working with the water industry and regulator to ensure that the capital city functions well in terms of its capacity to deal with flooding. I know that local authorities such as mine would be happy to collaborate with him and his officials in future, as they have in the past.

By and large, people are happy to accept the reassurance that, barring the entirely unexpected, the area between Teddington lock and the Thames barrier should be safe from flooding. It would help if the Minister confirmed that and told us what is being done by his Department, the Environment Agency and the ODPM to deal with the small areas of the river bank where defences are weaker and need to be replaced. They are often perceived as crisis points, at which there is a confluence of small rivers coming into the Thames and with the Thames itself. It would also help to know that where there has been significant additional building on what used to be wharves—they became empty and are now residential homes, businesses and offices on the Thameside—those boroughs will be secure and people will know that they can plan ahead. That is the second issue.

On the Environment Agency's helpful website, on which people can type in their postcode to see what the flooding risks are, there is a map of London, showing where the risks are and fanning out as one looks downstream. I thank the agency for proactively and informatively trying to ensure that the public are informed. In the north of boroughs such as mine, we are, in theory, at risk. The Minister's assessment and analysis of what can be done, will be done and, with the Environment Agency, is planned to be done, would be helpful.

The third issue is the big one. If London is to expand as the Government anticipate it will, if there is to be the additional population for which the Mayor of London is planning, and if there are to be the additional homes that we need—we need a significant number of extra homes—it would be helpful to hear what the Government think about the policy for ensuring that development is reconciled with pressures on the land. I understand that some sensible strategies have been accepted and proposed.

I should like to put on the record the relevant recommendations from the London assembly investigation, which, having finished just a month ago, was timely. I understand that 120,000 new homes and 250,000 new jobs are proposed in the Thames Gateway. I am told that the evidence to its committee stated that 5 per cent. of defences were in a poor or very poor condition. That is not a huge amount, but it is significant and the defences must be dealt with. Some 1.25 million people are in the area and, were things to go wrong, they could be adversely affected.

The London Climate Change Partnership made the following projections for our changing weather during the next 70 years: winters will become wetter by up to 30 per cent.; heavy winter rainfall will occur twice as frequently; the number of storms each winter crossing the UK could increase from five to eight; relative sea level in the Thames estuary will continue to rise, reaching between 26 cm and 86 cm by the 2080s, with extreme sea levels experienced more frequently; and, finally, without flood defences, 15 per cent. of London's homes will suffer a 0.1 per cent. chance of tidal flooding each year. It is only 0.1 per cent., but it is significant, and that percentage will increase as the sea level rises.

Those are the pan-London figures, and the committee made the following recommendations. First, it recommended that the Government, the Minister's Department and the Environment Agency work out the funding mechanisms to ensure that the Thames estuary 2100 project, which will take safety beyond 2030 to the end of the century, is secure, can go ahead and can be planned with collaboration from other public authorities. It is early days, but I know that the project is in the sights of the Department and of London's government.

The second recommendation was that not only the tidal defences, but the other defences along the river are surveyed so that the survey is complete and up to date. The proposal is to complete it by the end of next year, so that any necessary work can be done in the few years after that. It would help if the Minister said whether the Government see themselves having any indirect or direct or role in that.

Thirdly, are the Government's strategic plans for housing in the Thames Gateway going to leave up to 40 per cent. of the land undeveloped to provide the capacity with which to take up any flooding or water need? One way to deal with the pressures of the build is to leave a lot of open space with the capacity to soak up any flooding. It would be reassuring to know that the Minister's Department was fully engaged with those plans so that we did not overdevelop. Overdevelopment would mean that many people who might have been encouraged to go to that part of the world will not or might not go, having been told by their insurers that it is a bad risk.

Fourthly, what are we doing to ensure that the new and old infrastructure of our roadways can cope? I am no engineer, but I understand that the surface of the road determines its effectiveness. The assembly committee recommended involving Departments, as well as others, to ensure that we have roadways that reduce surface water and serious flooding. Fifthly, are there proposed changes to the planning guidance to ensure that we build in the right place and in the right way, and that we do not over-pressurise the natural capacity of the river and the river defences to do their job properly, particularly along the Thames Gateway, but and also further upstream?

Lastly, how do Ministers plan to respond if anything untoward happens? Obviously, the principal responsibility in London lies with London government, but the central Government have rightfully asked whether they can assist in Carlisle, in Yorkshire and in other parts of the country, as we have seen. We would all rather not have to ask them to assist after the event. We would prefer people to say, "Thank goodness everything was in place and we were all secure."

I do not mean to suggest that there is huge alarm and panic; quite the contrary. I want this to be an opportunity for the Minister to assure people that things are in hand, that we are learning from past mistakes and experience, and that plans are in place, whether at borough level, at London level or at Government level, to ensure that London is as safe from flooding in the next 25 years as we have been in the 25 years since the Thames barrier was built.

1.47 pm

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): I congratulate the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) on his comprehensive little run-around on London's potential flood risks. There is no doubt that any major city with a tidal river and several waterways running into it is at risk. The Government's job is to work with local authorities and the Environment Agency to find ways of reducing that risk.

I am happy to address the points made by the hon. Gentleman, because London and the Thames estuary is generally very well protected. Most of the area is protected up to a standard of 1 in 2,000 years. A standard of 1 in 1,000 is very common in the gateway area, which is a pretty good level of protection.

The hon. Gentleman talked about non-fluvial flooding, which is flooding from drains and sewers, and that is a big issue. In the major floods of 2000, about 40 per cent. of properties were flooded from non-river sources such as blocked drains and sewers. We identified that issue in our policy paper "Making space for water", which examines all forms of flooding so that we can consider the matter holistically, recognising that flooding comes from several sources.

As part of the "Making space for water" initiative, the Department of Environment, Food and Rural Affairs will pilot integrated urban drainage partnerships in 2006-07 and publish its recommendations in 2008. We are trying to give the Environment Agency a much more strategic overview of all sources of flooding, and have allocated £2.1 million to those pilots. Several local authorities have expressed an interest in being part of them.

We also continue to promote the use of sustainable urban drainage systems where appropriate. We have developed an action plan to resolve any barriers to uptake. We are also working to improve the uptake of resilience and resistance measures so that households and businesses are better able to protect themselves from the effects of a flood.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the development of the Thames Gateway and the use of green space. I confirm that the green settlements will include green space, which will have the benefit of providing recreational areas, but can also be used for sustainable urban drainage. So there could be a number of uses, which are being addressed in the plans.

It is also true that there has been discussion on the design of roadways, so that they can be used to channel water away in the event of a flood event or an extreme downpour. I do not know how far that has been taken in the Thames Gateway, but I can confirm that it is a consideration. Also, the flood risk maps are important in providing information for people and have been well utilised through the Environment Agency website.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the state of river flood defences between Teddington lock and the Thames Gateway. Again, they are generally to a high standard. The Environment Agency is carrying out a survey of all flood defence assets, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned. Incidentally, the idea is that the survey is designed to look at all flood assets because not all flood defences are in the ownership of public authorities or the Environment Agency. There are privately owned flood defences; it is useful to know that, and to know their condition. If there are weaknesses within the flood defence network, they will be need to be addressed. That, as the hon. Gentleman says, is under way, and I am quite confident that the Environment Agency will deal with it.

As I was saying to the hon. Gentleman, we recognise that we have no room for complacency on any area in managing flood risk. Although standards are high in London, we need to ensure that they are up to date, properly maintained and fit for purpose. In terms of London's defences, apart from the well-known Thames barrier, there are 12 other major barriers, 36 industrial flood gates and over 330 km of tidal walls and embankments protecting the estimated 1.25 million people working and living in the tidal floodplain. The Thames barrier, and associated defences, provide London and most of the Thames estuary with a flood defence standard of one in 2,000 years, which is a high standard.

In addition, flood risk is being taken into account much more in the development of local and regional plans. For example, the London Development Agency is currently completing a strategic flood risk assessment for the lower Lea regeneration area. That includes taking into account the point that the hon. Gentleman rightly made—the increasing risk of climate change and its implications for more extreme weather events, and more winter rain. That is part of the modelling.

The 2030 issue is mentioned repeatedly with regard to the Thames barrier. Some people almost think that it will disappear in a puff of smoke in 2030. That may not be what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but some people are getting a bit carried away, saying, "Oh, it reaches the end of its life in 2030." Well, it does not. When it was originally built, the projections in sea level rises went up to 2030, so that post-2030 it may move from a standard of, for example, 1 in 2,000 years to 1 in 1,900. There is rising sea level in the east—as you will be aware, Miss Widdecombe, since it affects your own constituency. To compound further that rising sea level, south-east England is slowly sinking as the country tilts geologically. That, too, has to be taken into account—I believe it contributes about 2 mm of the projected sea level rise—but the Thames barrier has a considerable life yet.

What might need to be done in order to raise the efficiency of the Thames barrier would actually be to raise the outer London flood walls and flood embankment. That is taken into account in longer-term planning. The hon. Gentleman mentioned Thames Estuary 2100. The Environment Agency is developing a major flood risk management strategy to address how we can protect London over the next 100 years. We are trying to look ahead at the long-term implications. That study will examine the options and their technical, economic, environmental and social implications. TE2100 will also look at options for the Thames barrier. Barrier closures are increasing—as a consequence of rising sea levels, as anticipated by the Environment Agency—and the barrier can easily accommodate the predicted closure frequency for 2030.

[Mr. Elliot Morley]

This is an important and welcome study. It will be vital for informing our long-term plans for London and the Thames estuary. Taking steps now to identify future needs means we are less likely to be storing up trouble for the future. TE2100 will look at long-term flood management needs, but all decisions on planning, development and regeneration cannot await the outcomes of that project.

Development on the flood plain cannot be avoided completely. In many cases, there are compelling social and economic reasons for development to continue in such areas; that can prevent blighting areas. However, we must also make sure that flood risk is properly managed. For development to be sustainable, it must avoid flood risk where possible.

In that respect, Government planning policy statement 25 is being updated. It will give guidance to planning authorities about developments in flood plains. In some cases, it will be appropriate to reject planning applications because of flood risk. In other cases, it might be possible to accept them, but on the basis of a contribution being made by the developer in respect of mitigation not only for the development, but for implications for other existing development in the area. Most importantly, PPS25 proposes as part of the current consultation that if the advice of the Environment Agency is ignored by the planners—which I am glad to say happens in very few cases these days, but it does happen—it can ask the appropriate Minister to call in the application so that it can be properly examined. That is an important sanction.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the condition of sewerage. As part of the recent price review, the regulator made available to all the UK water and sewerage companies an additional £1 billion, to address sewer flooding. I do not know offhand what proportion of that was included in the Thames Water business plan, but I am sure that it has bid for a proportion of it to upgrade its sewers. I also know that its business plan includes upgrades for the three main sewage treatment plants in London to deal in particular with storm surges. That might not, in itself, tackle all the issues of drain and sewer flooding, but it will certainly help in a number of respects, not least in relation to storm discharges into the Thames. I welcome that investment.

The hon. Gentleman identified a range of serious issues that need to be addressed. The last one, which I did not mention, is resilience and contingency. We have contingency plans, which are regularly tested. There was a major recent test called Operation Triton. It was a desktop exercise involving breaches in the outer London defences—we did not actually dig the breaches in the defences. Its purpose was to test the responses of local authorities. The London resilience committees and sub-committees also deal with such major situations.

The defences are in good condition, and they are of a very high standard, but we do not take these matters lightly. We plan for the future. We are looking ahead for the next 100 years, and, given the importance of London and the need to protect lives and properties, people can have confidence that the necessary investment and commitment will be made.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Two o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 23 November 2005

[MR. ERIC ILLSLEY in the Chair]

UK Space Policy

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Heppell.]

9.30 am

Mr. Bill Olner (Nuneaton) (Lab): I declare an interest as the joint chair of the all-party group on space, which has the support of nearly 100 Members, from both Houses and from both sides of this House. I am delighted to see my co-chair, the hon. Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor), on the Opposition Front Bench, and to see the considerable number of members of the space group here. They, and you, Mr. Illsley, will know that my interest in space and my support for it in the House is of long standing.

I asked for this debate for a number of reasons. First, the relevance of space to all of us is growing. We live in an information age, and much is possible because of satellites. Television, mobile phones, weather forecasting and satellite navigation are just a few things that show that our lives increasingly depend on space technology. Increasingly, space applications play a crucial role behind the scenes, monitoring disasters, assisting in aid efforts and driving forward our understanding of climate change.

Secondly, today's debate allows us to pay tribute to the lead role of UK space in that revolution. That role has been possible only because of sustained development and investment in technology over the years. I give the hon. Member for Esher and Walton credit for his work as a Minister in the previous Government to advance joined-up thinking about space. Such thinking is crucial if the UK is to play a major role in Europe and across the globe and to get its share of space contracts in future.

In March and November, the world's biggest and most sophisticated telecommunications satellites were launched. The Inmarsat-4 satellite series was made in Britain by EADS Astrium and operated in Britain by Inmarsat, the world's most profitable mobile satellite communications company. That is a triumph both of British technology and of British business success in using that technology to ensure that profits are made for British business. It is a shining example of technology transfer really working, involving British technology moving through to a British business and on into the global marketplace, all of which is a huge success.

When UK space was not making the news, it was often behind the news. UK space is a vital part of the world's disaster monitoring and disaster management infrastructure, and British companies used British space technology this year to make a real difference to relief efforts after the Asian tsunami, the famine in Darfur and, most recently, the earthquake in Pakistan and Indian Kashmir. Our space industry is not just making money; it is saving lives.

It is no surprise that the space sector is seen by many countries as a prize asset and a strategic asset. Britain spends £195 million a year on civil space activities. That is equivalent to about a penny per person per day. Sadly, our level of spending as a proportion of gross domestic product is only 16th in the world; we are well behind the Finns and the Belgians. Although we do well, if we are to remain a world leader and a sharp cutter at the edge of this technology, we need more investment.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if the Government were to increase that money, it would be not expenditure but investment? It would repay itself, not only because of the commercial profitability of which he has spoken, but because the skills that our space industry is famous for encouraging would grow and prosper.

Mr. Olner: Yes. There is always a semantic difference about whether funding is an investment or a cost. Money invested is space is just that: an investment for the future. As I shall say a little later, it is an investment because of the amount of technical expertise in the industry. The figures will become clearer later, but an enormous number of graduates take up worthwhile and meaningful careers in the space sector. Investment in the industry not only repays itself; it is an investment into the education of some of our young people.

Across the UK, the space sector employs more than 15,000 people in more than 200 companies and offers some of the most exciting and rewarding work to be found anywhere. More than two thirds of the work force have a degree; they are probably the most highly skilled work force in British manufacturing, and they are adding value to Britain. By the Government's own measurement, the space industry is one of the most value-adding, generating about £4 billion a year for the British economy. The global space industry is growing at 15 per cent. a year—past investment is paying off.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on his speech about a very important subject. Although he calls for vast increases in investment in space activity, I am aware that he knows that a tremendous number of satellite operations have failed and that an extraordinary amount of rubbish is circulating the globe. Does he not think that Governments should invest, or have invested, huge amounts of money to clear up that mess before we further pollute the outer atmosphere of the Earth?

Mr. Olner: Yes, there is some space litter up there, and we probably need to pay attention to it. However, my hon. Friend's point about failed launches shows that, although we take for granted such things as getting a signal on our mobile phones or getting a television stream, such technology is at the cutting edge. Space technology is not just about pressing a button; it is not a given. There are real challenges out there, and I think they are being addressed by our companies. We have failures—our successes far outweigh them—which, unfortunately, are well publicised. The space industry is doing well in all that it does.

At the European Space Agency ministerial conference, the UK must decide where it is going—not just where space technology is going, but where the country is going. The UK Government must make two decisions if we are to sustain Britain's bank of space technologies, which generate wealth throughout the economy. We must subscribe at the same level to the Advanced Research in Telecommunications Systems technology investment programme. If space technology and the industry are to remain at the forefront of global efforts to combat climate change and develop a global early-warning system for natural disasters, we must play a leading role in the global monitoring for environment and security initiative. Those decisions will test the UK's aspirations to having a high-tech, highly skilled future and its global leadership in combating climate change.

[Mr. Olner]

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman for his long interest and expertise in the space sector. Does he agree that during the late evening debate on climate change last night, it was a little surprising that, in responding to my intervention, the Minister for Climate Change and the Environment did not appear to be entirely au fait with GMES and the role that the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has to play? Does he agree that that is slightly alarming, and that it will be interesting to see the Minister's written response to me, which I hope will arrive before the ESA ministerial conference?

Mr. Olner: I did not hear that intervention on the Minister last night, but I assume that he is more au fait with the issue now and that it will burn in his mind when the ministerial conference comes up. It is important that all sections of the Government know the UK's position in the field of space technology and how crucial it is to get proper support from the various Departments.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): I add my congratulations to the hon. Gentleman on securing this important debate. He mentioned the importance of GMES and UK space policy for helping to tackle climate change and for environmental monitoring. Does he agree that it is surprising that the UK Government are considering contributing only £3 million when a UK contribution of £11 million is required to fund GMES properly?

Mr. Olner: The hon. Lady makes an important point, which I was going to stress later: it is no good the Government just giving warm words and reassurance. Those things must be matched with investment—spending is not just expenditure; it is investment in the industry. It allows the UK to play a major role with the rest of its European competitors.

Space could well be used for many things. We all know that one of the Prime Minister's passions is Africa and how we are best able to help it. A company called Avanti is seeking to put a type of footprint over Africa that will allow various things on tele-medicine and tele-education to be streamed into Africa—things that we in Europe perhaps take for granted because we have overflying satellites that provide a footprint here. Unfortunately, the footprint is not as heavy as I would like it to be in Africa, and UK industry is able to play a role there.

Such a role brings the industry into contact with the natural hazard working group, which the Prime Minister set up after the Asian tsunami in December last year. Its report said that > "there is a clear need for a sustainable and effective global multi-hazard early warning system building on existing capabilities and frameworks."

Keeping our eye on the planet will help our ability to forewarn, particularly in Africa. Famine is one of the scourges in Africa, whose climate leads to failing crops. Being better able to predict and plan for such events will start to put the world in a better position to assist people living where natural disasters might occur.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend—I use that phrase as the hon. Gentleman is my co-chairman on the all-party group on space. Will he pay tribute to Surrey Satellite Technology Ltd's disaster monitoring constellation, which uses four big satellites and which is now part of a wider operation ensuring that natural disasters are monitored?

Mr. Olner: The amount of intelligence and skill that we have put up in the skies to be able best to monitor some of the natural disasters that happen all over the globe is not generally known about.

I hope that the Minister will address the point about DEFRA and the minimal UK contribution to GMES, because the UK needs to make its position known at the ESA ministerial meeting in December and needs to be a lead country in space. The fact that DEFRA plans to put in less than £2 million a year for the next two years is a disaster. That is part of a UK contribution totalling less than £3 million a year. If we were talking in billions or could add a couple of noughts to those figures, we could, and would, be looked at as a major player. Although £2 million or £3 million is still a lot of money to me—I still have not made my first million—in the run of things it is paying lip service to something that needs better investment.

Other hon. Members want to speak, so I will curtail my comments. Next month the Government face a decision. The question is not: "Are we in space or are we not in space?" It is far simpler than that. The question is whether we really want a high-tech, highly skilled economy and whether we really care about climate change and natural disasters. If the answer is yes, we need to sustain our support for ARTES and to play a leading role in GMES. Anything less would simply pay lip service to our vision of not only a better Britain, but a better world.

In my early teens, as an apprentice at Bristol Siddeley Engines, I developed a keen interest in space. In the early 1960s, we manufactured launchers. We have not manufactured many since, unfortunately, but the UK and its industries have since played a major role in harnessing for the betterment of mankind the advances in communication and observation that I have spoken about. We must not allow the position that we now enjoy to be lost. I look forward to hearing from the Minister the assurances that I and the industry require and which are so crucial.

9.46 am

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner) on securing the debate. As he said, it is important because of the ESA ministerial meeting that will take place on 5 and 6 December. He noted the small amount that this country spends on space activities. We have only to look at the expenditures of some other countries to see a stark difference. That is worrying. It is not that if we do not engage in space activity, it will not happen. If we do not engage in it, other people will. That means not just that we will lose out, although clearly we will, but that the skills associated with the space industry and the profit related to it—the wealth of a country can be measured in many ways—will be lost to this country and go elsewhere.

Where will those things go? Clearly the United States of America is spending vast sums on space activity—it always has—but we should look at China. It has an ambition to put a man or woman on the moon, and there are a number of other activities that the Chinese want to engage in. The Chinese do not want to do that for nothing. They know the importance of space, which is why they want to be involved and why they are spending somewhere in the region of $620 million on it. That figure will increase.

The decisions to be taken next month are important for us. The hon. Gentleman referred to the fact that DEFRA plans to spend something like £2 million a year on space, which is a ridiculous sum of money. He spoke about natural disasters and climate change. Everybody talks about climate change, and we must do a lot more about it, but that will not happen on its own. A vast amount must be invested and, frankly, £2 million is chicken feed in the context of what we need to do.

Mrs. Gillan: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is appalling that we spend about £195 million a year on civil space activities, whereas France spends €1.9 billion and Germany spends €850 million? Our spending on civil space activity falls behind 15 other countries, including Finland and Belgium.

Mr. Evans: It is embarrassing. I am looking at the tables showing what other countries are doing. We know about China. It has growth rates of about 8 per cent and it is definitely growing its space programme. The same is the case in Russia and in India, which also has growth rates of about 8 per cent. and is spending $500 million. We are spending almost half the money that India is spending on space activities. I am worried that we will lose all the skills involved and that Britain will be seen as a country that is not interested in or committed to the space programme. When other collaborations take place in the future, Britain will not even be considered.

There is also great worry about whether skills can be retained. There are tremendous skills in this country. For example, I visited Astrium, which builds satellites. We should be proud of the absolutely fantastic skills in that company.

The hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) referred to debris in space. A great deal of attention must be paid to how it can be managed, and since the pollution of space is clearly in no one's interest, that is something in which this country could be involved.

Mr. Ian Taylor: There is the prospect of a Dutch satellite that will gulp up debris. I believe that that project is private-sector driven, and perhaps my hon. Friend would like to consider it. The serious point is that we must clear the way for other satellites to be launched and ensure that no damage is done to them.

Mr. Evans: My hon. Friend makes an important point about the project being commercially driven. There is a great deal of money to be made in the space industry, so it is commercially attractive to companies. However, there is definitely a need for the Government to drive progress harder and faster than is currently the case.

Various activities are involved. For example, we discussed telecoms. I remember that when I first became a Member of Parliament in 1992—never mind when others first became MPs—the internet was in its infancy, and satellite television was just starting, but look at the situation now. We have a choice of 300 channels and that number will grow. It will not be long before we all hold devices that allow programmes to be beamed down to us wherever we happen to be. The excitement in the telecoms market is superb. I am delighted that Britain is at the forefront of the telecoms market, but we must continue to invest on a much larger scale if the industry is to have a future.

The hon. Member for Nuneaton discussed the number of space industry jobs in this country and the fact that two thirds of them are filled by people with university degrees. That is superb, and we want to further it. I hope that the Minister will comment on the closure of physics departments in universities, the shortage of physics teachers in schools and the fact that many youngsters are not interested in physics. That worries me. We will store up trouble for the future if we do not try to correct that.

Mrs. Gillan: Does my hon. Friend agree that it would also be interesting to hear from the Minister what progress this country is making on the Lisbon goal? It appears that we will not meet the target, which means that we will not produce the number of scientists needed to support our economy or the European economy.

Mr. Evans: The attitude in this country to science, and scientists and physicists, must change. I hope that the Minister will say something about that. A couple of weeks ago, I spoke to a constituent who visited the House of Commons. He said that he was the last physics teacher in his university, and that he was on a short-term contract—a 12-month contract. I do not know how people are supposed to plan when they are on such contracts. He feared that the whole department might close. Scientists are respected in other countries, but we do not treat them the same way.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman. Does he not recognise that the Government have published a 10-year scientific framework programme, and that they have made more effort to increase the proportion of our GDP that is spent on research, development and innovation than his party did when it was in power? Under this Government, expenditure will go from 1.9 per cent. to a target of 2.5 per cent. for 2014. That record is better than his party's.

[Dr. Ashok Kumar]

Mr. Evans: I will contest the figures with the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for Nuneaton led the debate, and I am delighted that he did so.

Dr. Kumar: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Evans: No. We want to focus attention on the fact that the European Space Agency ministerial meeting is coming up.

Dr. Kumar Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Evans: No. The hon. Gentleman's party has been in power for eight years. I do not want to make this debate party political. His hon. Friend the Member for Nuneaton led on the figures about how much DEFRA is spending and the total budget compared with other countries. We have to do much more.

Dr. Kumar rose—

Mr. Evans: No, I will not give way. As far as space technology is concerned, we have advanced in the past eight years, but we ought to do much more.

I shall finish, as I want other Members to have the opportunity to speak. I am thinking about the excitement that surrounded Beagle 2. It was considered to be space on the cheap, but many people were gripped by it. I do not believe that its failure dampened people's enthusiasm for space technology.

Jo Swinson: Will the hon. Gentleman join me in congratulating Glasgow on securing the international astronautical congress 2008? It is exactly the sort of opportunity that the Government should make the most of to enthuse and inspire people about science and space.

Mr. Evans: I congratulate Glasgow, of course. It is tremendous that all parts of the United Kingdom should get involved in the opportunities relating to space. The hon. Lady mentioned enthusiasm and excitement and that is what space provides. It captivates people, as Beagle 2 did; people were excited. I went to the Royal Geographical Society when Beagle 2 was separated. Prince Andrew turned up, it was exciting and everybody was enthused and gripped. It was a shame that the project was not a success, but I do not think that it diminished people's enthusiasm for space, its potential and what can be achieved.

The hon. Member for Nuneaton mentioned climate change and the natural disasters that seem to befall Earth far too often these days. That is where space can play its part, too. We also have a role to play in space. That is why I hope that we shall hear from the Minister that our commitment this December will be made and reinforced with the extra investment needed to play our full part in space technology in the future.

9.58 am

Sarah McCarthy-Fry (Portsmouth, North) (Lab): I, too, am a member of the all-party space group. Why I should want to become a member was a source of perplexity to some of my parliamentary colleagues. To many people, space technology means either space exploration or boys' toys—the "Star Trek" or "Star Wars" syndrome. Whether one has aspirations to be Captain Kirk or Luke Skywalker, there is another important aspect of space, which is the eco-warrior role. The role of the space industry in monitoring, tracking and ultimately helping to reverse—or at the very least better manage—climate change is crucial.

A few weeks ago, I was fortunate enough to be invited to the European Space Research Institute at Frascati in Italy to watch a video link to the launch of the Cryosat satellite. All seemed to be going well, but unfortunately after what we thought was a successful launch, the satellite ended up plummeting into the Arctic ocean. It was a bitter blow for the British man, Dr. Duncan Wingham, whose brainchild the satellite was. It was going to survey from space the thinning of the Earth's icecaps and provide the clearest picture yet of what climate change is doing to our planet. We monitor from the ground, but that is not good enough. The information that we could have got from the satellite would have been crucial.

The aborted launch brought home the fact that space is still an inexact science. As my hon. Friends the Members for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) and for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner) remarked, we do not yet have all the answers. However, we have a wealth of opportunity. The satellite was launched on top of an old Soviet SS-19 ballistic missile. I could not think of a better example of the swords-into-ploughshares argument: a rocket designed to destroy parts of the Earth being used to launch a satellite that was going to help save it.

Climate change is probably the most important global issue, and I want to make sure that we do not lose the opportunity to gather important data. The data that that satellite was seeking are essential to our understanding of climate change, would have given scientists a definitive picture of the rate of thinning of the Arctic sea ice and would have enabled them to improve computer models of climate change.

Will Europe approve a replacement satellite? That is one of many issues that will be debated at the European Space Agency ministerial meeting. Cryosat cost £90 million, which is not insubstantial. However, the project director said:

> "You have to see the replacement cost in context, there is a cost in not knowing what is going on and in the end that's an even larger cost."

If a decision is made quickly, much of the original team will still be in place, so we will not need to reinvent the wheel. The original satellite took seven years to build, and it is estimated that if we move quickly, a replacement could be built in three. That is better than seven years, but it will be three years in which the icecap thins still further and scientists do not have the information they need. That is just one example of the importance of the space industry, not only to the United Kingdom, but much further afield.

We have reached the point where we must ask whether we want the UK to be a major player in the space industry. Last month, Lord Sainsbury of Turville, the Minister for Science and Innovation, said that UK Space's importance as a contributory factor in achieving our goal to be Europe's leading knowledge-based economy is without question. However, we are at a crossroads. Without continuing investment, we will not be able to play that role. Space is one of the few industries in which Britain retains a comprehensive design and integration ability and it employs the most highly skilled work force in British manufacturing.

Ironically, it was a British man, Arthur C. Clarke, who found fame and fortune from space—not from designing or manufacturing space hardware, but by writing about it. He was my literary hero during my teenage years. I found his books fascinating, because although they were fiction, they were rooted in real scientific ideas. He was a man way ahead of his time. He predicted communication satellites way back in 1945 and inspired generations of young people to dream about space.

In the 1960s and 1970s, the United States Apollo missions inspired a generation of Americans to go into science, engineering and technology. A MORI poll last year found that 70 per cent. of young people would be encouraged to go into science, engineering and technology because of UK involvement in space, but we need to have a space industry for them to use their skills in.

When I watched the doomed Cryosat launch last month, I found it fascinating that the technology for putting satellites into space was still basically a giant firework. Once again, we can turn to Arthur C. Clarke for inspiration. His view is that the rocket has as much future in space as dog sleds have in serious Antarctic exploration, but at present it is all we have. However, he came up with the vision for communication satellites remaining poised over a fixed spot on the equator by matching their speed to the turning Earth. He progressed that idea in his book "The Fountains of Paradise": by adding a cable linking the satellite to the ground, payloads could be hoisted mechanically and reach their orbit without the need for expensive rocket power. He called that a space elevator and although at first it was just a fanciful idea, since the discovery of material with which it could be built—the third form of carbon, C60—it has become a real possibility. It would have the effect of massively reducing the cost of putting payloads into space. We should imagine what the growth effect of that would be on the UK satellite industry and what it would mean for the UK economy.

In my constituency, I have seen the effects of job losses across industry and, in particular, jobs going to the low-cost eastern Europe and Pacific rim countries. However, we should examine which jobs are being outsourced; by and large, they are at the low-skill and low-tech end of the market. The key to retaining jobs in the UK is to maximise the number of high-skill, high-tech jobs, and that is exactly what jobs in the space industry are.

EADS Astrium, which is one of the UK's leading space companies, employs around 1,000 people in my constituency. They have highly skilled jobs, which is precisely what my constituency needs in order to be a driving force in the knowledge-based economy. We need many more knowledge-based, high-tech, science-based industries and I want my constituents to be able to obtain the skills they will need to work in those industries. There is so much good work going on in my constituency to encourage young people into those career paths. EADS Astrium has sponsored the local girls' school to become a specialist school in science and maths. The support and help of such a leading player in the space industry helps to inspire schoolchildren to take a positive look at science, engineering and technology opportunities. School standards in my constituency are still below the national average, despite huge improvements since 1997. I welcome the involvement of such a major high-tech company in helping my young constituents to reach their potential and to have an ambition beyond working in McDonalds—not that there anything wrong with working in McDonalds, but it should not be the only choice. The head teacher is very enthusiastic about the project and has said that attaining specialist status in science will give the girls in her school a unique opportunity to acquire the technical, and ultimately transferable, skills that they need to thrive in the 21st century. However, what is the use of their gaining those skills if we cut the legs from under the UK space industry through short-sighted cutting of funding?

The hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) has left, but referred to the European global monitoring for environment and security programme and said that the UK should contribute around £11 million a year to maintain our position in the driving seat of that programme. If it is true that we will contribute only £3 million, it sends the message to our European partners that the UK does not want to be a leading player in the co-ordinated European effort on environmental monitoring, including disaster management and monitoring climate change.

The UK holds the EU presidency and recently held the chairmanship of G8. Our Prime Minister has said that tackling climate change is a key part of those roles, but we cannot do it alone. We must bring other countries on board, but if we cut back our contribution, what message will that send out?

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Lady is making an excellent speech and I agree with every word that she utters, so I will call her my hon. Friend. Does she agree that we are not talking big bucks in terms of Government spending? We are talking about the difference between a commitment of £3 million and the amount that industry and outside assessors have arrived at, which is £11 million. That is just pocket change to the Government, even though it is taxpayers' money. It is almost ridiculous that we have to fight for that money and encourage the Government to spend it when the Prime Minister rightly said at G8 and various EU meetings that he wants to take a lead. Showing leadership would surely mean finding this small amount of money.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: I hesitate to say that I agree with the hon. Lady, but it is good that we have cross-party consensus on driving space industry forward because we all realise its importance. One difficulty is that different Departments contribute, and in this debate we can impress on the Minister the fact that we need a co-ordinated effort across Departments. The matter is important to the UK economy and for jobs in my constituency, but there is a much wider importance and the effort needs to come not just from one Department. I hope that the Minister will pass that message on.

[Sarah McCarthy-Fry]

The GMES programme is vital for the early warning of environmental disasters and climate change. Returning to my favourite hero, Arthur C. Clarke once said:

> "The dinosaurs are not around today because they didn't have a space programme".

He said that the meteor that released the poisonous chemicals and created the cloud that blocked out the sun could have been foreseen and averted with a sufficiently advanced space programme.

The natural hazards working group, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Nuneaton referred, acknowledged that earth observation, space science and space engineering are key parts of our scientific knowledge bank and are helping us to understand and prepare for natural hazards.

I have spoken today from the perspective of my constituency about the economic aspirations of the young people of Portsmouth and wanting it to be a high-tech, high-skilled city, but the consequences of not supporting the GMES programme with the full commitment go far beyond the borders of my constituency. We would let down not just my constituents but people in other parts of the world who might face tsunamis, hurricanes or earthquakes. We have a responsibility to our children and grandchildren to do all we can to tackle climate change. By supporting the space industry, we could do that.

Mr. Eric Illsley (in the Chair): Before calling the remaining two speakers, I remind hon. Members that I intend to begin the winding-up speeches no later than 10.30 am.

10.10 am

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I do not intend to keep the Chamber for long. I am delighted that the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner) secured this debate, for which several of us applied.

It is important that we have this brief debate because it is a considerable time since we have had a chance to debate space. With the important decisions coming up in the next few weeks, I am grateful to the Speaker, who had the foresight to grant it. However, I am less impressed with the Government—I apologise to the Minister if I imply a personal criticism—who do not see fit to devote their time to debating or examining policy in this area before taking fairly serious decisions that will affect our businesses and research councils.

Space is exceedingly exciting. I went to a Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council exhibition the other day, which was, rather inappropriately, held in the Treasury. I had with me a schoolboy doing work experience, who was very enthusiastic about what he saw in the presentation on what was happening in space. For example, it was good to find, even under the auspices of an anonymous philanthropist, that the opportunity for schools to use a telescope directly through computers in their schools is being made available through Cardiff university.

A couple of weeks ago, I visited Salford to look at the Group 4 Securicor tagging and monitoring exercise, where I saw the satellite tracking that is being used in two pilots—among the three being conducted by the Home Office—monitoring the control of criminals at the end of their sentences when they are in the community. I was impressed by what has already been shown up by those pilots. I hope that the Minister will familiarise himself with the commercial applications for space, which are paying our society dividends.

I shall concentrate mainly on one aspect, which the hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Sarah McCarthy-Fry) mentioned. How do we ensure that the benefits from space research flow through to our space industries? I yield to no one in my admiration for the successes achieved by our space scientists in pushing forward our knowledge of the universe and its origins, and there is a lot to say about that. However, I am concerned that we are not optimising the industrial benefits that should flow not only from scientific research, but from civil research, whether funded by the Government, the European Space Agency, the EU or our space industries.

Like many people, I do not see the issue as political and I certainly do not raise it to score political points because many of the problems have existed for some time, whether under a Conservative Government or the current Labour Administration. I raise the matter from a genuine desire to engage the Government in a discussion and to find a solution. I share the Government's objectives to exploit space technology to benefit us through improvements in communications, Earth observation to monitor climate change and all the other items that have been mentioned in this debate.

Massive improvements have been made in using space technology, but it is not functioning correctly. The problems result from the machinery of government and are, therefore, all the more difficult to solve. As the practical uses of space extend, more Departments are affected. Having recognised that some 20 years ago, we established the British National Space Centre to act as a focus for space activities, both internationally through ESA and the EU, and recently, bilaterally with China. Internally, BNSC acts as a forum for interested partner Departments and the scientific research councils. All the agencies and councils have worked together well and achieved some great successes.

Mr. Olner: Does the hon. Lady agree that we are in danger of missing a golden opportunity, because Departments are not talking to each other? The Department of Trade and Industry has put in an awful lot of work and money. Lord Sainsbury has been a tremendous champion of space over many years. We are fortunate that he has held that position for so long. The problem is not Lord Sainsbury, but the fact that other Departments do not realise the relevance of the space industry and of joining all the bits together.

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Gentleman takes the words out of my mouth. I am certainly not laying the blame at the door of Lord Sainsbury, who is a space enthusiast, as far as I know. Indeed, I say that while sitting next to my hon. Friend the Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor), a well known expert who was a first-class Minister on the subject. I am trying to focus the Minister's mind on joined-up government. The hon. Member for Nuneaton makes my point exactly, and I think that he probably agrees with me.

Although the BNSC, through the DTI, can fund industrial research via the European Space Agency, my concern is that funding applications in the public sector become the responsibility of the relevant Department, whose main interest is not space. A current example is the European space navigation project, Galileo. That is an agreed European project funded mainly by the EU, but with ESA as the up-front research organisation—its responsibilities include the first four proving satellites. Funding is required from both the DTI and the Department for Transport.

I hope that I am wrong, but there are signs that the Department for Transport cannot fully provide the funding required and that our industries could well lose out rather than cash in on all their work. I seek reassurances on that from the Minister. There are similar potential problems with international efforts to use space technology to help on climate change. I refer to global monitoring for environment and security—GMES—which we talked about earlier. It seems that DEFRA will find that funding is wanting, with disastrous consequences in my view and that of many people in this House and beyond.

The Government, in common with previous ones, have long insisted that our space industries should share in funding research and that we should not just look to taxpayers' money for funding. Our industries have responded to that challenge better than industries in other European countries where Government funding is more forthcoming, and I admit that there have been notable successes. For example, the privately funded consortium launching Paradigm's Skynet has proved a great success at providing communications satellites for our military. However, Galileo is a European, publicly funded project. Our industries have won an impressive share of the work, but that will be realised only if the Government are prepared to fund their share alongside other European countries.

This and similar cases raise the "machinery of government" issue. Unless we can find some way of ensuring that Government-funded research is followed up with Government-funded support for public sector projects, our space industries will not benefit fully from the research that they and the Government initially funded. After all, we are talking about front-edge technology that is recognised as being critical for the UK, particularly as lower-technology industries are taken over by developing countries. I hope that the Minister will take that thought away from the debate and examine whether improvements can be made to Government arrangements that will benefit our space industries and ensure that what we have already invested is not wasted for want of a ha'p'orth of tar.

10.19 am

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): I apologise for being late for the debate; I was attending a seminar on the global science and innovation network held by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner) on securing the debate. Having tried to secure debates of this kind in the past, I know how difficult it is to do. It is the first time that I have heard a debate on space policy in this Chamber, since we have had Westminster Hall. I did not want to indulge myself by taking part but was sufficiently provoked by the hon. Member for some valley—

Mr. Evans: Ribble Valley.

Dr. Kumar: How could I ever forget the famous by-election? We were both part and parcel of it.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) made a doom-and-gloom speech, attacking the Government's science and technology policy. I do not want to make the debate partisan, but the hon. Gentleman has sufficiently provoked me to do so. As somebody who has worked at the sharp end of research most of my adult life, was a practising scientist and engineer in research and specialised in engineering before entering the House, I can tell him that I have never seen a Government devote so much of their resources to tackling science and technology, its problems and the contribution that it makes. UK space policy is part and parcel of that, and it is a great credit to the Government.

I speak loudly in praise of the Government. I know that the Minister will do a grand job because he excels in every Department in which he has served. I speak loudly also of Lord Sainsbury of Turville, whom my hon. Friend the Member for Nuneaton mentioned. Lord Sainsbury is one of the best Science Ministers we have ever had. He is exemplary and outstanding, and his contribution has lifted the spirit of science and science policy in a way I have never known in all my years following science policy.

The issue I take with the hon. Member for Ribble Valley concerns the figures I quoted for the increase in investment in research and development, from 1.9 per cent. of GDP to 2.5 per cent. by 2014. Those figures are quoted in "Science in the New Parliament", a report by the Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology, which is an independent body. I wanted to put it on record that I did not pluck those figures from the air. That is why I asked the hon. Gentleman to give way earlier.

Mr. Evans: I wonder why the hon. Gentleman thinks that the French and the Germans spend so much more than we do. Does he not think that we are missing a trick, that it is an investment and that it would benefit us if we spent more?

Dr. Kumar: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, but we should remember the base from which we started, and where we were under his Government. That is the difference. Under his Government, science went downwards. I praise the former Minister, the hon.

[Dr. Kumar]

Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor), because he did a great job under difficult circumstances when the country's finances were screwed up. The credit goes to this Government, however, because our finances are healthy. That is why we are able to invest in science and technology.

I praise the Government, and one of their greatest achievements has been to secure money for science and technology. Much credit goes to our Prime Minister, because he speaks with great passion for science, and to the Chancellor. The ideas that we develop, we translate through action.

I support many points that hon. Members have made about the need to spend more money. I am happy to go along with that, but we must recognise what has been achieved. That is important, because it was not always so. Year after year, scientific research grants were cut at universities. That is not the case now because budgets have been growing, which is a great credit to this Government.

I agree with some points that the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) made about exploiting the UK's space policy and technology. I am happy with that, because I recognise the contribution that space policy would make, assisting us with the problem of climate change, developing climate model forecasting and dealing with coastal and flooding problems. Climate change will be an important issue during the next five years and more, because it is on our doorstep.

Mrs. Gillan: As the hon. Gentleman has chosen a party political platform, perhaps he would acknowledge that the British National Space Centre was started by a Conservative Government. He should face Lord Hunt of Wirral in the other place and tell him that we did nothing about science and technology. We did a tremendous amount about it, including starting the framework for action, and the hon. Gentleman should be better informed on such matters before he starts slinging things at previous Conservative Governments.

Dr. Kumar: I am happy to make such acknowledgements and I was not slinging things. The Nietzschean picture of doom and gloom painted by the hon. Member for Ribble Valley is not my view of science and technology. I was trying to help the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham and was agreeing with some of her important comments. She was right that we have to exploit these things. I did not try to demean the previous Government. I tried only to paint the picture.

I agreed with the hon. Lady about one issue, which was the drop in the number of students studying physics. If we are to create scientists and engineers to deal with the problems of UK space policy, we have to train scientists and we ought to have more physicists. I find it sad that the number taking physics at school is dropping in the country that gave Newton, Faraday and Maxwell to the world. We do well at primary school level in getting children interested in science. At secondary level, things seem to go in the wrong direction.

I speak as a strong friend of the Government and praise their achievement, but my hon. Friend the Minister ought to have some words with the Secretary of State for Education and Skills. We ought to consider why those things are happening; there is no magic answer. The hon. Member for Ribble Valley gave no explanation of how to deal with it. He just said, "Enthusiasm, enthusiasm, enthusiasm". That is fine, but we can create only so much enthusiasm before it reaches a certain level. It existed in the spirit of scientific innovation once upon a time, but I know that we have moved away from Faraday and Newton and individuals do not do research in the way that they did; they work in collaboration either in research institutions or internationally.

To a certain extent, I am concerned, just as the hon. Member for Ribble Valley is. We must look ahead and the situation I describe is the thing that we must get right if we are to create world-class physicists. That is one thing about which I strongly agree with him. I am sure that the Minister will address it because it is worrying, as is the situation in relation to chemistry departments mentioned by the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham.

I was not trying to make a partisan speech. I had not even prepared to take part in this debate. The hon. Member for Ribble Valley provoked me into doing so by trying to rewrite the achievements of the Government. This is the first time that I have spoken loudly on science policy on behalf of the Government. As I said, it is a testament to our very good Minister for Science and Innovation, who has achieved a great deal. I idolise him and think that he has done a marvellous job. He came to my constituency several times trying to encourage youngsters to study science and he was there during the election campaign. In fact, he visited one of the science labs at Laurence Jackson school.

Ministers can do only so much. Nevertheless, we must take seriously the concerns that I have addressed. As one who had no intention of taking part in the debate and ended up making a 10-minute speech, I think that I ought to shut up and sit down.

10.29 am

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner) on securing this debate on the exciting subject of UK space policy. Although it is now nearly 50 years since the first satellite was sent into orbit, space exploration remains exciting and full of prospects for understanding the origins of the universe and life on Earth. There is also the tantalising prospect of finding evidence of life on other planets. Space studies continue to advance our knowledge of the universe and the fundamental laws that govern it. Although the exciting part of space is often exploring other planets and trying to understand the origins of life, the space industry is an important one in many other respects and can bring many benefits here on Earth.

Satellites play an important role in communications and navigation. For example, the Government's proposals for road-user pricing would be impossible without satellite technology. Satellite services have a crucial role to play in extending broadband networks to households throughout the country, particularly in those remote and rural areas that are too far from telephone exchanges to be able to receive broadband on a landline. Satellites can also play an important role in monitoring the Earth, helping to forecast the weather, measuring climate change and aiding responses to natural and man-made disasters.

Space is a high-value global industry and Britain a world leader in many aspects of space technology. An estimated 15,000 people are employed in more than 200 companies in Britain in space-related jobs. The jobs are highly skilled, and more than two thirds of the workers hold a university degree. The industry generates about £4 billion a year for the British economy, and it is therefore important that we maintain it.

It is vital that our schools and universities continue to produce people with high expertise in science, especially in physics, chemistry, astronomy and maths. Young people must be encouraged to take those subjects at school and university. The excitement and possibilities of space travel and exploration certainly encourage young people and must be used for that purpose. In order to achieve that, we need more graduates of those subjects teaching in our schools.

We also need to address the supply of research scientists. We need to ensure that there are physics departments in local universities and that these subjects are sustained and grown. We need to tackle the problem of short-term contracts and job insecurity for science post-doctoral researchers. We also need to recognise that increased student debt deters graduates from going into teaching and research in the public sector and encourages them to go into higher-paid jobs in private industry.

Investing in space involves cutting-edge technology, which is obviously very expensive. Co-operating with our European partners clearly makes sense. Roughly two thirds of the UK's budget is spent through the European Space Agency and EUMETSAT—the European Organisation for the Exploitation of Meteorological Satellites—which provides and operates Europe's weather forecasting satellites.

The procurement system used by ESA is known as "fair returns to contributing nations". That means that the bulk of the contracts are awarded to companies simply because they are in countries that have contributed to the ESA budget and not necessarily because they are the most cost-effective bidders. That is not a sensible system. Awarding the contract to the most cost-effective bidder would be better and would reduce costs. However, given that that is the system, it is important that Britain contributes, so that British companies can gain a fair share of the contracts.

The loss of the Beagle 2 Mars lander was referred to earlier in the debate. It was clearly a setback to the UK's involvement in space, but we should not allow that setback to deter us from undertaking future projects. It is necessary to take risks to make scientific progress and in a cutting-edge business such as space, some projects will inevitably be disappointing failures. Beagle 2 was an exciting project and high-value returns were possible, so it was right to take risks.

Mr. Evans: We talked about the failure in that case, but Mars Express—we are involved on three of the instruments that are being used—is bringing back much information from which we will benefit. The successes clearly outweigh that one failure.

Mr. Reid: I agree. As I was saying, we should not allow that failure to put us off taking risks. It is important, however, that, when a project involves a significant risk, there should be a thorough feasibility study to identify the risks and options, investigate potential benefits and accurately estimate of the project costs. If it is decided that we should proceed with a risky project, it is important to ensure that, having carried out the feasibility study, the project is properly funded. Trying to cut corners is often the road to disaster.

We should take risks to explore space. Britain is a world leader in space industries and space offers exciting prospects. I hope that the Government will do all they can to maintain that leading role.

10.35 am

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton) (Con): I am grateful to my co-chairman on the all-party group on space, the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner), for securing this debate and to colleagues on both sides for contributing so knowledgeably. This important debate is about an important subject, just ahead of the upcoming European Space Agency ministerial conference.

I pay tribute to my successor as space Minister. My only successor, believe it or not, is the noble Lord Sainsbury. I was the Minister for three and a half years. Most of my hon. Friends thought that that was far too long and that I was in orbit for most of the time, but Lord Sainsbury has had a remarkable record and I pay tribute to his enthusiasm. If there is one drawback of his continuity in the post, it is that the space Minister is not a Member of this House, which has sometimes held back some of our discussions. However, I believe that his enthusiasm has kept the space budget at the forefront.

We should not play party politics too much. I happen to have a good memory of the period in which I was the Minister for Science and Technology, and it does not matter what the Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology, on whose council I serve, says. One of the good things I was able to do, when my ministerial colleagues at the Department of Trade and Industry were not watching, was to grab some year-end funds and put them into the space budget. The British National Space Centre, the Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council and others were rather grateful for that.

Dr. Kumar: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that he does not believe the figures that POST has produced?

Mr. Taylor: That intervention was pretty infantile, if I may say so. I was saying that the space budget during my period as Minister compares very favourably. There is no doubt that the overall budget for science and technology has gone up under this Government, as I have said many times in the House of Commons.

One of the key things to come out of this debate is the enormous excitement and importance of space. There have been many examples of that this year: the Venus Express has just been launched and Mars Express has been mentioned. Although Beagle 2 was ultimately lost, a lot of its technology has been captured and will be reused in other missions. The Huygens probe has landed on Titan; the Inmarsat launch will be vital for global communications. Those are really big issues.

No one doubts that space issues are crucial. The question for the Government is about their tactics at the ESA ministerial conference. What key issues will they raise? There are some big questions. The ARTES programme, which has been mentioned, is pretty crucial. ARTES has mixed funding, from industry and Government. Even Lord Sainsbury has said that we can get a measurable commercial return on ARTES investment of at least six or seven times. In that context, it is genuinely an investment. It represents perhaps about 80 per cent. of UK space industry activity, yet makes up only 10 per cent. of UK civil space spending. What is the Government's commitment for further work on ARTES?

[Mr. Taylor]

GMES has been mentioned. It is important and fulfils all the criteria on environmental monitoring set forward by the Government themselves, yet the participation level that the Government are committing to is, in my judgment, sub-critical. What will the Government do about GMES?

On the space science side, will the Government continue to commit to Aurora? I shall mention two other programmes that will not be discussed at the ESA ministerial conference. There are still top-up funding arguments to be made on Galileo, which is vital for the UK space industry. We have already won contracts for the two preparatory satellites from EADS Astrium and Surrey Satellite Technology Ltd, but there are many other upstream and downstream implications. I should be grateful if the Minister had a word with his Ministry of Defence colleagues about TopSat and how we will continue that investment.

When I was Minister, I found that the key thing about the space industry is that it really wants to work with the Government, the European Union, which has now taken on a space role, and the European Space Agency to turn technology into wealth, to amplify skills—they were mentioned earlier—and to improve academic excellence. We have some fantastic universities—I do not have time to mention them all—and detailed knowledge of what is happening in space and some of the work that is being done. Such work is exciting and inspirational to younger people, yet DTI funding of the national programme has been cut alarmingly. I believe that it is only some £5 million or £6 million, whereas it used to be well into the twenties. What is the future of the DTI's investment in the national programme? How will the British National Space Centre, which has been reviewed several times, not least by the National Audit Office, improve its game in respect of co-ordination across Government Departments, which was one of its original functions? It seems not to have gone much further than persuading the Department for Transport to put some money into Galileo, and, in fact, that is with the Department now.

There must be drive and determination. This is not a personal comment on the individuals involved, but the centre is not seen by the outside world as a driving force across Government Departments, which it needs to be, as the space industry now affects so many aspects of our lives. The DTI certainly is not the space ministry. The Department of Health, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Department for Transport are all vitally involved in the downstream use of space. As they are, in a sense, the consumers of space-derived material, to what extent should they also be the anchor tenants in projects and have extra funding, rather than just depending on the DTI or the Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council?

I want to give the Minister a full opportunity to respond, as we do not get ministerial statements on space often enough. There are challenges. For example, is he content that during our presidency we are taking a lead on space policy in the European Union, which now has a dedicated space ambition? I have not seen evidence of that. Are we on top of the marriage between space and security? A panel of experts on space and security has produced an interesting report. What are the implications for Britain in the security aspects of, for example, GMES and Galileo? It seems that the rest of the EU is thinking about those fundamental questions but we are not articulating them.

Is the Minister content that the expenditure in available budgets is properly balanced between science, industry and industrial applications and enabling technologies? Is a further review intended?

There has been a succession of space policy documents. I am glad to say that mine in 1996 was the first, and there have been some excellent ones since, but I am worried that we are fudging some questions, perhaps because of budgetary pressures or because we have not really decided what we want to do in the future. I recently saw a Royal Astronomical Society report on the scientific case for human space exploration. It reads extremely well, but I urge the Minister not to be seduced by the idea that Britain should start investing in manned space exploration. We have not dedicated enough money to existing space activity, which has a much higher priority. I was the Minister who decided that we should not have an active role in the international space station, simply because it would have sucked out money disproportionately from every other activity. I was not convinced that it was good science anyway, and I believe that my successor, the noble Lord Sainsbury, has been grateful to me ever since.

I do not believe that the Government's expenditure on space has reached critical mass. Let us not argue about statistical analyses of the past. I am dealing with issues that confront us today and with new programmes. Indeed, I would argue that during the eight years since I was Minister, space has become more central to decision making in Government. What was only beginning to be anticipated, for example, in the use of space to evaluate fraud in the EU and in the common agricultural policy has now become a central platform of what the EU wishes to do; much to the irritation of some member states, incidentally. Most of the fraud in that area is not carried out by the Commission but by member states. Nevertheless, it is of extreme importance for the use of space for the practical delivery of policy. That is an important point, and we have not previously been able to utilise it.

On disaster monitoring, the satellites launched by Surrey Satellite Technology Ltd. with some interesting partners—Nigeria and Algeria—cover an area of the world that is prone to problems. Someone mentioned the tsunami in the Indian ocean; that was picked up and tracked by satellites. Sir David King, the chief scientific adviser to the Government, did not sufficiently show in his report the way in which satellites can help us to monitor and anticipate such events. I would wish the Minister to have a further word with Sir David about the role that satellites can play.

This is an opportunity for the Government to show leadership. I wish my party were in government; we are not. That is something for the future. I assure the Minister on a personal basis that if the Government take a lead in space policy, he will have strong support from the Conservatives because of the national importance attached to it for science, discovery, skills and its industrial base.

10.47 am

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): We have had an extremely well-informed debate. I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner) on securing it. Indeed, all the contributions have been excellent. I felt quite humbled in being unable to match from my earlier career the experience and interest of some of the people present.

On the subject of Arthur C. Clarke, as every schoolgirl knows, this autumn is the 60th anniversary of his proposal that we should use geostationary satellites for global communications. As I recall, that was published in Wireless World in October 1945. That is a useful reminder.

My hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) has learnt a new scientific law of political science this morning. If someone attacks the Government, that is above politics and statesman-like. If they have the temerity to defend the Government, that is sheer partisanship. We have learnt a new law of one of the softer sciences, which we should all reflect on.

This is an opportunity to consider the UK's role in space. I applaud the work of the all-party parliamentary space committee—I feel jealous that I am not a member, and I must declare it as an interest. The debate is certainly timely. In Europe, the world, and the UK, decisions are being taken and new developments taken forward. The UK is taking a leading role. Although there are issues and concerns, we have a great deal to celebrate in our space sector.

I will start with Europe, where the UK has taken centre stage throughout our EU presidency. A joint European Union/European Space Agency space council will focus next week on the programme definition for global monitoring for environment and security. Our success in taking forward the European space programme will set the pattern for the future framework of European space initiatives. The EU is an increasingly important user of space, and we support an approach in which Commission directorates use space when that is the best means to achieve policy goals. It should not seek to enhance its status by prestige projects, however.

A week later, the ESA ministerial council will see important decisions taken on the level of UK involvement in key ESA programmes. We will contribute to programmes that meet our economic, scientific and technological objectives. The ESA matters enormously to us. About 60 per cent. of the government's civil space spend is invested in its activities.

The United Kingdom also leads on the global stage. We are coming to the end of our G8 presidency, and space has done much to help us meet our objectives in support of Africa and climate change. That environmental theme has been a feature of this morning's brief but important debate. In providing images of changing land usage, environmental changes, and the impact of human and natural events, space offers detailed data and images that cannot be obtained by other means. Satellites played an important part in the response to a number of recent events, such as the earthquake that had such devastating effect in Pakistan and the terrible hurricanes Katrina and Rita in the United States.

As many people know, the UK, through the British National Space Centre, took the chair of the committee for earth observation satellites in November 2004; it passed to Argentina last week. The committee has an important role in co-ordinating space-borne information systems, and the UK has sought to develop that role. In support of that vital work, it was announced last week that the UK-led disaster monitoring constellation has been accepted to operate within the international charter for space and major disasters. UK technology can now play its part in helping to respond to major disasters.

Finally, on the international front, the UK has taken the initiative in considering the threat from near earth objects—what most would call asteroids and comets. The threat is not just good fodder for films such as "Armageddon"; although it might bring some solution to concerns about avian flu, it is nevertheless a serious matter—and not only to those on the Liberal Benches.

Mr. Meale: Before the Minister leaves the international scene, will he comment on what is happening with the space race? First, it is being led by the United States, which is currently pursuing a policy that would give it territorial rights in space. Secondly, the hon. Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor) asked about security in defence. The American Government—or should I say the President?—have announced a $25 billion programme for defence in space, which includes space-to-space as well as space-to-earth defence activities. Will the Minister comment on those factors?

Malcolm Wicks: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I need to make a number of other comments in response to the debate. However, I shall draw those matters to the attention of the relevant Defence and Foreign Ministers.

I shall speak next about our national priorities. The UK space strategy for 2003–06 sets out three objectives for the use of space, all of which require a dynamic and innovative space sector in order to succeed. I believe that those objectives remain a sound basis for the next UK space strategy.

The first objective is to maintain high-quality science—another theme of this brief debate. We have all seen the value of collaboration through ESA in the recent exciting results from Cassini-Huygens. The first pictures from the surface of Titan were astonishing. Another recently launched mission with major UK involvement is Venus Express, which plays well with our interests in climate change. Science is also about advancing our understanding of our environment. Much has been achieved in developing stronger capabilities in services aimed at prevention, forecasting and assessment of damage from disasters.

[Malcolm Wicks]

The second objective is to stimulate commercial use of space and to develop not only the important upstream areas of space but to identify areas where carefully focused investment will lead to significant downstream economic benefits. My hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Barbara Follett) has spoken to me about the importance of that to her constituency. The telecommunication and broadcasting sector makes up 80 per cent. of all UK space industry turnover. There is now a large commercial space industry, worth more than $100 billion globally and estimated to be growing at 9 per cent. a year. We must, of course, be part of it.

The Government seek to support the development of technology for the space industry. However, we should not forget that the overall UK budget for space has risen from £160 million in 2002–03 to almost £200 million in 2004–05. I am sure that others will consider the words of colleagues: in an ideal world we would be spending more. That has been a strong theme of the debate, but the Government are proud of our record, not least in relation to the overall science budget. When making international comparisons, we should recognise that, in my judgment, the return on our investment exceeds—I shall be tactful—that of many of our counterparts.

The third objective is to seek to identify and support projects that most benefit the lives of citizens in the UK and the wider world. Galileo has been mentioned. The UK is committed to that important programme. It is a key part of the infrastructure that is necessary for a digital world. The UK has made a strong technical contribution, but there is still much to decide both now and in the longer term.

To respond to a point raised by the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), I am advised that the UK has contributed more than 17 per cent. of the cost of the early phase of Galileo. We also contribute through the EU budgets. Decisions on funding for the next phase have not been taken, and I understand that discussions could proceed well into 2006.

GMES was mentioned. It is well known to the DTI and across government. Over the past few years, we have been able to demonstrate the benefits of a series of practical services from the GMES programme. Their value was dramatically shown in the aftermath of the Boxing day tsunami.

The UK's achievements in this area are credible, and I want to address some specific issues. My hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) mentioned the clear-up of space debris. The UK is working in the inter-agency space debris co-ordination committee—I wish I was a member of it, but, sadly, I am not—to address problems and to develop codes of conduct for the disposal of satellites. It is important that we are concerned not only about waste on our own planet.

Education was another theme of the debate. I know from my time as Minister for Lifelong Learning in the then Department for Education and Employment that that is a matter of great concern to Ministers with responsibility for education, and rightly so. We are all concerned about what has happened in respect of physics teaching. There are programmes to address the problem, and to get competent scientists to teach in our schools; there are salary inducements and other incentives. I am not saying that we have entirely cracked the problem, but colleagues are on the case.

The development of sector skills councils, which I had a hand in when I had ministerial responsibility in that area, is important, as is the interface with education more generally. I am pleased that the Department for Education and Skills is now a member of the British National Space Centre; that is an example of joined-up policy that shows that we are moving in the right direction.

Parliament has shown a strong interest in what we are doing in respect of space. In the past few years, there have been inquiries by the Trade and Industry Committee and the Science and Technology Committee, and the Public Accounts Committee has addressed the subject, too. There has also been discussion of asteroids and the European Space Agency.

It is encouraging that there is that level of interest in the subject. Reviews have shown that spending on space is good value—it is a sound investment in an exciting sector that can only become more important. Parliament's interest helps the country to know about space and informs discussion on the subject. We are at the end of an exceptional year in space, and this debate has very much been in keeping with that positive tradition.

I will draw the conclusions and judgments of Members in this debate to the attention of Lord Sainsbury of Turville, and I welcome the tributes that have been paid to the important role that he has played in government and industry.

Jobcentre Plus Customer Management System

11 am

Mr. Anthony Wright (Great Yarmouth) (Lab): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Illsley, and to have secured this timely debate on the Jobcentre Plus customer management system. It will have a profound effect on most, if not all Members.

The CMS has been designed as part of a complex plan to centralise and streamline the benefit system. I will focus on the roll-out of the CMS at the contact centre for the east of England, which will operate in tandem with the benefits processing centre in Norwich. The contact centre is in Lowestoft. I should add as a footnote that Great Yarmouth is 20 miles from Norwich and 11 miles from Lowestoft.

Before CMS, any prospective claimant had a choice of ways to start their claim. They could telephone or attend the local office, where queries on the relevance of questions in the claim forms could be raised. Alternatively, they could collect forms from the post office, general practitioners' surgeries, citizens advice bureaux, and so on. Now, under the CMS, the only method accessible for the vast majority of people to begin a claim is via the Lowestoft contact centre.

Unlike the previous system, the CMS is supposed to operate first by a telephone call made at the caller's expense, when they lodge a claim and basic personal details are taken. That should result in a callback within 24 hours. The outward-bound call from the contact centre should result in details being taken to enable a claim to be made and an appointment to take place at the local job centre. That process should take place within four days; then the information collected on the CMS should be transferred to the benefits system, enabling payments to be worked out within 30 days of the initial call.

The roll-out of the CMS for Great Yarmouth was delayed, owing to the associated costs of an extension required to provide a screened area for social fund work and an area for processing, and did not happen until after March. Great Yarmouth was the first office in the east of England region to use the CMS, although some offices elsewhere in the country had previously piloted the system from late last year. Management reports from the pilots, including one in the west country, were critical and concluded that the CMS did not work well in small offices. Concerns from the pilot have proved well founded in Great Yarmouth.

The CMS has meant that experienced local staff are being moved to Lowestoft to undertake contact centre work, or into Norwich to the benefits processing centre. Owing to that, we are losing a vast amount of knowledge and understanding in dealing with local cases in Great Yarmouth, as workers are coerced into moving, or being made redundant. Indeed, work force skills are being ignored to satisfy the drive to centralise processing and customer handling, whatever the consequences.

The CMS and the centralisation process have resulted in the closure to the public of Yarmouth house, the social security office covering the whole of Great Yarmouth, during a process that was accelerated over the summer, despite assurances that adequate time would be given to consult before a closure decision was made. Following representations from the Public and Commercial Services Union, the office is at least able to open its doors to allow people to collect payments. Despite that, however, management has refused to use the facilities available for effective customer contact.

I have been told that to avoid having to reverse a decision on closure, Jobcentre Plus management has gone so far as to send claimants to the town market place to receive a phone call in a public call box for a crisis loan interview, followed by a later call to advise them of the decision to pay under the CMS. Small queues have even been known to form at those telephone boxes as a result. Surely, if that is true, it is ridiculous, especially in the Great Yarmouth constituency, which suffers from high benefits dependency.

In the most deprived ward in one of the most deprived constituencies in the country, we have lost jobs in the community as people directly and indirectly employed in Yarmouth house have left, been moved, or await their fate under the CMS, despite Government promises that they would move more jobs away from the centres and out to areas of deprivation. Here we see the reverse happening. Perhaps the Minister will tell me how many jobs have been taken away from Great Yarmouth and give us an evaluation of why Yarmouth house was not even considered as one of those centres, because there is enough space in the building.

Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): I am interested to hear my hon. Friend's sad stories, which he will know are shared by other Members of Parliament throughout the country. For example, the CMS system in east Kent that serves my Dover constituency has caused so many problems that some people are waiting one month, or even two, to get their first jobseeker's allowance claims, and even when they go to the telephone hotline—we have to call it a warmline now, apparently—they might be waiting for an hour. Some people have even been threatened with eviction because no money is coming in during these sad, sorry delays.

Mr. Wright: Absolutely. I agree with my hon. Friend's sentiments. That situation is replicated throughout the country. Indeed, those stories are heard in my office, too.

How good is the CMS service that is replacing the service previously offered by Yarmouth house in Great Yarmouth? Apparently, only 8 per cent. of calls were getting through to the Lowestoft contact centre under the CMS at one stage, and as few as 6 per cent. were getting through elsewhere. The CMS in Lowestoft was suspended several weeks ago and the contact centre is only now starting to reuse the system. When one gets through, which takes hours and sometimes days, the initial call usually takes much longer than envisaged: 20 minutes plus instead of five minutes. The callback often comes several days, rather than several hours, later. Imagine the cost to the contact centre of lengthy calls to mobile telephones, bearing in mind that the vast majority of people claiming benefits do not have a phone in their home and rely heavily on mobile phones. The contact centre in Lowestoft is recruiting 55 more staff, which will take it to a level that it did not anticipate requiring until the full roll-out of the CMS, showing that staffing levels are set too low and have led to problems.

[Mr. Wright]

I understand that staff in the centre find the work unrewarding and are aware that they provide a poor service because of that and the inadequate scripting that they are provided with under the CMS. Before CMS3 started recently, the staff had a paper brief of 35 pages of issues not covered in the script. The script restricts staff in many ways; for example, it includes a request for answers to sensitive questions about a partner's details which are not required when a claimant wishes only to claim national insurance stamps.

More concerning is the fact that under the CMS, emergency appointments are discouraged by the system because appointments cannot take place for four days after the contact centre makes its callback to allow for forms to be posted, received and brought to an interview. Non-emergency appointments to attend the jobcentre under the CMS often take place between one and two weeks later. For example, in Great Yarmouth on 18 November the first appointments were for 2 December, despite extensive overtime. Many appointments are then missed because appointments often overrun and last up to two hours rather than the projected 45 minutes. Indeed, we have only now reached the stage that we were at before Jobcentre Plus and the CMS.

The CMS is not only behind with the appointments that it keeps, but inflexible when making them. The system does not allow a booking prior to circumstances occurring. That significantly impacts on a resort such as Great Yarmouth, where the end of seasonal work could normally be planned for and appointments could be made in advance of unemployment. The CMS allows individuals to call only from the first day of unemployment. Due to its rigidity, the system also requires appointments with the financial assessor and personal adviser to take place consecutively. That has caused conflict because frustration must be managed. Yarmouth jobcentre currently has four security guards and two floor managers, when only a receptionist was required previously. Despite that deterrent to aggressive behaviour, local incidents recently included the arrest of a man in the office for possession of and threatening to use an 8-in blade. Another incident involved two men with an axe and a sharp gardening instrument being taken away by the police.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): That is only in Yarmouth.

Mr. Wright: I think they came from Norwich.

Ironically in the light of those incidents, the aim of the CMS was to reduce the need for contact and general footfall—the number of people who visit the offices to use the services available. Unlike other organisations that try to improve that scenario, Jobcentre Plus now actively discourages that by referring people to a website or another contact centre for jobs, or by advising them that they need an appointment to have a query on their benefit claim answered. The CMS was designed to play an important part in that active discouragement. Despite that, the last count in Yarmouth indicated that some 5,500 people a week came in compared with the 2,500 planned for. That is a direct result of the problems caused by making processing more remote through the CMS.

The goal of 80 per cent. of information being transferable from the CMS to IT systems that enable the processing to be done is simply pie in the sky. Incapacity benefit claims do not transfer at all, two thirds of the others do not transfer, and anticipated savings on processing have not been realised because of the additional time required by the CMS on liaison between processing teams and financial assessors.

The administrative nightmare caused by the CMS is serious. Claims under the CMS now have to be totally rebuilt following minor administrative errors. That fault could be rectified through reprogramming, but others will not be so easy to solve. Under the CMS, statements of between 15 and 30 pages were being posted from the contact centre to local offices to avoid administrative problems in using the CMS. The situation was not vastly improved under CMS2, which required handwritten notes to be faxed to the local office from the contact centre. Under CMS3 those details are now held on the CMS, but the system continues to be unreliable. A good example of that was when it went down for the whole afternoon on 15 November.

Owing to the introduction of the CMS, some officers are no longer even taking claims. In Suffolk, only three of the 13 sites take claims. A similar process is starting in Norfolk. Soon, people from North Walsham will be required to choose to attend one of three sites, necessitating an up to 50-mile round trip at their own expense. To further compound that problem, I even heard suggestions that contact centre staff have been told to refuse requests for travelling expenses, and to refer cases for an alternative decision only when complainants become aggressive.

The closure of some sites has already occurred, with others opening on a reduced basis. As more work is centralised, the situation is likely to be exacerbated. I have been made aware of problems of constituents calling the jobcentre to ask about payments. They are referred to a team in Norwich, only to be referred again when querying payments. In future, jobseeker's allowance will be based in Basildon, social fund in Norwich and bereavement benefit in Bury St. Edmunds, with more of the same consequences.

Dissatisfaction with the CMS has been portrayed in feedback from Citizens Advice in its recent memorandum and in press articles highlighting the 62 per cent. increase in incidents in Jobcentre Plus. The Public and Commercial Services Union, representing staff in Jobcentre Plus, has made extensive efforts in consultation with and briefing of interested parties, including the Work and Pensions Committee, to raise further those concerns.

Despite that, Jobcentre Plus's middle management and the chief operating officer continue to maintain that there is no problem with the CMS. If that is the case, why has the roll-out been delayed and, more recently, suspended? Why does feedback from the practitioners in local offices, in processing, social fund and the contact centres, indicate a lack of confidence in the system? Why do complaints via various sources confirm a problem?

Middle management and the chief operating officer are completely wrong, and the strategic delivery of the CMS has been deeply flawed. The problem is profound, and it falls on the Government to address it quickly. I do not envy the Government that task and responsibility, working to develop a system with contracting companies that have no interest in or knowledge of the product. It is very likely that we shall have another IT disaster—similar to the Child Support Agency and debt management—unless we act quickly. Instead, we are cutting staff numbers and morale before ensuring that the transition is practicable.

We are not seeking the views of interested parties, such as Citizens Advice, welfare rights services, unemployed representatives and trade unions. Further, we are not assessing and testing new processes fully before their roll-out, and by failing to develop standard operating models and contact centres for those whose needs are best catered for by a local service, we are not addressing the equality issue.

By not resourcing the project responsibly, and by not testing the full costs of proposals, the true savings of the CMS have been massively overestimated. For example, in Yarmouth, a whole year's budget of paper was used in the first month, and the additional cost of severance schemes made possible by the changeover to the CMS is £8 million for Jobcentre Plus in the east of England for the current scheme alone. Further costs are being incurred rapidly for movement of staff, postage, telephony and movement of people and work from one office to another. That has all been undertaken without asking those most affected—the customers and proposed customers—what service they would like. We need to review with urgency the policy that has led us to that situation, put a hold on job cuts, and suspend roll-out and use of the CMS and movement of work while we do it.

This Government have built a platform dedicating polices to producing change within society and creating the support structure that society can expect. The change under discussion should be the right one, but it should be delivered using the appropriate technology, risk-assessed and properly tested. The change should ensure a high level of service, delivered locally where possible, at the right pace for customers and workers—something that the CMS is sadly not delivering.

11.14 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. James Plaskitt): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright) on his choice of subject for this Adjournment debate and on being such an effective champion of the effective delivery of public services in his area.

During my hon. Friend's speech, he made several specific points about the performance of local services within Jobcentre Plus. I hope that I shall be able to respond to some of them in the course of my remarks, but I cannot deal with some of the specifics at this moment. I undertake to ask the local managers for a report responding to the specific points that my hon. Friend has made. Once I receive it, I will write to him in due course about the points that I am unable to cover.

Mr. Anthony Wright: In addition to the response that my hon. Friend will get from the management, will he secure a meeting with me to discuss the points face to face, rather than by correspondence?

Mr. Plaskitt: I am more than happy to do that, because I am anxious to make progress on this matter as rapidly as we can, both for my hon. Friend's sake and for his constituents'.

When we formed Jobcentre Plus in 2002, we integrated the job-broking elements of the former Employment Service with the benefit-payment functions of the former Benefits Agency. In doing so, we created a new, modern and more accessible way of delivering services to meet the needs of all people of working age. We are three years into a four-year programme of rolling out the new services through a network of more modern offices. This week, I can report the opening of three more offices, which brings the total to 672.

Jobcentre Plus is not just about delivering services in a new, more modern physical environment; it is about delivering services in a new way to all people of working age. So, alongside the roll-out of a new network of offices, we are investing in new IT to support the new business model. We learned from the early pilots that our customers welcomed the opportunity to make contact with us using the telephone, often in the comfort of their own home. That led us to develop a network of contact centres, and to support those centres with the new customer management system that my hon. Friend has spoken about.

The CMS is an important tool in enabling our staff to collect essential information from our customers, and to use that information to build up claim details on our systems so that we can pay them the correct entitlements. We introduced the system in 2003, after first testing it in Livingston.

The system was not as robust as we needed it to be, and we took steps to correct those problems with what are known as performance releases, which my hon. Friend mentioned. I am pleased to say that, in large measure, the system is now performing in line with our requirements. However, my hon. Friend is right to draw our attention to some continuing difficulties that we have faced in operating the new business model. I acknowledge that in some parts of the country, particularly during the recent summer months, some of our customers experienced difficulty in getting in touch with us through the contact centres. That gave rise to some long waits for callers and some long delays in payments, which were not acceptable.

However, I do not want to pin the blame for those delays on the computer system. The management of Jobcentre Plus quickly realised that they needed to look more deeply for the causes of the difficulties, because it became evident that the problems were more to do with the way that the contact centres were run and the way in which calls were handled.

The management team has acted quickly to remedy the problems. It has tackled basic issues such as staff recruitment, learning and development, and the management of individual contact centres. In addition, it has invoked contingency measures and adjustments to the processes in order to recover the performance in the most affected centres. Early indications following the introduction of the adjustments have been encouraging. Since September, we have seen week-to-week improvements in call handling.

[Mr. Plaskitt]

Gwyn Prosser: Does the Minister think that, during those difficult times and those long delays, it was sensible to continue laying off staff and reducing the establishment, especially in the south-east of England and in Norwich?

Mr. Plaskitt: I am grateful for that intervention, which reminds me that my hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth, who introduced the debate, has asked me to deal with specific issues on staffing numbers. I intend to do so in a moment.

Each of our 24 contact centres is working to an action plan for recovering performance, and we are managing the return to a full system as quickly and carefully as we can. Nine of the centres are continuing to operate with some clerical procedures, but well over three quarters of the new offices are now operating normally.

My hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth asked me specifically to address issues about the closure of Yarmouth house. I understand his concern about that, but I remind him that the roll-out of Jobcentre Plus is a massive four-year programme involving the makeover and modernisation of a national network of offices. We are also developing a network of contact centres.

While we work on making our services more accessible through new IT and telephony systems in our contact centres, we have to examine carefully our use of the estate. We inherited some unsuitable buildings, often in the wrong locations. That is why we are closing some buildings and opening new ones, as well as refurbishing some existing ones. As we take forward our plans to centralise benefit processes, some buildings, including Yarmouth house, will no longer form part of our network.

We have taken a view, across the country, on the buildings most suitable for accommodating the number of processing staff that we need, and Yarmouth house does not match our requirements. That is not to say that we are in any way depriving customers in Yarmouth of a quality face-to-face service; on the contrary, a service for all our customers will continue to be delivered from Copperfield house. That service will include dealing with social fund and other inquiries that cannot be dealt with by telephone. In our processing centres, staff will be able to develop benefit knowledge and experience to deal with more complex cases more effectively and efficiently, and our customers will have greater access to services irrespective of their geographical location.

Clearly, the closure of any site has an impact on staff. My hon. Friend is, of course, concerned about that. Some 50 members of staff will need to be relocated from Yarmouth house, of whom around half are not able to travel to sites outside Great Yarmouth. Consultation will continue with individuals and we are, of course, making every effort to redeploy the staff affected to alternative jobs, including inter-departmental vacancies, to avoid redundancies. Our policy, agreed with the trade unions, has been to avoid compulsory redundancy wherever we can. That is why we are making every effort to redeploy those people most directly affected.

My hon. Friend also asked, rightly, about the performance of the Lowestoft contact centre. The management team at Jobcentre Plus has taken prompt action to rectify the problems at that site. That action includes: the development of a performance improvement programme; speeding up recruitment and increasing staffing numbers from 184 to 242; and providing additional learning and development support. Of course, it will take a little time for those measures to make a difference to the service for our customers, so, in addition to tackling the causes, Jobcentre Plus has introduced clerical contingency measures and temporary changes to its business processes to ensure that customers are not inconvenienced. That has had an immediate impact on performance in terms of answering calls; it improved significantly in the last week of September, and went from below 50 per cent. to above 90 per cent., a level that has been maintained for a six-week period.

I add for my hon. Friend's information that I have been checking performance at the Lowestoft centre against the national situation. Back in the summer—in August—the national performance was way short of the target that we set, but the Lowestoft performance was even worse. The more encouraging news recently is that, nationally, we are now very close to hitting the 90 per cent. target. However, at the beginning of November the Lowestoft centre was exceeding both national performance and the national target; so in a period of four or five months there has been a sharp improvement in performance.

I acknowledge that last week there was a drop to 82 per cent. when a number of calls were diverted from another site to Lowestoft in order to support learning and development activities in Lowestoft. However, we are monitoring the position on a week-by-week basis and taking whatever measures we need to sustain and improve performance. Jobcentre Plus has stipulated that, for every site operating on clerical contingency, there must be a management action plan to map out the return to operation on the full CMS system. Across the east of England region, those plans are in place for each site. I hope that my hon. Friend will be reassured to know that we will be reviewing the plans on a site-to-site basis in the next month with a view to moving them to the full CMS supported process on a staged basis. The review will allow me to see performance figures from the centre in his constituency, and I will be happy to discuss them with him when he and I meet after I have had a more detailed report from the region.

Our modernisation programme is about much more than a network of new offices. In parallel with physical upgrading of the offices, we have started to build a modern infrastructure, including new contact centres supported by new IT systems. CMS is an important part of the modernisation programme. It enables people to provide the information that we need to assess their benefit entitlements. By enabling our customers to provide information by telephone, we are responding to their desire to deal with us from their own home, which we learned of when we tested the use of contact centres in the ONE pilots.

The introduction of new processes has not been without teething problems, as my hon. Friend and others are all too aware. However, we are working hard to deal with the difficulties, and I hope that I have been able to show that we are making real progress in improving the service to our customers. Our handling of calls is improving on a week-to-week basis, and every site now has a managed plan to return to the full CMS operation. The Jobcentre Plus management board is determined to maintain that improvement, and I assure my hon. Friend that I am determined to give it every support in achieving that objective.

11.27 am

Sitting suspended until half-past Two o'clock.

Local and Regional Government

2.30 pm

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I am delighted to have secured this debate on the future of local and regional government. I am pleased that we can discuss such an apparently wide-ranging issue in one of our 90-minute debates. Hon. Members who want to take part will recognise the importance of establishing a clear relationship between local and regional government powers and national Government policy.

I shall start by commenting on the Government's plans of the past eight years for the devolution of central Government and Government agency powers to so-called regional assemblies and how that relates to local government. I shall also comment on certain aspects of my constituency—I am sure that hon. Members would be surprised if I did not mention Cornwall a few times—including the long-term unitary authority, the Council of the Isles of Scilly, in the far west of it.

The Government have stated their intentions towards regional assemblies in various Acts governing preparations for their establishment. The Minister will doubtless have a clear recollection of the substantial defeat of the Government's proposal in the north-east just over a year ago, and I shall comment on the progress made since then and the Government's intentions following that heavy defeat of their approach to devolution.

I should make it clear that I do not question or even criticise the Government's desire for genuine devolution and for completion of the work that they started. Many hon. Members on the Liberal Democrat Benches and elsewhere strongly support, as I do, the Government's efforts and indeed successes, in devolving power to the Scottish Parliament, the Welsh Assembly and London. However, I want to tease from the Minister, as I hope others will, how the Government intend to fill the many vacuums in policy in order to deliver genuine devolution to the rest of the country.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the substantial defeat of a year or more ago was not necessarily a permanent rejection of regionalism as a concept but a rejection of the detail of the proposal that was put to the north-east, as well as a lack of conviction among the electorate that there would be a genuine transfer of power and resources to the level that they were being asked to approve?

Andrew George: I am not sure that I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman's analysis, although I do not interpret the north-east's rejection of the Government's approach to devolution as a rejection of the concept of devolution or a rejection of the prospect of devolved power. It was, as I just said, a rejection of the Government's approach. My criticism is that it was typical of so much of the Government's control-freak approach elsewhere, which I also criticise, whereby they insist on deciding where boundaries are, what powers the people of a region or Government zone will have, how those powers will be dispersed and to what timetable, when a referendum will take place and under what terms, and in what context everything will be carried out. I hope that they will learn lessons from the referendum in the north-east and not hide away under a stone, wondering what on earth they should do next, although I worry that that is what they are doing. As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, they should not interpret the referendum as a rejection of devolution itself.

[Andrew George]

David Taylor: Regionalism.

Andrew George: There is a debate to be had about what is interpreted as regionalism and what is interpreted as devolution and decentralisation. I shall come to my criticism of the Government in a moment, but it relates in part to the fact that they are concerned not with regionalism, but with attempting to establish a democratic structure in Government zones. Such zones are not regions, because there is no internal integrity in many of them. I cannot comment on the north-east, but I can certainly comment on the Government zone of the south-west. It is not a region, but a Government zone, which has been created over time not only by this Labour Government but by their predecessor Governments for reasons of bureaucratic convenience. It certainly has nothing to do with regionalism, because regionalism implies that a region recognises its own internal integrity and then seeks to achieve power for itself.

David Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Andrew George: I will once but then I want to make progress.

David Taylor: This will be my last intervention. We can agree that reform does not necessarily involve regionalism, but does the hon. Gentleman agree that it does involve genuine decentralisation and real independence, with local accountability, local democracy, a majority of revenue being raised locally and decisions about how it is spent being made locally? How can we raise revenue in that context, given, not least, that the Liberal proposal for local income tax went down like a lead balloon?

Andrew George: I do not want to be diverted on to the rights and wrongs of local income tax, although I dispute the hon. Gentleman's interpretation that it went down like a lead balloon. It obviously went down like a lead balloon with him, but that was not the case for a lot of others, who recognised the inequalities of the council tax system and the farce of the Government's attempt at revaluation, which I notice has been put in abeyance.

In a debate on 12 July in this Chamber, I raised the issues before us with the Minister's colleague, the Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the hon. Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Jim Fitzpatrick). In summing up what point the Government had reached, he said:

> "We will decentralise and devolve power where we can."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 12 July 2005; Vol. 436, c. 236WH.]

In recent years, however, we have seen not devolution but further centralisation of strategic planning and learning and skills. The same is about to happen to fire control, the police and, to a large extent, housing. Those are all moving from local authority influence to Government zones, Government quangos and non-accountable bodies.

Chris Huhne (Eastleigh) (LD): I very much appreciate my hon. Friend's points about the proposals for amalgamating and centralising various public services. Does he agree that that is happening at a time when we are already the most centralised member state of the European Union in terms of the amount of tax revenue that is collected and disbursed centrally? On the latest figures from the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, 94 per cent. of all tax revenues go to central Government before being disbursed, on occasion, to local authorities. In only one of the 25 EU member states is that proportion higher. That state is Malta, which has a population only a little larger than the London borough of Croydon. Does my hon. Friend agree that the figures are compelling and suggest that we are excessively centralised, and that the Government are heading in the wrong direction, rather than attempting to decentralise?

Andrew George: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. As Malta has a population roughly the same size as that of Cornwall, there are probably a number of lessons to be—

Chris Huhne: Malta's population is smaller than that.

Andrew George: Sorry, obviously more people have left the island since I last heard about it. One could draw a number of conclusions from my hon. Friend's intervention. I am sure that the Minister will bear it in mind in his concluding remarks.

The issue is not just the centralisation of important local government services which local authorities have discharged effectively for decades. Bearing in mind the Government's proposals for local education authorities and the big question mark over the relationship between social services and various health quangos, we can see coming down the track a further siphoning of local government powers to quangos, to Government zone bodies with appointed Government placepeople, or to Departments. That is the inevitable result of the direction of Government policy.

What have we seen as a result of the north east assembly referendum last year? Basically, the Government have demonstrated paralysis; they appear to have no idea. A year on from the referendum, there has been no comment and no proper assessment. There is no sign that the Government are prepared to debate the issue.

Before this debate, I reminded the Minister that on 11 November 2004, when he was Deputy Leader of the House, I asked him when the Government would recall the Regional Affairs Committee, which was established to fill the vacuum created by the lack of any debate about the regional dimension to Government policy. The Committee last met 18 months ago. As I recollect, it met to discuss a relatively unimportant matter relating to "The Northern Way"—I am sure that it was important to the north, but I am talking about Government strategy and Government positioning on the important issues of the day. That Committee, which was set up to undertake an important task, has not met since.

I asked the Minister, who was standing in for the Leader of the House on that occasion last November, when the Government would take the opportunity to review their policy following the north-east referendum. He replied:

> "The hon. Gentleman makes a reasonable point, which he and other hon. Members have made before. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will want seriously to consider that matter on his return, so I thank the hon. Gentleman for the question."—[Official Report, 11 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 935.]

The then Leader of the House must have considered it very seriously, because I heard no more about it. We are still waiting to hear whether the Regional Affairs Committee will ever meet again. Surely this is a time when it should be meeting weekly to hold the Government to account and to review where Government policy is going.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): May I help the hon. Gentleman with this part of his argument? The reason the Government do not recall the Committee is that they have no need to, because they have already made up their mind about what they are doing. I draw his attention to what the Deputy Prime Minister said in the House on 8 November 2004, just after the referendum result, when he made his intentions clear:

> "We will keep the regional assemblies, the regional development agencies and regional government. The regional dimension will form an essential part of this Government's policy to correct the economic differential between the north and south of this country. Let us be clear that that is our intention."—[Official Report, 8 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 592.]

That is their intention, so they have no interest in listening to anyone else.

Andrew George: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. It is helpful, but it is also worth pointing out that on that same occasion, when the Deputy Prime Minister was answering questions following his statement, he went on to say in answer to my question on democratically accountable regional government:

> "I am not giving up, and I hope that I do not give that impression."—[Official Report, 8 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 603.]

He said that, yet since that time we have had a complete vacuum.

Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell) (LD): With the Government's plans for regional assemblies dead in the water, we are left, as my hon. Friend has said, with the centralisation of services from fire control rooms to secondary education and much else besides, plus a regional tier that is unelected, unaccountable and, frankly, extraordinarily bureaucratic and inefficient. Is it not true that the only way to rescue that is to revitalise the process of democratisation of regional and local government by making it closer to the people and allowing them the opportunity to take the decision to have assemblies that are genuinely accountable and local? We are told that the Government have considered that idea for urban areas. I hope that they have. They should certainly be considering it for rural communities that have a genuine sense of identity. What is wrong with the Government's plans is that their regions have no proper identity.

Andrew George: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. In many ways, I agree with him. I, as a Cornishman, do not presume to know what is best for the north-east, the north-west, the midlands or anywhere else. It is not for me to decide.

I will come in a moment to the solutions that I think the Government have to pursue. They do not need a control-freak approach, which seems to assume or misunderstand that devolution is about holding on for dear life and controlling the agenda down to the last tee. Devolution is fundamentally about letting go and giving people in the regions as defined by them the opportunity to bring forward their business cases. They should be able to select from a menu of powers and take their cases to the Government, urging support for them, not the other way round. That is why the Government have catastrophically failed.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): A lot of resentment is felt in Shropshire, particularly by our chief constable, Paul West, who has stated that he does not want the West Mercia police authority to be amalgamated with four other police authorities. That, coupled with the regional fire control centres, is another example of how the Government are determined to bring about regionalisation by stealth, no matter what local people wish.

Andrew George: I am not sure that it is regional government by stealth. It is the bolstering of an unaccountable Government zone, potentially supported by various cronies and placepeople and certainly not accountable to the zone—the south-west is not a region, as far as I am concerned, and I cannot talk about Mercia—that it is supposed to represent. The issue that the hon. Gentleman talks about needs to be drawn out, and the Government need to reflect on it.

The debate in this Chamber on 12 July and the paucity of the Government's response to the vacuum in policy demonstrate that they appear to be on the nursery slopes of the debate. They are not engaging in the debate: they do not wish to. If they do engage in it, they demonstrate that they are still on the nursery slopes by coming out with the same twaddle about needing economies of scale. One needs only to lift one's eyes beyond the narrow horizons of the Government's view of what Britain should be like to the wider world and to look at regions and provinces in other countries. Grown-up countries do not take the view that they need economies of scale in order to deliver services, and they do not take the view that they need to dictate to those regions and provinces what size—

Chris Huhne rose—

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): rose—

Andrew George: I will give way in a moment, but I am now on my hind legs.

[Andrew George]

Those countries realise that if small provinces are required to work with other provinces, small or large, in order to achieve the economies of scale that will allow them to deliver important services, it can be done. Those provinces and regions simply need the space and the opportunity to do it.

Tony Baldry: The hon. Gentleman is being far too kind to the Government. He assumes that they have beneficial motives; they do not. The Government know that Labour councils will get hammered in the local government elections next year, and this is all a distraction, putting district councillors against district councillors—people of one party against others of the same party. It will not work. There is nothing noble about it. It is a distraction, because they know that their party will be devastated in next year's elections.

Andrew George: I am aware of the time, so I hope that those who intervene on me do not mind that as a result of taking interventions I shall speak for rather longer than I had intended. Unless I hear otherwise, I will try shortly to draw my remarks to a close. However, I will try to deal with the questions raised.

I will come to the question of how these things relate to the apparently leaked memo—I believe that the Minister will say that it was a letter—from the Minister of Communities and Local Government to some of his governmental colleagues. The important issue is the order in which reorganisation takes place, if it is to take place. I am sure that the leak leaves a number of people with the clear sense that mere cynicism lies behind the alleged proposals for local government reorganisation and that they are not part of an intelligent, thought-through policy.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Before the hon. Gentleman moves on, is he aware that Northamptonshire now has a grotesque structure called a sub-region? The Milton Keynes and South Midlands sub-region has published its own spatial strategy and encompasses counties that fall into the east midlands and the eastern and the south-eastern regions of England. It has taken from the counties' structure plans responsibility for planning thousands of new houses in the shire counties.

Andrew George: I am sure that the Minister will take on board that plea on behalf of the area that the hon. Gentleman represents. Many of the proposals and spatial strategies emanating from such bodies are particularly ghastly documents, and those local authorities that wish to engage with them find it extremely difficult to do so. There is very strong objection to the way in which such documents have been drawn up and about the fact that they fail properly to reflect some of the strategies and intentions of the local authorities with which such bodies are engaging.

Having said all that, it is rather sweet of the Government to respond as they do whenever I raise the Cornish dimension to devolution. Despite the fact that a large number of people aspire—I would argue that it is the settled will of Cornwall—to modest powers devolved to a regional assembly that covers the local authorities of Cornwall and of the Isles of Scilly, the Government take the view that they know better than the people of Cornwall how to run their affairs. It is extremely kind of them, but we could do without that level of intervention.

Chris Huhne: Let me reinforce my hon. Friend's point. Does he agree that the English regions of which the Government seem so enamoured are extraordinarily large? My region, the south-east, has more than 8 million people and is covered by 83 Westminster constituencies. Every English region apart from one—the north-east—is larger than the Republic of Ireland. Therefore, we should consider much more substantial decentralisation than merely to the regional level on which the Government are so keen.

Andrew George: Let me correct my hon. Friend: he cannot say regional level and must get used to the term Government zone level if we are to do this right and use the proper terminology. However, he rightly points to the need for a constructive proposal to fill the vacuum in Government policy. I hope that the Minister is listening. If the Government follow the principle of letting go rather than that of holding on for dear life, they should end up taking a grown-up but more passive approach to devolution. They might recognise that it is possible to achieve devolution and decentralisation in the over-large Government zones by waiting and allowing local authorities, community groups and others to make a business case for the definition of their own regional boundaries, and to demonstrate how they would run their region and which powers they would wish to take on initially—recognising that it is a process and not a single event—from a menu that the Government would, I hope, be prepared to offer them. Referendums are far more likely to be won if the people in the regions are involved than if the terms appear to be imposed by the Government.

With regard to local government reorganisation and the Whitehall memo that was apparently leaked to the press at the weekend, let us put aside the claims that it is all part of a scurrilous and cynical Government ploy to deal with the problems of Tory shire counties. We need to take care that it is not part of another cynical ploy—a tactic to divert us from the important task of addressing the deficit in the definition of devolution from central Government, particularly when so many powers are being syphoned away from local authorities and so many statutory responsibilities have been loaded on to them.

Such authorities are given no other choice than to be Government agents rather than genuine local government making its own decisions, so the whole exercise becomes rather fatuous. It is like asking an engineer to start building a bridge from the centre or, in the context of the syphoning away of powers that I have described, like rearranging the deckchairs on HMS Local Government before it finally goes under. One has to start with a clear vision of what the Government want to achieve with the devolution of power and of their strategy.

Finally—this is the Isles of Scilly interlude in the wider debate—the Government should take care with the uniform application of national policy and its impact. The Isles of Scilly have a population of 2,000 people and a small local authority with a range of responsibilities covering not just county and district council matters but others such as water, which was never privatised, and the running of the airport and the port.

Either because Government Departments like visiting the Isles of Scilly, which is possible, or because they fail to understand the nature of the responsibilities of the council of the Isles of Scilly, there have in the past year been 31 inspections from different Departments, by inspectors who stay in one of the many swanky hotels on the island and meet officers. Some 113 days of the four chief officers' time has been taken up with receiving and meeting those guests and answering questions, although each chief officer has only a total of 220 days each year. When one takes into account all the time that they have to put into the preparation of their case and answering inquiries, one sees that more than 250 days of chief officer time is taken up with addressing the problems of inspection. That is neither best value for local government resources nor proportionate. I hope that the Minister is keeping a watching eye on that and considering the cost.

I have had to fight the best value inspections. We have managed to negotiate the number of indicators that have been used from 140 down to 75, but there were times when the local authority was asked to undertake a best value analysis for grave digging, trading standards and traffic wardens. In fact, on some occasions the best value analysis cost more than running the service. That is a bizarre situation on which I hope the Minister and the Government will reflect when they review how to deal with such matters, and I hope that they will not always assume that all local authorities are large metropolitan areas.

Finally, civil contingencies budgets were apparently enhanced for this year. Under the new formula, the civil contingencies budget for the Isles of Scilly was cut from £54,000 a year to £1,800 a year. That is some enhancement. That amount hardly covers the cost of the officer responsible for the service travelling to meetings in the so-called region—in Exeter and other places—and his telephone bill, let alone his other costs and expenses. Clearly, the Government need to reflect on that.

I apologise to all present for taking so much time, but I understood that more people wished to intervene than to make speeches, so I have taken that into account.

I hope that the Government will not hide and become paralysed. Although in Liberal Democrat terms I have been brutal with the Minister in my comments, I hope that he will not become paralysed, because some of us are keen to engage with a Government who demonstrate that they are genuinely eager to deliver devolution and decentralisation. That cannot be done if they keep retreating into their shell.

We want to help. I hope that the Minister is listening, is prepared to take note and will debate the matter further and often.

Mr. Eric Illsley (in the Chair): Before calling the next speaker, I remind Members that I intend to begin the winding-up speeches at 3.30 pm, so I ask for brief contributions from here on in.

3.4 pm

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): Perhaps I should declare an interest from the start. I have been a Member of the Welsh Assembly for the past six years, despite the fact that I campaigned and voted against it. If I had the opportunity to vote in another referendum, I would probably vote for Christmas, unlike the proverbial turkey. I went into politics because I believed that it should be about low taxes, high-quality public services, low taxation wherever possible and building a sense of cohesion. The Welsh Assembly, and regional government in general, undermines those key principles.

We saw a huge rise in the costs of government from the moment that the Welsh Assembly was set up. One of the first decisions taken was to build ourselves a brand new building, which originally cost £6 million and is now running at £66 million. That money is coming straight out of the block grant for the Welsh Assembly, or regional government, and could be spent on other matters.

There are also Welsh embassies all over the world—or, rather, in the more exotic parts of the world—[Interruption.] I am happy to give way to anyone who wants to ask me about that. I have tried to find out the costs of the embassies. I know that they run into millions; the embassy in New York is in the Chrysler building. I am unable to give a definitive figure because, despite my asking a series of written questions on it, the Minister has not been able to give me a proper cost.

There has also been an expensive reorganisation of quangos, which brings me to public services. One effect of regional government is a tendency among those running it to try to do things differently, even when there is no real reason to do so. I have been critical of this Government in Westminster and their handling of the health service. However, they are doing a far better job of running the health service than their colleagues in the Welsh Assembly are. Perhaps that is because the Government have a slightly more pragmatic approach or because of the relatively lower costs of having a larger health service in England; I do not know the full answer. The health service in England is far better than the one in Wales.

Daniel Kawczynski: May I tell my hon. Friend and the Minister something? As a result of the different policies that the Welsh Assembly now employs, my Royal Shrewsbury hospital loses £2 million a year, because the Assembly pays a different amount per patient than English authorities do.

David T.C. Davies: Indeed. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for pointing out some of the many irregularities caused by the fact that we no longer have a national health service; we have a regional health service.

On education, it concerns me that there is now talk of developing separate qualifications that might not be recognised in the rest of the United Kingdom. On agriculture, we saw the effects of the difficulty of getting the level of expertise needed to deal with complicated cases during the foot and mouth crisis. That was demonstrated when somebody from the Welsh Assembly agricultural department rang up one of my constituents, who had asked for a movement licence on a bull, to ask what sex the bull was. That is a true story.

[David T.C. Davies]

The hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) mentioned taxation. Under the current models, regional governments are not given powers to raise taxes—quite rightly, too. As a result, where they have had responsibility for local government funding there has been a tendency for them to use that to raise taxes through the back door by increasing council tax.

In a debate on local government the relevant Minister was criticised for council tax rises of between 74 and 90 per cent. I think I said that we would be having parties in the street to celebrate if our council taxes had risen by only 90 per cent. or so in Wales. In my constituency, the figure is more like 130 per cent.

I am proud to be Welsh, particularly on international days, and I am again very much looking forward to the game against England this year. I am also proud of the fact that I am British. There is currently a great danger—a tendency to encourage people to define themselves by the region that they come from, by their ethnicity, by their religion or by any one of a number of other distinctions, whereas we should encourage everyone to define themselves as British.

We have to build a strong, cohesive society. To do that, we should say to people that they should be able to celebrate whichever culture, religion, ethnicity or regional identity they feel that they have; that is fine. However, we also need to encourage people to celebrate something that is a little different and that can unite us all. That argument is currently being won on both the left and the right.

I can see some advantages in regional government. Regional government representatives and Assembly Members—whatever we want to call them—are local. They are back in their constituencies most nights and are therefore easier to get hold of. It is easier to get hold of Ministers in the Welsh Assembly Government than to get hold of Ministers in Westminster. That was said without any disrespect to the Minister present today, because there are more regional representatives and they are more local. It is also easier to raise matters in the local press, because it tends to be based in the areas where regional governments are based.

I do not believe that the advantages outweigh the disadvantages. I accept that there is now a question, because we have a Parliament in Scotland, which has tax-raising powers and primary legislative powers, an Assembly in Wales with secondary legislative powers and, theoretically, no tax-raising powers—although I would argue that it has them—and an assembly in London. I shall not go into the complexities of Northern Ireland. We have different systems of government throughout the United Kingdom. That was not thought through sensibly. The population of Scotland is of course twice that of Wales, which is twice that of Northern Ireland. The question arises of our perhaps setting up an English Parliament or regional governments, or simply preventing Welsh and Scottish Members of Parliament from voting on matters that affect only England. That is a matter for the English to sort out. However, I strongly suggest that the answer to the question is not more politicians, more taxation, lower public service levels, or anything that undermines the principle that all of us are British.

3.10 pm

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) on securing an important and timely debate. In preparation for it, I thought about who I would consider the most influential figure in recent local government history, and I concluded that it was probably not anyone pictured in the halls around Westminster, but Derek Hatton, or "Degsy", as he is known in Liverpool, who managed not only to be a bête noire of Labour and the Conservatives but to be not much liked by Liberal Democrats. He was the last person I can recall who set municipal power into deliberate conflict with Whitehall power.

When Derek Hatton came to power, the Government had already decided, post-Toxteth, that local government could not really be trusted, and had tried to emasculate or sideline it by creating other agencies. The Greater London council and metropolitan counties had already been abolished. Certainly, Mr. Hatton played a pivotal role in a hardening of Whitehall thinking which, I should say, spans different Administrations.

The strategy that I have described has not been reversed. Those of us who have observed local government in recent years have noticed a reduction in its functions, a limiting of its role as a provider, and a capping and controlling of its budgets, with, on balance, a preponderance of its funding increasingly being provided from the centre, and the loss of business rates. The Government have gone so far as to determine the structure of council meetings, with the imposition of the cabinet system.

To be fair, the Government would probably claim, by contrast, to have given local government some new powers. However, when those powers are examined in detail they tend to emerge as powers to enable rather than provide, powers that, often, are shared with other partners, or what I might call short-straw powers, such as the power to impose congestion charging or administer the Licensing Act 2003—unattractive numbers that central Government do not fancy.

We must accept that the great days of civic power are some way behind us now, with the not unexpected result that turnout is down and local government is by and large left as a useful whipping boy or, occasionally, bogey man, whereas in reality genuine power has shifted massively to the centre. I should go so far as to say that local government is not only no longer an autonomous unit, but not any more even a trusted partner.

Centralisation, however, goes only so far. There comes a point at which centralisation assumes a burden that it can no longer carry. It has thus been necessary for the centre to create various satellite agencies, such as the development agencies and the Government offices that inhabit the regions like colonial viceroys, and to try through them to administer each region in various ways. Such agencies certainly father, in conjunction with regional assemblies, a host of varied strategies.

I disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives that there is paralysis; I think that there is progress, because we all know that a range of interesting strategies are at the moment cooking in the bowels of various Government offices and development agencies—spatial strategies, housing strategies, transport strategies and economic strategies. All those are influential or bound to be influential. They are consulted on in a brief and perfunctory pattern, but I do not think that anyone would recommend them as genuine, ideal democratic products.

Perhaps I can give two local examples from the region that the Minister and I inhabit. A north-west transport strategy is being developed. That is basically a 10-year transport plan for the entire north-west. It is being produced fairly quickly, with a deadline of around January for the region and around March for the Government. It is proposed that £1.4 billion of public expenditure will be committed or prioritised. Included in that strategy there will obviously be some schemes that many Members of Parliament would like; but other schemes that they would like may well not be there. Key decisions are being made with inordinate haste. The whole process is veiled, by and large, from council leaders, certainly in part from Members of Parliament, and certainly from much of the business community. None the less, it will undoubtedly be fairly influential.

The region that I share with the Minister comes under the Northwest Development Agency. It often says that it has a three-year strategic plan that identifies which projects it will and will not fund, but I invite Members just to try to get it off them—they will find it fairly difficult. They would also find that not even the Freedom of Information Act 2000 will prise the plan from the agency.

I think that there is an appalling democratic deficit, and most people would say that that was the case in the example that I have just given, but the situation is complicated by haste and the genuine lack of regional government. Whatever we think about it, there is now some regional decision making by our regional government. That, coupled with the regionalisation of emergency services—something mentioned by other Members—and of the health services, is not so much a democratic deficit as a complete democratic vacuum. That is one reason why the Select Committee on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will look into regionalisation over the next few weeks or months.

I turn to the poor old counties—I say "poor old counties" because they have essentially been stripped by the regional bodies of their strategic transport role. Roads are no respecters of council boundaries; I accept that. Counties have been largely stripped of education, and are simply a postbox for educational funding. Social services are, by and large, shared between counties and health bodies now, and so the counties act in partnership rather than autonomously. In fact, it has to be said that they are now an extra layer in a world, largely, of unitaries. As function and structure are intimately related, if all those changes in function are made, some change in structure will inevitably be suggested at some point. Therefore, the leak from the Minister for Communities and Local Government the other day was heard with a sense of inevitability by some of us, because it follows logically and consecutively from the Government's prior plans.

However, I do not want to get into a debate about the structure of local government, or even to suggest an ideal template to hon. Members. The fundamental issue, as was highlighted in the introductory speech, is the democratic deficit. The question is how we get public ownership of local and regional decisions, and how we persuade people that it makes a real difference to vote for any local or regional body.

3.18 pm

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): It was always ridiculous making the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) the Deputy Prime Minister, because the Government then had to create a whole Department for his entertainment. Having created the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, they then had to find something for it and its junior Ministers to do. All they have managed to do is meddle; there is compulsive meddling on the part of this Government. Oxfordshire is about to lose its fire control centre; the Home Office is deciding whether Thames Valley police should join Hampshire police to form a new force; and there is a comprehensive reorganisation of primary care trusts only a few years after they were introduced.

I do not think that the Government have any noble intent in suggesting a reorganisation of local government. It is a ploy; they know that next year there will be some very difficult local government elections for them—in London, in the unitary authorities and in a number of the shire districts. They know that they will get squeezed by Conservatives and Liberals, and I suspect they will find themselves in a very humiliating position. This proposal is a distraction from future election losses and a distraction from the extent to which, under the Government's stewardship, council tax has gone up and continues to go up. Last year, the Government injected a one-off £1 billion into council tax—a pre-election give-away that clearly will not be repeated this year. As I shall later say, we are likely to see an average increase of £100 in council tax because of the Government's actions.

We do not need to look too closely, because we know from the experiences of history what happens when one seeks to reorganise local government. As Sir John Banham, who undertook the last consideration of reorganisation, said only the other day on "The World at One":

> "Any reorganisation costs more, takes longer and delivers less than any proponents of change ever thought. Everyone needs to be very careful before they undertake further disruption."

However, that is what the Government want to do in rural England: to be disruptive and expensive and to deliver less. When I go down the high street in Banbury, I am not stopped by people who say, "We would really like to see Oxfordshire county council abolished. We would love to see a unitary authority here." What they are really concerned about is the collapse of the NHS in Oxfordshire and the fact that their council tax bills are going through the roof.

When the council tax was introduced in 1993–94, it averaged £456; today it averages £1,009. Sir Jeremy Beecham, the vice-chairman of the Local Government Association and a Labour councillor, said only the other day that the LGA is hoping for a substantial sum from the Government along the lines of last year's one-off £1 billion payment, because if it does not get that, there will be a shortfall that could mean an average £100-a-year increase in the council tax this coming year. That is not because local authorities have been wasteful, irresponsible or profligate or because they have been tearing up £5 notes and throwing them into the River Thames; it is because authorities across England face extra costs of £2.8 billion to cover the new responsibilities imposed by Whitehall. Those are Sir Jeremy Beecham's figures.

[Tony Baldry]

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Phil Woolas): Even the Local Government Association does not say that the figure to which the hon. Gentleman refers is made up of supposed new burdens.

Tony Baldry: That is the reported figure. Perhaps the Minister will give the new burdens figure when he winds up; we look to having the whole of that incorporated into the local government settlement. That settlement will be difficult not only because of council tax, but because we will be hammered in Oxfordshire on the supporting people budget. It is wholly unsatisfactory that councils should regularly have to plead for one-off cash handouts, rather than having a stable and predictable source of income from the Government.

What is also particularly distressing about the ever-increasing hikes in the council tax bill—which are, of course, a very effective stealth tax because they result from the Government's shifting of burdens from central Government to local government without proper funding—is that the people who get really hammered are those on fixed incomes such as pensioners. Council tax has risen and continues to rise by far more than prices and the state pension. We have seen the council tax go up by nearly three times the inflation rate.

There is another particularly stupid aspect of the proposals for reorganising, merging or scrapping Oxfordshire county council or other tiers of local government. In its reports, the Audit Commission shows that in the south of the country, for example, local authorities—many of which are Conservative-controlled—are better than any other part of the public sector in delivering efficiency savings and are persistently among the best performers in the Audit Commission league tables. If parts of central Government were as effective as local authorities such as Oxfordshire county council and Cherwell district council at delivering efficiency savings and doing more for less, public finances would be a lot better and there would not be that sizeable black hole in the Government's finances.

The whole debate about the reorganisation of local government is a deliberate distraction on the part of the Deputy Prime Minister and Ministers. They want to attract attention away from the substantial hikes in council tax that we will see as a consequence of this year's local government settlement, which always comes up just before Christmas in the hope that the Christmas break will also somehow distract people's attention. They want to distract people's attention also from the devastating local government results that will occur quite rightly next May.

3.25 pm

Sir Peter Soulsby (Leicester, South) (Lab): I speak as somebody who has been an elected member of a local authority for some 30 years, and who led one for some 17 years. On many occasions during that time, I found myself on the receiving end of changes in structure and in Government policy.

I can look back during that period at a significant change to the way in which the public view local government and local government views itself. We have seen public esteem for local government and the morale of those involved in it—particularly elected members—diminish. Members of all parties will acknowledge that the link between the level of spending of individual local authorities and the level of taxes levied by them was lost in many people's minds, and that it became confused and opaque. We have discussed on other occasions the gearing effect of how things work at the moment.

I shall keep my remarks brief and look back to the damage that was caused in the 1980s with the confrontation between central Government and local government—the attack on services, the erosion of powers and the way in which local government's legitimacy was undermined. I shall also look forward to the Lyons review of the structure and the purpose of local government and its function.

David T.C. Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Peter Soulsby: No, time is about to expire, so if the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I shall not give way.

We must look forward with some optimism to the Lyons review, and look for genuine devolution and decentralisation to arise from it. I hope that through the review and in the Minister's contribution towards its thinking he agrees that some significant issues need to be tackled. Most particularly, there is the funding of local government to ensure the availability of a broader range of funding sources and genuine accountability by local government for the level of spending, which is then linked back to the level of taxation.

I hope that the Minister agrees that there is a need for a review of the remnants of the two-tier system. It was partially addressed by the abolition of the metropolitan councils and the establishment of some unitary authorities, but it must now be addressed throughout the remainder of the UK. The system remains wasteful, and unnecessary duplication is built into it.

I hope also that the Minister agrees that there is a need to look again at the way that the cabinet and scrutiny systems have worked in practice, recognising that although there have been some benefits, in many areas it has led to increased confusion rather than transparency about where decision making takes place, and that the role of scrutiny is not always 100 per cent. successful.

Finally, I hope that now and as part of the review the Minister will consider ways in which it is possible to restore the morale of members of local government, recognising that for all parties there is a real issue about attracting a high calibre of person to local authorities, and, once they are elected, retaining those members. Far too many of them will serve one term and decide that they are going to go away and do something useful with the rest of their life. We need to restore the legitimacy and prestige of those who serve us, as members of local authorities. We must recognise that there is a job to be done to restore local government as an essential part of our democratic structures.

3.30 pm

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) on securing this debate on an important and timely topic. I agree with him especially on two points. First, I agree with his preference for power to be held at the most local level possible. If that turns out to be regional, or zonal, as he puts it, that is fine, but it strikes me—as I think it strikes him—that that will be quite a rare occurrence. Usually, power can be held at a level more local than the large zonal level to which he refers. The second point implicit in what he said was that power ought to be built up from the bottom rather than imposed from the top. That leads to my, and I think his, preference for joint working and joint commissioning of services as a way of overcoming the problems of economies of scale, rather than starting with gigantic authorities built around the principle that sometimes quite rare services must be delivered in the most efficient way.

It strikes me that the regional level might be suitable, say, for strategic planning and some aspects of transport—although even in respect of transport, sub-regional levels are often better—but that there are otherwise few natural functions for it. As my hon. Friend said, however, as long as regional offices exist, and as long as regional quangos multiply, there is a serious democratic deficit to be dealt with in our approach to regional government. It is important to review the way in which existing regional assemblies work to ensure that they are properly accountable, and we should be thinking about looking for ways in which to make them more clearly accountable downwards to local government, rather than upwards to national Government.

The situation of local government following the leaked memo to The Daily Telegraph is interesting. The Lyons review started as a review of finance. Then the Government announced that it was to be expanded to look into function. Now it seems that we are to have a review of structure as well. Add those three things together, and we are in the midst of a general review of local government. Albeit perhaps by accident rather than by design, that is the point that we have reached. If so, this is the right time to return to first-principle thinking about local government, and for the Government to publish a White Paper outlining their view of the whole relationship between central and local government, rather than tackling the question in parts. For Liberal Democrats, the basic principle is localism.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): From the Minister's body language—I saw him smiling at his civil servants—it appears that the Government propose to bring forward a White Paper along those lines. I hope that the Minister will be able to confirm that later.

David Howarth: I would be happy if that idea had occurred to the Department and the Minister.

For us, the basic principle is localism. Power should be exercised at the most local possible level. However, it is important to understand not just the principle but the reasons for it, as they may determine a lot of policy direction. The Minister has heard me say this before, but perhaps other hon. Members have not. We have three distinct reasons for being in favour of localism, which lead to distinct conclusions in their own right. One is that power should be dispersed, rather than being too concentrated in too few hands, and that local government has a constitutional role to play. The second is that there is a need for diversity and experimentation, both in government and in society, and that local government can play a role in that as well. Thirdly, there is a need for democratic participation, and it is important that local government should be seen as a way in which local people can participate in the democratic process. I do not have time to go into those three reasons at great length, although I am sure that Ministers would be happy to respond on the reasons for localism, rather than simply stating conclusions.

The most important aspect of our belief in the dispersal of power is that we think that local government should be about local politics, not about local administration. Part of the problem is central Government's view that local government should be their agent rather than a source of political legitimacy in its own right. We should look forward to a situation where national Government respect the powers of local government within its sphere and a financial structure is in place to back that up, and where, when national Government want local government to act for them, they have to negotiate with local government about accepting extra responsibilities, rather than simply imposing them through legislation.

The central point about experimentation and diversity is that local government should be able to experiment not only with the delivery of policies but with what policies to deliver. National Government should content themselves with minimum standards and providing information about performance and practice. The crucial difference is that the implied national policy has been for decades that public services should be delivered in the same way throughout the country. That is implicit in the local government financial system. As a matter of principle, we should move away from the idea of uniformity to one in which local government is encouraged to have different policy aims from national Government.

The most important of the three points concerns democratic participation. It is necessary to the survival of democracy itself that as many people as possible have direct experience of the democratic system. By that, I mean not only voting but standing in elections, serving as a representative, making decisions and being held accountable for those decisions. We cannot afford further development of a small and separate political class—an isolated clique of leaders divided from a resentful mass whose only experience of democracy is being governed by someone else. The best defence of democracy is the widespread experience of democratic politics.

The theme that lies behind what is said on many sides, including in the leaked document in The Daily Telegraph, is that it is a good idea to reduce the number of councillors just for the sake of it. I oppose that. By international standards, we are not over-represented in this country. The Government might quite rightly—this relates to a point raised by the hon. Member for

[David Howarth]

Leicester, South (Sir Peter Soulsby)—be worried about the quality of local government councillors, and think that one way of addressing that could be to reduce the number of councillors and to use the money that would otherwise be spent to increase allowances to make attractive salaries. However, that is the wrong way to attract talent to local government. The best action to take would be to increase the powers of local government and to free it from national control, so that councillors can achieve something for their communities. Freedom for councils means better councillors.

It seems that one of the Government's reasons for unitary councils is a reduction in the number of councillors. I would not accept that. I also reject the idea of a single system of local government throughout the country. A single system is wrong; there should be various ideas of how to run local government. There is immense geographical diversity in the country and what might be appropriate for a rural area might not be appropriate for an urban area. However, as another former council leader, I am much attracted to single-tier local government, especially in urban areas. The present system leads to immense confusion and failure among the various levels of local government to take responsibility.

It is difficult for the electorate to believe that the county council is responsible for all the roads, even in an urban district, or that one council deals with waste collection, while another deals with waste disposal. I remember from my time as a council leader that the local population always thought that I was responsible for all the county's services, including part of the health service. That lack of clarity is a real problem for democratic accountability.

If The Daily Telegraph leak is right, I strongly advise the Government to think carefully about how they propose to go about the reform. They risk repeating some of the mistakes of the Banham/Grant commission. That went for speed. Its remit was limited to building new authorities out of existing authorities, and not crossing county boundaries. In many areas, including mine, those two rules by themselves meant that no agreement was possible, because fears of dominance of town over country or country over town, or the existence—in my area—of several important towns close to county boundaries made the creation of a rational system of unitary authorities impossible.

I advise going for a slower, but more thorough process that allowed more radical solutions and that sought ideas not only from existing councils, which are bound to reflect their institutional interests, but from a wider community. Structure is probably the last thing that must be decided after function and finance, and it is important for the Government to return to that.

3.40 pm

Alistair Burt (North East Bedfordshire) (Con): Welcome, Mr. Illsley, to the third and probably spikiest of an occasional series of seminars on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, ably run by the Minister and the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth). Although we have less time than normal on this occasion, what has been packed in has certainly been up to the quality of our previous sessions.

I congratulate the brutal hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) on securing this debate and leading off. He gave a series of illustrations of how the present burden of waste and bureaucracy is causing nonsense and managed to put the words "cynical ploy" and "this Labour Government" in the same sentence. I suspect that if that were tapped into Google there might be more than one reference to those words being linked.

My hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies) told us about his experience of the Welsh Assembly and of how costs can rise. He spoke endearingly of Welsh embassies around the world but, frankly, with the Welsh rugby team and Katherine Jenkins, I do not see that anything else is needed to advertise Welshness anywhere.

The hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) drew attention to another modern problem connected with local government: the plethora of bodies that are now involved in some way in partnerships or stakeholding so that any consultation must be rushed before information comes back. That led him to the conclusion, as it would have led me, that the only winner in such a system is the sole partner with a fixed and single view: the Government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) in a series of devastating attacks clearly pointed out the damage done by the waste, bureaucracy and nonsense that characterise local government today. He rightly referred to the quotation of John Banham about how the costs of restructuring are always well beyond anything that is contemplated. He put his finger on the elephant in the room: the leaked letter of the Minister of Communities and Local Government which was a ploy to divert attention from impending huge council tax increases and to set Tory against Tory—a ploy with which we will not comply.

The hon. Member for Leicester, South (Sir Peter Soulsby), with almost a slight deviation to the 1980s which might not have been necessary, made a significant and well measured contribution on the problems of attracting people into local government, of public esteem and of establishing proper links between what is raised and what is spent. Although it has taken him 30 years to decide to leave local government and get a life, we are delighted that his experience is so well put to effect in a debate such as this.

The hon. Member for Cambridge in his usual persuasive and homely way gave us another master class based on his experience of local government. I particularly agree with and support his point that if we want to enhance local authorities in this country, we do not need gimmicks. We need to restore their power and accountability, and then the sort of people who made local government great in this country will again be attracted to work in that area. There are already good people in local government, but too many have slipped away because they feel that they could do something elsewhere. We want them restored to local government.

I remember that as a child when I passed churches, and being a good follower of Jesus, I read the little homilies outside. One I particularly remember said accusingly, "If you were charged with being a Christian, would there be enough evidence to convict you?" I have lived with the guilt of that ever since. I could turn that around today and ask the Minister whether there was sufficient evidence to convict him and his colleague of making a complete Horlicks of local government in England and Wales. I suggest that the answer would be yes. Based on that evidence, we have heard today all the problems with which he is rightly charged.

There is continual tension in the United Kingdom between the powers of central Government and the needs of local government. That waxes and wanes over the years depending on the Government, and there is never a fixed point at which there is a settlement. The nation feels that this Government are central and controlling and the lack of trust in them is strongly reflected at local level. If there is to be a better future for regional and local government in England and Wales, three problems must be addressed and put right.

First, the Government must stop undermining local accountability. New taxes and burdens are imposed on local government, but it is not given the funds to pay for them and the public become confused about the responsibilities of their local authority and of the Government. New burdens in recent years have included the landfill directive, the directive on disposal of white goods and electronics, asylum seeker dispersal, care standards, emergency planning, homelessness and licensing. All were placed on local authorities without money to pay for them.

Beyond that, there is a growing sense among those at senior level in local government that, these days, they must look up to Whitehall for their careers and future, not out to the community that they are supposed to be serving. They feel that they are the local arm of central Government, and that is not what local government should be. In my area, that led to the nonsense of rate capping. Mid Bedfordshire council had the 10th lowest charge in England, but it cost £85,000 to re-bill ratepayers, all to save them an average of 15p per week. That is an example of domination by the Government going too far.

Secondly, the Government must stop undermining local responsibility by moving powers to various boards and partnerships. We all know of examples. The clearest one is moving powers to regional offices which do not, in fact, deliver the goods. They now have responsibilities for transport, housing and planning that have been taken from democratically elected bodies. If regional offices worked, that would be something, but the report yesterday from the Urban Task Force neatly illustrated how they fail to get things right. In describing the problems of delivering regeneration, the Urban Task Force stated:

> "The plethora of overlapping, but differently funded and monitored, area based regeneration bodies has reduced the delivery effectiveness of public sector led regeneration schemes. This has been exacerbated by the disconnection of regeneration expenditure between Government Regional Offices, Regional Development Agencies and English Partnerships and the huge number of new ineffective partnerships at local and sub-regional levels".

That is how the new bodies and the new partnerships do not deliver on just one aspect of government—the vital one of delivering regeneration. They do not do the job and are not effective in crucial areas.

Thirdly, the Government must sort out and stop the incessant drive to regionalisation. The preamble of the leaked letter states:

> "As you know, over the last year, we have been engaged in a wide-ranging debate about the future of local government. In the context of that debate and of the proposed significant organisational changes under way in Police and Health services it seems to me"— that is, the Minister of Communities and Local Government—

> "that we have an unprecedented opportunity to consider together the structures that are in place to provide services to local people and to improve partnership working."

If that is to be done in the context of police and health, we know what it will be. It will be regionalisation, as that is where restructuring goes and it is the declared aim of the Government. We know exactly what we will get if local government reorganisation follows that pattern.

A better approach for the Minister for Local Government to take would be, first, to restore local authority powers and responsibilities. Powers should be gathered from the top down and sideways from the various boards. That would lead to an increase in interest and participation.

Secondly, the Minister should encourage the voluntary coming together of areas where there is a natural congruence, because the regional boundaries as currently devised simply are not adequate. For example, there is more congruence among south coast towns than there is in any structure that links them with places many miles to the north or inland.

Thirdly, the Government should be an enabler and ring-holder, and not enforce from the top down. Fourthly, it is better to build from the bottom up, and to ensure that councils at district, county, borough and metropolitan levels pare costs, share facilities and look for a consensus on what is delivered and how it might be done. Finally, the Government should pare down partnerships and make their responsibilities clearer so that they can deliver. That is a better recipe for local government growth and development in this country than continuing along the failing lines that I fear the Minister and his colleagues will enforce on us all.

3.50 pm

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Phil Woolas): I thank hon. Members for a very wide-ranging debate. The title of regional and local government allows comment on just about anything. I congratulate the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) on securing the debate and on giving us the opportunity to share different policy ideas and strategies. I also thank him for asking questions about his constituency. I am grateful for the advance notice that he gave me, and for the spirit in which he approached the subject.

I reject the central charges that hon. Gentlemen have made against Government policy. There have been caricatures of policy, repeats of urban myths and some slight exaggerations. We have also been accused of control freakery yet again. This Government, who devolved power to Scotland, to Wales and to London, and who have pursued a policy of freedom and flexibility towards local government, cannot fairly be accused of control freakery, especially when contrasted with the Government of the 1980s and early 1990s, a period to which some hon. Members referred.

We have also been accused of regionalisation. That is unfair, and I shall try to explain why in the brief time available to me. The debate in Government and in Parliament was whether transport, for example, should be regionalised down from Whitehall, not up from local authorities. Some functions, such as those performed by regional fire control centres, are performed well at regional level. Emergency numbers have worked very well indeed in London for most of the past 100 years, and have the support of most fire officers across the country.

[Mr. Phil Woolas]

I shall try to answer as quickly as I can some of the specific points made by the hon. Member for St. Ives, because it is his debate. He called for a new meeting of the Regional Affairs Committee. The Government are open to that suggestion, but I remind him that only eight Members responded, if my memory serves me correctly, when the views of the House were canvassed on whether it should meet again.

Andrew George: Perhaps I blinked when that happened, but just so that I did not miss it, will the Minister say how the House was canvassed on whether the Regional Affairs Committee should meet again?

Mr. Woolas: If my memory serves me correctly—I shall correct myself if it does not—my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) canvassed the House, and the Leader of the House was presented with the result of the canvass just before the hon. Gentleman asked his question in the House. That, I remember, was part of his consideration. The point is that the Committee exists. I should have thought that the House would want to consider the possibility of its meeting again. I am certainly not standing in the way of its doing so. Indeed, I believe that it has the power to meet outside London.

The hon. Gentleman made some points about the Isles of Scilly. The per capita ratio of senior officers to population is pretty high compared with my local authority, but he has a point, on common-sense grounds if in no other way, and I am pleased to report to the Chamber that Departments, agencies and the council have started to work together under voluntary arrangements to plan improvements, particularly to the inspection regime. Indeed, a meeting is scheduled for 19 December to take that forward. I am very conscious of the fact that applying the funding regime to the Isles of Scilly does produce unintended consequences that can be disruptive for them, and I thank the hon. Gentleman for making that point.

May I hit on the head the point about county councils versus districts, and the suggestion that that was a cynical ploy on the part of a Labour Government? I do not concede that, because I do not concede for a moment that all counties and districts are held by the Conservative party. If we took the point made by the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) and picked, say, Durham and Lancashire, we would find that the situation was different. Although it is not, of course, the Government's policy to comment on leaks, a close reading of The Daily Telegraph shows that the options were simply put forward and no conclusions were drawn. It is hardly a secret—indeed, it is an open debate in local government—that the issue has been considered not least by districts and counties. However, Government policy on the issue shows no predilection towards counties or district—or, indeed, towards taking action on structures at all.

Alistair Burt: I am extremely grateful to the Minister for giving way in such a tight debate, but can I press him on the issue of context? The point made by the Minister of Communities and Local Government at the beginning of his letter is that the debate on restructuring should be seen in the context of the structural changes being made to the police and health services. Those are being redesigned on a regional basis, which therefore gives rise to the supposition that that will also be the context for the changes in local government. Can the Minister respond?

Mr. Woolas: I can respond and I am glad to have the opportunity to do so, because I think that the hon. Gentleman is misreading things in that respect. No regionalisation of primary care trusts is being proposed; it is the strategic health authorities that are being considered for regionalisation, and I remind hon. Members that they were regional not too long ago anyway. As I said, the decision on fire control is a sensible management and logistic decision, rather than a policy or political one. Similarly, the proposals for the police, which have been considered and consulted on, are not prescriptive or universal across the country. Amalgamations are proposed where clear benefits to the service can be brought about. The Government's policy is service improvement-led; it is certainly not about regionalisation.

I am squeezed for time, although I am glad to be so, because it is good to see hon. Members taking part in the debate. None the less, let me say that I hope that the hon. Member for St. Ives appreciates that the Liberal Democrat party is in favour of elected regional assemblies. In this debate, he said that very few powers could reasonably be held at regional level, and I do not quite see how the two policies square. At the same time, the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies) said that he is not in favour of devolution and that it has all gone wrong. Therefore, the hon. Member for Monmouth is against devolution, the Liberal Democrat party and the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth) are apparently in favour of devolution to the regions, but do not know what the regions should do, and the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt), who speaks for the official Opposition, accuses the Government of centralisation. The words "pot" and "kettle" come to mind.

David T.C. Davies: I actually said that devolution did not work—I said nothing about the shire counties. In fact, I would be very much in favour of taking further powers from central Government and giving them to county councils, although not to regional assemblies.

Mr. Woolas: I thank the hon. Gentleman. As I have told many conferences of local authority leaders in recent weeks and months, the introduction of local area agreements and the pooling and aligning of Government central funds at local level, with local authorities acting as first among equals in respect of other public sector agencies, are some of the most significant acts of devolution in this country for many a year. I therefore reject the notion that this is a centralising Government and that we are implementing a stealth policy of regionalisation. In fact, as our manifesto declared, and as can be seen from the freedoms and flexibilities, local area agreements and other policy measures that we have introduced, our policy is one not only of decentralisation of function, but of devolution. Let me take the example of the licensing law. The licensing law is an act of devolution; it passes powers to local authorities, although one would not know that.

On the point about the new burdens, the Government are committed to dealing with that. The Local Government Association says that there are £72 million of extra costs, but I have not had one letter pointing out the savings that will be made through that act of devolution.

Cyber Security

4 pm

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to bring an important issue before the House.

There are four types of cyber threat—worms, viruses, trojans and spyware, which can also appear in combination. Worms are self-replicating programs designed to spread through networks and cease operations. Viruses are usually files that attach themselves to other programs and spread themselves into other programs or computers with which they come into contact. A trojan is usually a program that disguises itself as helpful, but then proceeds to replicate itself throughout the computer network, allowing external control as well as user debilitation. Spyware is a type of trojan usually attached to another program which when downloaded is used to record activity on a computer, and is then accessed by the originator.

Today I will consider the national security and economic implications of the advent of new and more aggressive breeds of virus and cyber security threats to Government and the private sector. It is noteworthy that the United States Department of Homeland Security records that the number of cyber attacks increased from 10,000 in 1999 to more than 400,000 in 2004. We are all aware of major incidents that have taken place in recent years. In May 2000, the "I love you" virus, a macro virus that overwrites key computer files, caused $10 billion-worth of damage across the globe. In September 2001, the "Nimda" virus—a worm and virus—which spread throughout north America in just one hour, attacked more than 8 million computers and took weeks to eliminate. It was spread by e-mail attachments and copied itself to mailing lists and networks.

In November 2004, the "Agobot" virus, a dormant virus that replicated itself throughout computer networks, hit the world. It is still dormant in many computers across the globe. Nine million computers have been affected, and that figure is rising as people discover the virus on their systems. In March 2004, "Mydoom", the appropriately named combination of a trojan and a virus, spread to more than 1 million computers in just 56 hours, thereafter infecting another 4 million. The US State Department has suggested that there has been a 300 per cent. increase in trojans in the past year alone. More worryingly, those viruses have been introduced not by amateurs, although they have been involved in some cases, but by professional hackers.

The rise of the professional hacker has serious implications for the UK, particularly in relation to national defence. I would be very concerned indeed if my constituents, or anybody in Britain, felt that our intelligence and defence systems and networks were being penetrated by viruses. There is also the danger that potential enemies of this country might spy on vulnerable and security-restricted areas of the internet. We know that that does occur; it has been confirmed by Governments around the world, including that of France, and, again, by the US Department of Homeland Security. We hear little from the British Government, and I hope that the Minister will be able to throw some light on what Britain is doing about protecting our national security systems from such viruses and cyber security threats.

[Mark Pritchard]

I recall that in July 2001 a worm targeted a weakness in the White House network. That had serious implications for the running of the White House. All users who attempted to access the server were attacked. More than 250,000 computers were affected in three hours. It was code red.

Key national infrastructures, such as energy, transport, finance, telecoms and aviation rely constantly on an exchange of information, primarily through computer networks. A penetration of any of those networks would be a serious threat to national security, not least when it comes to the potential to access Britain's 14 nuclear power stations. I hope that if the Government decide on new nuclear power stations as part of the current energy review—clearly, there is a bit of confusion, but the Prime Minister has hinted about going new nuclear—the software and the systems involved in running them will be fully protected from cyber security threats. It is interesting that imprisoned al-Qaeda members have admitted that their organisation has been attempting to, and no doubt is still attempting to, develop cyber threats to strike western Governments.

There are other issues, such as Government databases, especially those proposed for the national identity card scheme, which would contain biometric data. They have been identified by Infosecurity Today online magazine as potent targets for hacking, possibly allowing massive identity fraud. It is reported that more than 200,000 cases of identity fraud on the internet were recorded in 2004–05, at a cost of nearly £60 million to the UK economy alone. That is in spite of the launch by Companies House of Monitor, which seeks to secure company details—never mind the details of individuals.

There is an added cost in the form of people who would shop online and access services and products—wholesale or retail—in that way, but who are put off by the risk of being exposed to fraud. Online credit card fraud increased by about 29 per cent. over the past year alone, at a cost to UK businesses of at least £16 million and of £260 million worldwide. That is a small proportion of the total and ever-increasing fraud on the world wide web.

I have mentioned America and the French and now I should like to mention the Japanese, being a member of the all-party group on Japan. I am supporting not just Japan's rugby bid, but its anti-corporate espionage activities. It is leading the way in preventing corporate espionage, including the theft of patents, scientific research data, business strategies and client information. In fact, the Japanese Home Office has estimated that there has been a 200 per cent. increase in corporate espionage over the past year. That could have limitless implications for British businesses and entrepreneurs.

So, what can be done? The US has a unified agency called the National Cyber Security Division to assess and respond to cyber-threats. The computer emergency readiness team is a sub-agency of the division and its role is to inform the private sector of any threats and to co-ordinate private sector action and responses. The US Government have also taken several measures to reduce the rise in cyber threats, such as a regular exchange of information between the state and the private sector to alert one another to such threats. Known threats are analysed, and strategies to deal with them are developed. Software is updated and protected against the latest threats. The private sector is encouraged to develop contingency plans should the internet and computer systems, networks and servers fail. However, it is incentivised for doing so.

The rise in aggressive viruses and cyber security threats is a clear and present danger to Britain's national security. It is also a threat to Britain's economic well-being. More than 90 per cent. of cyber threats have a major impact not only on the originating country but across the globe. Britain is the international hub for banking, finance houses and many other businesses, so if we get it wrong it will have implications for many countries as well as ourselves; yet we have no international treaty or convention to deal with cyber crime. We have only a series of bilateral engagements and extradition laws. The Americans, however, extradited someone from the UK, perhaps because their laws are more robust than ours.

That leads me to my questions for the Minister. Will Her Majesty's Government consider strengthening domestic laws to ensure that penalties are severe enough to act as a deterrent to all those caught and convicted of cyber crime? Will the Government work with the international community and the World Trade Organisation towards creating a standard or uniform legal approach at a global level on such issues?

Will the Government consider doing what the United States has done, and establish a cyber security week or cyber security day? That would provide a platform to promote awareness and understanding of cyber security issues, and the potential damage to Britain's economy and national security. It would help if the Government dealt separately with the impact on the private and public sectors.

Will the Government consider forming a unified national cyber security agency, which would take a lead on their behalf and be a single point of cyber security information, guidance and advice for the nation? What are they doing to ensure a robust and co-ordinated response to cyber threats in the UK and among our allies? Viruses can often get through weaker systems. If we, with improved cyber security measures, share intelligence information with nations that do not have similarly robust firewalls—what I might call added-value firewalls—our systems will still be vulnerable. We need to be aware of that.

Will the Government please consider those matters urgently? I have spoken this afternoon about defensive measures. I hope that we shall have time in the House to speak about offensive measures—how to avoid wars and confrontation by disabling our enemies' systems before they can push the button on missiles that might strike our shores. The House should have the opportunity to debate offensive cyber security issues.

I hope that the Minister agrees with his noble Friend Lord Harris of Haringey, who said only a few months ago that the Government should consider appointing a cyber security tsar. I have expressed personal views, but there is cross-party support for them. I hope that the Minister will look upon my proposals and questions favourably.

4.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Barry Gardiner): I congratulate the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) on bringing such an important matter to the attention of the House. I hope that he will forgive me for gently reminding him that he should register his interest as a remunerated director of an internet company, as it is pertinent to our debate.

Mark Pritchard: I am grateful to the Minister for reminding me. I am happy to register that.

Barry Gardiner: Secure networks are absolutely vital, not only to ensure that data held by public and private bodies are not compromised or lost, but to build the element that is essential in any commercial or financial market: consumer confidence. If consumers do not have confidence in their ability to transact online business in safety, they will not transact online business at all.

The Government take such issues seriously. Although my Department's responsibilities focus primarily on the business community, I can outline progress in a range of activities across Government. The strategic focus of Government is co-ordinated through the Cabinet Office. Its primary concern is to ensure that the Government's information assets are properly secured. It is recognised as of vital importance that work in Government is informed by and informs developments in the private sector. For that reason, we see communication between Government and business and end users as vital.

There is now a sense of ownership of the issue among Departments and a recognised community of senior risk owners who are responsible for promoting best practice. The Cabinet Office is also taking a far more forward-looking approach to future risks and acts as the Government's customer for expert work in devising common-good solutions to emerging information security problems. The budget for the vital investment in software and hardware to protect Government information in the current spending round amounts to some £30 million.

The Cabinet Office has also tried to simplify basic security requirements for the entire public sector by producing guidelines on secure e-government. They are supported by a new initiative that will help by the simple method of verifying security claims made for a product. All parts of Government make informed purchases of information technology.

All in all, I believe that the importance of cyber security is now embedded in Government thinking. Hon. Members will have noted that it was one of the key features highlighted in the recent "Transformational Government Enabled by Technology" strategy paper. Government can effectively be moved online only if it is consistently available and, as I said before, has the confidence of its users.

My second point is about the work that we have done to protect our critical national infrastructure. With the emergence of the threat of a remote attack on information systems, the Government have placed particular importance on protecting the systems that are critical to maintaining the energy, communications, water, transport and government systems that are crucial to our way of life. For that reason, in 1999 the Government developed a policy on protecting those systems and created the National Infrastructure Security Co-ordination Centre, NISCC, to implement that policy. NISCC can draw on nearly 100 experts from agencies, and works in close partnership with the police and other parts of Government that have an interest in protecting the critical information infrastructure.

Mark Pritchard: The Minister is absolutely right that that organisation exists. Bringing it on line, if the Minister will forgive the pun, was a major step forward for the Government. However, it has only an advisory role and the threat should be managed more robustly.

Barry Gardiner: I understand the tenor of the hon. Gentleman's remarks. However, NISCC has established good working relations with the management of public and private sector owners of the infrastructure. It discusses with them, as a trusted partner, how those systems are secured against a constantly changing threat paradigm. It has established communities in the relevant sectors called information exchanges, where front-line security specialists can talk frankly about emerging problems and solutions. There are active information exchanges in the financial and communications sectors. In terms of this aspect of Government policy, we are one of the world's leading nations. The UK experience is seen as important, particularly as the EU gets to grips with the issue in the context of new threats to our security.

Of course, the business community understands that the move to the information age will function only if there is confidence in systems and networks that are resilient and that do not pose a risk to the privacy or the pocket of the user. We all know that mistakes have been made in the past and that, in the rush to get the world connected, security was perhaps sometimes traded off against functionality. Those days are long gone and there has been a move by vendors to work towards a much more inherently secure generation of hardware and software. I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the trusted computing initiative, which brings together the leading technology vendors in a joint enterprise to address the issue.

That, of course, reflects an increased concern by Government that technology should develop in a way that is inherently more resilient. The continued resilience of the internet was one of the underlying public policy concerns that drove the recent world summit on the information society. I am pleased to say that, difficult as it was, we have an outcome in terms of future stakeholder engagement on these issues that is a step forward. I can report that we have had notable success and have agreed that the way forward from the summit will address cyber security and spam. The summit constitutes a call for further co-operation by all stakeholders, and for Government and industry to move forward in partnership.

[Barry Gardiner]

While the business community is addressing the issue, we must accept that there remain several important roles for Government. At this stage, we have not sought to go further than is necessary down the path of regulation. The relevant regulation in this area is rightly lean and focused. Those who process sensitive personal information are bound by the Data Protection Act 1998 to apply appropriate protection to ensure that such information is not inappropriately accessed. There are fairly broad requirements on those who provide communications services to ensure that they are secure.

There is a role for Government and business to work together in a non-regulatory way. I have mentioned the work undertaken as part of our national security agenda and the collaboration with technology vendors in relation to the Government's own requirements. We are also working with technology vendors and service providers to deal with the new generation of malicious software, which first became a problem as those who pushed out spam sought to conceal their activities by colonising the computers of other internet users to pass on their products. That led to an explosion of criminal activity based on the ability to dupe innocent users into giving up personal information or downloading software that, through constantly changing technology, seeks to extract personal information or passwords in order to access online accounts.

The new generation of malicious software, by which I mean spyware, keyloggers, adware and the like, is requiring new defences to work with the approaches developed to combat the virus and worm attacks that there have been since the late 1990s. The Government have been among the leaders in trying to develop a multifaceted approach to the problem, looking at a toolkit of regulatory technological processes and awareness-raising tools.

One of the issues emerging is the pressing need to find a solution to the problem of identity online. The failure to have certainty about the identity of the person or body that one is dealing with is at the heart of many of the problems. I am glad to note that the question of electronic identities is moving up the agenda for further work in the EU, and the thinking on our own identity card will be informed by the need for greater certainty about online identities.

My Department can make an important contribution to the future of cyber security through the work that we support in the research community and through our existing programmes to support innovation. I remind hon. Members that Lord Sainsbury of Turville, who is responsible for the Office of Science and Technology, commissioned a major piece of work in 2004 under the foresight programme. It was called cyber trust. It took a long-term, scenario-based approach and identified possible directions for technological and sociological work in this area. The Department's innovation programme is reflecting that thinking and work is under way to improve the way in which the UK's supplier base can improve its performance in adopting new ideas.

Mark Pritchard: I just wondered whether the Government would consider, as Lord Harris suggested—and we agreed—appointing a cyber security tsar and having a cyber security day or week, which would include the private and public sectors.

Barry Gardiner: I have noted the hon. Gentleman's comments and his strong recommendation that we should do that. Obviously, he would not expect me to make any announcements at this stage, but the Government should consider those sensible suggestions and arrive at an appropriate conclusion.

My Department has had a long-standing role in identifying and promoting best practice in information security, with a particular focus on the needs of smaller businesses. The hon. Gentleman will be aware, I am sure, of the Department's biennial information security breaches survey, one of the best of its kind in the world, which looks at the changing pattern of security problems as they are experienced by UK companies. The last survey reported some positive developments in relation to how the subject was being treated by companies—some 75 per cent. of managers thought that information security was a high priority—but it still found a worrying lack of awareness and preparedness. Only 20 per cent. of respondents had a business continuity or disaster recovery plan. I suspect that the next survey, on which the fieldwork is under way as we speak, will give us a good insight into how business is responding to the current surge in malicious software.

The survey assists us in many ways, and I should say in passing that sponsorship and input from business make it a great example of public-private partnership. It has allowed us to focus our outreach efforts to small business against a clear understanding of their problems. Let me illustrate that. UK industry classifies 51 per cent. of its information as highly sensitive, but small business spends less than 1 per cent. of its IT budget on protecting that asset. It is clear that investing in IT security is perceived as a burden by that group, especially as identifying a return on the money invested is so hard to calculate. Yet it can cost upwards of £10,000 to rectify a security breach. We aim to get the message across that a small investment in appropriate systems and products will increase security exponentially.

The material that my Department has produced for smaller businesses is rightly regarded as among the most effective in the EU. My Department looks to work with high-profile partners to support the dissemination of these ideas. We are fortunate in having recently completed one successful project with the Institute of Directors, and another one with the CBI and Ernst and Young is due for launch in the new year. It will seek to use the supply chain as a method for reaching smaller businesses and will involve a series of regional roadshows.

The survey also allows us to measure how businesses are treating information security as a business issue. It has always been the Department's objective to put information risk at the heart of the UK business approach to risk management. To that end, the Department has collaborated with businesses in the production of information security management standards, and we have worked together to produce two key standards: a guideline document and a specification for an information security management system. I am glad to say that both those UK initiatives have been recognised by the international standards community and have been adopted as international standards. The publication of the information management systems specification took place as recently as 15 October, and there is every prospect that it will become a major tool for businesses that wish to deal systematically with information risk.

I am mindful that we need to promote good practice to support e-business, of which I understand the hon. Gentleman has personal experience, and I assure him that the Government remain committed to promoting a vibrant e-business community with confidence in its ability to work securely. As I have explained, it is not the Government's role to manage the internet or regulate how business is conducted through it. We need to regulate to allow e-business to flourish and, through laws such as the Computer Misuse Act 1990, provide a deterrent to those who would seek to conduct crime online.

Middle East Peace Process

4.30 pm

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): I am conscious that I have about three hours of material to cram into 15 minutes. It is a great pleasure to speak in a debate with you in the Chair, Mr. Illsley, and to see the Minister for the Middle East who has a great and long-term commitment to middle east issues, not least those affecting Israel and Palestine.

I declare two interests at the outset: first, I am an executive member of Labour Friends of Israel, and, secondly, I am patron of the friends of the parents circle and bereaved families forum, which works with communities on both sides—Israelis and Palestinians—who have lost sons, daughters and relatives in the continuing conflict. A fortnight ago I was at Atlantic college in the constituency of our hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (John Smith). I addressed a meeting of about 80 students, from Jordan, Oman, Israel and the west bank and other parts of the Gulf and Arab nations. They were highly articulate, and I expressed some optimism to them, as I frequently try to do on such occasions. How could I know, however, just how much would change, as things always do in the middle east, in only a fortnight?

I want to rattle through some issues, on which the Minister will, I hope, have time to respond. As to Gaza and Rafah there have been immense developments that hold out positive messages for the future. In short, the breakthrough on the Gaza-Egypt-Rafah border crossing, which is due to be opened on 25 November, is of huge significance. The Palestinians will for the first time have a border of their own to control. Israel has agreed that the EU will have the authority to ensure that the Palestinian Authority complies with the regulations set out in the agreement. Not only are the Palestinians to be in charge of the border, but the EU has for the first time become involved on the ground in Gaza.

We hear more day by day about provision being made for further developments, including the opening of a seaport, a cargo customs crossing, the reduction of road blocks in the west bank and—most crucial, so that it does not perish—allowing immediate export of the 2005 harvest. I rushed through those items, but it is important to examine the terms of the agreement, because they are historic milestones. The text includes the words:

> "Rafah will be operated by the Palestinian Authority on its side, and Egypt on its side, according to international standards, in accordance with Palestinian law and subject to the terms of this agreement."

It would be easy to understate the significance of the move in the direction of legitimacy and authority within the Palestinian Authority, which is recognised by not only Palestinians but the international community.

As to security, the agreement states that the Palestinian Authority

> "will act to prevent the movement of weapons and explosives at the Rafah crossing."

How far have we travelled in recent times, away from complete distrust on the Israeli side of any of the Palestinian Authority's attempts to impose its own security, through rapid improvements in recent months, to, now, a statement that on the Rafah border the Palestinian Authority will determine security and deal with preventing the transfer of weapons and explosives?

[Huw Irranca-Davies]

The agreement also states that security services from Israel, the Palestinian Authority, the United States and Egypt

> "will continue to coordinate on security issues and will participate in the security working group."

I stress those matters because now there is proper co-ordination. It is not unilateralism or one side making decisions on the other's behalf, but, in a very tense and difficult situation, where we still have far to go, all sides working together—the international actors and those on the Palestinian and Israeli sides.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing the debate. As he has mentioned security, does he agree that it is the key to a lasting middle east peace settlement? One reason why so much progress has been made recently is that the Palestinian Authority and the Palestinians are finally beginning to recognise that.

Huw Irranca-Davies: The intervention is wise. That could not have happened unless the Palestinian Authority and the Israelis had been willing to work together. I am convinced that the Palestinian Authority are committed in a way that they have never been to tackling security, but they will continue to need cross-border intelligence and logistics support from not only the Israelis but the international community to aid them in any way that they can. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that security is pivotal.

I want to touch on the economics of the region, in Israel and in the Palestinian territories. In terms of the much-talked-about economic road map, led by the UK there is now an international commitment to Palestinian economic rejuvenation, based on James Wolfensohn's recommendations for the viability of a Palestinian state.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer's report—an economic plan—should accompany the political road map to which the Israeli Government, the Palestinian Authority and the international community have committed themselves. It is a fundamental step forward that goes with security, political impetus in the region and economic necessities.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer last week said:

> "So my message is one of hope: that there is an economic prize before us, a double dividend. By ensuring that people—who, because they have a job and a livelihood, to support their families—have hope and a stake in a peaceful future. And also by ensuring that the benefits of economic growth are so great, that people see that the unacceptable cost of returning to violence is not only a loss of security, but also of prosperity.
>
> Prosperity through peace. And peace through prosperity."

Mr. Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): May I register an interest? I am chair of the Labour Friends of Israel. On my hon. Friend's point about the need for economic prosperity, does he recognise that the new leader of the Israeli Labour party, Amir Peretz, is going to move the focus towards tackling the big problems of poverty and social deprivation in Israel? That will help reduce turbulence in the middle east.

Mr. Eric Illsley (in the Chair): Order. I remind the House that Adjournment debates are the property of the Member establishing them, and interventions should be made only with the agreement of the hon. Member raising the debate and the Minister. I hope that hon. Members will bear that in mind.

Huw Irranca-Davies: Thank you, Mr. Illsley. I am conscious that my three hours has been extended to three hours and a few minutes. However, I shall try to keep a close eye on the time, because I want to hear the response of my hon. Friend the Minister.

We should not discount the reality of the situation touched on by the Chancellor when he talked about the gap between the $800 a year typical income in Gaza and the $18,000 a year typical income in Israel. We can drive forward the economic road map only if we are willing to address that issue, and I think that we are committed to doing so.

I shall touch on how the Chancellor said he would take the issue forward. First, the report will be followed by meetings in London with the G8, the EU and Israeli and Palestinian Finance Ministers. I applaud the Government—No. 10, No. 11 and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office—because they have driven forward many issues, sometimes dragging the international community along behind them.

There will be a final conference on 13 December hosted jointly with the World Bank, bringing together Israeli and Palestinian business men to promote private sector growth. I was sitting at a lunch three weeks ago with Israeli business men on either side of me. Although they applauded the political engagement of this Government and the international community, they were adamant that nothing would be done unless the private sector on the Palestinian and Israeli sides was brought on board to drive forward the area's economy.

There are European Commission plans to double aid to the Palestinian Authority; I shall return to them. The EU has already made available €60 million for quick-start projects, including €25 million for a new cargo terminal at Gaza airport. In addition, as many Members know, in July 2005 the G8 pledged an extra $3 billion in aid to the Palestinians.

There are many positive messages at the moment, but it would be completely remiss to have a debate of this nature without tackling the issue of the fence, wall, barrier, or whatever. In my short tenure as an MP, I have visited Israel and the occupied territories on three occasions, with Labour Friends of Israel and with the Labour Middle East Council. Anyone who saw Israel's security barrier would be completely struck with sadness that it had ever been built, but we have to remember that the barrier is not the cause of the conflict, but a direct consequence of it. It is unlikely that withdrawal from Gaza and a small part of the northern west bank would even have been countenanced without the improved security afforded to Israelis by the security barrier.

The Israeli Labour party was, of course, a supporter of the barrier before the idea was even brought forward. The Israeli Labour party wrote to Labour Friends of Israel last year:

> "The barrier is undesirable but it is a non-violent . . . measure that has saved lives on both sides."

The Israeli Labour party then talked through the figures. It said that there had been a 90 per cent. drop in attacks by terrorists since the barrier was begun, a 70 per cent. decrease in the number of Israelis murdered and an 85 per cent. decrease in the number wounded, and so on. However, it acknowledged that the route of the barrier is hugely contentious and that it is not the long-term solution.

Hon. Members, myself included, have rightly raised concerns about the exact route of the barrier, especially in and around Jerusalem, and the humanitarian impact on Palestinians. We would all agree that the barrier should not be used as an excuse to pre-empt unilaterally a negotiated settlement or agreement about the future of Palestine or any final borders. It is of paramount importance that that principle is accepted in Israeli law. Hon. Members may be aware that, in a series of judgments, the Israeli High Court established the precedent that it is legal for the Israeli Government to build the wall only where that is a proportionate response to the security threat posed.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): I saw the barrier with my own eyes last week. If we are to accept what my hon. Friend says about it, can he explain why it is not built on the border, and why up to 10 per cent. of Palestinian territory is behind the wall?

Huw Irranca-Davies: That is the very point that I was making. I accept that the route of the barrier is contestable, but the statistics on what it has done to give security to the Israelis are incontestable. I am looking forward to the awaited Israeli High Court decision on the route through Jerusalem, as are many people.

On Hamas, we are heading towards legislative elections to the Palestinian Authority in January. That is another landmark in extending democracy throughout the Palestinian Authority. The Hamas charter still calls for the destruction of the state of Israel and opposes all peace conferences. If Hamas is to be accepted into the Palestinian political process—I do not rule that out in any way, because we have seen, in conflict zones around the world, the advantages of bringing in those who have at some point seemed irreconcilable to peace, and bringing them in pays dividends—the international community must constantly demand that Hamas accepts the principle of a two-state solution and completely renounces violence.

Let me touch briefly on the political changes that have happened in recent days and weeks. First, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Wright) said, the new Labour leader Amir Peretz has a very progressive foreign and domestic policy—something for which many of us have been waiting for some time. He is determined to keep up the momentum of disengagement, and is already submitting a Bill offering compensation to west bank settlements if 60 per cent. of residents agree to leave voluntarily. He believes that the peace process is linked to the welfare reform package, and he is much more inclined to move towards final-status solutions.

Only a week ago, on 16 November, Jonathan Freedland described him in The Guardian as > "the man who could bring about a revolution in Israeli politics".

A week on, Ariel Sharon steps down from Likud and we move towards a complete shake-up of Israeli politics, beyond the role of Peretz and the Labour party. On leaving, Mr. Sharon said:

> "After great hesitation, I decided to leave the Likud. The Likud in its current format cannot lead Israel to its national aims . . . Remaining in the Likud means a waste of time in political fighting.
>
> The task in front of us",

says the great warrior, the man who built the settlements,

> "is to create a base for a peace agreement in which we will create the permanent borders of the state while demanding the cessation of terror. The disengagement from Gaza gave us a historic opportunity. I don't mean to miss it."

I am sure that the Minister already has the endless press cuttings, some of them cynical and sceptical about Sharon's motives and asking, "Is he building a legacy; is he serious?". In the classic phrase, the kaleidoscope has been shaken. My message to the Minister, with all his experience, and given his recent and future visits to the region, is to continue to press, not only with Peretz and the Labour party but with Ariel Sharon and others and with some of the minority parties, for a situation in which, when the kaleidoscope settles, it settles on something that is tied more closely to the aspirations of the Palestinian people as well as the security needs of the Israelis and that is based firmly on a two-state solution. At the moment, the process has all the potential to go very right, but similarly all the potential to go very wrong indeed.

I had intended to discuss the wider issues, but I see that the Minister is running out of time in which to reply as I aim towards my three hours. Let me set out some things that Labour Friends of Israel would want to happen in terms of both the Israeli and the Palestinian agendas. First, we want to see international development in which technological and agricultural expertise in Israel, alongside its diplomatic and political relationship with some African countries, could play a significant role. Secondly, UK-Israel joint research and development projects should receive specific encouragement, and as the Minister knows, there are already strong links with our Israeli counterparts. Thirdly, we seek greater security and counter-terrorism co-operation, building on the trust already developed by the Gaza-Egypt border control. There is more potential there.

At EU level, we should be looking for other ways to combat terrorism in the interests of supporting the peace process. In particular, we should look again at the UK's proscription of Hezbollah being matched in the EU lists. In respect of Palestinian development, we want a country assistance plan for Palestinians that looks at redrafting the common agricultural policy to reflect disengagement and the increased Palestinian Authority capacity, so that more money goes directly to the Palestinian Authority. I am sure that the Minister has seen the documents, which I will share with him afterwards, as I have no time now, touching on the sensitive issue of whether the money that goes to the Palestinian Authority has all been used for the right and appropriate purposes on the ground.

[Huw Irranca-Davies]

Finally, we seek micro-financing for the Palestinians. Funding should be put aside for a Palestinian equity fund directly to support those small businesses and agricultural projects. That is exactly the message that has been given to me by business men.

As patron of the friends of the parents circle and bereaved families forum, and as a Member of the UK Parliament, I think we owe it to those families who have lost relatives and those who are living through these times of conflict to drive this agenda forward. I know of the Minister's commitment to this project, and I look forward to hearing from him how the UK Government at all levels intend to do that.

4.50 pm

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) on raising this issue. It remains, as he said, a huge international challenge to make sure that things take a turn for the better, not the worse. Now is a unique moment. My hon. Friend and I are neighbouring MPs and we know about territorial disputes. I have the magnificent Royal Glamorgan hospital in my constituency, while he has the hospital car park. Our equivalent of the River Jordan is the River Ely, but I shall not go into that now.

My hon. Friend concentrated on some important issues. I have never been one of those people who believed that Gaza was a hopeless case. On the contrary, anyone who has gone into Gaza and walked through the fields knows that they are good for growing all sorts of vegetables. It is good agricultural land as well as good for building on. When walking to the beach, we are on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean, which should be enough of a sign of what is possible. The area ought to be a tourist paradise. It could become one.

He did not say it as directly as I will, but the most important point that my hon. Friend made is that it will not do the people who live in the area any good to have on their doorstep what amounts to a basket case of a country. They want a vibrant economy. The population of Gaza is young. The west bank has a young population.

My hon. Friend touched on some interesting issues, not least of which is communications. He drew attention to the welcome developments on the Rafah crossing, as well as on other crossings. Now is a great moment of liberation for the people of Gaza. They will be able to move back and forth to Egypt. I was in Cairo recently and I know that Egypt wants to play its part. The Jordanians want to play a part, too. They are happy with recent developments and want their borders opened up. As my hon. Friend said, now may be a real turning point. I certainly hope that it is.

We need to go further. We welcome the fact that bus convoys will take the people of Gaza and the people of the west bank to visit each other. We cannot have a situation similar to that in the two Germanys before unification took place; that is absurd in the 21st century. There must be proper communications, such as a specially designed road, a railway line or both. At present, we are building the world's most sophisticated railway line into St. Pancras. I hope that we can use our expertise to help Jim Wolfensohn and his team take his project forward. That would be marvellous.

My hon. Friend described vividly the continuing problems. My hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt) spoke of the wall. I do not know which part of it he saw; I saw the part that was in and around Jerusalem. It is a horrifying sight. It is 28 to 30 ft tall. Architecturally, it is certainly no great wall of China. It is ugly. It stands as a reminder to all of us that such a solution will only be temporary, until the two countries see their economies grow and realise that they need each other. There is a symbiotic reciprocity between the countries, which was understood in the early days of Israel. There is no question about that.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore on this: I went to a kibbutz on the old Jerusalem road a month or so ago and, although the left wingers there were reluctant to admit it, they said that life had become immeasurably easier since the barrier went up. That should tell us something—we do not have to agree—about the psyche and the mood that it has generated.

I went to see a Palestinian who is living in Jerusalem and is married to a British citizen. He works in a hospital just up the road from where he lives in a nice house. He is a hard-working doctor and instead of getting to work in four minutes, it will take him 40 minutes.

Huw Irranca-Davies: Does my hon. Friend accept that if the High Court decision in Israel suggests re-routing or even dismantling part of the wall, again the Israeli Government should respond favourably?

Dr. Howells: That is the strength of the Israeli state. Palestinians told me that their greatest weapon at the moment is the Israeli High Court, and we should remember that.

The debate inside the Palestinian Authority at the moment is interesting because there has been a feeling that Palestinians should not use the Israeli legal system. I think they should certainly try to use it if it enables them to obtain some justice in the routing of the barrier.

Roger Berry (Kingswood) (Lab): In relation to the barrier and the reference that my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) made to economic development, does the Minister acknowledge that the barrier in separating Palestinians from their land and preventing people from moving—I was with my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt) and the Palestinian Authority last week—does not just delay them and that many have lost their jobs because they can no longer get from Bethlehem to Jerusalem? The extremely time-consuming road blocks that we experienced on occasions are not just an inconvenience for Palestinians; they are a real humiliation. Those are obstacles to the development of the Palestinian Authority. Should they not go as quickly as possible, to enable that development to take place?

Dr. Howells: Yes, that was a very fine speech. The obstacles should go as quickly as possible. I know that the United Nations has a mission in Jerusalem that is looking at the matter, but we must be careful. I tried to illustrate the effect of the barrier on Israeli psychology. It is no use assuming that if one side does something, the other will follow. We must take everyone along. It is disgraceful that people have lost their livelihood and the ability to come out of their home and stroll in areas where they have loved to stroll in the past. That is a disgrace; there is no question about that. I would like to see everyone press as hard as this Government have done to get that barrier re-routed. We will not back down on that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore could have mentioned the real problem of a north-south division of the west bank and of the whole area. That is something about which we will keep banging away.

In the moments left to me, I thank my hon. Friend for raising the matter. His work in the middle east to try to bring reconciliation and peace to an area that has been so terribly torn by war and conflict is well known and much appreciated. We should all be grateful to him, especially for his work with the parents circle and bereaved families. All too often we forget the victims, some of whom are British. Some fine people have been killed in Gaza and the west bank who were doing very good work, and we should not forget them.

We now have a moment when we can perhaps start to take the process forward to much better times. I hope that everyone approaches that with the best will in the world and tries to bring about changes.

It being Five o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 24 November 2005

[SIR NICHOLAS WINTERTON in the Chair]

Road Pricing

[Relevant documents: Seventh Report from the Transport Committee, Session 2004–05, HC 218, and the Government's response thereto, Cm 6560.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the siting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): I call the very distinguished hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody).

2.30 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): I am always very flattered to listen to your kind compliments, Sir Nicholas, which are all to the manner born.

This afternoon's sitting deals, importantly, with the Transport Committee's careful consideration of road pricing. It seems to members of the Committee that this country has a simple and uncomplicated attitude to traffic. We all want to be able to drive wherever we want, park outside our own front door and, if necessary, drive into the centre of cities and drive out again.

There are, however, one or two things that we do not want. We do not want other people to park outside our front door, we do not want to hear the noise of any traffic and we prefer to get exactly where we want to go in exactly the time we have planned, with no other cars on the road. That presents traffic planners—even those with enormous intellectual ability, such as the ones in the Department for Transport—with a slight problem. Our Committee therefore believes that we might be able to assist. I shall begin, however, with something that is not sufficiently discussed.

The Committee made it very clear at the beginning of its report that its one vital caveat was that if road pricing was to be introduced, or even if it was decided that it was the most effective way of reducing congestion, it must be conditional on the risks of diversion, dispersal, road danger, pollution and, above all, social exclusion being fully addressed.

The Secretary of State for Transport is not only exceedingly civilised but very straightforward when it comes to dealing with the Committee—most of the time. He has been kind enough to make it very clear to us in his reply that he is generally in favour of our suggestions. Nevertheless, several questions should be addressed. We said that any strong arguments for road pricing should take its direct effects into account. If the Government want to meet their carbon emission and congestion targets, they had better seriously consider whether road charging should be revenue-neutral or revenue-raising.

The Department for Transport should consider why, when it has control over the urban motorways and appears to be telling local authorities that they should adopt congestion schemes, it is not prepared to declare very openly its intentions and its time scale. There is no timetable, which is an extraordinary omission from the Government's plans.

We need to be told whether the Government accept the objectives that we have set out, particularly the objective of social inclusion, before road pricing can be introduced. We use fashionable phrases such as social inclusion, but then create a system in which some people can use the motorways because the prices that are considered acceptable are absorbed by their customers, their industries or those for whom they work, while others might find it more difficult. That produces a real dilemma for a Government committed to equal treatment.

Let us consider the issues from the point of view of my Committee. We asked where the timetable was and said that if the Government were going to introduce road pricing, it would be no use their saying in the next 18 months to two years that they would decide on an area or a region of the country in which to pilot it. The decision should be taken and stated openly, and if the Government want to implement the scheme, they should get on with it.

We said that diversion of traffic on to unsuitable roads where the charges would be lower must be avoided. We are talking about varying charges to persuade people to travel on different routes and at different times. Is not the danger of traffic being diverted on to minor roads an implicit part of the scheme? It would be much better to vary the charges only according to the time of day to avoid causing the diversion of traffic and dispersed land use.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Is my hon. Friend encouraged by the fact that the Government appear to have taken a decision in principle to construct a second toll road north from Birmingham to Manchester on the basis of just a few months' data from the M6 toll, which runs close to my constituency? That is not a great start in terms of evidence-based policy, is it?

Mrs. Dunwoody: My hon. Friend raises an important point. The Government sought views on whether to carry out more detailed work on building a private expressway as an alternative to widening the M6, and our report looked at the implications of that. There was a 50:1 ratio of responses against the M6 expressway, but the Department announced that further work would be commissioned. It then said:

> "There is a balance to be struck between maintaining controls over toll levels and the commercial viability of a toll road scheme and the extent of risk transfer to the private sector."

As we know from many private finance initiative and public-private partnership schemes, the hazard with such an approach is that very little risk is transferred to the private sector.

What is even worse, as we highlighted, is the absurdity of the Government suggesting that they would produce an integrated charging scheme on the roads for which they had direct responsibility only to disclose to the Committee that a road in the middle of it all was controlled and owned by a private firm. That stretch of road might or might not be doing what it is supposed to do, but the Government have no way of controlling the charging system for it.

[Mrs. Dunwoody]

We pointed out that it was quite extraordinary for the Government to move forward with what ought to be a unified scheme at national level without considering the implications of reaching an agreement on certain bits of road and issues such as the M6 widening, which would remove the Government's responsibility and control.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend mentioned that control of the M6 toll is almost entirely within the power of Midland Expressway Ltd. Does she hope, as I do, that that is not a precursor—in the same way that small-scale PFIs were a precursor to large-scale PFIs—to transport policy across the national trunk road and motorway network being subcontracted out in an extreme market sense?

Mrs. Dunwoody: If the Government intend to go ahead with a charging scheme, they have several responsibilities. First, they must tell us all what they want out of this scheme; they must say, "We have agreed with this congestion scheme because it is the only way we can control the growth in traffic." At one point in their response, there is a suggestion that they accept that there will be consistent growth in traffic, although they do not call it exponential growth. If so, will the scheme deal with the problems we have highlighted? Will it mesh in with the little bits of private enterprise that are dumped down in the middle of the system? If not, who will control those roads? What effect will their policies have on the rest of the system? Who intends in the long run to at least make it clear on what basis decisions have been taken?

We also discussed the lorry user charge. My Committee had previously discussed with the Department our very real worries about the fact that extra charges are levied on the road transport industry in many parts of Europe, and we said that we were concerned that several European nations were sending more and more units into this country—picking up goods, creating more traffic and developing all the time, but not paying comparable charges to those levied on British hauliers on the continent.

We were told that the lorry road user charge would deal with that difficult problem. I have endeavoured to find out from the police authorities closest to the channel ports how many foreign lorries are being stopped, are breaking the law, are liable for fines and have been fined, but that information seems to be astonishingly confidential. No one is anxious to tell me anything; that is not new in my life, but it worries me considerably.

It would be quite wrong of us to develop, even by default, a system of traffic control in which British hauliers who break road rules and are stopped by the police are taken to court—and fined, if needs be, if they are found guilty—but in which foreign hauliers in the same situation, who may have committed exactly the same crimes, and been stopped and cautioned by the police, are not charged because the local police know that the bother of dealing with them is too great. If we are not to have the lorry road user charge—there are a great many good and sensible reasons not to go ahead with that scheme—what will be the alternative in the short term? How are we to deal with that anomaly, and what are the Government's plans to charge foreign hauliers for the use of UK roads?

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): The hon. Lady will appreciate that the matter is not just about legal equity: overloaded lorries overburden bridges and roads, causing appreciable damage and, therefore, appreciable cost to the public purse.

Mrs. Dunwoody: That is why we took, in the first instance, the decision to move ahead in the way proposed. The Secretary of State told the Committee that he was working with the road haulage industry to introduce measures. Unfortunately, in the same week, the Freight Transport Association said that it would launch a legal challenge over what is effectively a subsidy of foreign hauliers. If the Minister straightens that situation out, it will help us to know where we are, at least.

The lorry road user charge was scrapped to avoid there being two parallel charging schemes, but it is clear that the Government are still going ahead with individual, private arrangements. If they are to go ahead with a system of national, distance-based road charging, will they buy out the M6 toll contract? If not, why not? If not, do they intend somehow to harmonise the dues that would be payable? If so, what would be the cost to the taxpayer?

Have the Government decided to ignore the results of the consultation on the M6 extension, "M6: Giving Motorists a Choice"? If so, why did they bother with it in the first place? I am not sure that there is any defence on that.

My problem is, overall, political. The Secretary of State has openly led the debate on road user charging since the beginning of the year, which is useful. It is helpful that he has been prepared to make public some of the difficulties as well as the advantages. The Government also need—to use a fashionable phrase—to clarify some of their policies, so that we know exactly what they propose.

It is clear that congestion will be with us as long as everybody wants to use their car for trips that they think are essential, and the number of people purchasing cars rises every year. Any policy decided at governmental level will have enormous implications, not just for public transport, but for our road-building programmes, our expansion of services and certainly how we plan to integrate any local authority congestion schemes with an overall road-pricing toll scheme. I do not believe that those are simple questions or that they will be easy to resolve.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I very much concur with the hon. Lady. Does she agree that problems of congestion will become particularly acute in the growth areas identified by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, into which Kettering falls? My major local road, the A14, carries 70,000 vehicles a day round Kettering, which is well over its planned limit. The Government have placed a statutory duty on local authorities to deliver tens of thousands of new houses in the next 10 years, but there are no plans to expand the capacity of that road until 2012 at the earliest. I was interested to see the Committee's recommendations on road-building alongside road-pricing. Will not the problems of congestion be particularly acute in some of those growth areas?

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am sure the hon. Gentleman is right to raise the particular problem in his constituency, but he will understand that my Committee wants to put the whole matter in its proper context. The public have to face up to those difficult questions; this is not just a matter for the Government. We have to debate those questions openly, but it will be possible to reach a clarity of view only if the Government state exactly what they want from road user charging, including how it would apply and who would be encouraged to use the various schemes.

David Taylor: In this interesting section of the report, the Committee looks at the impacts on travel behaviour and congestion that can be generated from what it calls "soft factors" such as travel planning and cycle facilities. However, as far as I can see, the report does not refer to the potential of community rail networks to lessen congestion on the adjacent road network. That is particularly relevant for a line for the national forest in the east midlands-west midlands border area.

Mrs. Dunwoody: My hon. Friend is right to take me to task in as much as the Committee did not specifically include a paragraph about community rail. However, it stands to reason that whatever is done in the realm of road pricing and congestion charging will have a direct impact not just on the use of public transport, but on something as basic as emissions. The Government are obviously serious about trying to hit their targets on emissions, and we need to know whether they have considered the implications of those schemes.

If the Government model a revenue-neutral road-pricing scheme and say that that will increase the distance travelled and therefore add to climate change emissions, we need to know whether they intend to go ahead with a revenue-neutral system, or whether they would prefer to use a charging scheme to discourage the extra use and encourage people on to public transport. My hon. Friend made that point earlier, and it remains one of the most important questions in the debate.

I am not clear what analysis has been done of the potential impact of congestion charging on the strategic network. I am not clear why the Government are saying that the case has not been made without setting out why they have reached that conclusion. I do not know why the Government do not seem to recognise that there are congestion problems on inter-urban strategic roads—now—that need to be dealt with. I am not at all sure that the objectives that the Government set out at the beginning of the report have been accepted.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way, and apologise to you, Sir Nicholas, for arriving late for the debate. Does the Committee feel that the Government did enough to make the case for road pricing? The Mayor has made a strong case for the congestion charge in the capital, but, sadly, that case could not be sustained for Edinburgh. Do we need to make much more of a public case for road pricing? If we do not, we shall face the same problems that were faced in Edinburgh.

Mrs. Dunwoody: As I said earlier, what worried the Committee was the feeling that the Government control the inter-urban road system, they say that they believe in congestion charging and they make many sensible arguments in favour of a road charging scheme, but they are also putting pressures on local authorities by saying, "We want you to do this, but if you don't you won't get the extra support for the other schemes that concern you." However, they are not necessarily proceeding with something that would demonstrate that congestion charging works.

I am a bear of little brain, but if one shows people something that works, most are more responsive. Local authorities face enormous pressure from their local population, who are ambivalent about congestion charging schemes, however presented. Even those who benefit from the schemes will still complain about London's congestion scheme.

Local authorities must be given positive signs that the report represents a way forward and that it can help. It is only a management tool, and I hope that my Committee has made it clear that congestion charging, whether inter-urban or local, can only be a management tool. If the United Kingdom continues to buy the combustion engine at the rate at which it does every week, we shall face considerable problems. However, the Government should at least have the honesty, clarity and confidence not to say, "Well, we'll think about this for another two years and then we'll set out where our pilot schemes will be." They should be saying, "We know that we cannot continue this way. We know that traffic is rising at rates that we find uncomfortable—in cities, in villages and on our inter-urban roads. This is a way forward, and this is what we intend to do."

In the next six months, the Government could announce a timetable and a pilot area for the scheme. They could offer incentives to local authorities and positive encouragement to people to face up to difficult questions.

David Taylor: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am just finishing. Above all, Her Majesty's Government have a special duty not only to offer warm words, but to make difficult decisions and offer a clear line of responsibility. They do not appear to be ready to do that with road planning, even though they have started the debate. They intend to have another four years of debate, without decisions being taken at the end of that debate. There is a suggestion that after the next general election—if we live long enough—the incoming Government will face up to the problems of traffic congestion. That is to condemn our cities and villages—not to mention the United Kingdom's economic development—to chaos and, in the final analysis, very real damage.

The Government do not want to do that. They have a clear view of their own interests at least, but it is about time that they told us what they intend to do, when they intend to do it and how they intend to produce results.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): Order. Before the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) speaks, I want to say that I am not sure whether it is post-lunch lethargy, but I had to wait for 10 seconds before a single Member rose to his or her feet. I trust that hon. Members present will be more sprightly hereafter.

2.55 pm

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): Sir Nicholas, as may have become clear as a result of the time that elapsed between the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) sitting down and the next Member rising, I had not intended to intervene. I am attending the debate because I have an historic interest in it. A long time ago, when I was Secretary of State for Transport, it was an issue with which we had to grapple. I am slightly disappointed that so little progress appears to have been made since 1996, when a White Paper set out the broad approach of the previous Administration to road pricing.

I am speaking from memory, because I have not come equipped with the relevant documents, but I recollect that subject to satisfactory trials of the technology at the Transport and Road Research Laboratory, and subject to getting the requisite legislation through the House of Commons, the previous Administration were broadly committed to the concept of road pricing. Again from memory, I think that we gave an illustrative price of 1p per mile on motorways as a means of starting the debate.

I find it disappointing that little appears to have happened since then. We have received several statements from the Secretary of State, one of which was almost identical to one made by Lord MacGregor when he was Secretary of State for Transport in 1992. There seems not to have been an heroic initiative from the new Administration. My brief speech is intended to give the Government some political cover, if they want it.

I have no idea what my hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) is about to say on behalf of my great party, and perhaps there will not be an absolute convergence between my approach and that of my party's Front Bench. However, for the strategic reason given by the right hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody)—

Mrs. Dunwoody: Honourable.

Sir George Young: Her time will come. For the strategic reason that she gave, it is necessary to make a decision about how to manage a scarce resource. It can be managed by congestion or by the price mechanism. I am in favour of using sensitive price indications, with variations by time of day and route.

For example, where there is a perfectly good railway line from one city to another and congestion on the motorway between those two cities in the rush hour, I am entirely relaxed about using the price mechanism to encourage the motorist out of the car and off the motorway, on to the railway. I am equally anxious to get the best possible use from the network that we have, which is grossly underused at night, by the use of, for example, zero tariffs on motorways in the small hours of the morning, if that will encourage the efficient distribution of goods.

I accept that there are all sorts of political hurdles to be cleared, and I think that the Secretary of State said, when he last made a statement, that if and when the Government go down the road-pricing route it will be on a cost-neutral basis; in other words, any additional revenue raised from road pricing will be set off against either the vehicle excise duty or fuel duty. To persuade motorists that the initiative is sensible, that deal must be on the table. We are looking not for an ingenious new way for the Treasury to raise additional funds, but for a better way of using a scarce resource in the interest of all who use the roads.

There may be a dialogue between the Department for Transport and the Treasury—it would not be the first time—about what that new, exciting tax or revenue-raising instrument might in due course be used for, but to take motorists with us we must make the statement that the approach is revenue-neutral.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the problem with the whole subject is that it is urban-focused? Is there not a danger that motorists will not be taxed out of their cars, and that rather than deciding not to use motorways or major radial routes they will be persuaded that there is every advantage in using the local network of roads around villages? That would result in congestion in what are currently rat runs. What is a congested rat run? There must be a term for it.

Sir George Young: If road pricing were confined to motorways, the hon. Gentleman would be correct. However, if road pricing were not confined to motorways, he would be wrong because there would be a tariff for using the alternative route. The Government will have to make up their mind about whether they wish to proceed with motorway tolls or total-road charging. I am persuaded by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich that it probably makes sense to have a universal scheme, but with differential tariffs. If one drives on a motorway, it will probably take less time, and the charge would be slightly higher than that of the alternative dual-carriageway road.

I accept the point about diversion, but, as a matter of concern to those of us who represent rural constituencies, if the Government proceeded on a revenue-neutral basis, rural motorists would probably be in pocket as a result of that change. In my constituency, most travel would not be on the high-tariff motorways; it would be on the less highly-charged rural roads for which there is very little case for having a charge because they are underused. There is no particular need to price the motorist off the B3400 or the A343 in North-West Hampshire because there is not much traffic on those roads. There is, however, an argument for using the price mechanism to encourage people not to travel on the M3 or M4 to London during the rush hour.

Dr. Pugh: The hon. Gentleman may or may not support its analysis, but can he explain why the Campaign to Protect Rural England is less than enthusiastic about road charging?

Sir George Young: I confess that I arrived equipped with a sudoku puzzle, with which I had made very little progress. I did not take the precaution of equipping myself with briefings from the Campaign to Protect Rural England or from the Library. However, the hon. Member is right to point to the political problem that this is not the most fantastically popular case to put across. The matter is best handled on an all-party basis. When the Secretary of State last made an announcement, my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight)—who was previously the Member for Derby, North but now represents a slightly safer constituency on the east coast—made a statement that was neutral or perhaps encouraging to the Government. It may be that if no one else speaks in the debate, we shall not reach a consensus. However, if the outcome of the debate indicates that there is not total hostility from all the major parties, perhaps the report of the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich will have made a little progress.

Mr. Love: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for allowing me to intervene. May I tempt him just a little? There is one successful example of a congestion charging scheme. While all hon. Members accept that changes may be necessary to the way that that scheme is run, and to its coverage, those who support road pricing should support such a scheme as an example of where we should be looking in future. Would the hon. Gentleman agree?

Sir George Young: Is the hon. Gentleman asking whether I support congestion charging?

Mr. Love: Yes.

Sir George Young: Yes, I do. I was among the small number of my party who advocated a slightly more cautious approach to that matter during the last London mayoral elections. Speaking as someone who lives in central London and cycles to the House of Commons, it is a slightly better journey as a result of the congestion charge. The problem now is not the cars; it is the motorcyclists. Motorcycles are more of a problem for cyclists because they use the same lanes and paths through the traffic. I take the hon. Gentleman's point that someone who believes in road pricing should logically also be in favour of congestion charging as a means of allocating a scarce resource, whether in the middle of a city or between cities. I approach the problem as an economist: how does one price a scarce resource in order to maximise the benefit from it?

I hope that I have provided hon. Members with the opportunity to assemble their thoughts, so that when I resume my seat, there is not the same reticence as there was when the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich sat down some 10 minutes ago.

3.5 pm

Mr. Nick Hurd (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): Thank you, Sir Nicholas. I apologise for my earlier lethargy, which had more to do with the absence of lunch than the abundance of it. It may also have had something to do with my reticence to follow the powerful oratory of the Chairperson of the Transport Committee, the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), whom I warmly congratulate on the report, which was extremely stimulating and touched on an issue of great interest to me as the Member of Parliament for Ruislip-Northwood.

My seat is in the borough of Hillingdon, which enjoys, I think, one of the highest ratios of cars to households in the country, and its motorists express to me a number of the sentiments expressed by the hon. Lady.

David Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), who linked the nation's congestion problems to the propensity of its travellers to buy 2 million shiny cars a year, is not necessarily correct? Germany has even more cars per head, I would guess, than Hillingdon, but they drive significantly fewer kilometres than we do. That is the problem. We are not trying to discourage the virtues of the car, the numbers bought or the freedom and flexibility that they give. We are trying to give sensible alternatives, are we not?

Mr. Hurd: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I do not know the data for Germany, but I am happy to take that at face value. I suspect that the problem may be linked in part to public perceptions of the quality of public transport as an alternative to the motor car in this country. The point that I was trying to make is that the issue is of great concern to my constituents, who have to endure highly congested roads and, at the same time, complain to me regularly about the cost of motoring. They are well aware that they pay the second highest petrol costs in Europe and that the Government have taken more money from them in successive years through vehicle excise duty and fuel duties. I think that it was about £28 billion in 2004–05, up some £7 billion since 1997.

My second point of interest relates to tackling one of the great causes of our reducing competitiveness as an economy: the cost of congestion. A few days ago, I went to listen to Sir Digby Jones talk in this place. He expressed his deep-rooted frustration at the failure of successive Governments to get a grip on upgrading the country's infrastructure and on the cost of congestion in particular, which his organisation puts at some £20 billion. More simply, he made the point that, if we cannot get our people and goods to market and work in time, how on earth can we compete with the economies in Asia and the emerging giants?

A third point of interest is the environmental aspect. It is clear to anyone who takes an interest in the climate change challenge that the transport sector and the growing emissions from it are arguably the biggest cause of concern.

I, like my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), who has left his place, welcome the Government's initiative. I recognise that the Secretary of State for Transport is indulging in bold politics, which is not something with which he is traditionally associated. However, I want to register two concerns. First, if we are to have a public debate the Government should be much clearer about why we are doing this. I distrust a long list of benefits for any big idea. The debate on ID cards is a good example: when the priorities shift and the reasons for doing something get longer, the credibility of the case tends to fail.

The public instinctively will ask whether the plans are about raising more revenue to invest in transport in other areas. I take at face value the Government's assurance that their intention is to work on a revenue-neutral basis. However, the public will need convincing, because of the sentiments I expressed earlier. Is it about a fairer system to charge the motorist? That seems the really interesting area. My right hon. Friend talked about the effect on rural motorists in particular. The question is, is it worth the money? The report makes it clear that the Government's feasibility study estimates that the start-up cost will be between £14 billion and £60 billion—that is a disturbingly wide range—with ongoing costs of about £5 billion for a national scheme. The Government will have to send us very strong signals to convince us that it is worth that much to introduce a fairer system for charging motorists.

[Mr. Hurd]

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's kind words. However, he might like to know that, through Customs and Excise, the Government have already spent £31 million on preparation for the lorry road user scheme, which has now been abandoned.

Mr. Hurd: I thank the hon. Lady for that intervention, which was extremely helpful in reinforcing my point that the Government must make a case for value for money if the prime purpose of the scheme is to introduce a fairer system under which to charge motorists.

The hon. Lady made some extraordinarily relevant remarks about the impact of a national road-pricing scheme on low-income drivers. The report is clear on the Committee's concerns about that. I hope that everybody would agree that it is highly undesirable—if I might create some mood music—to create a situation in which the roads are for the rich only. That would be wholly unwelcome.

Is the reduction of congestion the main reason for introducing the scheme? Do we need a national system? It is worth considering the alternative of targeting hot spots with a pricing mechanism and, particularly, introducing road pricing on new capacity where that is practicable. Congestion is not a problem across the whole network, as my right hon. Friend eloquently pointed out. Do we need a national system, given the huge costs involved?

We need a solution now, not in 10 to 15 years, which the Government have made clear is the time when we can reasonably expect a national scheme to be introduced. In its understandable excitement about pursuing this huge project, the Department risks losing sight of the need for two things. The first is new roads. I am not talking about blanket coverage, but the Government acknowledge that they need to reboot their road-building programme to invest in selective new road capacity. The second is supporting soft measures. That, too, is clear in the report, and is suggested strongly in research that I have seen that suggests that, where soft measures have been introduced by imaginative local authorities, they have made a real impact. I am concerned that, as innovation funding flows into the system that is clearly earmarked for initiatives relating to road pricing, local authorities that have prioritised soft measures will believe that they need not bother applying those.

My other concern about whether the measure will help to reduce congestion is: if it is to be revenue-neutral, will it make an impact if introduced on a national basis? My perception is that even the material petrol price increases that have occurred in the past year have not affected behaviour. British motorists still take their cars to the petrol pump and fill them up. I have not noticed a significant change in behaviour. That might be linked to my earlier point about the public's lack of faith in the public transport alternatives.

Mr. Drew: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows what I am going to say. The problem is that, in real terms, the cost of motoring is lower now than it was when we came to power in 1997 and the price of cars is dramatically lower than that of going by train or bus or even, to some extent, buying a bike. We are not serious enough about encouraging—in the nicest possible way—people out of their cars.

Mr. Hurd: I know the analysis and I have seen the data. I cannot disprove the fact that the real cost of motoring has fallen—but it does not feel like it to the motorist. When trying to engage the motorist in the political debate on road pricing, we should recognise that he has had it up to here.

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend's speech is much better than the one that preceded it. I press him on whether the motorist is insensitive to variations in charges. The data from the congestion charge in London surely leads to the opposite conclusion to the one that he draws—namely, that motorists are sensitive to increasing costs and that they do adjust their behaviour. That is why there has been a substantial drop in the number of cars in central London during the hours of the congestion charge.

Mr. Hurd: I accept that the congestion charge has changed behaviour. Like my right hon. Friend, I support the charge, although I have criticisms about how it was implemented. I suspect that at the root of the apparent success in changing behaviour was the investment in public transport, and the level of public confidence in London's public transport alternatives. However, I am not sure that that plays out across the country. Although the pricing mechanism can work, my concern is that it will have to be set at a high level in order to make an impact. The congestion charge is expensive at £8, but it has to be at that sort of level in order to bite. What concerns me is the flip-side—what it will do for social inclusion and what its impact will be on low-income motorists.

Mr. Love: I take issue with the hon. Gentleman's earlier comments. I understand that the congestion charge of £5 led to a substantial reduction in traffic when it was introduced. More recently, concern was expressed that people were beginning to take to the roads again. One reason for increasing the charge to £8 was not merely to deal with the revenue deficit but to maintain the impetus in getting people out of their cars. The hon. Gentleman's most recent comment—that only if the economic cost to motorists was significant would they use their cars less—was valid.

Mr. Hurd: I thank the hon. Gentleman for reinforcing that point.

Another concern is about the benefits. The list of benefits cited include environmental ones. Again, I reiterate my point. Are we sure that those benefits can be delivered on a revenue-neutral basis, given what has been said about the psychology of the British motorist and his sensitivity to price? If the Government are serious about reducing transport emissions, they would be better advised to focus their energies and political capital on reducing the cost of green cars and green fuels, whose market share is pitiful. Green fuels have about 0.5 per cent. of the market, and if we are to get a grip on the hugely important agenda of reducing emissions, the future lies in technology, not in demand management. To advance the debate, the Government need to be much clearer about why it will make a difference.

Next, I echo the comments made by my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire. Where is the momentum behind the public debate that has been called for? In a speech in June 2005, the Secretary of State said that we needed to answer three questions. First, what sort of system did we need, and what sort of benefits would it bring? Secondly, was the technology available, and could we construct an affordable scheme that would work? Thirdly, what practical steps did we need to take in the meantime? That sounds great, but it seems that the ball has been passed to local authorities. Are they picking it up?

Again, the Committee's report makes it clear that guidance on local transport plans invited local authorities to contact the Department by January 2005 if they were interested in exploring a package of measures to tackle congestion. It reads:

> "The Secretary of State told us that he had received a positive approach from local authorities."

Can the Minister be a little bit more specific about how many councils have expressed enthusiasm about that? Has the Department decided who will lead the pilots, particularly the inter-urban pilot, which the Committee's report identified as being critical to advancing the debate? My sense is that local authorities have real concerns about the lead they are getting from the Government.

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I will answer those questions now. Over 30 councils have expressed an interest and we will be making an announcement shortly about which ones we think are of the most interest.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to the Minister for that answer. After the rejection in the Edinburgh referendum, I was worried that there were concerns about the political risk attached to this agenda. Concern has been expressed about the lead being given by the Government on technology, which seems hugely important to this issue, particularly in the context of a phased approach where the Government wish to encourage local schemes, but with a view to that ultimately fitting into a national programme. The technology at play here is fundamental.

It has been put to me that not enough lead has been given by the Government on standardisation. The Committee's report is explicit on that:

> "the Government should establish a national framework within which local authorities can design the finer detail of the scheme . . . The Secretary of State told us that he would seek to get some standardisation agreed in the near future:
>
> 'That is why I say that if we were going to go down this road, we would want to get that standardisation in at the start, otherwise it would make it extremely expensive.'"

Can the Minister respond to that apparent concern about the lead being given by the Government on the standardisation of technology? My over-riding concern is about the lack of strong leadership in this debate. I fear that momentum will be lost. An interesting idea has been introduced. A debate has been called, but I sense a lack of momentum and a potentially wasted opportunity.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): I call Dr. John Pugh.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD) rose—

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): May I just say that in calling Dr. Pugh, I am starting the wind-ups, so if any other Member wanted to make a speech, they should have risen to their feet. I am grateful to Dr. Pugh. I am prepared to allow Mr. Hollobone to make a speech in this instance.

3.23 pm

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I am grateful, Sir Nicholas. Thank you for correcting me on the protocol. Like my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), I had not intended to speak in this debate but I have been inspired by the oratory that has preceded me. With your permission, Sir Nicholas, I should like to take a slightly different, if controversial, tack, based primarily on chapter 4 of the Committee's excellent report, which concentrates on setting the road pricing debate in the context of other ways to tackle congestion, and the Government's response to that in paragraph 7.

I have a strong constituency interest in mind. As I mentioned in an earlier intervention, Kettering and Northamptonshire form part of one of the Government's growth areas and north Northamptonshire is obliged to deliver 52,100 houses between 2001 and 2021. That will increase the population of north Northamptonshire by about a third.

The local road network simply cannot cope. The main road—the A14, which is a road of national and European importance—is already beyond its design limits. Some 70,000 cars a day travel around Kettering. You do not need to take my word for it, Sir Nicholas. The Highways Agency itself is tackling congestion locally by imposing article 14 directions on house builders who have planning permission for new developments. Those directions forbid them from building more than a small number of their planning allocations, on the basis that the local road network cannot cope.

The point has been made that although these thoughts about a national road pricing scheme are in many senses welcome, it is already tremendously late. In constituencies such as mine, another Department is driving through another agenda, and it seems to me that the Department for Transport and the Highways Agency have not been made aware of the need for urgency in providing the necessary transport infrastructure up front. My short point is that, as far as tackling congestion is concerned, road pricing has many merits for the future, but by 2014, which is the earliest date by which the Government say that they can introduce it, there will already be tens of thousands of new houses in and around the Kettering constituency, and the local road network, which is already congested, will be approaching gridlock.

[Mr. Philip Hollobone]

3.26 pm

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): Had hundreds of hon. Members appeared here to speak about road user charging, many could have avoided the congestion charge on their way home by staying here until 5.30. I suppose the fact that they did not appear in droves proves that the charge is no significant deterrent to most people, or at least not to people on MPs' salaries.

If road user pricing is the answer, I would like to begin my little contribution by asking what the question is. It appears to be, "What are we going to do about pollution and congestion?" Both are thoroughly unacceptable. Pollution is unacceptable because of its connection with climate change, and congestion is unacceptable because individuals are inconvenienced and gross inefficiency is built into the economy. That will all be aggravated, according to Government statistics, by the projected 30 per cent. increase in road traffic; that will only make pollution and congestion worse.

Pollution and congestion are related, but they are different problems, and solutions to pollution are not necessarily the same as solutions to congestion. For example, increased use of biofuels, which at least one hon. Member has mentioned so far, more efficient engines and so on provide a solution to pollution but do nothing for congestion. In fact, if there are fiscal incentives to use biofuels, the motorist may find that he can travel more cheaply.

Similarly, solutions to the problem of congestion do not necessarily work for the problem of pollution. For example, one criticism made of road pricing in the Institute for Public Policy Research study mentioned in the Select Committee's report is that it runs the marginal risk of encouraging people to travel further, which will clearly do nothing for pollution. Road building is another solution to congestion that does nothing to ameliorate the pollution problem, although if cars wait longer because of congestion, whatever gain has been made by virtue of engine efficiency—and appreciable gains have been made over the last few decades—will be completely negated. The car will be sitting there with the engine revving over, going nowhere and at its polluting worst. There are, however, solutions that attack the problems of both congestion and pollution—for example, car sharing and boosting public transport.

Before moving on to whether road pricing is the solution, may I make a few remarks about the Government's analysis? I would like some help, because they appear to be extrapolating figures for traffic growth from existing statistics and I wonder what that extrapolation is predicated on. A sceptic could argue that with demographic trends and the population becoming ever older—it is a known fact that older people are more reluctant to take long journeys and they travel less and use cars less—there will be disincentives in future for some people to travel. Is the projected 30 per cent. increase built on the optimistic assumption of economic expansion continuing as ever before? Is it based on increased car ownership? If we compare ourselves with other European countries, we see that there is scope for that. Compared with some other European countries, we have not yet maximised car ownership. Or is there an assumption that there will be a general increase in mobility due to the real cost of motoring remaining relatively static, and, perhaps, improving against people's net incomes?

Does the projection allow for the effect of congestion, which retards mobility to some extent? Clearly, if travelling around the country by car is a deeply frustrating experience and is much slower than one expects, one tends to do it less. This is in no sense a criticism, but I want the 30 per cent. projection to be analysed in a little more detail, or for the Government to share their modelling, which would equally help, as the figure is an important element in considering what should and should not be done.

Apart from road pricing, there are other well known mechanisms for dealing with congestion, one of which is to increase road capacity. That is often lampooned under the heading "Predict and provide." Some people suppose that one has only to build a road and it will immediately fill up with cars, but anyone who has had the lonely experience of travelling up and down the M58 will know that that is not the case. There are examples of roads being built that nobody uses, or that people do not use much.

When increases in road use are analysed, an interesting pattern emerges. Over the past decade, according to figures that I have obtained—presumably the Department for Transport has the same figures—there has been a 36.6 per cent. increase in motorway use and a 21 per cent. increase in rural A road use, but the increase in the use of urban A roads is only 5 per cent., so there is a variant pattern.

When one takes into account the fact that we have fewer motorway miles per car per head of population and by gross domestic product, the case for never increasing capacity and simply taking measures to restrain demand or ration road space is not unassailable. I am sure that all hon. Members will say, when canvassed, that they are against road building per se, but if one speaks to any of them for any length of time, one will find that there is a scheme in their area that they consider to be good and not to have any of the vices that road schemes in general are thought to have.

If one reads the Transport Committee report carefully—I hope that the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) will correct me if I misrepresent anything—one finds that there is an element of hedging bets. Although the capacity issue is not ignored, the Committee says that a pure building capacity solution is not a solution in any sense. That consensus is shared across party divides.

I agree with the Committee that there is still scope to reinvigorate Government support for softer measures, such as quality bus contracts and improved support for public transport as—I believe that this expression is used in the Committee's report—goods in themselves. I do not want to stray into the unfortunate issue of trams yet. That is a difficult issue because although modal shift is encouraged with trams, it is at an appreciable price, which the Government are increasingly reluctant to pay.

There are other obvious solutions to the congestion problem that should be pursued in parallel with road user pricing, such as the better use of ports and port capacity. I am enthusiastic about the expansion of my local port, Liverpool. Freight and road access to that port is severely hampered, but many containers could be taken off the M6 and the motorway network in general if it were a thriving port with good access. Currently, that situation does not entirely prevail, but it is a mechanism that could be used to do something about congestion, as is freight transfer to rail. I think that the Minister will accept that there is scope for that.

The broad, sensible view—I think it is the Transport Committee's and probably the Minister's view, too—is that road user pricing is part of a tool kit; it is not the sole item or a magic bullet. Indeed, it is not even particularly new or radical, although the Secretary of State for Transport said that it was radical when he introduced it and sought to excite the House with his proposals. As has been said, road user pricing has been on the stocks for a long time and goes back to the turnpikes. All my life, I have paid to go through the Mersey tunnel to the Wirral; at one time, I did not know that that was road user pricing, but that is precisely what it is. There is also the Greater London authority experiment with congestion charging, which has been broadly supported this afternoon. We all agree with the principle of road user pricing and we are all comfortable with it. We do not really have a difficulty with it and we accept it in various contexts, although we perhaps object to it in schemes that we dislike. However, the principle is well embodied in the thinking of all serious people who apply themselves to considering how we can better transport ourselves around the country.

The big issues are how far that principle will be extended and, equally importantly, what the details will be. We can have a brilliant scheme, but if we get the detail wrong, we shall generate a very unfortunate, adverse public response. In years gone by, I was the council leader in Southport, which is the constituency that I now represent. At one stage, I rationed parking on the streets by means of pay and display. I did that against appreciable political opposition, and there were processions through the streets calling for my dismissal, even though I was just a simple councillor at that stage. The scheme had to be introduced, and somebody would ultimately have had to do that, but when it was introduced, some of the details were not quite right and needed fine tuning. Once they were put right, and people understood what the scheme involved and what the benefits were, they rapidly adjusted to it. Obviously, I have lived to tell the tale politically, in so far as the constituents of Southport have, in their wisdom, elected me as their MP in the past two elections. The issue, therefore, is over-extension and detail.

As I understand their current thinking, the Government favour a high-tech and, to some extent, a high-risk solution. It is an historically unprecedented nationwide solution, and I am not aware of anybody in the world who has implemented or is implementing it. According to the Transport Committee's report, it will cost £5 billion a year to run. It is based on new global positioning system technology, which is used voluntarily by Norwich Union customers. However, it is not used massively across the world and is not the traditional microwave number recognition tag and beacon system.

There might be good reasons for using that system and the thinking might be that it will work extraordinarily well and that there will be no computer glitches. However, there are hitches. There are problems with synchronising what we are doing with what the European Union might want to do. There are privacy issues and issues related to who will own the satellites and what they will do with the information. I am not saying that those issues cannot be bottomed out, but they are complex.

If I were the Minister, I would understandably want to learn more before going for the big-bang solution. Once we do that, it will be difficult to retreat. Like him, I would probably be encouraging pilots. The transport innovation fund perhaps involves some strong-arm tactics, but the Government are taking a carrot-and-stick approach to some extent. Word has gone out to local authorities that if they want to be splendidly rewarded by the Government, one thing they could do is pilot a measure of road charging. I can therefore quite see why the Government want to avoid a big-bang solution and wish to prepare the public, the motoring industry and the freight industry.

As the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich said, the Government have not been helped by the collapse of the lorry charging system. I am a bit bemused by that. There are practical reasons agin it, some of which are in the Select Committee's report and some of which have been spelt out by Ministers. I wonder whether technical problems have been encountered that we might come across later if we opt for a massive scheme across the country. I reflect on the fact that Germany seems to have done something similar, although transport conditions and Government conditions are different in Germany. I wonder whether the Germans decided that there were serious technical problems of the sort that could well come back to bite us.

Pilots have their place, but the cruel dilemma for the Government is that there are also arguments against them. It is often argued that pilots are unrepresentative because the procedure for charging people is not universal across counties, regions or countries, which results in all sorts of displacement effects that are not created if the scheme is nationwide. Some people would advance the different argument that if we keep setting up enough pilots, we may well resolve the real meat of the problem without having to opt for a fully fledged nationwide scheme. That was the line followed by the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd).

The evidence so far is not terribly helpful. We have the examples of London and the M6 toll road. One decreased traffic and the other slightly increased it. It is, however, very difficult to draw obvious conclusions from those examples, because we may not have to the same extent in Manchester, Liverpool or Leeds what we have in London. A city might have a whole range of options—an excellent bus service, many trains and an underground system—and the people who need those options the most are probably the people who cannot pay the charges.

[Dr. John Pugh]

I speculate on the predicament of a cleaner in Manchester under a road charging scheme who must go to work when the building needs cleaning, which is often early in the morning, and return in whatever congestion period has been set. That person does not have a lot of cash and cannot vary their behaviour by choosing to drive at a different time. Buses might not be running at the appropriate time or in sufficient numbers, or they may simply be inconvenient. All those factors could create the problems of social exclusion that the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich mentioned and that would affect ordinary city workers rather than people in the country. That point must be addressed in any scheme, and surely will be.

People who have the opportunity to use the M6 toll road increasingly go via Birmingham. I am one of them, and I hope that I can give Department for Transport officials in the Chamber useful advice about what is actually happening. I used to avoid the M6 altogether because I would simply roll slowly along in my car past the RAC building, and that is a deeply unpleasant and tedious experience surrounded by large lorries.

Mrs. Dunwoody: The hon. Gentleman should have taken the train.

Dr. Pugh: I do sometimes. The hon. Lady suggests that I take a train from a sedentary position—well, one cannot take a train from a sedentary position. I usually take the train, but occasionally I must drive, so I do. Many motorists like me used to drive up the M1 until they almost reached Derby and then drove straight across to Stoke. We have ceased doing that, which might in part explain why the figures have changed. That is not a standard example, however, so it is very difficult to draw satisfactory conclusions from it.

Similarly, none of the schemes under consideration are fiscally neutral. The Government recommend a fiscally neutral solution. The Select Committee, in part, advocates that. I have studied the Government response in some depth and contrasted it with the rather more forceful statement made by the Secretary of State for Transport when, not so long ago, he excited us all with the imminent appearance of a national road pricing scheme. For all the reasons I have given, the language of the Government response to the Select Committee report is far more tentative than that statement. It uses words such as "consensus", "research", "complexity" and "setting milestones"; there are lots of "whethers" and "ifs" in the text.

Such caution is partly justifiable, but three things are certain: first, the Government will not find support, nationally, locally or, probably, in Parliament, unless the evidence for the policy is convincing. Secondly, they will not find support unless the public can, however begrudgingly, see the need for the action. One reason for congestion charging not becoming a political disaster was that most people could, from time to time as they travelled around London, easily identify the futility of the previous arrangements. Anyone who, in 2001, got in a taxi and asked to go anywhere and just sat going nowhere with the clock ticking over recognised that something needed to be done. The public must recognise the necessity for action, and there must be open, manifest and forceful public dialogue.

Thirdly, the detail of any scheme, whether local or national, needs to be carefully thought through. The devil is often in the detail and that is true of road pricing. There is no need to be dogmatic or presumptive, but there is every case for holding a good, open and intelligent debate on the subject.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): I understand that the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) wishes to raise a point of order.

Mrs. Dunwoody: On a point of order, Sir Nicholas. It is extraordinarily kind to call me now, as I was hoping not to interrupt a speech. I apologise to you, to the House and to the Minister and Front-Bench speakers, but I am committed to attending a prize-giving ceremony and my life depends on it. I hope that hon. Members will forgive me if I leave. It is not, I assure them, a sign of any desire to underplay the importance of the debate.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): I congratulate the hon. Lady on her courtesy. I know her constituency and her life would indeed be in jeopardy if she did not make the engagement in question. We understand her predicament and that she must go.

3.48 pm

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): What a good debate we have had, but that comes as no surprise when we are discussing a report prepared under the stewardship of the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). I am delighted that she will be gracing the school with her presence tonight, as she graces us with her presence in the Chamber.

I welcome the debate on road pricing and the Transport Committee report on it. Road pricing is part of the wider debate on our transport system, the acute problem of congestion and the public policy decisions that have put such a strain on our transport infrastructure. In introducing the debate, the hon. Lady identified the effect on traffic; she talked about the displacement effect on smaller roads, and other possible results of road pricing. She dealt with the effect on individuals and communities, when she spoke about social exclusion. I want to deal with that in some detail. She also spoke about the effect on revenue, when she highlighted the tension between revenue-neutral and revenue-raising approaches. Those effects will permeate much of my speech, and they have permeated much of the debate so far. I am sure they will be central to the Minister's considerations.

I am pleased that the Government and the Transport Committee recognise the severe problem of congestion. There is cross-party concern about it, and it is not a matter of partisan politics. I also welcome the willingness of the Committee and the Government to consider new ways of dealing with the problem of traffic on the roads. The Committee has done a good job of identifying the key difficulties, examining the possibility of a road pricing system and posing some key questions for the Government about such a scheme. I want to amplify some of those questions, and I hope to add some of my own.

I intend to continue in this consensual vein, not just out of personal taste, but because we all want to support fair and effective measures that relieve the problems of congestion. However, I hope to ask some of the many remaining fundamental and critical questions about the Government's intentions.

The Department for Transport anticipates a 30 per cent. increase in road traffic compared with 2000 levels by 2015. The Committee states:

> "Congestion already has a strangle-hold on many of our towns and cities at rush hour and on important parts of the strategic road network."

The danger of the Government's approach is that it fails to deal with the root causes of that extra demand. The answer cannot be simply to price the poorest and most vulnerable members of our society out of travel, when it is becoming increasingly difficult to go about one's everyday business without embarking on long and numerous journeys.

My right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) said that there are two ways of dealing with congestion and, for once, I disagree with him to some extent. He said that the problem can be dealt with either by taking a non-interventionist approach and allowing congestion or by intervening and introducing what I think he described as a measured form of pricing. However, there is a further way of dealing with that problem—by examining and adjusting demand. Indeed, when the Government came to office, they were quite bold about that. In their early days, they recognised that transport policies were not simply a matter of reacting to an inevitable circumstance of ever-growing demand and were prepared to look at how that demand could be altered.

I therefore want to talk a little about the change in traffic, travel and transport, and how public policy can affect demand. Although everyone recognises that growth in the opportunity to travel for pleasure has enriched our lives, the travel revolution has also had less desirable effects on necessary travel. People have become obliged to travel more and for greater distances than ever before in pursuit of everyday objectives. Government policy means that people have to travel further and for longer not only to work, but to access core public services. For example, policing has become increasingly remote: one in four police stations has closed since 1990, obliging people to travel ever greater distances to report a crime, or to deal with the police in an everyday way. The threat of regionalisation of health and other services is also likely to lead to greater demand for travel.

There is also a greater obligation to travel to access shops. The average distance that we now drive to shop for food each year is 898 miles, compared with 747 miles a decade ago. The goods that we buy at supermarkets also travel for longer distances before they reach us. Although our lives have been enriched by the availability of exotic fruits—I imagine, Sir Nicholas, that you enjoy a star fruit or a kiwi fruit with the best of people—many products that could be produced locally now travel ever further to get to us.

I represent a rural constituency in Lincolnshire where people grow a lot of vegetables. If I went into the supermarkets in Holbeach and asked for a cauliflower grown in Holbeach, I suspect that people there would look at me as though I was mad. They would not know where the cauliflower had come from, and even if it had been grown in Holbeach, it is quite likely that it would have been transported to a distribution centre and then sent back to the supermarket close to where it originated.

We therefore have a serious problem not simply with access to shops, but with the distance travelled by the products sold there. The official figures show that the distance that food travels—known as food miles—increased by 15 per cent. in the 10 years to 2002. The use of heavy goods vehicles to transport food has doubled since 1974, and food transport accounts for 25 per cent. of all miles driven by heavy goods vehicles on our roads. As a result, the CO_2 emitted by food transport has risen dramatically. Some 19 tonnes of CO_2 were emitted in 2002 as a result of the transport of food—an increase of 12 per cent. since 1992.

According to a Government report, time lost through traffic congestion, wear on roads, ill-health caused by air or noise pollution and accidents—all caused by food transport—cost the UK £9 billion a year. That is half the value of the food and drink manufacturing sector, which is £19.8 billion.

The amount that we are obliged to travel has risen also as a result of the Government's housing, planning and employment policies. My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) is a doughty defender of the interests of his constituents, and is known in his area as someone who will stand up against Government plans to create unsustainable communities. He will know that the Government plan to build 200,000 houses in four growth areas in the south-east of England.

To drive that new development through, the Deputy Prime Minister is taking control of planning away from local communities and giving it to unaccountable and distant regional bodies. Incredibly, however, the Government have failed properly to assess the environmental and infrastructural impact of those decisions, despite repeated warnings from Committees of the House. The Environmental Audit Committee recently reported:

> "It is astounding that despite the clear need for an assessment of the environmental impacts of the proposals for the Growth Areas as a whole, nothing has been done to date by ODPM or DEFRA to address this issue."

In short, it is important that the debate on road pricing and congestion is seen in the context of a broader debate—one about the impact of public policy on the need to travel. It is important that we consider the effect that obligatory travel has on quality of life. We want the Minister to liaise, co-operate and collaborate with other Ministers to ensure that decisions made by Government—the problem is not peculiar to this Government—are consistent in respect of their impact on transport and infrastructural costs, and the environmental consequences of those costs. That is the nature of the fundamental and wide-ranging debate that needs to take place, and I welcome the opportunity to contribute to it briefly.

Early in this splendid report, the Committee says:

> "What we urgently need is a proper evaluation of the costs of congestion and an understanding of the impact congestion has on the UK economy."

[Mr. John Hayes]

The Committee recognised the wider context that I have tried to highlight. An effective road pricing scheme will obviously depend on the evaluation that the Committee suggests. The Government's response to that is that they are > "taking forward a research programme to look into this area."

Will the Minister elaborate on what that programme is, and to what timetable it is operating? Can we have a proper debate on finances—the taxation and revenue aspects of the subject?

There is a fundamental difference between revenue-neutral schemes and tax-raising schemes, as the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich made clear. A revenue-neutral scheme would replace existing taxation with a new form open to more subtle manipulation, although the possible effect of displacing traffic from trunk roads to rural and smaller roads has already been highlighted. The logic of a revenue-raising scheme is that the ever-increasing demand for road use can be suppressed only by higher taxation. To tax road use is to treat a symptom, not the disease. The real issue is that we are obliged to travel more as part of our everyday lives. If we do not deal with that, we will be punishing the poorest and most vulnerable of our citizens; we will be restricting their ability to travel, even when it is essential that they travel to maintain a decent quality of life.

I make a special plea to the Minister on behalf of rural motorists. As I have said, I never waste an opportunity to advance the interests of my constituents—something I have in common with you, Sir Nicholas. You will know that I represent a rural constituency with a sparse population, many of whom do not have of the luxury of easy access to public transport. For them, the subject is vital. Imagine if they were charged to do the basic things—getting to school, work or the most fundamental facilities.

Compare that to the example of the citizens of leafy Ruislip-Northwood, who, we understand from the excellent speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd), have more cars than they know what to do with and easier access to all sorts of local services. I have nothing against Ruislip—I do not want to suggest that for a moment—but the challenges and difficulties are entirely different in the two areas described in my speech and that of my hon. Friend.

Let us be clear: it is impossible to have a meaningful debate about road pricing if the Government do not set out their position on the fundamentals. Would road pricing be revenue-neutral or an additional tax? The Government response to the report makes no mention whatever of the Committee's conclusion, which states:

> "There are strong arguments behind introducing road pricing on a revenue raising, rather than a revenue neutral, approach, if a national system were to be implemented."

Why have the Government failed to respond, or will the Minister respond today? This is not a question of detail; it is fairly central. It is vital to address it if we are to inspire confidence in the Government's intentions and if we are to have the clarity of purpose mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood as well as an open and honest debate on the difficult issues and the related challenges they throw up.

There is an ethical issue, which the Committee described as an issue of social exclusion. It is perhaps even bigger than that: how do we regard freedom to travel and where is it on the scale of importance? What do we believe people's rights and opportunities should be?

As a Conservative, Sir Nicholas, like you, I do not hold much truck with natural rights, but having said that people have become accustomed to having the opportunity to travel freely and in a way of their own choosing. We need to take the broader ethical question of the balance between obligation and freedom into account as part of this important debate. I know that the Minister takes such matters seriously, and, as I have said, much of the subject goes beyond the partisan Punch-and-Judy politics that sometimes characterises our exchanges in this place and elsewhere.

The report also notes that

> "without complementary planning restrictions, cheaper road travel in rural areas could promote out-of-town land-use development, and would further reinforce car dependency".

I would be interested to hear what discussions the Minister has had with the planning Minister about out-of-town shopping and related planning decisions, which will have an impact on road use and maybe on road pricing.

The Committee also expressed concern that a road pricing scheme would hit the poorest hardest, as I suggested, stating:

> "While improvements in public transport and car sharing options would undoubtedly be an advantage to many people, there will still be disadvantages for people with low income who have no option but to continue to drive on congested roads at peak times."

To be successful, road pricing must be part of a coherent strategy that addresses the number and length of journeys we are obliged to make as part of our everyday lives. If that is not the case, road user charging will simply displace traffic on to rural roads or make it impossible for vulnerable members of society to go about their business.

There is some doubt in this Chamber, which has been expressed by a number of hon. Members, about whether the scheme would be national or local. The Committee reported in paragraph 58:

> "If road pricing were introduced, the business and haulage sectors would want to see a single, seamless interoperable system with single billing. Without some co-ordination the administrative burden for businesses which had to deal with a number of different systems could be significant."

In paragraph 62, it went on:

> "Local and regional authorities must be involved in determining design and charges, but an overriding national framework would provide consistency for the user, as well as lowering the costs of implementation for the local authority."

Will the Minister address in his winding-up speech the fundamental point of whether the charging scheme would be a single, national programme or a variety of local schemes? Is there any guarantee that the Government would use the revenue raised by road pricing to benefit motorists? Would that money be hypothecated? Would it be ring-fenced? Would it be ploughed back into the many important causes that are dear to our hearts and which assist travel?

We expect one of the coldest winters in recent years, yet the Government are consulting on a proposal to remove the tax exemptions enjoyed by snow clearers and gritters. That is shocking, and surely not a responsible action. I cannot believe that this sensible Minister would have any truck with such a policy. It must be an error, which I hope his words in this Chamber will put right.

The Association for Public Service Excellence has warned that > "the move to remove exemption from winter maintenance vehicles in particular will have a considerable impact on budgets in what is a crucial and highly visible local authority service. The effect will range from authority to authority but could be as high individually as £125,000 . . . With limited budgets the implication is that the financial resources would result in a reduction in the mileages of treated roads . . . It is estimated that the cost of a single fatality on the roads is over £1.5 million. There is therefore a substantial risk that the suggested £0.5 billion savings in fuel fraud will be less than the cost to the wider economy and the proposals will have an adverse effect on the overall economy of UK . . . the actual cost of these proposals will be borne by the public by either increased Council Tax or reduced services".

I digress a little, Sir Nicholas, and I am grateful for your indulgence.

I shall conclude by posing serious questions: some are amplifications of what the Committee has said while some give further weight to hon. Members' comments. First, as we have heard during the debate, the Government support the development of local and regional demand management road pricing schemes through their transport innovation fund. Will not that give rise to a plethora of schemes that are based on different technologies? If so, those schemes will do little to inform a nationwide scheme that uses one technology only. How will the results be judged and then scaled up for a nationwide scheme?

Secondly, which of the several road pricing schemes around the world have the Government studied? Will the results of those studies be published? Thirdly, what risk is there of the Government abandoning any future national road pricing scheme, as they did the lorry road user charging project? Abandoning that scheme cost the companies that were working to implement it tens of millions of pounds.

I must take the opportunity to say what a powerful point the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich made about foreign heavy goods vehicles escaping the legal obligations that British hauliers endure. It is not really appropriate for our hauliers to be put at a commercial disadvantage because of the Government's inability or unwillingness to create a level playing field on which they could compete with foreign hauliers.

The hon. Lady also said that that is a matter of great concern to her and to her Committee. It is of great concern to the Opposition, too. I hope the Minister can satisfy us that he is on the ball and dealing with that problem; I hope he urgently introduces proposals in the House.

What assessment have the Government made of the possible effect that the local trials will have in displacing shoppers and traffic to neighbouring areas? How will businesses that find themselves suffering inside local congestion charging areas be compensated? Most will be familiar with what is often known as the cliff edge problem, whereby a business is located just inside a congestion charging area, but most of its customers and clients are outside—for example, a shop or a nursery. Where the scheme begins and ends is a real problem, although the Minister will have thought about that and, with his usual ingenuity, will devise an appropriate solution.

Will any local or regional scheme under which drivers, at their own cost, volunteer to have positioning satellite receivers in their cars produce skewed and irrelevant results? Will car-tracking data be held? If so, by whom and for how long? What work is being done to ensure the compatibility of road pricing schemes across frontiers in the European Union? That matter was mentioned by the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh). How much will the GPS box cost? How can drivers predict how much they must pay for a given route? Will hire cars and foreign cars be treated in the same way as UK ones? We know that in London, for example, within the congestion-charge area, some embassies pay the charge and some do not, or so I am told. Does the Minister know anything about that, and might that precedent spread alongside congestion charging?

It is right in principle to discuss this matter—the Secretary of State has called for a debate, the Transport Committee has examined the issue, we are having this debate and we will have an ongoing discussion on these aspects—but I suggest to the Minister that the debate would be better informed if it were clearer where the Government stand and if they answered some of the questions posed by me and the Committee.

The Minister will not be able to answer all those questions today, in the short time available to him, nor would I expect him to. I am happy for him to write to me, and he will wish to take the matter further in future debates. He might wish to adopt the style of inductive reasoning, whereby he starts with a theory and tests it. At the moment, we must deduce the outcome from sometimes disparate information and from uncertainties, rumours, hints of what might happen and the line that the Government might take. That is no way to hold a meaningful and productive debate.

I hope that the Government can go some way to correct that. We must take these matters seriously: they involve the UK economy, the UK's communities and the well-being of our constituents—the citizens of the United Kingdom.

4.13 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I begin by thanking the Liaison Committee and the Transport Committee for promoting the debate and for giving us the opportunity to discuss these important issues. I seldom get to my feet with the opportunity of speaking uninterrupted for an hour and a quarter. However, since the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) is anxious to be at home for his little boy's birthday—and I am rather anxious that he should get to that party and pass on the whole House's good wishes—I shall try to speak for somewhat less than an hour and a quarter.

One of the dilemmas that the Government face is that when we come forward with a firm plan and a set of proposals, everyone says, "You should have consulted more. Why did you not come to us to ask our views before you came forward with a plan?" When we do exactly that and come forward with a blank sheet of paper indicating that there is an issue that we must address together, and that we need to grope our way to a solution, we are accused of not having put a plan in place. I rather feel that that has been the theme of this debate; it began with my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) saying that we needed to offer more of a plan and to include a timetable, a point at least partly reiterated by the hon. Gentleman.

[Dr. Stephen Ladyman]

We recognise that, as several hon. Members have said, the scheme will only move forward if we can get public agreement that it should move forward. Also, we have to get the public to understand how it will work. We have to deal with the complex problems that people are raising on how the scheme will work and the effects that it will undoubtedly have on social and economic policy. Unless we can deal with all those questions and come up with answers on which there is broad agreement, the scheme will not go ahead. The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) said that he was offering a certain amount of "political cover"; I would not call it that, but he is absolutely right that we will not go ahead with the scheme unless there is political consensus.

We have made it clear that if, ultimately, we end up with a national system of road pricing—and there is still a question as to whether we will, but we have to accept it as a possible objective—it will take at least 10 years to do it. That means probably two, perhaps even three, general elections between now and then. If we do not work together on the scheme, and if there is no political consensus and political understanding on the issue, there will be a temptation for somebody to say to the people, at some point during that time, "If you vote for me, I won't do it." By that point, we may have spent billions of pounds on moving towards the scheme, so it is absolutely vital that we work together across the parties to resolve the matter. I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman has suggested willingness to do so, and that the Liberal Democrats have indicated a willingness to share ideas. I welcome that, whether it means corresponding or meeting. The Secretary of State has said that he is prepared to have discussions with Front-Benchers—shadow spokesmen—from other parties to try to get some understanding on the problems that confront us and the difficulties that we will face in resolving them.

I must say that I do not know the answers to many of the questions posed today, and I am probably closer to the problem than anybody. I do not have answers to all these questions, but I know what many of the questions are, and I have some idea about potential answers to them. I know which questions do not yet have a full answer, and frankly probably never will. We have to accept that if we move along this road, some problems will be caused by the policy, and others will be solved by it. Nothing will be easy. We have to grope towards a solution that we can all buy into. Anything that I say in the next few minutes, and anything that the Government have said in recent weeks, has to be put in that context.

We have started a debate that we genuinely want to hold. We genuinely want to identify the problems and come up with answers that everyone can buy into. We have some ideas and are putting them in the public domain—I will put some more before the House today—but I do not want anyone to think that anything in the debate is locked down or decided yet. None of it is decided; all of it is open to debate, discussion and moving forward. That will also apply to those councils chosen to move forward with us in developing pilots, and those that are involved in the pilots that have applied for money from the transport innovation fund.

I told the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd) that more than 30 councils have shown an interest in working with us on pilots and in being involved in transport innovation funding projects. We are narrowing that number down to a much smaller group that we would like to work with in the immediate future, and we will make an announcement on that shortly. I am sure that hon. Members will forgive me if I do not go into detail now; clearly we have to notify the House first. We will work closely with the short-listed authorities on recognising local issues, identifying how a pilot in their area might contribute towards answering the questions that have been asked today and clarifying the bigger picture.

Mr. Hurd: Can the Minister indicate whether the 30 councils that have expressed an interest present an opportunity to frame the sort of inter-urban pilot that the report suggests would be helpful?

Dr. Ladyman: The 30 or so interested councils present many opportunities, including that of testing behaviour. I would go further and say that there is no point in running a pilot unless we learn something from it. I would also argue that there is no point in running more than one pilot to answer the same question. If we are to learn anything from pilots, we need to identify questions and try to answer them. That might mean that we have one pilot dealing with one subject and another with another. Some pilots might be relatively simple, and able to be started quickly; others more complicated, needing to be run in the medium term; and others might be even longer term. All of them, as has been said by several speakers, have to be run in such a way that they can operate together and can all be part of the final picture. That means that technological and social issues will all have to be brought into line.

I hope that we will be able to answer some of the inter-urban issues with pilots but, because we are shortly to announce who is to work with us in the short term, I must make one point crystal clear: nobody has made any decisions about pilots or road pricing in those areas. All that we are committed to considering is the problems of those areas and the potential for working with them further. I do not want anybody to hear the announcement that a certain area has been included in the pilots and to run into the street screaming, "Oh my goodness, we are getting road pricing in our area." That is not what we are about. We are aiming to identify issues of interest on which we can work together, to look at them in depth and then to decide whether to take the next step.

Mr. Hayes: I take the Minister's point that the pilots and what can be learned from them should be sufficiently consistent that they can be applied more generally. Has he looked, as I suggested in my speech, at the experiences of countries that have already implemented schemes? That would seem to be a less risky way of achieving the same objective, given what he said about the worries of people who assume that a congestion charge or something similar is to be introduced in their area.

Dr. Ladyman: The hon. Gentleman is right. We can learn from other places, and we are studying schemes around the world. However, many of them do not deal with the sorts of problems that we are trying to address. For instance, some hon. Members have spoken in this debate as though the congestion charging that applies in central London is the sort of road pricing scheme that we are talking about for the rest of the country. The zonal congestion charge in central London, which uses relatively unsophisticated technology, is not applicable to the wider national situation. It might apply to certain towns and areas, and if it does then we might consider it. However, we are talking about ending up with a distance-based road price that will have to vary according to the congestion of the road and the time of day. That is a different concept from a congestion zone. When we consider a foreign scheme, we have to ask whether the problems that it was designed to solve are the problems that we are trying to solve here. If they were, then we will take it on board and will study it closely.

Let me outline some of the technologies that have been suggested. Not only Governments have looked at some of these technologies; a number of insurance companies are interested in moving how they charge for insurance to a road pricing system. One, Norwich Union, has a far advanced pilot scheme under way, in which people use what is basically a GPS positioning system to identify how many miles they have driven and are charged for their insurance accordingly.

There is a tendency for some people to say, "Okay, all the problems have been solved. All the technology we need is there; we can just apply it to our national road pricing scheme." However, the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire talked about the need to make sure that technologies work properly. The GPS system that Norwich Union are using is very good for answering the questions that the company wants to ask: "When are you driving your vehicle?", "Broadly, where are you driving it?" and "How far are you driving it?"

Younger, inexperienced drivers pay a great deal for insurance because they could be out and about on the roads at all hours and we know that many such drivers have accidents between midnight and 4 o'clock in the morning because they are tired, have been partying or are with their friends and showing off. If we want to come up with a system that disincentivises them from driving at that time of night, we need to deploy technology that tells us whether they are on the road at that time of night. That question is different from the one we are trying to answer; if we go to national road pricing, we may need far more specific and accurate information.

For example, one of the things that Transport for London has identified is that there is an effect called canyoning when a person is driving in cities. That means that the person is screened from the satellite by the tall buildings on either side and that the GPS system does not work that well in cities. That would be entirely unacceptable for a road pricing system such as the one we are considering.

Where do we go from there? Well, the Austrians or Germans have built some sort of gyroscopic system into their technology so that when the GPS system is not working, there is a way of predicting how far a person is travelling. Others have proposed a predictive mapping system whereby cars have an electronic map inside them and a person can work out where they are on that map using the GPS signal.

I hope that the House is starting to get the flavour of the fact that this is a complicated thing and that it does not necessarily have the accuracy that we seek. Different types of GPS technology can be put in vehicles to make the system more accurate. When we manage to get Galileo deployed, we will also have to ask ourselves whether that will increase the accuracy of GPS systems. GPS, of course, is just one technology that we might use. Mobile phone-based technologies are being piloted.

Mr. Hurd: The Minister mentions Galileo. How fundamental is that programme to the Government's vision, or potential vision, of a national scheme, and is there concern at Government level about the apparent uncertainty behind the funding for Galileo?

Dr. Ladyman: Galileo will certainly be a great help, not only for road pricing but for many companies that will be able to build technologies on the back of Galileo signals. I have no doubt that it will be a major boost to high-tech industry across Europe generally.

There is a debate to be had on whether we could build a road pricing system based on available satellite signals or whether we would need Galileo. There is no question but that if Galileo is available, it will be easier. However, some suppliers have said that they could build detector systems to go in a car that would be accurate enough to work with the existing satellite deployment available from the United States. There is not a clear answer to the hon. Gentleman's question, which is a good one. Galileo is not essential for road pricing, and there other types of technology that we can consider deploying. However, Galileo would make things much easier. I hope that we are now making progress towards sorting out the issues in that regard, and that we shall have good news about it in the not-too-distant future.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire asked whether the technology is available. Certain types of technology that have been identified immediately as potential elements of the marketplace may be available, but issues arise to be considered. We know of some technologies that are immediately available. Tag and beacon, for example, is relatively easy to deploy, and we know that it will work, but it means that every car must have a tag and we must deploy beacons along every road where we want road pricing, or around the zone of any congestion charge. The technology works well. It works on the Dartford crossing and is available on many toll roads. Some of the pilot systems that we will consider might use tag and beacon technology.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich asked how the technologies deployed in the pilots would be built into the final scheme of things. I do not have a complete answer. It would be wonderful if we could identify now the technology to deploy on pilot schemes, which would be the technology in use in 10 years' time. Realistically, that may not be possible. We may have to start with schemes that use technologies that will help us to answer questions, but that we intend to abandon in the long term because we do not see them as the ultimate answer.

[Dr. Ladyman]

One question to which an answer is vital is whether road pricing will change people's behaviour. If the answer is no we may as well stop now, because road pricing will not be the answer to congestion. Unless it makes people travel at a different time of day or on a different modality or on a different route, what is the point? It will not help us with congestion. There may be trials that we need to conduct to test that. Will road pricing affect the behaviour of the motoring public? The technology with which we ask that question might not, in the circumstances, be so significant.

We may be able to plot a technological road map to where we want to be. We may be able to identify now where the technology that we want to deploy will be in 10 years, and set milestones using different types of technology, as we move towards the final system.

Dr. Pugh: Can the Minister conceive of a situation, when the milestones are reached, in which he would say, to his surprise and against expectation, "The job is broadly done, we need not go further or have a more elaborate scheme, and we do not have to incur further expense"? Might a provisional scheme in some hot spots largely dissipate the congestion problem, or might a programme for motorways do so quite adequately, without the fine-grained satellite inspection of everyone's car movements?

Dr. Ladyman: The hon. Gentleman is right and we must keep that possibility in mind. As we conduct the pilots, we may identify the ability to solve some local problems, and that may deal with the issue sufficiently well to enable us to slow down the progress towards national road pricing, or to decide that we will never need it. On the basis of our projections—I shall come to his point about projections shortly—the Government expect the increase in traffic in the next few years, and the increased congestion that that will cause, to require us seriously to consider the possibility that 10 years from now we will need a national road pricing system for all roads to change people's behaviour.

That is our current conjecture. If it proves to be wrong and we do not need a national road pricing scheme, I have no doubt that we can slow down our progress towards it. That is one reason why it is important that we grope slowly towards such a scheme, using pilots to answer questions, using discussion and trying to establish consensus each step of the way, so that we can be open-minded about where it is necessary for us to go in the long term, but we need the scheme to be a clear possibility.

The hon. Gentleman asked about our figures and whether our modelling is based only on vehicle numbers, or whether we took other factors into account. We take into account a wide range of factors, such as economic growth, demographics, the age distribution of the population and predictions about people's behaviour. When making any long-term projection, we are somewhat in the area of futurology, so we have to make some simplifying assumptions to come up with any answers at all, but we try to take a range of factors into account. If he wants to consider them in detail, they are on the Department for Transport website for all to see. If he has any questions about them, I shall do my best to clarify the matter for him.

On the question asked by the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings about technology and how much the bit that will go into people's cars will cost, I do not have an answer. I am pretty sure that I do not want the Government to be in the business of designing it. As I have said many times in public, I suspect that if the Government designed it, it would probably be the size of a suitcase and cost several thousand pounds. It would be much better if we identified the standards—what information cars will need to exchange with the road pricing system—so that the private sector can become involved in designing the systems and building in added value.

If and when we have a system of national road pricing, an obvious benefit would be to build the technology alongside satellite navigation, which is increasingly installed in cars as standard, so that the additional cost of providing the required information to the road pricing system might be negligible. People might want to ask not only, "How do I get from A to B?" or "What is the quickest route from A to B?", but "What is the cheapest route from A to B?" They might also want a system that provides them with route-planning advice such as, "You can do this journey most quickly if you do it at this time of day." The private sector would be well equipped to build that added value into the system if one were prepared to pay for it. Therefore, the Government should try to come up with standards that we can publish, which other people can then make equipment for.

The hon. Gentleman asked about privacy, which is an important point. When the Secretary of State first announced what we were considering, there were all sorts of comments about the spy in the sky knowing where people are all the time. That is absolute nonsense and technological buffoonery. The spy in the sky is not a spy; the satellite does not know where people are. All that a positioning satellite does is to beam a signal that anyone in the world can pick up at any time, which tells the receiver the position and identity of the satellite and when it was beamed. Based on the satellite signals that the car receives, the equipment in the car carries out a process rather like triangulation to work out where the car is. Therefore, the equipment in the car knows where someone is, but the satellite and the Government do not.

Of course, if we specified that someone's car must broadcast that information to us, we would know where they were, but we do not have to specify such a system. We could specify that the car must simply broadcast how much someone owes, how far they have travelled, what time of day they have travelled or the price of the road on which they have travelled. In those circumstances, it would not be necessary for the car automatically to broadcast information about its location. We can therefore deal with the privacy issues, and people should insist that we do so. However, they should not get hung up on the notion that such issues are a showstopper, because we can design a system that does not require that information.

Several hon. Members have mentioned cost and social exclusion. On cost, we have made it clear that we do not intend the system to be revenue raising at this point. We are looking at shifting from the existing way in which motorists contribute to the Exchequer to new ways; we are not looking at the issue as a way of raising additional revenue.

I take issue with what the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire said about the previous Government's 1996 White Paper, which did not deal with road pricing in quite the way that he suggested. In fact, it suggested looking into several possible ways of paying for roads and talked about the possibility of raising additional revenue, rather than the road pricing system that we are debating.

Mr. Hurd: The Minister has made it clear that the Government's preference is for revenue neutrality. Perhaps I can link that to the pilots, which will be critical to shaping political understanding of the issue. If a local authority says, "We have to do this, but there's a lot of political risk involved, so we're only prepared to do it on a revenue-neutral basis," how will central Government deliver on that?

Dr. Ladyman: That is an excellent question, and there is no doubt that we need to explore the issue with local authority partners. We have made it clear that we are prepared to engage in a discussion about how we deal with that. Clearly, we cannot change the whole system of national taxation because one local pilot is going on. If people in that area find that whatever they pay is in addition to their national taxation, they will be entitled to say, "We're not getting a very good deal. How are we going to be repaid?" We have said that we are prepared to look at all manner of options for dealing with that, including giving the money back to the local council, which could then spend it on additional services or even on a council tax rebate—that would be a matter for the council. That might be a way of giving the extra value back to local people.

Mr. Hayes: Can the Minister just explore the regressive nature of the tax? He responded effectively to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd) by saying that there might be some way of returning the money to the community, but that does not deal with the regressive quality of this potential tax. I am particularly worried about essential car users and about rural and semi-rural areas—the pilot could cover a combined suburban and rural area in particular districts. How will the Minister deal with those issues?

Dr. Ladyman: Again, that is an excellent question, which brings me back to the point on which I was intending to conclude. Essentially, the hon. Gentleman asks how we shall deal with the issue of social exclusion, which my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich raised at the start. A congestion charge or road pricing system that created additional opportunities for public transport and for faster public transport might be one way of dealing with social exclusion. That is essentially how the congestion charge in London has dealt with the issue. The Mayor has raised money through the congestion charge. He has used a significant amount of that money to buy buses. He has designed a road network that gives a high degree of bus priority. The general lower level of congestion, the bus priority lanes, the additional buses and the expenditure on other forms of public transport essentially mean that those people who choose not to or who can no longer afford to use their car have cheap, convenient and workable alternatives. That is one way that the social exclusion problem can be dealt with. We must make sure that by doing this we are providing benefits for people.

Flexible working is another issue that must be explored. If the highest cost for using a road is between the traditional rush hour of 7 am and 9 am, employers could be encouraged to tell their employees to start any time up to midday and thereby avoid the high price roads. No doubt some employers would refuse to do that and would insist on their employees arriving by 9 am regardless of their personal circumstances. I suspect that such an employer would find it difficult to recruit staff, and would be forced by the market either to increase the wages paid to offset the road costs or to think again about the way forward. That is at least a partial answer to the social exclusion problem. Let me repeat: this will be one of the biggest issues with which we have to grapple. I have not given a complete answer to the problem at all.

Mr. Hayes: I am extremely grateful to the Minister for giving way yet again. He is grappling with incisive questions from the rising stars of the official Opposition. Let us deal with the matter of essential car users. He makes a good point about how one might deal with employment issues, but there are those, such as the chronically sick, the frail and elderly and disabled people, for whom public transport is not a practical option. Would remission of charges be a possibility in those cases? Some people could be excluded from charges because they were essential car users and that was the only way in which they could access things that were necessary for their quality of life or well being.

Dr. Ladyman: I certainly accept that we have to discuss such remissions. We must have an open mind. I would not rule them out at all. Let us not forget that, under the existing system, those essential car users already make a significant contribution through fuel duties, vehicle excise duty and the tax they paid when they purchased their car. How we deal with the shift in taxation from the existing system to the new system is not a matter for me. It will be a matter for the Chancellor. Other than my late mother, I do not think that anyone has ever suggested that I am in the running to be the Chancellor. These will be complex issues that have to be grappled with. Remission is certainly a problem.

I recently had discussions with representatives of the disabled driving lobby. They told me that we would get no support from them unless we told them that they would not pay any road charges. My immediate response was that they were already paying road charges, so were they saying that they should pay less in road charges in future? Were they demanding complete exemption, or do we need to look for a system where they pay a standard road price rather than a variable road price?

[Dr. Ladyman]

During that debate, the leading spokesman admitted that he makes a journey on a reasonably regular basis which takes him from just outside the congestion charging zone to another place just outside the congestion charging zone. If he went around the zone it would add only an extra three or four minutes to his journey, but because he has complete exemption from the congestion charge, he always goes straight through. He admitted that that was not an appropriate way to behave because he knew that the zone was there to eliminate congestion, which he was causing as much as anyone. He was prepared to engage with me and admitted that the issue is not as simple as complete remission of charges for everyone.

Those are complexities that we must debate. I can give the hon. Gentleman and anyone in the essential car-user groups an absolute promise that we are completely prepared to engage with them and discuss how we would tackle the matter through the pilot schemes and any subsequent national scheme that we might ultimately introduce.

Finally, I wish to comment on the assertion of the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) that there were two questions to answer: one about the environment and pollution, and the other on congestion. I do not agree. The question that we must address is that of congestion. Environmental issues might be solvable by other means such as clean engines or incentives to use cleaner cars. We have just introduced the 5 per cent. renewable transport fuel obligation, which is one way we can begin to deal with greenhouse gas. It may be that once we have designed a perfect system that can deal with the complexities of congestion—we have identified how difficult that alone will be—there will be an obvious way to tweak it, so that it also brings environmental benefits. However, we must first concentrate on the big question of congestion, which is quite complicated enough. Let us not be tempted to get into a debate about a tax on gas guzzlers or other polluting vehicles. Let us deal with the difficult enough questions about how we resolve congestion.

I shall finish where I started by repeating that the Government do not have a plan. We have set out our objectives and, shortly, we will outline how we intend to start groping towards a solution through pilot schemes. We are completely open-minded about technology and the other issues and problems that hon. Members have raised. We are very happy to engage with anyone and everyone including motorists' groups, people who represent transport interests and other political parties. We are happy to engage in that debate because we wish to reach consensus.

No decisions have yet been made about how the matter will ultimately be resolved. We acknowledge the complexity of the issues, but we are starting to gain some clarity about the way forward. Shortly, I hope that we shall be announcing who will participate in the first wave of transport innovation projects, and we shall look for scope for further pilots. At this stage, everything is up for grabs. I and the Secretary of State honestly wish to solve the problem with help from across as wide a spectrum of opinion as possible.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): The House thanks the Minister for his detailed response.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at six minutes to Five o'clock.